

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PREFACE.

It is with feelings of deep thankfulness to the Giver of every good gift—especially of all wisdom to plan, and power to carry out counsel into execution—that the Author has, after a very long period of most strenuous exertion, been enabled to send forth to the Public a Work, which, from its wide extent of plan, and no less comprehensiveness of particulars, may be said to constitute, in a manner, the results of the labours,—at least in the department of Theology,—of almost a lifetime. When the Author applied himself, nearly eight years ago, to the construction of a Supplementary Volume to his larger Greek Testament, he little thought that he should afterwards be called upon to furnish what he has now been enabled to accomplish; but circumstances, over which he had no control, demanded it of him. That Supplemental Volume had been, the reader will remember, constructed in fulfilment of an engagement on his part to the Public, in the Preface to the Third Edition of 1839,—that any further accessions of new matter, or alterations, for improvement, of old, should be reserved for another Volume, to be formed out of whatever additional materials the Author might be enabled, out of his multifarious reading and assiduous study, to collect in the course of such a period as should, by the mercy of God, be granted to him, with competency of health and strength, to labour in the great cause to which he had so long devoted himself; so that the Volume should contain his amended judgments and latest views, on the very many disputed points, whether of reading or interpretation, occurring in the Greek New Testament.

Accordingly, after a period of preparation as long as that to which he could safely defer the carrying out of his purpose, the Author applied himself to the working up of his long gathered materials into a regular edifice; and, after the labour of above a year and a quarter, he sent forth to the Public the long promised Volume,—with which he intended to close his labours on the New Testament; trusting, that the original Work in its most perfect state, coupled with the Supplementary Volume—of no inconsiderable bulk and quantity of matter,—would furnish Students of Theology, and Ministers, with whatever might be essentially necessary for their use.

However, not long after the publication of the Supplementary Volume, it became evident that the Public needed far more than what was there furnished according to the arrangement which it had been thought might suffice. Experience showed, that the mode in which, by that arrangement, the conjoint matter presented itself to the reader, was inconvenient, rendering necessary a process of mental labour by amalgamation, to which few persons are equal, and which involved a sacrifice of time and attention that could ill be spared, especially by Students and Ministers;—and which, after all, did not accomplish the same purpose as if the matter contained in the two Works, thus requiring to be brought together, had been regularly incorporated into one. In fact, it was ere long suggested to the Author, from the very highest quarters in the Church and the Universities, that a complete and careful amalgamation by himself of the matter contained in them both would produce a Work calculated to be highly serviceable to accomplish the end in view. No little hesitancy, however, was felt by him, in undertaking so great a labour;—involving, too, as it must, no inconsiderable pecuniary sacrifice out of his slender means. Nevertheless, being, at length convinced that the great Cause, for which he had so long laboured, demanded the exertion and the sacrifice, he felt it his duty to make it. Accordingly, undeterred by difficulty, he entered upon the undertaking with the courageous energy of his earliest course. No long time, however, had elapsed, before he found, that the labour he should have to bestow, would be far greater than he had calculated on. After a minute examination of the matter of the original Work, and carefully revolving in mind the full extent of the purpose aimed at, he became convinced that far more than a mere amalgamation, by incorporation, however skilfully executed, of the matter contained in the two Works, would be indispensable,—at least as regarded permanency of effect, with a view to the future requirements of the Public. What is more, he found the Critical Annotations of the original Work not such as he could now consider sufficient,—especially as respected the present advanced state of Critico-Biblical Science,—although he had already gone far towards supplying that deficiency in his Supplementary Volume. This, ere long, suggested the idea of a separate work of limited extent, which should present a careful fresh revision of the text, accompanied with brief Critical notes only, giving reasons for the further changes which, while drawing up his Supplemental Volume, or subsequently, he had deemed fit to be made in the Greek Text of the original work. Further, in order to thoroughly bottom the whole question, by, as it were, sounding the depths of inquiry as to the actual value and authority of the textus receptus,—and also to arrive at the truth as to the real character, and just claims to paramount authority of the earliest Uncial Codices,—he now thought it indispensable (previously to forming such a fresh revision) to obtain possession of various important facts, which might come in aid of surmise, however plausible, to fully test the true value, and consequently just authority of the MSS. in cursive characters, and to ascertain how far the statements of their contents, as set forth in the various Critical Editions, could be confided in as a true representation of their actual contents, on which must depend the determination of their full value. To accomplish this purpose, it was necessary to compare the readings of a competent number of cursive copies, as they are represented in the Critical Editions, with those supplied by a careful recollection by himself. He recollected, therefore, seven of the most important Cursive Codices, and effected a partial recollection of all the rest, of any value or authority, to which he could gain access. As the result of this labour, he found the collations, with very few exceptions, made in so very careless and inexact a way, as to be any thing but full representations of the contents. Furthermore, in order to ascertain the real value of the Cursive Codices generally, he applied himself to collate such MSS., hitherto either uncol-lated or most imperfectly collated, of the New Testament, as he could gain access to,—especially those of the Lambeth Library, to the number of 23, and those found in our great National Repository, to a far greater number. Of the former, the whole were most carefully collated by him throughout; and, with the exclusion of a few of no value, the whole of the latter, except in the Gospels of St. Luke and St. John, and great part of St. Mark; which remaining portion of his task he was sedulously engaged in accomplishing, when his labours were abruptly cut short by the necessity, which, he at length had become convinced, existed, for the, as it were, reconstruction of his long laboured Work on an enlargement of plan, such as seemed called for by the exigencies of the times, and embracing both the Critical and the Exegetical departments of Annotation. From the gradual development of this plan arose the Work, in its present vastly extended scale and improved form; and which the Author now sends forth, with some confidence of obtaining a renewal of the meed of approbation accorded by the Public to his previous endeavours to merit its patronage. To revert to the above long-continued (though not wholly completed) Critical researches, the Author may be permitted to say, that by those labours amply sufficient had been effected to enable him to see his way on very many obscure questions where he had previously been more or less in the dark. This advantage was obtained, in a great measure, by his having now acquired a complete practical acquaintance with Palæography, on which the decision of very many debated Critical questions materially depends. In carrying forward the above collations and recollations, the Author, aware that collation is the true basis of all sound Biblical criticism, kept continually in mind the state of the evidence as regarded the true reading, not a little perplexed and dubious, of very many passages of the New Testament. Moreover, in the exercise of fresh research, and further inquiry pursued in various points of view, he not only entered more fully into the true reading of disputed passages, but, in some measure, into the true interpretation of not a few variously expounded passages of the New Testament;—insomuch that he was enabled to form no inconsiderable amount of fresh matter both of Critical and of Exegetical annotation, which proved of very great service in drawing up the Work now sent forth to the Public; in the construction of which he constantly subjected the whole of the original work, together with the Supplementary Volume, to a searching examination, both with a view to correction of statement and impartment of fuller information; in fact, for improvement generally, and not least by condensation. The utmost brevity was indeed imperatively called for by the necessity of introducing, with due compression, a vast amount of new and most important matter, chiefly original—either accumulated during the labours of several years, or gathered up from various sources while the work was in progress, or being carried (very slowly and carefully) through the press. In short, the present performance comprehends, as respects the Critical notes, not only the amalgamated matter, with great enlargement and improvement, both of the original Work and of the Supplementary Volume, but the general results of the above-mentioned collations and recollations, and also of the extensive Critical researches, carried on for a period of several years. The Exegetical notes have been very considerably increased in number, and the former annotations greatly improved in various respects, and not least by the insertion of much important Geographical and Topographical matter. The Introductions to the Books of the New Testament have been, in a manner, rewritten, and the Indexes, both of Greek words and phrases and of Matters, have been formed anew, with adaptation to the Work in its present state. In the department of Philological and Grammatical discussion, the Author desires respectfully, but earnestly, to recommend, especially to his younger readers, his Lexicon to the Greek Testament, in its second and vastly improved edition;—a work which will, he trusts, prove highly serviceable to all readers of his Greek Testament, and form a most useful appendage to it. To the Student of Theology it is calculated to be peculiarly instructive, inasmuch as all the articles which involve the leading doctrines or essential truths of the Gospel, have been drawn up with especial view thereto.

The additional matter of whatever kind in the present Work, is for the most part original; but a portion of it has been derived (with acknowledgement), after condensation, from the great luminaries of Exegetical science, ancient and modern (Æcum., Chrys., Theoph., Theod., Augustin, T. Aquin., Calvin, Hyperius, Bullinger, Estius, and of more recent Theologians, Hoffmann, in his ably executed work on the Quotations from the Old Testament); also from Foreign Expositors of what is called the Orthodox School of Germany, as Olshausen, Tholuck, Stier, (now in course of translation, ably executed by the Rev. Mr. Pope of London,) also from some recent English Expositors of note. In bringing together, with orderly arrangement and due perspicuity, so vast a body of heterogeneous materials, the Author had need of all the advantages which long experience and a practised skill in composition could contribute towards the accomplishment of the purpose in view.

To revert in a general way to the two departments of his present labours—the Critical and the Exegetical. As to the former, the Author trusts that his recent very extensive researches (of which the present work contains the chief results) have enabled him materially to improve the Text which he had long ago framed;—at any rate he has been guided by a spirit alike remote on the one hand from reckless innovation, and, on the other, from a slavish adherence to what had been indeed received, but on grounds which, the Editor had become convinced, would not bear the severe test of searching examination, when conducted on the enlightened Critical principles which mark the present advanced state of Biblical science¹. As to the

1 The Author must, however, be understood as not offering the text of the Greek Testament, presented in this work, as final (far from it!), but only provisional, and subject to further changes where called for by the evidence of truth,—the whole serving to lay a firm foundation for a future superstructure, when all the cursive copies extant shall have been carefully collated, and their readings as to origin, character, &c., thoroughly settled. His view of the extent of research, to be carried out before we shall be enabled to construct a thoroughly fixed Text, entirely accords with that promulgated by the learned and judicious Mr. Scrivener of Falmouth, in the Introduction to his late valuable work, entitled “Twenty collations of Greek MSS. of the Four Gospels, hitherto uncollated,” where, after showing that Griesb. and Scholz, Lachm. and Tisch. have each failed in his attempt to classify the MSS. of the Greek Testament, chiefly for want of proper data whereon to form a sure system, owing to materials for judgment being imperfectly known,—and further remarking that “he doubts not it will be accomplished by some scholar in the next generation, who shall avail himself of the patient labours (by collation, &c.) of obscurer names,” he adds, “We will not endeavour to reap until the fields shall be seen to be ripe for harvest." He further fully proves, that "both the theory of a twofold division of the MSS. into Recensions must be abandoned, and an exclusive devotion to any single class of records, however venerable from antiquity, foregone." The Author is, indeed, disposed to suspect, with the same competent judge of these matters, that "all the MSS., Versions, and Fathers, will ultimately resolve themselves into 5 or 6 classes, by the diligent comparison of which agreeing or disagreeing testimonies, we shall at length come far nearer than the Editors who adopt the system of recensions,—though widely differing in their views,—have brought us, as to the ipsissima verba of the Sacred writers." Even Mr. Alford, in the "correction of the great mistake" which he candidly confesses he made in his first Edition of Vol. I., "by forming too high an estimate of the authority of the most ancient MSS. as determining a reading, and too low a one as to the importance of internal evidence," has arrived at a view little differing from that of Mr. Scrivener. See sect. i. ch. vi. 12, of his Prolegomena to the 2nd Edit. of Vol. I. In what is there said the Author mainly concurs; and, indeed, generally so in the Canons which, after Tischendorf, Mr. Alford lays down for our guidance in the construction of a newly revised Text. In fact, the theory of those Canons is nearly unobjectionable; but the mode in which that theory has been carried out by both Tisch. and Alf. is, as far as regards the due weight to be awarded to internal evidence, when properly weighed, not a little frustrated, in its results, from attaining that end which the theory, properly understood and duly carried out in practice, is calculated to attain. Indeed, if a wide aberration in this respect from the right course be not proved almost to demonstration in the present work, the Author will have laboured long and thought much to very little purpose. Had there been more scope, he could have multiplied his proofs of the error in question tenfold. Something additional may be effected in this respect, should he be encouraged, by the public approbation of his present labours, to bring forward some further choice Critical materials formed in the course of his long laboured Collations and Critical researches. He cannot, however, allow himself for the present to conclude, without animadverting on one, he apprehends, erroneous notion to which Mr. Alford still clings, but which his better judgment will, doubtless, ere long, enable him to cast off, with the other "things that have been,"—namely, that "long before the date of our earliest MSS. a systematic course of correction had begun, and that there existed errors of transcription of long standing." The latter may have taken place, but the former is destitute of proof or even probability. At any rate, the phenomena which offer themselves to the diligent Collator and the enlightened Critic (whose province it is to use the labours of his coadjutor, who prepares the field which he is to sow and reap), are, as Mr. Scrivener truly observes, fatal to the scheme of those persons who, as Mr. Alford, persuade themselves that a process of gradual change and corruption of the Sacred text was gradually going onwards, during the Middle Ages, till the Sacred Originals passed from the state exhibited in the most venerable uncials of A, B, C, into the stereotyped standard of the Constantinopolitan Church. There is surely no cause for believing that such a supposed Byzantine standard text had ever any existence, save in the imagination of certain modern theorists. If such a text were ever fixed, either by public authority or general usage, in what direction shall we look for it now? The only verdict of a Critical Jury must be, Non est inventa!

The above, it is hoped, true view on those agitated questions is confirmed by the following remark of Mr. Scrivener. "There is a tone and manner among Biblical students, often observable, when MSS. of the Greek Text. are spoken of, as if it were taken for granted that their value is in proportion to their date,—an assumption which forms the groundwork on which Mr. Alford has constructed the text of his Edition of the Greek Text.—as though the testimony of a document of the 12th or (even) 14th century were necessarily, and as a matter of course, far inferior in weight and probability to that of an uncial copy some 500 years older." "Now (continues he) I deny not the existence of a presumption in favour of the more ancient authority. The nearer we approach to the Apostolic times, the fewer stages that have intervened between the inspired autographs and the MS. copies before us, the less chance there is of error, or wilful alteration on the part of the copyists. What I complain of is this, that instead of looking on the case as one of mere presumption, of prima facie likelihood, such as other circumstances may limit, or entirely remove—it is regarded from the first as a settled point, that unless a monument be upwards of 1000 years old, it is hardly worth the trouble of collating; though the remark is so trite that one is weary of repeating it—that many Codices of the 10th and following centuries were probably transcribed from others of a more early date than any which now exist; the incessant wear and tear of the older copies in and Preacher, and the general Reader of Divinity. Accordingly he trusts that the Work will be found to present a constant Handbook supplying an ever ready AID, and, as far as is needed (though the materials for independent judgment are always placed before the reader), a GUIDE.—In regard to such portions as concern Systems of Theology,—nay, even points of doctrine whereon professing Christians, however sober and conscientious, have differed and do differ,—he has been anxious to lay down the course of Exegesis, (on the adjustment of which the decision of such points turns), in the most cautious manner,—ever endeavouring to open out the mind of the Spirit in the spirit of love, candour, and Christian charity; at any rate studiously avoiding to treat such passages polemically, or controversially.

Thus much may suffice as a sketch of what the Author has, by the blessing of God, been at length, after the labours of nearly a quarter of a century, enabled to accomplish for the elucidation of the Sacred Volume, in the completed Work now laid before the Public; and deeply thankful does he feel for that gracious aid from Above vouchsafed to him, in this, as well as in his former efforts, to advance the knowledge and further the communication of Divine truth. And now he desires to bless and praise God, that his fervent aspiration, very long ago expressed,—that he “might be enabled to complete what he had ventured to mark out in his mind as the extent of his labours on the Sacred Word,”—has been granted to him; a consummation which cannot but materially cheer the bright and calm late-evening of his life. He has only to hope and pray, that, whensoever to him the “night shall come, when no man can work,” he may, by Divine grace, be enabled to finish his course with joy, in the humble hope of being “accepted in the Beloved,” “written in the Lamb’s Book of life.” Nought remains, but to offer up his fervent prayers at the Throne of Grace, and to the Father of lights, that his various labours in the service of the Sanctuary carried on for a period of nearly thirty years, may be blessed to the right understanding of those “Holy Scriptures which are alone able to make us wise unto salvation, through FAITH which is in Christ Jesus.” Ἀμήν ἀλληλοῦĩa!

the Church services rendering a fresh supply indispensable.” With reference to the supposed insignificance and slight importance of the variations which the cursive MSS. present, how unfounded is such a notion, the Collations of Mr. Scrivener and the Author prove to demonstration. The latter cannot but hope and trust that he is addressing not a few candid inquirers, who love truth far more than their own theories, and who will not be disinclined to reconsider their previous views, and retrace their steps. Since the writer has, in very many of his notes, deferred much to the evidence of the Pesch. Syr. Version, he must not conclude without noticing an allegation of Lachmann’s in justification of his neglect of that most weighty authority, namely, that its most ancient and trustworthy copies are as yet uncollated, and may differ widely from the text of our printed copies, which the German critics assume has been tampered with to suit the ordinary text. Now although, until those most ancient MSS. (in the British Museum and the libraries of Oxford) have been collated with the printed text, it is impossible to dissipate such a notion, yet it must be remembered that the onus probandi rests with the broachers of that notion. Meanwhile, we may rest satisfied on the testimony of Canon Cureton (communicated to the Author and doubtless others), that the text of those MSS. very rarely differs from that of the printed copies. This, too, the Author can confirm from the additional testimony of the very eminent Syriac Scholar, Mr. Ellis, of the British Museum, and also that of two most distinguished Syriac Scholars from Germany, who have recently been engaged in collating those MSS. with the ordinary text.

ence of a Hebrew original, which is demanded by the evidence of antiquity, and is in itself very probable; for a Hebrew Gospel must, in the first age of Christianity (when almost confined to Judæa), have been as requisite as a Greek one was afterwards. And there is in the book itself, even in its present state, internal evidence of its being written, at first, especially for the use of the Jewish nation; since those circumstances are particularly dwelt on, which were adapted to establish the faith of such as believed, and to sway the minds of those who were disbelievers in the Divine mission of Jesus Christ. And in vain is it to seek to impugn the existence of the Gospel in Hebrew, by urging, as is done, that the Gospel, as we now have it, bears no marks of being a translation, but has every appearance of being an original. For surely it has far more marks of being a translation, and has far less of the air of an original, than Josephus's History of the Jewish War, avowedly a version from a Hebrew original. Yet the circumstances under which the Greek both of Josephus and St. Matthew's Gospel were respectively brought out, are such as not to warrant us in regarding either one or the other as a mere translation. There are, indeed, grounds to believe that JOSEPHUS made considerable alterations in his work when he brought it out for the use of the Greeks and Romans. And there is some reason to suppose that St. Matthew made some alterations in his Greek Gospel; especially in the interpretation of Hebrew names, and in the adaptation of the quotations from the O. T. to the Sept. version. As to the ancient versions being all formed from the Greek Gospel, that will not at all invalidate the existence of a Hebrew original, for it is admitted by all that the Hebrew Gospel had become obsolete long before even the earliest of the versions was formed.

In short, all the difficulties, which have so long embarrassed this question, will vanish, and every thing which seems at first sight strange, be accounted for, by supposing (as Whitby, Benson, Hales, and others, have done), that there were two originals (or, so to speak, editions), one in Hebrew and the other in Greek; yet both written by St. Matthew. It is true, that the existence of a Hebrew original has of late been strenuously encountered by an able writer in the Edinburgh Review, No. 191. He maintains, that "up to the time of Papias, the existence of a Hebrew Gospel is quite a matter of hearsay." And I am ready to grant that Papias does not, as has been said, give the fact on the authority of John the Presbyter. But I cannot agree with him that the expression ἀνὴρ τὰ πάντα ὅτι μάλιστα λογιώτατος, καὶ τῆς γραφῆς εἰδήμων is explained by the language of Euseb.; nor is it in the same chapter, but a preceding one (ch. 36), that those words occur; which words I am surprised that so acute a critic should not have perceived could not have come from Eusebius; for I agree with Valcinius, that the words are quite irreconcilable with those used by Euseb. of Papias, at ch. 39, as 'a person of meagre understanding, slender judgment,' and, so far from being γραφῆς (Sacred Scripture) εἰδήμων, as misinterpreting from ignorance the apostolical narrations. In fact, the words are absent from several MSS., and are rejected by the recent editors. I am indeed disposed to admit, with the Reviewer, that, from the qualities of Papias, as they are represented by Euseb., he would seem to be, as the critic pronounces, "a very uncertain authority for a story which involves so many difficulties as that of the existence of a Hebrew original of St. Matthew's Gospel." But, on carefully examining all that Euseb. has said, together with the fragments of Papias, as collected and ably annotated on by the very erudite Dr. Routh (Reliq. Sacr. T. i. p. 3-16), I am of opinion that, from the effect of some bias or prejudice on his mind (perhaps from his aversion to the Millennial hypothesis maintained by Papias, in connexion with Irenæus, and several others), Euseb. did not do full justice to the understanding of Papias; which were more highly, and perhaps justly, appreciated by Irenæus. Indeed, Papias's opportunities for coming at the truth of such a matter as the one in question, he being the disciple of St. John and the companion of Poly carp, were very great. However, I am not indisposed to acknowledge, with the Reviewer, that 'we are not warranted in considering the testimony of Irenæus for the Hebrew Gospel as separate from that of Papias, and thus forming another witness;' and I am half inclined to agree with him, that the statement of Irenæus, that 'the Hebrew Gospel of St. Matthew was written while St. Paul was at Rome, is the only thing which imparts a distinctive character to his authority; and that, if we separate this portion from the rest, by supposing it a mere error of calculation on the part of Irenæus, it is difficult to conceive the residue, as reposing on any other foundation than the tradition recorded by Papias.' But the thing is manifestly very uncertain, and it is not improbable that he had other authority for his full persuasion of the existence of the Hebrew Gospel. If Euseb. thought so meanly of Papias, is it likely that he would have held the opinion in question solely on his authority? And, as to Papias's judgment being 'disabled by the language used of him in one passage,' there is, I apprehend, nothing in his fragments, as adduced by Euseb. himself, to warrant us in regarding Papias as a person of mean intellect; at least, if the phraseology be correctly interpreted, as may easily be done by the aid of Dr. Routh: and that he was not credulous, is abundantly apparent. Upon the whole, I cannot but think that we have good reason to believe that St. Matthew did put forth his Gospel first in Hebrew, for the use of the Jews in Palestine, and afterwards in Greek, for the use of the foreign Jews and the Gentiles. In no other way but by recognizing this most early tradition, can we account for the puzzling circumstance of such a weight of authority existing, as there does, for so early a date of the publication of St. Matthew's Gospel as A.D. 41. That Origen, any thing but credulous, living a century before the time of Euseb., and also Eusebius and Jerome, held this opinion is certain from his own words, cited by Euseb. H. E. vi. 25:—ὅτι πρῶτον μὲν γὰρ

αὐτοῦ. 3^ο Ἰούδας δὲ ἐγέννησε τὸν Φαρὲς καὶ τὸν Ζαρά ἐκ τῆς ^{Gen. 28. 27.} ^{2c.} ^{1 Chr. 2. 5, 9.}

γραφται τὸ κατὰ—Ματθαῖον, ἐκδεδωκότα αὐτὸ τοῖς ἀπὸ Ἰουδαϊσμοῦ πιστεύουσι, γράμμασι Ἑβραϊκοῖς συντάταγμένον. Whether the copy of St. Matthew's Gospel, mentioned by Eusebius, H. E. v. 10, 'Ἑβραίων γράμμασι' (sermone), seen in India by Pantenus, and said to have been left there by St. Bartholomew, was a copy of St. Matthew's Hebrew Gospel, I would not undertake to aver; and I readily grant, that the thing is incapable of being rendered more than probable. More than this the nature of the case does not admit, nor the argumentation, to evince a Hebrew original, require.

But to return to a consideration of the litigated question of the date of this Gospel. On a more mature consideration of the various arguments advanced in favour of an early, and those of a later date, I must confess that the evidence for the latter seems rather to preponderate. That of antiquity, when properly weighed, is stronger for it; and the complete silence of the writers of the Apostolical Epistles as to any written Gospels, tends to the same conclusion. A late period, too, was, as Dr. Hales observes, the fittest of all; for whilst the eye-witnesses and ministers of the word were executing their commission of 'disciplining all nations, by preaching the Gospel every where,' they had scarcely leisure for writing. But when they were 'finishing their course,' in order to supply the place of their oral instructions, after their decease, writing became necessary. This induced Peter to write his Epistles to the Jewish converts, Paul his Epistle to the Hebrews, James and John their general Epistles, and likewise Matthew and John their Gospels. The marvellous difference of opinion as to the date of Matthew's Gospel, has been chiefly occasioned by the conflicting testimonies of Irenæus, as quoted by Eusebius, Eccl. H. v. 8, and of Eusebius himself, in his Eccl. Hist. iii. 24, and his Chronicon. Yet the discrepancy may be reconciled, by supposing that the time mentioned by Eusebius as the date of Matthew's Gospel, namely, the 3rd year of the reign of Caligula (some time in A.D. 40 or 41), is to be understood of the Hebrew, not the Greek Gospel. This, indeed, is plain from that writer's own words; where he says that, having spread the Gospel by word of mouth, the Evangelist, on leaving Judæa to go and preach Christianity to the Gentiles, left his countrymen his Gospel, for their information, written πατρίῳ γλώττῃ. And as to what is said by Irenæus, cited by Euseb. Eccl. Hist. v. 8, as quoted in English by Mr. Horne, iv. 257, namely, that 'Matthew put forth a Gospel among the Hebrews, while Peter and Paul were preaching Christianity at Rome,' there would seem to be no difficulty in supposing, as Mr. Horne does, in order to reconcile this discrepancy, that the words of Irenæus are to be understood of Matthew's Greek Gospel; and thereby its date will pretty nearly be fixed. But then, in the translation which Mr. Horne gives of the passage, there is a passing over of the important words τῇ ἰδίᾳ αὐτῶν διαλέκτῳ. Now this would seem to put an end to the reconciliation of the discrepancy between Irenæus and Eusebius, and oblige us to suppose that Irenæus was misinformed; which, considering his opportunities of gaining the necessary information, were improbable. It may rather be suspected that the words are corrupt (as, indeed, they have long been acknowledged to be); and the best mode, I apprehend, to emend them is simply by reading γραφῇ for γραφῆν, and εὐαγγέλιον for εὐαγγέλιον; and pointing the passage thus: ὁ μὲν δὲ Ματθ. ἐν τοῖς Ἑβραίοις, τῇ ἰδίᾳ αὐτῶν διαλέκτῳ, καὶ γραφῇ ('in their own tongue, and in writing, as opposed to preaching') ἐξήνεγκεν εὐαγγέλιον, τοῦ Πέτρου καὶ τοῦ Παύλου ἐν Ῥώμῃ εὐαγγελιζομένων, καὶ θεμιλιούντων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. These emendations are confirmed by the words of Euseb. E. H. iii. 24: Ματθαῖος μὲν γὰρ πρότερον Ἑβραίοις κηρύξας, ὡς ἔμελλε καὶ ἐφ' ἑτέρους ἵναί, πατρίῳ γλώττῃ γραφῇ παραδόντες τὸ κατ' αὐτῶν εὐαγγέλιον, τὸ λαῖκον, τῇ αὐτοῦ παρουσίᾳ τούτοις ἀφ' ὧν ἐστέλλετο διὰ τῆς γραφῆς ἀπεπλήρου, where the Editors have been not a little puzzled by the words τῇ παρουσίᾳ, and some have been ready to embrace the reading of Niceph. ii. 45, τῆς παρουσίας, which is confirmed by the version of Ruffinus. But not a single MS. confirms this reading, which, were it adopted, would present a sense quite inept. Since, however, all the copies concur in reading παρουσία, it must be retained, and interpreted as well as we can: not, however, as Christopherson and Reading have done: for the former interpretation cannot be extracted from the words, and the latter presents a sense jejune and far-fetched. All will be set right if we regard τῇ παρουσίᾳ as a dative of reference,—quod attinet; as often in the Class. and the Scrip. writers. And then the sense of the passage may be thus expressed: "For Matthew having first preached (the Gospel) to the Hebrews, since he was about to go to others, having committed to writing in his vernacular tongue the Gospel according to him, he filled up what was wanting as to his presence (by their being deprived thereof) to those from whom he was departing, by the written word of the Gospel;" i.e. the Gospel put into writing. In the Lamb. MS. 1178 (of the 10th or beginning of the 11th century), there is prefixed to this Gospel, in large and splendid gold characters, Ἰστίον ὅτι τὸ κατὰ Ματθαῖον εὐαγγέλιον Ἑβραϊδὶ διαλέκτῳ γραφῆν ὑπ' αὐτοῦ ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἐξιδόθη, ῥηνηνισθὴ δὲ (was translated into Greek) ὑπὸ Ἰωάννου. Ἐξηγῆται δὲ τὴν κατὰ ἀνθρωπον τοῦ Χριστοῦ γένεσιν, καὶ ἱστῆν ἀνθρωπόμορφον τοῦτο τὸ Εὐαγγέλιον, with allusion to the Gospel of St. John as Θειόμορφον. The passage (which confirms both the genealogy and the Hebrew origin) was doubtless derived from some ancient Greek Fathers, to whom reference is made by Theophylact in the Preface to his Commentary, according to the more complete reading found in the best edition by Finetti, Venice, 1755. But if we understand the words, as we must, of Matthew's Hebrew Gospel, we are compelled to assign to it a much later period than probability, or the words of Eusebius himself in his Chronicon, will justify. For which reason I cannot help suspecting that there yet remains some corruption; for Paul was not at

d Num. 7. 12. τὸν Ἀράμ 4 d Ἀράμ δὲ ἐγέννησε τὸν Ἀμναδάβ. Ἀμναδάβ

Rome till above 20 years afterwards; and Peter was prob. never at Rome, certainly not till A.D. 63, a short time before his martyrdom. Instead of ἐν Ῥώμῃ, the true reading, I apprehend, is ἐν Ῥώμῃ, for ἐρρωμίνως, strenuously.

Thus every discrepancy will vanish: for the labours of Peter and Paul in evangelizing and founding the Christian Church were in progress (even in the case of the latter) as early as the year 40 or 41. Of course, the passage has no bearing, as it has been supposed, on the date of the publication of the Greek Gospel. Nor do I know of any passage that has, in any writer of sufficient antiquity to deserve credit. It was, however, probably published about A.D. 57, not long before the Epistle of St. James, and meant for the same persons; i.e. Hellenists and Gentile Christians.

With respect to the authenticity of this Gospel, it is established by the most irrefragable evidence, in a long and unbroken chain of Ecclesiastical writers citing or alluding to various parts of it, from St. Barnabas down to the time of Theophylact and Photius. As to the genuineness of the two first chapters, recently called in question by the Unitarians, that too has been established incontrovertibly; these two chapters being cited or alluded to perhaps more than the rest. And, besides the harmlessness of supposing the Gospel to commence with words (ταῖς ἡμ. ἐκείναις) evidently pointing to something that preceded, ἐν δὲ ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκείναις,—we may defy the Unitarians to produce any unmutilated MS. or ancient version (though the Peschito Syriac, and the Italic versions carry us back to a period nearly coeval with the formation of the canon of the N. T.) which is without those chapters. As to the separation of the Genealogy, i. 1.—18, in some Latin MSS., that by no means implies the spuriousness of even the portion in question. And although one Greek MS. (the Cod. Ebner.) is without the genealogy, yet that was doubtless owing to the genealogy being, in the archetype, placed separate from the rest (as I have observed in two or three Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), and thus negligently passed over by the scribe.

Against this mass of positive external evidence for the genuineness of these chapters, Unitarians, indeed, oppose a show of arguments, chiefly founded on internal evidence. But these have been triumphantly refuted by Mosheim, Bishop Horsley, Abps. Magee and Laurence, Dr. Pys Smith, and others.

With respect to the title of this Gospel, Εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Ματθαίου, the word εὐαγγέλιον in the Classical writers, signifies, in general, good news, sometimes the reward given to the bearer of it. In the Septuagint and the New Testament, however, it is almost confined to the former signification, corresponding to the Heb. תּוֹרָה. In the latter it specially imports the glad tidings of the Messiah's Advent, who should deliver man from sin and death, through his merits and intercession; thus founding that spiritual and eternal kingdom predicted by the Prophets, and fulfilled by the incarnation of Jesus Christ. Hence the term at length became simply a name for the dispensation; or, the Gospel scheme, the plan of redemption through Christ. The κατὰ must not be rendered secundum, according to; for (by an idiom found in the later Greek), κατὰ with the Accus. has simply the force of a Genitive, i.e. τοῦ Ματθαίου.

Ver. 1. This verse forms a preface to chap. i. and a title to the genealogy contained in the first 16 verses; for βίβλος (like the Hebrew סֵפֶר), may denote a roll of writing, whether long or short; and also, as in the Sept. Version of 2 Chron. ii. 17, enumeration, recension, which may be the sense here; and so the Syr. and Ethiop. Versions have, descriptio.

On the following genealogy not a few difficulties exist; 1. as to discrepancies from the Old Test. history in names, which might easily arise from errors in transcription; (especially as some of the names bear great similarity, and it was not unusual for the same person to have more than one name.) 2. as to the reconciling this genealogy with that of Luke; which is best done by supposing that Matthew gives the genealogy of Joseph, and Luke that of Mary. And therefore the former (who wrote principally for the Jews), traces the pedigree from Abraham to David; and so, through Solomon's line, to Joseph, the legal father of Jesus. And it must be remembered that, among the Jews, legal descent was always reckoned in the male line. While Luke, who wrote for the Gentiles, traces the pedigree upwards from Heli, the father of Mary, through Nathan, to David and Abraham, and thence to Adam, the common father of all mankind. Finally, whatever difficulties, even after all the diligence of learned inquirers, shall exist on certain matters connected with this genealogy, we may rest assured, that if these genealogies of Christ (which must be understood to have been derived from the public records in the temple) had not been agreeable thereto, the deception would have been instantly detected. And thus, whether Christ's pedigree be traced through the line of Joseph or that of Mary, it is alike undeniable that Jesus was descended from David and Abraham; agreeably to the ancient promises and prophecies, that the Messiah should be of their seed. To the above I add, I find not one among all the Lamb. or the Mus. MSS. (collated by me) without the chapters, except by accidental mutilation from wear and tear; some having lost the first leaf, or more.

Δαυὶδ] So have I here and elsewhere edited, with Matth., Græc., Scholz., and Tisch., with the general consent of all the more ancient and correct MSS. (including the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.); for the rec. Δαβὶδ Lach. edit. Δαβὶδ, found indeed here and elsewhere in several of the most ancient MSS. (when they write fully.) But even those (together with the most ancient cursive MSS. almost universally) generally use the abbreviated form Δαδ. However the spelling arose probably from Itacism, as also Ἀμειναδάβ, for Ἀμιν. found in B. A.

— υἱοῦ Ἀβραάμ] Υἱοῦ is for ἀπογόνου, after the custom of the Hebrew, in which the correspondent word signifies any lineal descendant, however far removed: the idiom, however, is also found in Homer. Thus the general sense of υἱοῦ Δ. and Ἀβρ is 'a descendant of David and Abraham; which the Evangelist then proceeds to prove. That the Jews expected the Messiah to be such, is clear from Matt. xii. 23. xxi. 9. and xxii. 42. David is mentioned first, as being far nearer in time to their age.

2 καὶ τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς αὐτοῦ] Why these persons should be mentioned though not the Messiah's progenitors, various reasons have been alleged. See Bp. Kidder. The thing, however, need not be anxiously debated, since there is every reason to regard the genealogy as no more than a transcript from the public registers.

3 τὸν Φαρίε καὶ τ. Ζ.] Both are mentioned as being twin brothers, and striving for primogeniture, and also to identify Phares.

5. Ῥαχάβ] It has been debated, whether this was the harlot of Jericho, mentioned at Josh. ii. 1, and whose faith is so commended at Heb. xi. 31, or some other person of the same name. Theophyl. of the ancient, and many modern commentators are of the latter opinion. Ἰωβηδ for Ὠβηδ, Lach. and Tisch. from B. C. Δ., and a few cursive MSS. (to which I add Lamb. 525 and 1178), authority too slender to warrant any change. The same remark applies to the omission of ὁ βασιλ. v. 6 by L. and T., to the change of Ἀσά into Ἀσάφ at v. 8 by Lach., and of Ἀμών into Ἀμιὸν at v. 10 by L. and T., also of Ἰωσίαν and Ἰωσίας at v. 10 and 11 to Ἰωσείαν and Ἰωσείας by L.

6. Σολομῶνα] So, for Σολομῶνα, almost all the editors down to Tisch. on the authority of the most ancient and correct MSS.; to which I add the Lamb. and Mus. MSS. generally.

8. Ἰ. ἐγένν. τὸν Ὀζιαν] Ἐγένν. must here be taken in an extended sense, founded on the Jewish custom, by which children were reputed the children not only of their immediate parents, but of their ancestors; who are said to have begotten those removed several generations from them (see Is. xxxix. 7); for, by an omission not uncommon in Jewish genealogies, three kings are here omitted—Uzziah being the great grandson of Joram. The most probable reason for this omission is the curse denounced against the idolatry of the house of Ahab, to which those princes belonged.

11. ἐπὶ τῆς μετοικ.] Ἐπὶ in this use signifies about, i. e. a little over or under, an idiom also found in the Latin circa and sub. Μετοικεσία, transmigration, is an Hellenistic word applied, quasi per metonymiam, to denote the removal of the Jews from their own country to Babylon (see 2 Kings xviii. 32), and correspondent to a Hebrew word which expressed the full force of the thing by captivity.

12. μετὰ τὴν μετοικ.] Some render 'at the time of the transmigration.' But the common signification after may very well be retained; indeed Fritzsch denies that μετὰ has ever any other. Although of the ancestors of Jesus in this and the following verses, no mention is made in the O. T., yet this does not derogate from the authority of what is here recorded.

16. ὁ λεγόμενος] i. e. 'who is accounted to be and is Christ;' an idiom which is not confined to Hellenistic, but is also found in Class. Greek.

17. γενεαί] On this use see my Lex. N. T.

—δικαίους·] The Jews were accustomed to divide their genealogical reckonings into classes, doubtless to aid the memory. Here, however, the classification is important, since in each class a change is denoted.

18. On Ἰησ. and Χριστ. see my Lex. N. T.

For γέννησις six of the most ancient uncials, and about six cursive MSS. have γίνεσις, found also in Euseb. Athan. (I add Cels. ap. Origen. c. Cels. i. 28 and 58) and edited by L. and T.; while Sch. retains γέννησις, rightly, for though internal evidence might seem to favour γίνεσις, yet that was a matter of doubtful disputation, and draws two ways, since it may have arisen from the temerity of critics, and the carelessness of scribes. See Matth. Besides it were vain to contend against so overwhelming a preponderance of external authority, confirmed by, I believe, all the ancient versions. And the testimony of Fathers has in a matter of this sort very little weight. That of Celsus none, since he would be likely to use γίνεσις in the sense of descent, origin, as the more Classical term. The γὰρ after μνηστευθείσης has an inchoative and an expegetic force; as often in the N. T., Joseph., and the Class. writers. See my Lex. N. T.—For want of perceiving this, the ancient critics cancelled the word, and Lachm. followed their example.

—πρὶν ἢ συνελθεῖν] This use of πρὶν ἢ with an Infin. for πρὶν (on which see my Lex.) seems to have arisen from πρὶν, including a sort of indirect comparison. Συνελθ. is by some taken to mean coming together in one house, Xen. (Econ. x. 4; by others, to denote conjugal intercourse; which is preferable, as being more agreeable to the context, and supported by 1 Cor. vii. 5 and numerous Classical examples adduced by the Philological Commentators.

—εὗρήθη ἐν γαστρὶ ἔχουσα] Supply βρέφος, or ἐμβρυον. Examples both of the elliptical and the complete phrase are adduced by the Philological Commentators. Εὗρ. ἔχ. is almost universally taken for ἦν ἔχουσα, i. e. ἔιχε. And εὐρίσκειν is, indeed, sometimes thus used by the Classical writers. Yet so to take it here would enervate the sense. Εὗρήθη simply signif. 'was discovered to be,' = εἰφανη ἐγένετο,—by which Euthym. explains the term, perhaps with allusion to Joseph's discovery of Mary's pregnancy on her return from her long visit to her cousin Elisabeth. The ἐκ before Πνεύματος ἁγίου stands for ὑπὸ, as denoting operation, by an idiom unusual even in Hellenistic Greek. However, the words ἐκ Πν. ἁγ., are not to be closely connected in thought, though they are in expression, with εὗρήθη, but regarded,—as they are by Euthym.,—in the light of an addition subjoined by way of showing how it came to pass that a virgin should be found pregnant, namely, by the supernatural operation of the Holy Ghost.

—ἐκ Πνεύματος ἁγίου] Bp. Middleton has here an able Note, in which, exposing Wakefield's mistranslation, 'by a holy Spirit,' he concludes with detailing the various senses of the important term πνεῦμα, and the usage of the article therewith, as follows.—There are six meanings of πνεῦμα.—1. Breath, or wind; in which sense it rarely occurs: Matt. xxv. 50. John iii. 8. Rev. xiii. 15.—2. The intellectual, or spiritual part of man, as distinguished from σὰρξ, his carnal part.—3. Spirit, as abstracted from body or matter; whence is deduced the idea of immaterial agents. Comp. Luke xxiv. 34. John iv. 24. Acts xiii. 9. The πνεύματα of the demoniacs belong to this head.—4. The Spirit, κατ' ἐξοχὴν; i. e. the Third Person in the Trinity; in which acceptance, except in anomalous cases like the present, it is never used without the article. It may be observed, however, that in all the passages where personal acts are attributed to the πνεῦμα ἁγίου, and which are, therefore, adduced to prove the personality of the Holy Spirit, the article is invariably prefixed. See Matt. xxviii. 19. Mark i. 10. Luke iii. 22. John i. 31. Acts i. 16. xx. 28.—5. The influence, not the Person of the Spirit; in which sense, except in cases of reference, or renowned mention, the article never appears.—6. The effects of the Spirit in the senses disposition, character, faith, virtue, religion, &c.; also to denote evil propensities, arising from the influence of the Evil Spirit. In all these cases, the Article is inserted, or omitted, according to circumstances. See more in my Lex. Hence it is evident, as a necessary consequence, that the Holy Spirit is not, as some aver, a mere influence, but a Person; also that the sacred writers clearly distinguish the influence from the person of the Spirit. See more in Bp. Sanderson, Sermon. pp. 594, 595, and Robinson's Lexicon in v.

19. δίκαιος] This is by some ancients and many moderns explained in the sense merciful, lenient; as we say a worthy good man. But the usual acceptance of the word is not less apposite, as denoting a lover of justice, and a man of uprightness and integrity. Being such, he determined to put her away by law; and yet, with that mercy which ever accompanies true justice, he wished not to make her a public example, but to do it privately; i. e. with only the two witnesses required to attest the delivery of the bill of divorce; which did not necessarily state the reason for the divorce.

—παραδειγματίσαι] I have now edited

[*παρά*δειγμ., for there is some reason to think that δειγματίσαι, though found in only four MSS. (yet those among the most ancient), may be the true reading, and παράδειγμ. a critical correction (on which use see my Lex.); for παράδειγμ. is the term used in this sense by the Class. writers, and δειγμ. is never used by any but the Greek Fathers, though once by St. Paul, Coloss. ii. 15, ἰδειγματίσεν, sine var. lect. So rare a term was likely to be altered to the usual one, παράδ., while the reverse is not to be thought of. It may have been a provincialism, Cilicium, or Syriasm. The word παράδειγμ., found only in the Sept. and the later Greek writers, properly signifies, 1. to make an example of; 2. to inflict punishment on, as Jer. xiii. 22, and often Polyb., or to expose to ignominy.

— ἐβουλήθη denotes, not will, nor counsel; but inclination of will, 'was inclined.' See my Lex. 'Ἀπολῦσαι, to divorce.

20. ἐνθυμηθέντος On this word see my Lex. — ἰδοὺ This, like the Heb. הִנֵּה, and Latin ecce, is often used, as here, to prepare the reader for something unexpected and wonderful. It is very rare in the Class.; but an example occurs in Eurip. Herc. Fur. 1066.

— ἄγγελος Κυρ. 'Ἄγγελος is used both as an appellative, denoting office, (then to be rendered a messenger;) and as the title of a particular class of beings; and should be rendered an Angel.

— κατ' ὄναρ See my Lex. In the times of Patriarchism, as well as the earlier ages of Judaism, God often revealed his will by dreams, or visions, not only to his own people, but to the nations at large. The ancients in general much regarded them; and rules for their interpretation were formed, both among Jews and Gentiles; the former of whom were, however, forbidden to seek their interpretation from any but the Prophets of the Lord, or the High Priest. These significative dreams had long subsisted; while, there is reason to think, prophetic dreams, or (as in the case of Angelic intervention, Gen. xxi. 11) visions, had, except in the case of Simon the Just, ceased after the time of the last of the prophets, Malachi. Now, however, this channel of communication between God and man, in addition to that of direct revelation, became re-opened in the prophetic dream of Joseph.

— παραλαβεῖν Scil. eis olkían, supplied in Lucian, Timon 17. The παρά refers to the parents, from which the bride was received.

By τὴν γυναῖκά σου is to be understood the betrothed wife; for as the betrothed had the same rights as the actual wife, the term γυν. was applicable to her.

— τὸ γεννηθὲν The neuter is commonly used of the fœtus in utero, since its sex is yet unknown.

21. τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ Commonly explained as put for αὐτόν, and usually accounted a Hebraism; but the idiom sometimes occurs in the early Greek writers; nor is it properly put for αὐτόν.

— σώσει—ἀπὸ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν αὐτῶν By sins are here meant especially the dominium of these, the being in subjection to them; and the best proof and illustration of this is found in Rom. vi. 14, ἁμαρτία γὰρ ὑμῶν οὐ κυριεύσει, οὐ γὰρ ἴστε ὑπὸ νόμον, ἀλλ' ὑπὸ χάριν. Of course, this dominion of sin over the man implies his habitual practice of it, as in the verses preceding the passage just cited, μὴ βασιλεύτω ἡ ἁμαρτία ἐν τῷ σώματι, οἷς τὸ ὑπακούειν αὐτῇ ἐν ταῖς ἐπιθυμίαις αὐτῶν, μηδὲ, &c., and this deliverance from its yoke is equiv. to what is called in 2 Pet. i. 9 and Heb. i. 3, ὁ καθαρισμὸς τῶν πάλαι ἁμαρτιῶν, i. e. by the blood of Jesus, where the GUILT, and consequently penalty, of sin must be included.

— σώσει—αὐτῶν On the important term σῶζειν see my Lex. The preservation here meant is, a deliverance, both from the punishment of sin, by Christ's atonement, and from the dominion of sin by his procuring for men the grace of the Holy Spirit, to enable them to resist it successfully. Αὐτός has here the emphatic use, for ἑαυτός or οὗτος (on which see my Lex.), q. d. 'for He, and no other, shall save,' &c.

22. This and the next verse contain not the words of the angel, as some have supposed, but an observation of the Evangelist; and the τοῦτο δὲ ὅλον refers not only to what has been mentioned in the preceding narrative, but also to all other circumstances connected with the transaction there recorded, and which contributed to bring about the event.

23. ἢ παρθένος The Article denoting that particular virgin who was prophesied of from the beginning, and whose seed was to bruise the serpent's head.

— καλέσουσι τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ Ἑμμ. The use of the third person plural without a nom. expressed or implied in the context, and left to be understood from the nature of the thing (by which ἀνθρώποι is meant), is not unfrequent in the N. T., and in all such passages a passive sense may be brought in; as here, 'a name by which he shall be called' (see Rom. ix. 26), it shall be an appellation ascribed to him. Here the idiom has peculiar force, and brings to mind a very similar passage of Jerem. xxiii. 6.

— καλίσουσι] scil. ἄνθρωποι, i. e. 'his name shall be called, or δὲ': for the fulfilment of the prophecy depends, not upon Christ's literally having borne the name Emmanuel, but upon his being such; which he clearly was as GOD-MAN. Thus the Evangelist has interpreted both Emmanuel and Jesus, to show that the prophecy was fulfilled, not in the names, but in their signification or application.

²⁵ ἕως οὗ ἔτεκε] 'This does not necessarily imply his knowledge of her afterwards, though it suggests the affirmative rather than the negative.' (Campb.) The allegations produced on the contrary side are, as Whitby has shown, not quite to the point. The suffrage of antiquity (which speaks in the negative) is indeed not lightly to be set aside: yet even that was not constant, nor without dissent. The question, however, is one of mere curiosity; and we may safely say, with St. Basil (cited by Bp. J. Taylor), that 'though it was necessary for the completion of the prophecy, that the mother of Jesus should continue a virgin until she had brought forth her first-born; yet what she was afterwards it is idle to discuss, since that is of no manner of concern to the mystery.'

— αὐτῇ τὸν πρωτ. omitted by L. and T.; but on authority too slender to be followed.

CH. II. 1. τοῦ Ἰησοῦ γεννηθέντος—μάγοι—παρεγένοντο] Meaning 'after Jesus' being born,' i. e. as seems implied in the whole air of the narrative, soon after his birth; for I cannot agree with those Biblical chronologers who fix this visit of the Magi to the period of two years after the nativity. There is too strong an impression of close proximity in the occurrences here mentioned to admit of this view. Whether, indeed, so long a space as forty days (which Benson fixes) intervened between the birth of Jesus and the visit of the Magi, I doubt. Far less seems more probable. And this view is confirmed by the weighty authority of Just. Mart. Dial. cum Tryph., who in five different passages adduced by Anger, Synops. Evang., says (probably from trustworthy tradition) that the visit took place ἅμα τῷ γεννηθῆναι Ἰησοῦν, very soon after the birth.

— μάγοι] The term adopted in our Translation, wise men, is not sufficiently definite, since the persons were a particular caste, as distinguished by their peculiarities as were any of the Grecian sects of philosophers. The word (better left untranslated, as in the Syriac, Arabic, Ital., and Latin Versions) of Hebrew origin (מג), whence Gr. μῆγ-ας), and designated throughout the East (and especially Persia, the original seat of this class of persons), the priests and men of letters in general; who devoted themselves to the study of divine and human science, especially medicine and astronomy, or rather astrology. Their doctrines are said to have been derived from Abraham, or at least purified by him from Zaban idolatry. They again became corrupted, and were again purified by Zoroaster, who is supposed to have been a descendant of the Prophet Daniel; deriving from him that intimate knowledge of the Mosaic writings which his religion evinces. From what quarters soever the persons in question derived their information, whether, as some suppose, from a prediction of Zoroaster (whom they believed to have been divinely inspired), or (as others think) from a prophecy of the Arabian prophet Balaam, is uncertain. Be that as it may, a general expectation then prevailed in the East, that a most extraordinary personage was about to be born, who should be Sovereign of the world. Vide Menag. ad Diog. Laert. i. 1. Porphy. de Abst. iv. 16. Perizon. ad Ælian. Var. Hist. ii. 17. Hyde de Relig. Vet. Pers. 31, et Brisson de Princ. Pers. 179. 'Ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν should be taken, not with παρεγένοντο, but with μάγοι (comp. Matt. xxvii. 57, ἄνθρωποι πλούσιοι ἀπὸ Ἀριμαθαίας), ἐλθόντες, or something equivalent, being implied. The term ἀνατολ. might apply to any one of the countries assigned as the residence of these Magi—whether Arabia, Persia, Chaldaea, or Parthia. The last mentioned may seem most probable, since the words of ver. 2 appear to intimate a country somewhat remote from Judaea. But the authority of Just. Mart. contr. Tryph. L. iii. and the Protevang. Jacobi, both writers living at a time when tradition was yet strong, determine in favour of Arabia; as, indeed, the nature of the offerings would suggest.

θεὸς βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων; εἶδομεν γὰρ αὐτοῦ τὸν ἀστέρα ἐν τῇ ἀνατολῇ, καὶ ἤλθομεν προσκυνῆσαι αὐτῷ. ³ Ἀκούσας δὲ Ἡρώδης ὁ βασιλεὺς ἐταράχθη, καὶ πᾶσα Ἱεροσόλυμα μετ' αὐτοῦ ⁴ καὶ συναγαγὼν πάντας τοὺς ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ γραμματεῖς τοῦ λαοῦ, ἐπυνθάνετο παρ' αὐτῶν, ποῦ ὁ Χριστὸς γεννᾶται. ⁵ Οἱ δὲ εἶπον αὐτῷ Ἐν Βηθλεὲμ τῆς Ἰουδαίας· οὕτω γὰρ γέγραπται διὰ τοῦ προφήτου ⁶ Καὶ σὺ Βηθλεὲμ, γῆ ^c Micah 5. 2. ^d John 7. 42.

— εἶδομεν γάρ, &c.] It would be out of place here to detail the various opinions that have been promulgated concerning this star; of which the only one entitled to attention is that of Dr. Hales, Anal. iii. 55, that it was a luminous meteor, at no great distance from the earth, exceedingly brilliant (as we learn from Ignat. ad Ephes. xix.) and called a star from its resemblance thereto, and formed, and its motion regulated, preternaturally, so as to descend so low as to mark out a single house. We may compare a similar preternatural appearance in the cloudy pillar which indicated to the Israelites the place for encamping in the Desert, Exod. xxxiii. 9. The course the Magi were to take was probably suggested to them by revelation; or they may have learnt it from some old tradition of the Jews, that a new star would appear at the coming of the Messiah.

— προσκυνῆσαι αὐτῷ] προσκ. signifies properly 'to kiss one's hand' towards a person in token of deep respect. As to the sense here, it is not possible to define the exact nature of this προσκύνησις; because in the East (though never in the West) the prostration of the body to the very earth (which this word imports) was paid alike to monarchs and to gods. Whether, therefore, it was adoration, or reverential homage, may seem doubtful, and the latter is adopted by the German commentators; but if we consider the Divine revelation vouchsafed to them, the Magi could scarcely but view the new-born exalted personage as one far above any earthly monarch; and, if at all acquainted with the Prophecies of the Old Testament (which we can scarcely doubt), they might very well expect far more in the Messiah than the human nature; and, accordingly, a far higher sense must be recognized. Dr. Pye Smith, indeed (Scr. Test. vol. ii. p. 290), after remarking that, of the 60 times that the word occurs in the New Test., 35 clearly respect the homage [by adoration] due to the Most High God, while about 20 relate to acts of homage to Christ our Saviour, of which Dr. S. thinks it cannot be said that any necessarily denote (as in John xx. 28 and Heb. i. 6) the worship due to God. But this is too refined a distinction. See my remarks on the Scripture use of the word in my Lex. Here both reverential homage and adoration seems to be meant.

3. ἐταράχθη] This perturbation was occasioned by the prevalent persuasion, that the reign (then supposed to be near at hand) of the Messiah would be ushered in by a long train of national calamities. Ἐταράχθη is to be taken in a twofold sense, so as to suit each of the two subjects to which it belongs. As regards Herod it denotes perturbation, occasioned by fear lest he should be deposed, and his dynasty be put down by the claims of one said to be born King of the Jews; as regards the people of Jerusalem, the term denotes commotion, a state of mind fluctuating between hope that they might be delivered from a tyrant they had groaned under, and fear lest some disastrous effects should arise, as had been the case on former occasions, from his savage disposition when roused by any suspicion of political disturbance. These appearances were soon justified by the horrible slaughter recorded at v. 16.

4. τοὺς ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ γραμματεῖς] Meaning all the members of the Sanhedrim, or great Ecclesiastical Council. By ἀρχ. we are to understand not only the ἀρχιερεῖς, and his deputy (the Sagan), but all those who had passed the office, and who still by courtesy enjoyed the title, and probably wore an Archieratical robe; also (some say) the heads of the 24 courses of Priests engaged. The γραμματεῖς were persons employed either in transcribing, or in explaining the Sacred books, and were distributed into two orders, Civil and Ecclesiastical. Among them were the νομικοὶ (or lawyers), mentioned in the New Test., who were, indeed, the only persons occupied in teaching the law and religion to the people at large.

— γεννᾶται] Render, 'is (by prophecy) to be born'; an idiom found also in John vii. 42, ἀπὸ Βηθλεὲμ—ὁ Χριστὸς ἔρχεται.

6. Καὶ σὺ Βηθ.] To reconcile the seeming contradiction here between the Evangelist's citation, the Hebrew original, and the Sept. Vers., Mr. Alford would regard the words as part of the answer of the Sanhedrim to Herod, and not a citation of the Prophet by the Evangelist. But I agree with Bp. Jebb in thinking that there is no reason to resort to this strange fancy of St. Jerome (for such it is) adopted by Michaelis and almost all the German Commentators, by which St. Matthew is supposed to merely report the answer of the Chief Priests, with all its glosses and misrepresentations of the Divine original, a view quite inadmissible, for many reasons which have been ably stated by Hoffmann in his Dem. Evangel. tom. i. p. 14, seqq., where he enters at large into the discrepancies of the Hebrew, the Sept., and the Evangelist, and at length draws forth a very satisfactory solution of the difficulties. After first adverting to the general solution offered by Jerome, that the citation is merely from memory, which easily deceives, and justly rejecting it as destructive of the authority of Sacred Scripture, and fully evincing that the other view of Jerome and Father Simon is equally inadmissible, he proceeds to remark that the best general answer to all alleged discrepancies is to say, that the Evangelists and Apostles did not anxiously confine themselves to

the words of Scripture, but thought it enough to relate its sense. Accordingly, they have not unfrequently expressed those words only which suited their present purpose, nay, have occasionally made slight changes of expressions for this end, 'ut non interpretēs tantum, sed etiam exegētæ simul casent.' Having premised thus much generally, he proceeds to adduce all the principal special solutions of the difficulty that have been proposed. First, he shows that the change of 'Bethlehem Ephrata' into 'Bethlehem terram Judæ' was quite allowable, and that the latter was, on this occasion more suitable, as pointing not only to the birth-place of the Messiah, but to the tribe from which He was to be born. The change of little into least is, he remarks, very slight, and was there called for by the context, which suggests a superlative, though, as the Hebrew language has no superlative grammatical form, it was necessary to supply that want in that version, as has been done by the Sept. in ὀλίγοστος, and by the Evangelist in ἐλάχιστος, which is far more suitable. As to the change of the Affirmative of the Prophet into the Negative of the Evangelist, after reviewing the various solutions, he decides in favour of that suggested in the foregoing solutio generalis. Finally, he observes that this mode of solution was adopted by Chrys., Theophyl., De Lyra, Bellarmine, and Estius, and others, down to Carpov. and Michaelis. In short, it is a paraphrastic version of a passage, that, even in the original, has been thought so obscure, that almost all the ancient Versions are more or less paraphrastic, and too free for an exact version. Yet the Hebrew words admit of being fixed to the sense following:— 'And thou Bethlehem Ephrata art small to be [reckoned] (i. e. so as to be reckoned) among the thousands (i. e. heads of thousands) of Judah.' This reading is confirmed by the Sept., the Chaldee Paraph. and Sol. Jarchi, and of recent interpreters, by Hoffmann, Maurer, and Henderson. I do not approve, however, of their introducing (after Sept., Syr., and Vulg.) the particle 'though,' and yet some such a course only weakens the force meant to be communicated by the ayyndeton, q. d. (expressed fully) 'Too small to be reckoned, say ye? Out of it, I say, shall issue,' &c. The discrepancy in the last clause is too minute to claim notice, since the general sense is precisely the same: and as to the use of ποιμανεῖ, that may have been suggested, as Hoffmann thinks, to the Evangelist by the fourth verse of the Prophet; or rather, as Keuchen thinks, by other passages of Scripture, c. g. 2 Sam. v. 2: Σὺ ποιμανεῖς τὸν λαόν μου, τὸν Ἰσραήλ, καὶ — σὺ ἔσῃ εἰς ἡγούμενον ἐπὶ λαόν μου Ἰσραήλ. Though the expression is there used especially to intimate David's origin, as taken from following and tending the sheep, to tend and care for the people Israel. And so here the Evangelist chooses the term ποιμανεῖ, in preference to ἀρχὼν ἔσται, to suggest the true nature of Christ's kingdom, as not political, but pastoral; not domineering, but mild, gentle, and useful to the ruled, in the very character predicted by the prophet, Isa. xl. 11, 'He shall feed his flock like a shepherd.'

— γῇ Ἰούδα.] Almost all Commentators regard γῇ as used in the sense πόλις: of which they adduce many examples from the Greek Tragedians. But in them, if γῇ be put for πόλις, it is only by πόλις having the sense a country, or state; for Seidler on Eurip. Troad 4, and Fritz. in loc. rightly deny that γῇ is ever so used. There is, however, no reason to resort to the reading proposed by Fritz., τῆς Ἰουδαίας, since the common reading may be tolerated, if γῇ be taken in the sense district, canton, as in Hesiod. Opp. 161: ἐφ' ἐπατύλῳ Θήβη. Καδμηίδι γαίῃ, where there is the same apposition.

7. τὸν χρόνον τοῦ φαι. δστ.] The partic. φαιν. is not to be taken for an Imperf. nor for an Aorist, as the recent Commentators suppose, but, as I have always said, for a Present, intimating, by implication, continuance as well as beginning; the time of the star (i. e. the star's) appearing, i. e. the time of its appearance by rising above the horizon. Comp. Hom. II. viii. 552: ὡς δ' ὅτ' ἐν οὐρανῷ ἀστρα—φαίνεται' (for φαίνεται) ἀριπρεπία; and Hesiod. Opp. 607: εὐτ' αὖν (for ὅταν) πρῶτα φανῇ σθίνος Ὀρίωνος.

8. The use of the Participles πορευθ. and ἐλθ. is generally referred to pleonasm, but wrongly; there being rather (especially when associated with verbs in the Imperative) an intensity of sense in them, intimating speed in the action. See Matthiæ, G. G. § 55.

9. εἶδον] For εὗρον. So almost all the MSS. Versions and Fathers, which has been received by almost every editor.

— ἕως ἔλθων ἔστη] The Indic., and not Subj., used after ἕως, by way of denoting the certainly of the action, as at Matt. xxiv. 39. Jos. Bell. iii. 10. 3: ἕως τῷ πλήθει βιασάμενοι, καὶ διεκπεσόντες, εἰς τὴν πόλιν συνέφυγον.

For ἔστη, L. and T. read ἐστάθη, from five MSS. and some Fathers; an authority too slender to justify the change, esp. considering that the Pesch. Syr., and Vulg. Versions defend ἔστη, and internal evidence is rather in its favour. I doubt not that ἱσθάθῃ is an alteration, as the word manifestly is at Luke xxiv. 36, ἱσθη, and at Matt. xxvii. 11, ἱσθη ἔμπροσθεν τοῦ ἡγ., where ἱσθάθῃ, though read by Lachm. and Tisch., is a mere gloss, or a correction of language.

^{10.} ἰχάρησαν—σφόδρα] The subjoining of a cognate substantive to any verb to impart intensity of sense is not a mere Hebraism, but is found also in the Classical writers. The addition of σφόδρα to μέγας is a relique of early antiquity, originating when the superlative was formed (as in the Northern languages), not by a termination, but by the addition of a particle, usually put after the adjunct.

^{11.} θησαυροὺς αὐτῶν] “their caskets” (lit. treasure boxes), as found in Joseph. Ant. ix. 2, ξυλίων θησαυρῶν. See 2 Kings xii. 9, κιβωτόν, “a money-box.” I know of no other example.

—προσένεγκαν—δῶρα] This was agreeable to the Oriental custom (even yet retained), of never appearing before a King, or any great personage, without offering him gifts; usually the choicest productions of the country of the giver. From the nature of the presents it has been usually supposed that the Magi came from Arabia.

[^{12.} 22. χρηματισθέντες κ. ὁ] “being warned [of God] by vision.” Χρηματίξω (from χρήμα and χάραμαι) signifies prop. and gener. to do business, whether private or public; but more freq. as used of Kings and Magistrates, to despatch business, esp. to give audience, and return answers; and hence in New Test., Sept., and Jos., to impart Divine warnings, either by answer of oracle, or by vision, or by Spiritual impulse; and the Pass. “to be thus warned, or admonished,” to receive such warning. And the verb is used either absolutely, as in Heb. viii. 5; xi. 7; xii. 25, as foll. by ὑπὸ τοῦ Πνεύματος τοῦ ἁγίου, Luke ii. 26, or ὑπὸ ἀγγέλου ἁγίου, as x. 22, also absol. and foll. by Infin. here, and by implic. v. 22. And so Luke ii. 26 in Cod. P. and the Ital. Vers. χρηματισμῶντος ἡμ. This use is very rare in the Class. writ.; but two examples at least in the cognate verb χάραμαι are found in Aristot. Rhet.

ii. 23. 12: Ἀγασίπολις ἐν Δελφοῖς ἐπηρώτα τὸν θεόν (καχρημῶντος πρότερον Ὀλυμπιάσιον) αὐτῶν, &c. 2. Æschyl. Pers. 834, Blomf., σωφρονεῖν καχρημῶντος—“being Divinely warned to be temperate, or sober-minded,” where to read καχρημῶντος, from the Schol., with Schulz and Blomf., or to take καχρ. for χρῆζοντες, with Hermann, would spoil the sentiment, which is, “Do ye, who are Divinely admonished to be sober-minded (prudent), make him prudent, instruct him by reasonable admonitions.”

^{13.} Αἴγυπτον] A better place of refuge could not be found, from its independence on Herod. And as there were many Jews settled there, who enjoyed both civil protection and religious toleration, it would be at once a safe and a commodious place of residence.

—ἴσθι] “continue, remain.” Ἔως ἂν εἶπω σοί, namely, “what thou must do further.”

^{14.} νυκτός] By night, to conceal his departure; and the very night of his receiving the vision, to show his ready obedience.

—ἐξ Αἰγύπτου—μου] “These words (from Hos. xi. 1) are not cited merely by way of accommodation or allusion,” but, referring primarily to the deliverance of the children of Israel out of Egypt, they were, secondarily and figuratively, fulfilled in the person of Christ. That Israel was indeed a type of Christ, appears from Exod. iv. 22, where he is called by God his son; his first born: whence also Israel is put for Christ, Isa. xlix. 3. Now as a prophetic prediction is then fulfilled, when what was foretold is come to pass, so a type is then fulfilled when that is done in the antitype which was before done in the type. It is no objection that the remainder of the prophecy does not belong to Christ, as the Evangelist only notices the resemblance between the type and antitype, in that both were called out of Egypt.” (Whitby.) I am now of opinion that the view taken by the Reviewer in the British Critic, though more facile, and agreeable to ordinary comprehension, is less just than that of Whitby. There is, however, more of soundness and truth in the view taken by Dr. Pye Smith (Scrip. Test., vol. i. p. 341, seq.), who denominates such instances as this, 'pre-arranged allusions'; and he ably shows that the Applications thus made to the Messiah were not arbitrary; not made because of a fortuitous coincidence, but possessing a real and just connexion formed by the comprehensiveness of the Divine Plan, and the providential disposal of various seemingly inconsiderable events. For myself, I am inclined to agree with the learned and orthodox Hoffmann, Demonstr. Ev., vol. i. p. 34, who, after an able discussion, acquiesces in the opinion which holds a medium between the two views. And he maintains that the passage of Scripture treats literally of ISRAEL, but (and indeed from the intention of the Holy Spirit) figuratively of CHRIST, and the Scripture involves both Type and Antitype; the Type being the leading of Israel from Egypt. This view, he shows, has been taken by some of the most eminent Theologians ancient and modern.

16. ἐνεπαίχθη] Lit. 'was trifled with, imposed upon,' i. e. as Herod took it, so Jer. x. 14. Bar. iii. 17, and sometimes in the Class. writers.

—ἀποστείλας] It is unnecessary to suppose any ellipsis, as of τινάς or ἀγγέλους (any more than in the Latin mittere, which is similarly used). Nor is there any pleonasm in ἀποστείλας, but merely a vestige of primitive verbosity. Τοὺς παῖδας, 'the male children'; for though the masculine is sometimes used with nouns of the common gender, in reference to the whole species, both male and female; yet that is chiefly in the Classical writers, and where the context and the subject suggest the right application.

—ἀπὸ διετούς] It is not quite certain whether διετ. here be in the neuter or the masculine gender. It may be in the former; and this is supported not only by Pollux i. 54, but by passages of Æschyl., Isæus, Demosth., and Aristot., as cited in Steph. Thes.; and if so, it is a Subst. meaning bimatus, biennis, a space of two years—and so the word was taken by the Vulg. Transl. But what is, I apprehend, the constant usage of the Sept., in this and its cognate terms, is in favour of the masculine, and that this is good, though not Attic, Greek is certain from Pollux ii. 28. But then it will be an adject. used substantively by the ellip. of βρίφος or παιδίων, just as in Engl. we say a two-year old, at least speaking of animals. And this is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., and all the other Versions, except the Vulg. and the Sahidic. The words intra bimatum in the passage of Macrob. Saturn. ii. 4, cited by the Commentators, by no means 'look very like a quotation from our narrative,' as Mr. Alf. imagines; nor is it possible that the saying of Augustus was founded on the Evangelist. The news of Herod's atrocity would have been sure to reach the Emperor's ear first from other quarters—besides the Gospel narrative was not in being until many years after. Nor ought we to mix up Macrobius's account with that of the Evangelist. As to the anecdote showing, as Mr. Alf. says, great ignorance of the chronology of Herod's reign—one would think that gentleman supposed the account in Macrobius made up to confirm the Gospel narrative; yet Macrobius was not a Christian. It is true that Antipater, the last of Herod's sons put to death by him, was (as he says) of full age at his execution, nay quite an elderly person, as Augustus must very well have known, for Antipater had just before been spending some months at Rome. Thus it is clear that Augustus could not have uttered the words which Macrob. seems to put into his mouth; nor could Macrob. be so ill informed as to have written them. I suspect that some grievous corruption has crept into his text, and I doubt not that he wrote, not inter, but præter, besides, which will make all right, for the Bethlehemite children and Antipater were cut off at nearly the same time. For intra, too, read infra. One may wonder how Scaliger on Euseb. p. 168 could have expressed surprise that 'such a saying should have escaped from the lips of the Emperor, since August. had himself confirmed the capital condemnation of Herod on his three sons.' That cannot be true, except of the two younger sons. The elder was, as we find from Josephus, put to death without the least delay. But if the passage be written with the two facile emendations which I propose, the words may very well have been said by the Emperor; and thus, too, the able writer of the Saturnalia will be rescued from a blunder grave enough to stultify a whole book.

17. ὡς τὸ Ἱερ.] B, C, D, Z, and several ancient cursive MSS. (to which I add Lamb. 528, 1175, 1178, 1192), have διὰ Ἱερ., which is confirmed by the Syr., Italic, Vulg., and other Versions, also by Just. Mart. and Chrys., and is edited by Lachm. and Tisch. It is probably, but not certainly, the genuine reading. The reading of MS. D, ὡς τὸ Κυρίου διὰ, found also in Cod. Ravianus, the Ed. Bryling., and the Brit. Mus. MS. 1649, rather casts a shade on the other, as seemingly a second and improved edition (so to speak) of the same critical alteration.

17, 18. It is far from being certain that there is not here a strict Application, and not, as almost all recent Expositors think, a mere Accommodation of the words of the Prophet: at least such is the opinion of several eminent Expositors, both Roman Catholic and Protestant; and this view has been recently maintained by Bp. Jebb and Mr. Forster in an able Dissertation. I am, however, inclined to adopt the middle course

κλαυθμός, και ὀδυρμός πολὺς· 'Ραχήλ κλαίονσα τὰ τέκνα αὐτῆς· καὶ οὐκ ἤθελε παρακληθῆναι, ὅτι οὐκ εἰσὶ. ¹⁹ Τελευτήσαντος δὲ τοῦ 'Ηρώδου, ἰδοὺ, ἄγγελος Κυρίου κατ' ὄναρ φαίνεται τῷ 'Ιωσήφ ἐν Ἐαῖγύπτῳ, ²⁰ λέγων· 'Εγερθεὶς παράλαβε τὸ παιδίον καὶ τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ, καὶ πορεύου εἰς γῆν 'Ισραὴλ· τεθνήκασι γὰρ οἱ ζητοῦντες τὴν ψυχὴν τοῦ παιδίου. ²¹ Ὁ δὲ ἐγερθεὶς παρέλαβε τὸ παιδίον καὶ τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἦλθεν εἰς γῆν 'Ισραὴλ. ²² ἀκούσας δὲ, ὅτι 'Αρχέλαος βασιλεύει ἐπὶ propounded by Rambach, Bengel the elder, Michaelis, and Hoffmann; according to which the words of the Prophet are to be understood generally of the wailing of Rachel over the taking away of her sons, first by the Babylonish and Assyrian captivity, and subsequently by the infanticide at Bethlehem. And surely when we consider how imperfect, at best, is the insight we can have into the full import of prophetic, and still more of typical, actions [and Mr. Forster maintains that the prophecy of Jeremiah was meant as a connecting link between the type and the antitype], good reasons may be given for regarding this as the safest view to be adopted.

— θρήνοι—πολύς]. The words θρήνοι καὶ are omitted in B, Z, 1, 22, almost all the Versions, and some early Fathers, and are cancelled by L, T, and Alf., whom I cannot follow. External authority is quite insufficient (all the Lamb., all the Br. Mus. MSS. have the words, and so has the Sept. sine v. 1.). It may, indeed, be urged that internal evidence is against the words, which may have been introduced from the Sept.; though the Evangelist meant to follow the Hebrew. But that is very improbable; and strange were it that the words should creep into all the copies but three. And though we cannot pronounce with certainty whether the Evangelist meant to follow the Hebrew or the Sept., yet the latter is by far the more probable. As to the variation between the Sept. and the Hebrew, I suspect that the Sept. Translators, wishing to do full justice to a term so pregnant in meaning as the Hebr. תָּרַח, chose to express it by a Hendiadys = a compound term, in order to correspond better to the very strong subsequent expression תָּרַח, presenting one of the most powerful superlatives in the Hebrew language, denoting weeping the most bitter. It is plain that the three substantives, together with the addition of the adjunct πολύς, are no more than necessary to draw forth the full force of the Hebrew. It may, indeed, be objected that the Evangelist could not mean to follow the Sept., because that has θρήνον καὶ κλαυθμὸν καὶ ὀδυρμὸν. I answer, that such was not, I suspect, the original reading therein, but θρήνοι, καὶ κλαυθμός καὶ ὀδυρμός, which is preserved in Theodoret, and also in the Complut. and a few other copies. As to the received reading (from the Vatic. and Alex.) that arose, I suspect, from alteration, to introduce a plainer sense. I hope to find a more suitable occasion than the present for evincing that the true text of the Sept. has yet to be settled; and that when that is done (by the aid of Theodoret slightly emended, and of the other Versions), we shall find that Sept. Version was no unfaithful representation of the Hebrew, and thus it would not matter whether we suppose the Evangelist to have followed the Sept. or the Hebr.; only that, strictly speaking, we cannot doubt that he followed the Sept. So that it is quite evident that the text of L. and T. cannot be sustained. I would render thus: "A voice in Rama hath been heard; lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning. [There is] Rachel bewailing her children, and refusing to be comforted because they are not."

— κλαίονσα]. Sub. ἦν. A fine figure, whereby Rachel is personified, and supposed to be bewailing the slaughter, and weeping for her children, as Ephraim is, in the same chapter, represented as lamenting himself. "Ὅτι οὐκ εἰσὶ (a common euphemism, for 'they are dead'), must be taken, not with παρακλ., but with κλαίονσα. In the passage of the Prophet, the words must mean, 'are gone into captivity.'

τῆς Ἰουδαίας ἀντὶ Ἡρώδου τοῦ πατρὸς αὐτοῦ, ἐφοβήθη ἐκεῖ ἀπελθεῖν χρηματισθεὶς δὲ κατ' ὄναρ, ἀνεχώρησεν εἰς τὰ μέρη τῆς Γαλιλαίας. ²³ καὶ ἐλθὼν κατώκησεν εἰς πόλιν λεγομένην Ναζαρέτ· ὅπως πληρωθῇ τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ τῶν προφητῶν, ὅτι Ναζωραῖος κληθήσεται.

lium, than to have been removed by the Alex. critics, who well knew that Class. usage requires its absence; nay, I know not of a single instance of its use in the Class. writers. So that there can be no doubt that the ἐν found here in all the copies but a comparatively few, was cancelled by fastidious critics, who wished to get rid of an unclassical construction. I need not remark, that the Cod. B. and its usual supporters, abound in such uncritical alterations. Of ἀντὶ, the sense is 'in succession to;' a sense derived from the Sept., where it occurs perpetually, though very rarely in the Class. writers. Xen. Hist. i. 4. 4.

— βασιλεύει Taken improper for ἀρχεῖ, since Archelaus was not a βασιλεύς, but only an ἐθνάρχης, as he is styled by Jos. Ant. xvii. 13, where his accession is recorded.

— ἐφοβήθη Not without reason; for Archelaus was heir, as we find from Jos. Ant. xvii. 9. Bell. ii. 7. 3, to his Father's cruelty, as well as to his throne.

23. Ναζαρέτ L. and T. edit Ναζαρίθ, which is found in B, C, E, K, and several ancient cursive MSS.; to which I add Lamb. 1177, 1178, 1192, 1193; Brit. Mus. 16,943, 17,470, pr. m. and Euseb. It was probably the original spelling.

— I must now reject the interpretation of Ἰνα πληρωθῇ propounded by Campb. and embraced by most recent Expositors, inasmuch as it weakens the sense, and is only a mode of evading, not of removing the difficulty; which, after all, is rather imaginary than real; for that the formula admits here of the strictest application has been fully evinced both by Hoffm. and his learned editor Hegelmaier, in his elaborate Dissertation prefixed to the Dem. Ev. p. x—lxx. In this and many other passages where ἵνα or ὅπως πληρωθῇ are used, it is better, as Mr. Rose on Parkh. observes (p. 692, sq.), "to leave the difficulty, whatever it may be, respecting such fulfilment of prophecy, and the interpretation thereof, unsolved, than to create another scarcely less formidable as to the rendering of a phrase in itself almost indubitable." I quite accede to his general observation, that "before we can decide that the passages cited are not susceptible of the sense put upon them [by the inspired writers of the New Test.], we ought to possess all the light that the most extended researches into the Scriptures and the Jewish writings can give us; and that even then we should not be too hasty in deciding that much of the knowledge which might justify the Evangelists [in writing as they have] may not have passed away in the lapse of ages. The careful examination of difficulties like these, the throwing sunshine on the dark passages of Scripture, and not, in the Rationalist fashion, the reconstruction of Christianity is the proper province of 'modern Theology.'" "As to the present passage," says Mr. Alford, "whatever may have been the partial fulfilment of the prophecy in the time of Ahaz, its applicability to a different time, and reference to a higher deliverance, is undeniable." This view, of course, proceeds on adopting, with Lowth, Meyer, Olshausen, Nares, and Smith, the hypothesis of a double sense,—one, in which the words apply primarily, either to some female living in the time of the Prophet, and her giving birth to a Son, according to the ordinary laws of nature; or, as Dathe holds, to some virgin, who at that time should miraculously conceive; and the other, in which they received a secondary and plenary fulfilment in the miraculous conception and birth of Christ. But, specious as this hypothesis is, there are the strongest reasons adduced by Hoffm. Dem. Evang. vol. i. p. 11, seq. why it cannot be admitted. To introduce here any such refutation of that and other ingenious theories, and fine-spun hypotheses, would occupy space required for better purposes. Indeed it were almost superfluous; "so self-contradictory, (to use the words of Dr. Henderson on Is. vii. 11.) and mutually subversive, are the bearings by which that and the other hypotheses are distinguished; while some of them are so manifestly formed for the nonce, as to be quite unworthy of notice." The only safe course, and fully borne out by the inspired authority of the Evangelist, is to refer the words solely to the Messiah. That Hegelmaier fully acquiesced in Hoffmann's opinion, is plain from the concluding words of his able argumentation: "Cur itaque dubitem hanc allegandi Formulam strictissime accipere, et post authenticam dicti prophetici, et allegati (Evangelistæ) verum et unicum esse sensum?"

— ὅπως πληρωθῇ—προφητῶν Render, "So that thereby was fulfilled (verified by the event) what was spoken by the prophets;" for (as Campb. observes) a declaration of any kind may be said to be then fulfilled, when it is verified by any incident to which the words can be applied, even if it were a coincidence in sound, which, as I shall show farther on, applies here. That the word ὅπως should be thus rendered (as it is also by Bp. Pearson, Abp. Newcome, and Wakefield, and Wesley), is shown by Campb., who observes, that the words refer only to the Divine purpose in the event.

— Ναζωραῖος κληθήσεται I am at a loss to imagine why Bp. Middleton should have alleged, that though there be no article to Ναζ., yet, as nuncupatives require the article, it is here the same as if expressed, the Nazarene: for though nuncupatives readily admit of the article, yet they may dispense with it; and indeed they should seem to reject it when the intention of the writer is not to advert to a person who is peculiarly so or so (as in Xen. Anab. vi. 4. 7, ἀνακαλουμέντες αὐτὸν τὸν προδότην), but to designate one of a class; as when we say, 'to call a person traitor,' or any other name of reproach. Now this will be the case here, if, as Dr. Hunt has remarked in his Sermon on Matt. ii. 23,

III. ¹ 'EN δὲ ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκεῖναις παραγίνεται Ἰωάννης
ὁ βαπτιστὴς κηρύσσων ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ τῆς Ἰουδαίας, ² καὶ λέγων

Nazarene was a term of reproach, proverbially given to any despicable person whatever. I am the more inclined to propose the rendering Nazarene, rather than 'the Nazarene,' because that lessens some of the difficulty here found, and the objection raised from the circumstance of the words in question being no where found in the writings of the Prophets. That difficulty might be still further diminished by rendering κληθήσεται 'should be called'; for, were we to regard κληθ. as future in sense, no less than in form, and regard the ὅτι as a sign of the oratio directa, we could scarcely view the words otherwise than as a quotation; which it has been thought it cannot be, being no where found in the Old Test. Whereas if the fut. here be taken in the sense should, often occurring, the above solution of the difficulty will have the advantage of being both natural and facile; but even that will be unnecessary, if we suppose, with some eminent Expositors, as Calv., Bengel, Osiander, and Hoffm., that there is merely a reference, by way of allusion, to something handed down by tradition as one of the ἄγραφα dicta of the Prophets. Hoffm. ably maintains this view, and satisfactorily answers the objections to which it might seem to lie open. He especially notices the use of ῥῆθιν, not γεγραμμένων, as confirming this view; and further remarks, that other dicta are in the New Test. adduced from tradition, e. g. in Acts xx. 35, and Jude 14; and he shows that this view, properly guarded, gives no countenance to Popish tradition, or authorizes their own unwritten traditions, even after the establishment of the canon of Scripture; for we thus only maintain a tradition first unwritten, though afterwards, and before the closing of the canon, inserted in Holy Scripture, and thus made ἔγγραφον by the inspired Evangelist St. Matthew. I cannot, however, agree with Hoffmann, that the sole purpose of the cited dictum was to express that the Messiah was to be brought up at Nazareth; and I must confess, that to suppose the sense to be, that the Messiah was to be a despised Person, lies open to the objection before adverted to, and others started by Mr. Alford (or his authors). Again, to suppose a reference to the Nazarites is going on untenable ground. The best mode of solution is to suppose a double reference, 1. to the Messiah's place of residence, Nazareth; and 2. to his descent, κατὰ σάρκα, i. e. from king David, namely, with allusion to Isa. xi. 1, where it is predicted of the Messiah, that "a shoot, ^{צמח}, shall come from the stem of Jesse, and a sprout, ^{צמח}, shall grow up from his roots;" and at v. 10, that "to the Root of Jesse shall the Gentiles repair." In confirmation of this view I would observe that the most eminent Hebraists are agreed that the true Etymon of Nazarite is ^{נצר}, and 2.) that though Ναζωραῖος is supposed to be found in all our copies (which, however, I much doubt), yet Ναζαραῖος is read by Euseb. Dem. Ev. p. 350, in a direct quotation from this passage; though just before, p. 349, he spells it Ναζιραῖος, as also in Origen on Matt., p. 436, and yet Jos. Ant. iv. 44, has Ναζαραῖος, which is retained by Dindorf, though Richter had edited Ναζιρ. from 5 MSS. That Euseb. must have written Ναζαραῖος in both places is evident from his course of argument, where he distinguishes Ναζιρ. from Ναζαρ. His words are, ὡν μὲν τῇ φύσει Ναζιραῖος (i. e. ὁ ἅγιος) κληθεῖς δὲ παρ' ἀνθρώποις Ναριραῖος (lego Ναζαρ.) ἀπὸ τοῦ Ναζαρίθ, ἐνθα παρὰ τοῖς κατὰ σάρκα γονιῦσι τὴν ἡ πιασίν ἀτρόφην ἔσχηκε. The ω and α are perpetually confounded.

III. 1. After the account of the nativity and infancy of Jesus, comes the second portion of the Gospel, containing a narrative of John the Baptist's proceedings with respect to our Lord, preparatory to his public ministry. Ch. iii. & iv. 1-11.

— ἐν δὲ ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκ.] This phrase, for ἐν τούτῳ τῷ χρόνῳ, is a customary form of commencing a narrative, both in the Classical and the Scriptural writers, especially in the book of Daniel. The difference is, that the latter use it strictly, when only a brief period is interposed between the occurrence to be narrated and some other event before mentioned; whereas the former employ it with greater latitude, when there is a considerable interval; as here of many years: yet always with a reference to some previously mentioned time. And the time adverted to is that of the residence of Joseph at Nazareth. The reason why Matthew passes over the period of Christ's infancy and early youth, is, that it was not his purpose to narrate aught but what was connected with the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. He therefore is silent on the event of Jesus's earlier years, but passes on to the uprise of his great Forerunner. The δὲ before ταῖς ἡμέρ. is omitted in seven uncial, and several cursive MSS., later Versions, and Fathers; but its omission can far better be accounted for than its insertion.

— παραγίνεται] This is the narrative present for the past, and the term is in Sept. not infrequently used to denote the coming forward, making his appearance, of a prophet on the scene of public life. So 3 Kings xviii. 36 (Compl.), καὶ παραγίνεται Ἠλίας ὁ προφήτης, and 1 Macc. iv. 46, μέχρι τοῦ παραγινήθηναι προφήτην. — Παραγίνεται κηρύσσων is for παραγίνεται καὶ κηρύσσει.

— ὁ βαπτιστής.] A name of office, equivalent to ὁ βαπτίζων, Mark vi. 14, and employed by the sacred writers to distinguish him from John the Evangelist. Baptism is well known to have been in general use with the Jews, as well as other Oriental nations, as a part of the ceremony for the admission of proselytes. It was believed that the administration of this rite would form part of the office of the Messiah.

— ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ τῆς Ἰουδ.] = ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ τῆς Ἰουδ. i. 16, where Sept. has εἰς τὴν ἐρημον τὴν οὐσαν ἐν τῷ νότῳ Ἰουδα, a free version pointing out the exact situation. But here there is reference not to the desert at the south of Judah, and which is blunderingly called in most maps the Wilderness of Judaea, but which is that of Judah. The one here meant is really that of Judaea; since it runs along a great part of the eastern borders of that country, forming a long tract of high ground stretching west of the Dead Sea and of the river Jordan, and thus forming two divisions: 1. that on which John baptized and grew up, west of the Dead Sea (Luke i. 60. iii. 2): 2. that along the Jordan, where John baptized (Matt. iii. 1. Mark i. 4). And this is confirmed by Jos. Bell. iii. 10. 7, where he says that the Jordan διακτίνει τὴν Γαλιλαίαν μέσῃ· ἔπειτα πολλὴν ἀνεμετρούμενος τὴν ἐρημίαν, εἰς τὴν Ἀσφαλτίτιν ἔξεισι λίμνην. The coast where John preached cannot be fixed, because it must have varied throughout the whole tract; but where he baptized is fixed at Αἰλῶν, near Saalim, from Justin, iii. 23. Thus the desert of Judæa is that high ground which overlooks the Aulon, or Magnus Campus, that part of the valley of the Jordan which is situated west of the river. It was so called, not that it was absolutely desert, but as being ἄγρος, i. e. draft-land, land to drive cattle on, not for tillage, but pasturage, and consequently thinly inhabited and wholly uninclined, like the sheep-walks of Spain, the llanos of South America, and the commons in England and other countries.

2. καὶ λέγων] The καὶ is absent from MS. B and the Sahid. Version, and is cancelled by Lach. and Tisch., but unwarrantably. Internal evidence is equal balanced; and external authority, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., and Vulg. and Ital. Version, is as strong as possible, being in all the MSS. but one; for I find it in all the Lamb. and Brit. Mus. MSS.; and the Versions in such a case as this are stronger for than against a particle that might well be dispensed with. It was, I suspect, removed by the fastidious critic who framed the text of B, or its archetype.

— μετανοείτε] On this important term see my Lex., where I have pointed out the modified sense in which this, and several other passages of the Gospels are to be taken, namely as regarded the Jews in turning to God from the spiritual idolatry of unbelief and sin, as attested by the moral reformation of mind and conduct. So Jos. Ant. xviii. 5. 2, states this as the scope of John the Baptist's preaching, describing him as teaching τοὺς Ἰουδαίους—βαπτισμῷ συνίναί· οὕτω γὰρ τὴν βάπτισιν ἀποδέκτην αὐτῷ φανίσθαι (a stronger sense than εἰσεσθαι), μὴ ἐπὶ τινὸν ἁμαρτῶν παρατήσει (remission) χωρῶμενος (not for the remission of some sins only), ἀλλ' ἐφ' ἀγνείᾳ σώματος, ἃτε δὴ καὶ τῆς ψυχῆς δικαιοσύνην προκεκαθαρίμενος (but for the purifying of the body considered as the seat of sin, or as subservient to sin, inasmuch as the soul has been previously purified by righteousness). See my note on Rom. vi. 6. Thus Jos. bears ample testimony to what appears from this and other passages, that the μετάνοια preached by John especially required amendment of life.

they all denote a Divine spiritual kingdom, the reign of the Messiah. The idea of this kingdom has its basis in various prophecies of the O. T., where the advent of a Messiah and his glorious reign are foretold. All which was meant to be understood, and was so by all enlightened and devout Jews, at the time of Jesus Christ, in a spiritual sense; though the people at large ascribed to such prophecies solely a temporal acceptance, as said of a temporal Messiah, who should come as king of the Jewish nation, to free them from foreign bondage, restoring its ancient religion and worship and thereby purifying the corrupt morals of the people, and expiating their sins; and should at length reign over the whole earth in peace and glory. Accordingly there are two aspects in which the above phrases may be viewed: 1. The Jewish temporal sense, ascribed to it by almost all Jews in the age of Christ, and by the Apostles before the day of Pentecost, as in Matt. xviii. 1. xix. 21. Luke xvii. 20. xix. 11. 2. The Christian sense, as in Matt. iii. 2. Luke xxiii. 51, though in those passages foretelling the coming of John the Baptist somewhat of the Jewish view was intermingled, and not, as in the passages containing the announcements of Jesus and his Apostles, which present the pure and unmixed Christian sense, as in Matt. vi. 17. 23. ix. 35. x. 7. Mark i. 14, 15. Luke x. 9. 11. Acts xxviii. 31; also, in a yet more internal and spiritual sense, as Matt. vi. 33. Mark x. 15. Luke xvii. 21. xviii. 17. John iii. 3–5, and especially Rom. vi. 17 and 1 Cor. vi. 20. See more in my Lex. New Test., in v. βασιλεία.

3. ὅς] The chief uncial MSS., and some cursive have, as in several preceding passages, διὰ, which is received by Lachm. and Tisch., and bears on it the impress of genuineness. The words οὗτος γὰρ ἐστιν, should be rendered, 'Now this is He, &c., for the γὰρ is here, as often, expletical; and these are not the words of the Baptist, but of the Evangelist.—Ἡσαίου τοῦ προφήτου. The words which follow convey the sense, though they do not follow the exact terms, either of the Hebrew or Sept.

— φωνή, &c.] ['There is heard] the voice of one preaching in the wilderness, and exclaiming, 'Ετοιμάσατε τὴν ὁδόν.' &c. The whole is an exact description of the office of John the Baptist, who prepared the way for the Redeemer by removing difficulties, and counteracting prejudices. A figure derived from the practice of Eastern monarchs, who, on taking a journey, or going on a military expedition, used to send forward persons to level the eminences, smoothen the unevennesses, fill up the hollows, &c., so as to form a road. See my note on Thucyd. ii. 97, 100.

4. αὐτὸς ὁ Ἰωάννης] Render, 'this same [person,] John [whom I am speaking of].' In the following description we find, as was meant to be intimated, a striking similarity between the John, the Elias of prophecy, and the actual

Ἰωάννης ὅτι εἶχε τὸ ἔνδυμα αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ τριχῶν καμήλου, καὶ ζώνην ^{b 2 Kings 1. 4.}

Elias (i. e. Elijah), as he is described in 2 Kings 1. 8, where the words of the Sept. and those of the Evangelist are so strikingly similar, that the latter would seem formed on the former.

— τὸ ἔνδυμα—καμήλου] Some take this to mean the camel's skin with the hair on, as sheepskins were worn by the Hebrew prophets. See Zech. xiii. 4. Others, however, more justly, suppose that it was the shaggier camel's hair, spun into coarse cloth, like our druggut. And we find from the Talmud that camel's hair garments were much worn by the Jews. Josephus more than once speaks of ἱσθῆς ἐκ τριχῶν πεποιημένη, probably the σάκκος τριχίως, of Rev. vi. 12. Nor were they unknown to the Heathens. Thus the Schol. on Eurip. Phœn. 329 mentions τὰ τρίχυνα ἔνδυματα. Those, however, were probably made of the finer camel's hair, like a manufacture formerly made in this country, and called camlets. Garments similar to the Baptist's are still worn (or rather a manufacture of wool and camel's hair) in the East by the poor, or those who affect austerity. John wore this garment in imitation of the prophets, especially Elijah. See 2 Kings i. 8, whom he also imitated in the austerity of his life. Indeed it was his prophetic habit and mode of life, that was chiefly instrumental (together with the prevailing expectation of the Messiah's advent) in drawing the attention of the Jews to his ministry, whereby the spirit of prophecy, which had been lost to Israel for 400 years, was in some measure restored.

— ζώνην δερμ.] So of Elijah, 2 Kings i. 8: ζώνην δερματίνην περιζωσάμενος τὴν ὀσφύν αὐτοῦ. The austerity consisted in the materials; for otherwise these girdles formed a regular part of the dress, and were of linen, silk, or even gold and silver, according to the circumstances.

— ἡ τροφή—ἀκριδες] That locusts (of which Bochart reckons ten species) were permitted to be eaten, appears from Lev. xi. 22; that they formed a customary food among the poor in the East, appears from Agatharch. v. 27. Strabo xvi. p. 1118, and Plin. vi. 30, &c. (Wets.) From Aristoph. Ach. 1116 and the Schol., it appears that the Greeks also ate of them, but that they were accounted a mean food. That they are at the present day a common diet among the poor, throughout most of the countries of Asia and Africa, we learn from modern travellers.

— For αὐτοῦ ἦν Lachm. and Tisch. read ἦν αὐτοῦ, from B, D, L, and some cursive MSS., but without good reason. In such a case as this, where the reading probably arose from the scribe's carelessness, the authority of MSS. (and all the Lamb. MSS. have the text. rec.) ought to decide.

— μέλι ἄγριον] Though I am now of opinion that by this peculiar expression is meant the honey made by wild bees, and deposited in hollow trees and clefts of the rocks, and such as we know from what is said in the O. T. (to which modern travellers bear witness), was always found in this tract of country called the Desert, yet I see not why the saccharinus gum, honey dew, exuding from trees, mentioned by Diodor., Jos., Xen., Polyb., Pliny, referred to by me (and I now add the cale-honey mentioned in the Anthol. Græc. i. 38. 3, and the wood-honey of the Rabbinical writers, both adduced as desirable articles of food), should not be also meant.

5. ἡ περίχωρος τοῦ Ἰορδ.] 'the country around the Jordan,' Gen. xiii. 10, seq.; 1 Kings vii. 37, forming a belt on each side of it. See more in my Lex.

6. ἐβαπτίζοντο] That baptismal ablutions had been, even among the heathens, thought necessary for admission to religious ceremonies, and for the expiation of offences, the Classical citations here adduced by Wets. and others, fully prove. That they were in use, too, among the Jews, we find alike from the Old Test., the Rabbinical writers, and Joseph. See B. J. ii. 8. 7. But the baptism here meant is one solemn rite, never to be repeated, comprehending the wives and children also of the proselytes; and founded partly on the ceremony which (as the Jewish theologians inform us) took place immediately previous to the promulgation of the Law, at Mount Sinai, but mainly on the Jewish baptism of proselytes; though not a little differing from it. The one involving an obligation to perform the whole law; the other, an obligation to reformation, and faith in the Messiah about to appear—the one founded on a system of justification by works, the other on faith in Christ. The baptism of proselytes was not introduced until after—perhaps long after—the return from the Babylonish captivity; and that to provide a less revolting mode of initiation into the Jewish church than circumcision. The Jews must have understood the ceremony of John's baptism as significant of a change of religion, and of introduction into a dispensation different from that of Moses. That they should have expressed no surprise at this, need not be thought strange; since they were taught by the predictions of the prophets, and the instructions of their most eminent teachers, that at the advent of the Messiah (which was now universally expected), the face of things would be entirely changed, and a new religion be introduced by Baptism. (Lightf., Wets., Bengel.)

— ἰβαπτ.—ἐξομολογ. τὰς ἁμ.] Notwithstanding the dissent of Meyer, I am still of the same opinion as to the period at which the Jewish baptism of proselytes first took place; but I grant with him, that John's baptism is to be viewed in connexion not only with the baptism of proselytes, but also with the religious usages of the Jews in respect to washings generally (comp. βαπτισμῶν διδαχῆς, and ix. 10, διαφόροις βαπτισμοῖς) and their symbolical meaning.

Little doubt is there that the baptism of John bore a great resemblance to the Jewish Baptism of proselytes, which Buxtorf, Lightf., and Schoettg. —the most competent judges—have proved (contrary to the opinion of the recent German writers) to have been in use before the time of John. As respects the character of the baptism in question, it was, Olshausen has remarked, a baptism of repentance, λουτρὸν μετανοίας (by μετ. being meant such a complete change of mind and heart as shows itself in reformation of life), not the λουτρὸν καλιγγενσίας, Luke iii. 3, and Tit. iii. 5. Now it was the requirement of μετάνοια, as used in this sense, that made the Pharisees in general decline John's baptism, μὴ βαπτισθῆναι ὑπ' αὐτοῦ, says Luke. Consequently the πάντες found in two MSS. and Hilary, and inserted within brackets by Lachmann, cannot be admitted. The word ποταμῷ before Ἰορδάνη, inserted by him and Tisch., from four uncial and several cursive MSS., and to which I add seven Lamb. and five Mus. MSS., came prob., though not certainly, from the margin. In ἱεροσολ. we have a very forcible term denoting full and complete confession, and which, as followed by ἀμαρτ., occurs also in Jos. Ant. viii. 4. 6, and, with du. understood, in Dan. vi. 10.

—γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν] 'ye brood of vipers!' So they are likewise called by Christ himself, Matt. xii. 34. xliii. 33. By this was meant to be designated their deadly malignity and wickedness, since the viper is the most poisonous of serpents.

—τίς ὑπέδειξεν ὑμῖν] Render, 'Who hath intimated to you?' in other words, 'from what quarter has come this intimation to flee from the wrath of God [about to visit the sins of the nation with national judgments in this world]?' (for the Baptist here, in the prophetic character which he in some respects bore, darkly intimates the wrath soon to be poured out on the Jewish nation.) Is it from yourselves, your own sagacity which discerns coming danger? or has it come from God in the secret warnings of conscience, suggesting the necessity of a repentance not to be repented of? The connexion with the next verse arises thus: 'Well, then [if you have, by whatever intimation, been induced to flee from the wrath to come by repentance], bring forth fruits suitable thereto, viz. in faith, love to all, equity, and every good work, as opposed to the infidelity, hypocrisy, and every evil work that had made you a generation of vipers; intimating, too, that they should show forth, not the leaves of profession, but the fruit of performance. See Matt. xxi. 19, compared with Eph. v. 9. The above interpretation of the passage derives confirmation from the use of the term ὑπέδειξεν, which, like our verb to suggest, intimate, is applicable both to the intimations of natural sagacity, and to the monitions of the voice within, that of conscience. Thus the verb to intimate is in our own language used to denote the suggestion of God both through the mind and the conscience, or Moral sense. So Addison writes: "'Tis Heav'n itself that intimates eternity to man." And such is the use of ὑποδαίκνυμι in Xen. Mem. iv. 3. 13, where Socrates, after remarking that we must not wait till we see the forms of the gods, but that it is enough for us, in order to worship, to see them by their works, adds, Ἐννοεῖ δὲ, ὅτι καὶ αὐτοὶ οἱ θεοὶ οὕτως (read αὐτοῖς) ὑποδαίκνυνται, they intimate themselves, namely, through the reason and conscience of men.

—ὀργῆς] This is to be taken, by metonymy, for punishment, of which use examples are adduced by the Philologists.

8. ποιήσατε καρπὸν ἔξ. τῆς μετ.] 'exhibit fruits worthy of,' and, by implication, 'suitable to,' as Acts xxvi. 20, and Plut. T. 11. 1117, οὐκ ἔσχη καρπὸν ἔξου, 'a suitable result.' Καρπὸν ἔξου, for Vulg. καρποὺς ἔξου, is the reading of almost all the MSS., and rightly received by every critical editor. The vulg. καρποὺς ἔξου came from the parallel passage, Luke iii. 8. The phrase ποιεῖν καρπὸν is said to be a Hebraism, and it occurs more than once in the Script.; but is found Arist. de Plant. i. 4: τῶν φυτῶν τινὰ μὲν ποιοῦσι καρπὸν.

9. μὴ δόζητε λέγειν ἐν ἑ.] These words have been variously interpreted; but the only view of the sense, based on any principles of correct exegesis, is that proposed by Fritz., 'do not suppose, think with yourselves, that you may say, [with impunity]. Δοκεῖν is very rarely used, as here, followed by Infinit. The only examples that occur to me are 2 Macc. ix. 8, ὁ δοκεῖν τοῖς τῆς θαλάσσης κύμασι ἐπιτάσσουσιν, & v. 10, δοκούντα ἄπασθαι τῶν ἀστέρων, and Eurip. frag. Æol. vi. 1, δοκεῖν ἀνολκεῖν γαῖαν; Plato p. 358, Bekk. ὁ Μ.—σὺ μὲν οὐδὲ δοκεῖ ὀρᾶν. Δίγειν ἐν ἑαυτῷ is thought a Hellenistic phrase, occurring also in Esth. vi. 6, equiv. to διανοεῖν, secretly think. Yet it is found in a passage of Chrysippus cited by Wets.

—Πατέρα ἔχομεν τὸν Ἀβ.] q. d. 'We have Abraham for our father [and therefore, as his descendants, cannot but be accepted by God];' as if God would, on account of that relation to the father of the faithful, impute not their sins unto them. Ἐκ τῶν λίθων κ.τ.λ., q. d. 'God can cause that these stones, pebbles, shingle, now lying on the banks of Jordan' (compare Joseph. Ant. 4. 3), i. e. men as unfit for useful purposes as stocks and stones, 'shall become children unto Abraham,' and imitate the virtues of Abraham.

Lachm. and Tisch., on the authority of 5 uncial and some 5 cursive MSS. But it is found in the parallel passage of Luke iii. 9; and was far more likely to have been omitted through carelessness on the part of the scribes, than inserted from the passage of Luke; and even there the particle was omitted by some copyists. Certainly it is not without force, though that force cannot be seen without referring it, as is done by Fritz., to κείται, which signifies, not 'is laid at the foot of the tree ready for use,' but, as he points out, 'is even [now] being directed at the root.' I cannot indeed yet adduce any other example of this use of κείται; but parallel to this in our own language, of the verb to lay, as employed in the sense to apply with violence, as when we say to lay blows at a person or thing. Comp. Deut. xx. 10, 'Thou shalt not destroy the trees by laying an axe at them,' Sept. ἐπιβαλὼν ἐν αὐτοῖς. The other sense is not supported by the foregoing words, πρὸς τὴν ῥίζαν, for which ought thus to have been written, πρὸς τῇ ῥίζᾳ.

— ἡ ἀξίω] i. e. the axe of judgment and punishment.

— ῥίζαν] hints at utter destruction; since directing the axe at the root of a tree denotes that it is to be cut down, not merely lopped. In the Scriptures men are often compared to trees; and sometimes (as Eccles. x. 15, and Dan. iv. 20 and 23) their punishment to the felling of trees.

11. ἰγῶ—βαπτ. ὑμᾶς]. The pronoun, accompanied as it is by μὲν, is very emphatic, q. d. 'I am not the person to do the momentous work in question of purification, and admission or rejection. It is Christ alone, of whom I am only the Forerunner, who can do that, by his all-powerful Agent the Holy Spirit [before spoken of].' Why Lachm. and Tisch. should have chosen to alter βαπτ. ὑμᾶς into ὑμᾶς βαπτ., on the authority of MS. B and 2 cursive ones, with some early Fathers, opposed to that of all the rest (including all the Lamb. and the Br. Mus. MSS.), confirmed by the parallel passages of Mark and Luke—I cannot imagine. The authority of Fathers in so minute a matter is next to nothing; and that of three MSS. is of very little weight. The change of position may have been accidental. But as it does not occur in any copies at Mark and Luke, I suspect it to have been introduced for the purpose of better adapting the words to those at the end of the verse, the critic not perceiving that the position there has an intensive force, by the two pronouns being brought together, q. d. He it is who shall baptize you—you who, dead in trespasses and sins, so much needed the quickening influences of the Spirit to purify the filthiness of corrupt nature, which requires to be washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb. The words βαπτίσει ἐν Πν. ᾧ. have reference to the gifts and the graces of the Holy Spirit soon to be abundantly imparted, whereby consciences were to be cleansed and regeneration communicated. In πυρὶ there is another metaphor, whereby the purifying effect of the Spirit is compared to that of the refiner's fire, by which metals are purified from dross; or to the brazier's burning out the sordes of a foul vessel. See Ezek. xxii. 15, the sense being, that the Holy Ghost, the Sanctifier, consumes away all the dross of corrupt affections; and thus the nature of man is regenerated, and the work of his sanctification is carried forward toward completion, so that he may stand 'complete in all the will of God' (Col. iv. 12. Comp. Col. i. 14, and Jude 24); for the words are not to be confined in their application to those receiving the baptism of Jesus, but to be extended generally to the true Church of Christ, its faithful members in all future ages, inasmuch as Christ himself confers the Spirit of regeneration, not baptismal only, but moral—that of carrying it forward by purifying and transforming the soul, so as to make it, through justification and sanctification, 'meet for the inheritance of the saints in light.' There may be an allusion to the miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost in fiery tongues; which view is supported by Chrysost.

— ἐν ὕδατι] The ἐν is not redundant, but denotes the instrument, or vehicle of baptism, as Luke xiv. 34, and often.

— εἰς μετάνοιαν] 'for promoting repentance.' Thus John's baptism is called by Mark, i. 4, 'the baptism of repentance.'

— ὁ ὀπίσω μου ἐρχόμενος, &c.] The Present is here used as at ver. 10, the sense being, 'There is one coming who will be after me in time, but who will be far greater than I.'

— τὰ ὑποδήματα βαστάσαι] Ὑπόδημα in Hellenistic phraseology is equiv. to the Class. σανδαλίον. Βαστάζειν is synonymous with κομίζειν, as in a passage of Plutarch which I have adduced in Rec. Syn. The general sense is to have charge of. From Lucian in Herod. 5, cited by Wets.: ὁ δὲ τις μάλα δουλικῶς ἀφαιρεῖ τὸ σανδαλίον ἐκ τοῦ ποδός (to which may be added Æsch. Ag. 917. Hor. Epist. i. 13, 15: Soleas portat), and other passages adduced by the Commentators, it appears that this was by the ancients in general accounted among the most servile of offices. Yet we find from the Rabbinical writers, that it was rendered by the disciple to the master; and from Eusebius we learn that this descended, with other observances towards the Rabbins, to the first Christian teachers. Thus the general sense is: 'I am not worthy to perform to him the humblest office.'

12. οὐ τὸ πτύον—αὐτοῦ] The οὐ is not redundant (for if it were taken away, there would be no connexion with the preceding); but intensive, as in Gen. i. 11, οὐ τὸ σπέρμα αὐτοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ. Πτύον signifies, not fan (which would require λικμὸν, as in Amos ix. 9, and was something like our bawling machine, to raise wind by a sort of fan-like sail); but winnowing shovel, which, from Hesych., seems to have been, in the lower part of it, shaped like a Δ.

— τὴν ἄλωνα] Properly that elevated area in a field, formed of soil hardened by the use of a cylinder, where the corn in the sheaf was trodden by oxen, and then winnowed; which latter operation was performed by tossing the rough and broken straw away with a fork; and then stirring up the compound of grain and chaff with the πτόον; whereby the chaff was delivered to the wind, and the grain left in a heap. But here Δλ. signif., by metonymy, the produce of the ἀλ. after having undergone the process of threshing and winnowing, previous to being placed in the ἀποθήκη, or 'depository,' generally a mere subterranean cavity to receive the grain, covered over with straw, and thatched with stubble; like the Egyptian ἀποθήκη described by Sir G. Wilkinson in his Ancient Egypt. This use of ἄλως was formed on that of the Hebr. רוּ, found in Ruth iii. 2, where Sept. λικμὰ τὸν ἄλωνα, and Job xxxix. 12, ἀποδώσει σοι τὸν σπόρον (fruges) εἰσότης σου τὸν ἄλωνα. It was not, however, unexampled in Class. Gk. So Alciph. iii. 16: μοι τὴν ἄλω διακαθήραντι, καὶ τὸ πτόον ἀποτιμῆναι, ἐπίστη κ.τ.λ. In the first and third of these three passages ἀλ. must signify the compound of grain and chaff to be purified by winnowing; the second, the grain itself after being winnowed; of which I know no other example; though of the double metonymy there is one in Virgil, Georg. i. 325, sata læta boumque labores.

13. τότε παραγίνεται] Christ vouchsafed to receive this baptism, as thereby entering upon his ministry on the same principle as those on which the priests under the Law were dedicated to their office (see Exod. xl. 12, and Lev. viii. 6, compared with Heb. ii. 17); and moreover as justifying the counsels of heavenly Wisdom, by thus recognizing the Divine institution of the Law, and sanctioning ordinances originally established for wise and good purposes. The selection of John to administer the rite would answer many important purposes, and especially tend to the establishment, by a voice from heaven, of the authority both of Christ and his Forerunner.

14. διεκώλυνεν] 'was hindering, would have hindered' (a not unrequent sense of the Imperf., on which see my Note on Thucyd. iv. 44); thus recognizing Jesus as the Christ.

— ἐγὼ χρεῖαν, &c.] A refined way of saying, 'I am very far inferior to thee, so as rather to need thy baptism than thou mine; and yet dost thou come to me, as to a superior?' This passage does not contradict that of John i. 33; since the purpose of the latter is to assert that John had not known Jesus as the Messiah, otherwise he needed not to have his belief confirmed by the visible proof of the descent of the dove. In διεκώλυνεν we have a more significant term than would have been the simple verb κωλ. And the διὰ has reference to the interposition of some substance to prevent the meeting of two others, and fig. quite to prevent the occurrence of any thing.

15. ἄρτι] Rosenm. and Schleus. render quæso, but the version 'for the present,' is far preferable. Indeed, the former mode would destroy the emphasis in the word ably pointed out by Bp. Pearson, On the Creed, vol. ii. p. 452. The meaning is, that John must suffer him, for the present, implying shortness of sufferance, to be baptized with the baptism of water, for that baptism of his with the Spirit was yet to be exhibited. At ἀφες supply, not με, but τοῦτο εἶναι, as in Philem. Jun. ap. Athen. 291 p, ἰάσασθαι ὡς οὕτως ἔχει, which is confirmed by Chrys. Δικαιοσύνην is for δικαιοῦματα, institutions, as often in the Sept. Render, 'for thus [in like manner] it becometh us (i. e. both me and thee) to fulfil all righteousness,' meaning all the requirements and ordinances of the law of God. Thus our Lord received John's baptism on the same principle as the Priests were dedicated to their ministry; because, by so doing, he justified the counsels of Divine wisdom in the ordinances of the Law.

16. I am now of opinion, with Meyer, that εὐθύς is to be taken neither with βαπτισθ., nor with ἀνέβη, but with ἀνέβη, q. d., and after he was baptized he went up immediately. Ἀπὸ τοῦ ὕδατος, 'from,' or 'out of the water,' the bed of the river.

— ἀνέμχθησαν οἱ οὐρανοί] Here certain recent foreign Commentators (on the same principle by which they elsewhere endeavour to resolve the extraordinary into the merely ordinary) understand lightning of the most vivid kind, 'by which, as it were, the heavens were cleft asunder.' But there is every reason to suppose the light to have been preternatural, and to have accompanied the DIVINE SPIRIT; such a light as accompanied Jesus, on being visibly revealed to St. Paul at his conversion.

The αὐτῷ after ἀνέχθησαν must be referred, not to Jesus, but to John; 'to his view,' namely, John's. The heavens were opened as a testimony to him of the Messiahship of Jesus.

— ὥσει περιστερὰν] There is an ambiguity in this expression, which has occasioned a variety of interpretation. Almost all the ancients understand by it the descent of a maternal dove, as a symbol of the Spirit, and with allusion to the innocence and meekness of Christ; while even moderns take ὥσει per. to refer to the mode in which the Spirit, in some visible form (probably of a flame of fire), descended; namely, with that peculiar hovering motion which distinguishes the descent of a dove. But the words of St. Luke (σωματικῶς εἶδει ὥσει περιστερὰν) demands the former interpretation. Even Meyer now admits, that the former explanation belongs only to the "vain attempt to bring down the miraculous to the ordinary, and are alike at variance with the words of St. Luke, and the use of the term by all Evangelists, according to which it can only mean the bodily shape of a dove, as seen by John." By ἐρχόμενον ἐπ' αὐτόν is meant, coming and resting, or settling upon him; for this expression appears to be of the same force as the καταβαίνειν—καὶ μένον ἐπ' αὐτόν in the parallel passage of John i. 32, 33, whence we learn how it was that John so readily recognized Jesus as the Christ, since he had been apprized by the Lord what sign was to denote the great Personage, the expectation of Israel. [Comp. John i. 33.]

17. φωνὴ ἐκ τῶν οὐρ.] Wets., Rosenm., Kuin., and Schleus., take this of thunder; which, however, involves absurdity; for (as Mr. Rose on Parkhurst Lex. p. 491, justly observes), 'if articulate words were heard, λέγουσα simply tells us that the very words which follow were used, and the thunder is a gratuitous supposition. If it is meant that no uttered words were heard, only a stroke of thunder, which was to be understood as declaring that Jesus, &c., reasoning is idle; for language could hardly have been used less appropriate to convey this idea.' 'It is, moreover (as observes Dr. Henderson on Inspiration, p. 88), quite at variance with the usus loquendi of the Scriptures, in which the formula φωνὴ ἐκ Θεοῦ is never employed except in reference to actual verbal declaration.' Comp. Dan. iv. 3. 'there fell a voice from heaven (φωνὴ ἐκ οὐρανοῦ), saying, To thee it is given,' &c.

We must therefore understand an articulate sound, audible by all present (such as that on the Mount of Transfiguration, and just before the death of Jesus) publicly declaring his Messiahship.

— ἀγαπητός] For ὁ μονογενής, denoting here, and xii. 18, and Luke ix. 35. xx. 13, the Messiah. This use is taken from the Sept.; as in Gen. xxii. 2; Jer. vi. 26; Amos viii. 10; Zech. xii. 10. Thus ὁ Υἱός μου ὁ ἀγαπητός may be regarded as a title, expressive of the nearness of Christ's relation to God, and the love borne by the Father to him. See John iii. 35.

— ἐν ᾧ εὐδόκησα] a use of the ἐν in this phrase formed from the Heb. בְּיָמֶי, and occurring also in the Sept. The Aorist is not put for the present, but has the frequent sense of custom.

IV. 1. ἀνέχθη—Διαβόλου] Ἀνέχ. must not be taken, with some recent Commentators, for ἤχθη, since dua may refer, as in Luke ii. 22, to the high and mountainous country of which the desert here mentioned (supposed to be what is now called Quarantaria, a rugged mountain range on the north of the road leading from Jerusalem to Jericho) consisted, as compared with the low ground about Jordan. Besides, ἀνέχθη is confirmed by ἀναγαγων αὐτόν ὁ Διάβ., Luke iv. 5. If, however, we could suppose, with some,—who trace a Scripture parallelism between Moses, Elias, and Christ,—that the scene of the temptation was the Arabian desert of Sinai, ἀνέχθησαν might mean simply 'carried off and away.'

— πειρασθῆναι ὁ. τ. Δ.] We are now come to the narrative of a most awful and mysterious transaction, where the Theologian requires to be reminded of his proper province, since we are encompassed with difficulties too mighty for the human understanding: to avoid which, several eminent persons, of ancient and modern times, have thought that a visionary scene, not a real event, is here narrated. But there is not the slightest intimation in the narrative, that the temptation was such. The air of the narrative produces an impression quite the contrary; and there are many strong reasons why such a view cannot be admitted. While in favour of the ordinary view, we may safely maintain, that there is nothing in the circumstances, which involves any strong improbability: but rather what is quite agreeable to the analogy of God's methods, in other points, in his dispensations to man. Bp Porteus, Dr. Townson, and Jones of Nayland, trace several points of similitude to the temptation of Adam and Eve in Paradise; while others have compared the character and design thereof with those of the Crucifixion, and have recognized in both a vicarious transaction. As to the confident assertion of the Unitarians, that the very form of expression, ἀνέχθη ὑπὸ τοῦ Πν. shows that it is only a visionary scene, referring for similar expressions to Rev. i. 10; Acts xi. 5, the latter of these has nothing in common with this of St. Matthew; and the former, though it bears some verbal resemblance to the parallel passage of Luke iv. 1, is really of quite another character. Similar expressions do indeed occur in Matt. xii. 28; Luke ii. 27;

ρας τεσσαράκοντα καὶ νύκτας τεσσαράκοντα, ὕστερον ἐπέειπεν.

^b Deut. 8. 3. Γέγραπται· ^b Οὐκ ἐπ' ἄρτω μόνῳ ζήσεται ὁ ἄνθρωπος, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ παντὶ ῥήματι ἐκπορευομένῳ διὰ στόματος Θεοῦ. ⁵ Τότε παραλαμβάνει αὐτὸν ὁ Διάβολος εἰς τὴν ἁγίαν

Acts viii. 29, and x. 19. But no one ever imagined the actions there described to be merely imaginary. As to those rationalists who would understand the fasting here spoken of to have been ascetic abstinence, the hypothesis is utterly excluded by the express words of Luke iv. 2, καὶ οὐκ ἔφαγεν οὐδὲν ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκείναις, where there is a negation of the strongest kind, meaning, 'he ate nothing whatever.'

— τοῦ Διαβόλου] meaning the Accuser, or adversary of God and Man, Satan. On the various sense of this important term I have fully treated in my Lex., to which the reader is referred. It cannot here be supposed to denote any human adversary or tempter. No example is found of a man being styled ὁ διάβολος; for in John vi. 70 is merely διαβ. without the article; and even there the sense is, as I have shown, simply a disaffected person, one set against another.

3. The alterations made in the wording by Lachm. and Tisch. are baseless, as founded on too slender evidence, only B, D, and their asses (for the Lamb. and Mus. MSS. have all the text. rec.). The varr. lect. I suspect arose from an uncertainty as to the right place of αὐτῷ, which I believe to be after προσελ. Besides, considering that the αὐτῷ might have been placed either after προσ. or after ἔφα, the external authority of MSS. ought to decide, espec. since internal evidence is rather in favour of the position after προσ. as being the less likely to come from the polishing school of the Alexandrian critics.

— Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ] Not 'a son of God,' as Campb. and Wakef. render. For it has been proved by Bp. Middl. that υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, or υἱὸς Θεοῦ are never taken in a lower sense than ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, which is always to be understood in the highest sense. Thus in Mark i. 1, Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ is spoken by the Evangelist himself of Jesus. In John x. 36, the same phrase is employed by Christ himself of himself; and in Matt. xxvii. 40, it is used by those who well knew Christ's claims. Neither is υἱὸς Θεοῦ, without either of the Articles, to be taken in a lower sense; for, not to examine all the places in which it occurs, in Matt. xxvii. 43, where the crime laid to Christ is, that he said, Θεοῦ εἰμι υἱός, the higher sense is required by the context.

4. ἐπ' ἄρτω—ζήσεται] This quotation agrees with the Heb. and Sept. For, although the Vatican MS. has τῷ, yet many other of the best MSS. and several Fathers omit it. The Fut. is here put for the Pres., taken of what is customary. Almost all the uncial MSS., and about 12 cursive ones, to which I add Br. Mus. MS. 11,300 and the Leic. M. teste Jacks. and Scriv. MS. K. prefix ὁ ἄνθρωπος; which reading has been received by Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch. But the use of the article with ἀνθρ., in this sense, is so very rare,—occurring only once in the N. T., John ii. 25, and a few times in the Sept.,—that one might suspect it to have been introduced through carelessness of the scribes. Yet they rarely introduce words, espec. the article. It never occurs in the Class. writers; and accordingly it would seem to be a Hebraism formed on the Hebr. אָדָם. Upon the whole, I can scarcely doubt that the ὁ found in Deut. viii. 3 is genuine. I have therefore admitted it. As respects the reading just after, ἐν for ἐπὶ, adopted by Lachm. and Tisch. from C, D, and five cursive MSS., to which I add Br. Mus. MS. 11,838, it is worthy of attention, since the harsh Hebraism it involves attests its genuineness; and the ἐπὶ of the MSS. A, B, &c., may have arisen from a correction of critics, who designed thus to make the antithesis more exact. But it may have arisen from error of scribes, who often confound ἐν and ἐπ'.

— παντὶ ῥήματι ἐκπορευομένῳ—Θεοῦ] ῥήμα is not expressed in the Hebr., and may mean thing as well as word; and the sense seems to be, 'by whatever proceeds from the mouth of God,' i. e. by the fiat of his providence. The general sense is, 'The life of man depends on God's providence, and not on food.' God can sustain life without food; but food cannot sustain life without his fiat or will. With this sentiment comp. Wisd. xvi. 26: οὐχ ἂν γινώσκεις τὴν καρπὸν τρέφουσιν ἄνθρωπον, ἀλλὰ τὸ ῥῆμα σου τοῦτοι σοὶ πιστεύουσιν διατηρεῖ.

5. As to the variation in the order of the temptations recorded by Matthew, as compared with that in Luke (who transposes the last two), the discrepancy (if, indeed, it can be called such) is not to be removed by any 'device for the nonce'; such as supposing the temptation to idolatry to have taken place twice, or the order in Luke to have been disturbed by transcribers. We may best account for such variation in order in the Evangelists by attributing it to a difference of purpose in narrating the temptation; and suppose that while Matthew intended to fix the order of the circumstances (which is plain by his having employed the definite terms τότε and τότε), Luke did not mean to be so very exact, but chose merely to record the transaction in a general way; and thus the ordinary conjunction was sufficient for his purpose.

The Devil, finding Christ immovably confident in his heavenly Father, changes his method of attack.—Παραλαμβάνει here is an expression which has been variously understood, but generally misunderstood. The term often signifies, both in the Scriptural and Classical writers, 'to take any one along with us' (παρα [as a companion]). Of course neither this term nor ἵστημι gives the least countenance to the vulgar notion, πόλιν, καὶ ἵστησιν αὐτὸν ἐπὶ τὸ πτερύγιον τοῦ ἱεροῦ. ⁶ καὶ λέγει αὐτῷ· Εἰ Τὸς εἰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, βάλε σεαυτὸν κάτω γέγραπται γάρ, ὅτι τοῖς ἀγγέλοις αὐτοῦ ἐντελεῖται περὶ σοῦ. ⁷ καὶ ἐπὶ χειρῶν ἀρουσί σε, μήποτε προσκόψῃς πρὸς λίθον τὸν πόδα σου. ⁸ Ἐφη αὐτῷ ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Πάλιν γέγραπται· ⁹ Οὐκ ἐκπειράσεις Κύριον τὸν Θεόν σου. ¹⁰ Πάλιν ¹¹ παραλαμβάνει αὐτὸν ὁ Διάβολος εἰς ὄρος ὑψηλὸν λίαν, καὶ that the Devil transported our Lord through the air. The latter is admitted to have the sense, 'prevailed upon him to take his station.'

—ἀγίαν πόλιν] Jerusalem was so called κατ' ἔξοχον, as having the holy Temple and its worship. Thus the inscription on its coins was 'Jerusalem the holy.'

—ἵστησιν] Lachm. reads ἵστησιν, from four uncial and as many cursive MSS., to which I add Lamb. 1176, 2 m; but both external authority and internal evidence concur in confirming ἵστησιν, for the narrative Present is more agreeable to the style of the N. T. The critical revisers, however, were of another opinion, and therefore (as in a similar case supra ii. 13, where they altered φαίνεται to ἰφάνη) adopted ἵστησιν, prob. from the parallel passage of Luke iv. 9. Yet there the aorist was used for the purpose of suiting the aorist preceding, just as here the Present to suit the foregoing Present; though occasionally the Present and Aorist are combined; but, I apprehend, only where the Aorist precedes, except, very rarely, in the somewhat anomalous phraseology of St. John, e. g. John i. 5. v. 14. xxi. 9; for in the Apocalypse the transition in the tenses of verbs is such as to place the composition quite apart from the regular and ordinary rules in other parts of the N. T. We are not to suppose any violent conveyance on the part of Satan (still less through the air); though power might have been given to Satan for that effect over our Lord's person. In fact this is quite excluded by the term παραλαμβ. (which is well explained by Euthym. παραλαβὼν ἄγει), and that used by Luke, ἡγάγειν. And agreeably to this view, Jerome, Gregory, and other ancient Expositors understand our Lord as ductum pedibus. Maldonati has (after Chrys. and other ancient Fathers) ably shown that nothing of compulsion must be thought of; and they agree in understanding our Lord as here exercising entire volition, permitting Satan to lead him where he would.

—πτερύγιον] This disputed term cannot mean pinnade; for thus there would have been no Article; and for the sense pinnaded battlement there is no authority. Unluckily we have no other example of πτερύγιον as used of a building. But since the primitive πτερόν is sometimes applied to the roofs of temples, so πτερύγιον here may denote the pointed roof, or gable, of some part of the Temple, probably the great Eastern Porch, called Solomon's porch. The most probable opinion is, that it referred to what was called the King's Portico, described in Jos. Ant. xv. 11. 5, which overhung the precipice of Cedron at the S. and E. of the Temple; and was perhaps so called from the spire-like figure which the gable end of the building presented from below.

6 & 9. The alterations here by Lachm. of λέγει into εἶπε from one MS. only (Z.) and of Lach. and Tisch. of ταῦτα πάντα σοι into ταῦτά σοι πάντα from three uncial and a very few cursive MSS. (their usual assecta) and some citations in Origen and Chrys. are equally unauthorized, and unsuitable. Indeed I find both in all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS., and the latter is confirmed by Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 23.

6. εἰ τίς ἐστι τοῦ Θεοῦ] i. e. in the highest Messianic sense, implying a Divine generation, for the passages Matt. xxvii. 40—43 and John x. 36, taken in conjunction with John x. 33, τοῖς σεαυτὸν Θεόν, somewhat confirms the opinion of Mr. Green (Gr. of N. T. dial., p. 174), that the charge made by the Jews (in John x.) was not [so much] that he assumed Messiahship, as one of impiety in professing to be of the same nature with God. The question, however, is, whether the generality of the Jews held strictly the doctrine of the Deity of the Messiah? See note on xiv. 33.

—γέγραπται γάρ, ὅτι κ.τ.λ.] The object of this temptation as the 20th verse of the foregoing. The former was a temptation to presumption from trust in himself; this, to distrust in God's Providence. The Scripture quotation, as referred to the Messiah, and with which the Devil subtly tries to effect his purpose, is misapplied and perverted; for the promise of protection there given is limited to those only who endure the evils which meet them in the path of duty; not such as they bring upon themselves by rashly presuming on God's protection. The metaphor in ἐπὶ χειρῶν ἀρουσί σε is taken from parents, or nurses, who lift up and carry the children over a rough way, lest they should trip and stumble. Comp. Xen. Cyr. vii. 5. 10.

7. πάλιν γέγραπται] The foregoing misapplied Scripture is here aptly refuted by another.

—οὐκ ἐκπειράσεις, &c.] From Deut. vi. 16, where ἐκπειράζειν denotes to make trial of any one's power to save one's life. Interpreters, however, are not agreed whether it contains a warning against presumption or distrust. The best mode of determining the question is to say, with Hoffm., that, 'though the occasion of the warning was special,' i. e. distrust of the Providence of God, yet the prohibition is general, forbidding every temptation, 'et citra et contra verbum Dei, sollicitando ejus patientiam, gratiam, justitiam, veritatem;' and hence is applicable to temptation from confidence equally as from diffidence.

8—11. Despairing of success by any covert device, the Devil resolves to make one open and final effort, staking success on the vastness of the proposed price of transgression.

8. ὄρος ὑψηλὸν λίαν, καὶ δεικνύσιν α. πάσαν, &c.] Comp. Dio. Cass., 1243, 81, ἀντήχη ἐς περιεπὴν (a look-out) καὶ καθορῶν, ἀπ' αὐτῆς πᾶσαν μὲν γῆν πᾶσαν δὲ θάλατταν, &c. It is not necessary, with many eminent modern commentators, to take τοῦ κόσμου in a restricted sense, to denote Palestine only. We may suppose the Devil to have pointed out, in various directions, to the several kingdoms, though not of the whole world, yet of what Luke iv. 5 expresses by τῆς οἰκουμένης, namely, that which was known to the Jews.

—δείκνυσιν—κόσμου] Δεικνύναι sometimes imports not absolutely to exhibit any thing to the sight, but merely to point out its position; and here may denote the several kingdoms by pointing to their several situations; and this is confirmed by the authority of Euthym., and prob. Chrys. Yet there is a difficulty as concerns τοῦ κόσμου, to obviate which the best modern commentators take this term in a restricted sense, to denote Palestine only; and so τῆς οἰκουμένης in Luke. And undoubted examples, as in Rom. iv. 13, and Luke ii. 1, and al. From this lofty mountain (supposed to have been Nebo) a prospect would be afforded (as formerly to Moses, Deut. xxxiv.) of nearly the whole of Palestine; and its provinces might be styled kingdoms, just as their rulers, whether tetrarchs or ethnarchs, were sometimes called kings. However, I am now inclined to distrust both solutions of the difficulty, and think it best to leave untouched the difficulty where we found it, and the supernatural character of the transaction, which, from the additional words in Luke, ἐν στιγμή χρόνου, seems to have occurred in vision.

9. προσκυνήσεις] The word here implies, not merely homage, but adoration, i. e. religious worship. See Smith's Scrip. Test. i. iii. ch. 3. The manner, indeed, of rendering both was in the East the same, namely, by prostration to the earth; but the latter would necessarily differ in degree.

10. Ὑπάγε ὁμ. μου, Σατανᾶ] The words which I have inserted, though in smaller characters, have strong external authority (to which I can add that of Lamb. MSS. 528, 1775, 1778, 1192, but not 1176), and they have been received by Wets., Matth., Griesb., Scholz, and Tisch., as also by Lachm., though in brackets—prob. influenced by the reasons which led me to express them in smaller characters, namely, that the authenticity of the words is a matter involved in some doubt, since the external authority for them, though very great, is not confirmed by the earliest Versions. The Fathers are alleged both for and against the words, and internal evidence draws two ways. The absence of the words is strenuously, but not successfully, contended for by Mill and Fritz., since most of their arguments are sophistical. That the words were, as they say, brought in from the passage of Matt. xvi. 23, or Luke iv. 8, by a sciolist—that remains to be proved; and the fact (which Mill admits) that the words were in the text of many copies almost from the age of the Apostles, is surely a very strong proof of their genuineness.

The object of the temptation at v. 9 was idolatry; whereupon Christ here repels the tempter with a quotation from Deut. vi. 13, where the Sept. is followed, except that προσκ. is substituted for φοβηθήσῃ, found in most MSS., though προσκ. is found in the Alex. and a few other MSS., and it is confirmed by citations from Origen, Chrys., Athan., and other Fathers. In the Sept. and N. T. λατρ. denotes divine worship only; though in the Class. Greek it is confined to human servitude; except once in Eurip. Ion 152, λ. φοίβω.

—διηκόνουν αὐτῷ] Διακονεῖν properly signifies to be an attendant on any one; but here and at Matt. xxvii. 55, and Mark i. 13 and 31, it signifies (like ministrare in Latin) to wait at table, and, by implication, to supply with food.

12. Though the circumstance of the final frustration of the Tempter, and the retirement of Jesus into the desert, after the death of John, are placed together, yet some not inconsiderable time must have intervened between one and the other event, during which Christ had not only entered on his ministry, but become eminent.

—παρεδόθη] Sub. εἰς φυλακὴν, expressed in Acts viii. and xxii. 4. Or it may be (with Fritz.) regarded as an indefinite form of expression (left so, in order to avoid mentioning what is unpleasant), signifying 'to be delivered up into any one's power, for harm.'

15, 16. The words agree neither with the Sept. nor the Hebrew; yet the discrepancy is by no means so great as would at first sight appear. The Heb., indeed, is, in our Common version, wrongly translated; and the printed text of the Sept. is very corrupt. If the mistakes of the one be rectified, and the corruptions of the other

removed, the discrepancy will almost vanish, espec. if we consider the purpose of the Evangelist; who did not mean to cite the whole prophecy contained in Isa. ix. 1—4, but that part of it which sufficed for his purpose. Why he did not cite the whole, was, perhaps, because the Sept. text in these verses was prob. then, as it is now, exceedingly corrupt, and that the Hebrew was very obscure, and accordingly he passed over what was in the Sept. so imperfect, or in the Hebr. so obscure, as to be unfitted for popular use in this familiar address to plain and unlettered Christians. He, however, perceived that the general scope of the former of the two verses was the same as the latter; and that this latter presented only a fuller statement of what was contained in the former. The sense of both being this, that, 'in the former time. He debased (or permitted to be debased) the land of Zebulon, and the land of Nephthali; the maritime district; the country beyond Jordan, called Galilee of the Gentiles; but, in the latter time, He hath made (or will make) it glorious.' Such being the case, the Evangelist rightly judged, that the substance of the two verses might be blended into one; omitting, in the former verse, the obscure words of the Hebrew, and the corrupt ones of the Greek; and retaining the rest, with the slight change (adopted from the Sept.) of making γῆ Ζαβ. &c. nominative instead of accusative cases, followed by ὁ λαὸς ὁ καθήμενος put in apposition with, as explanatory of, the preceding, and pointing out the nature of the glory to which that country was destined. 'Ὁδὸν θαλ.' is elliptically expressed for ἡ χώρα καθ' ὁδὸν θαλ. The words γῆ Ζαβουλών—τῶν ἔθνων will be found a graphical description of the country afterwards called Galilee, divided into its districts, as it was in the time of the Prophet; in which γῆ Ζαβ. and γῆ Ναφ. denote the whole of the tribes of Zebulon and Naphthali, except the πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου afterwards mentioned, a tract of country bordering on the lake, (the same, I imagine, as that which, in mentioning the divisions of Galilee, the Rabbins call the Valley;) which is here designated as the tract on the way or side of the lake—along the lake or its coast. Of the two next designations, πέραν Ἰορ. denotes the tract of country between Mount Hermon and the Jordan, which skirts its E. side, in its course from Mount Libanus to where it enters the sea of Galilee, and in which are situated Chorazin, and other places frequented by our Lord. By Γαλ. τῶν ἔθνων seems meant that tract of country at the N. of the tribe of Naphthali, where it runs out into a peak northward, and of which Kedesh and Dan were the principal towns; the same district as that mentioned in 2 Kings xv. 29, Sept., and called τὴν Γαλιλαίαν γῆν Νεφθαλί, where γῆν is put appositively, meaning 'namely, in the territory of Naph.' It is called in the passage Γαλ. τῶν ἔθνων, and in 1 Macc. v. 15, Γαλ. ἀλλοφύλων, because, as we learn from Strab. xvi. 2. 34, p. 769, many foreigners from Egypt, Arabia, Phenicia, &c., had, at a period long before the captivity, settled there, and were mixed with the population. As to the discrepancies which seem to subsist between the Sept. and St. Matthew, I apprehend that, in the time of the Evangelist, the text of the Sept. very nearly agreed with that which we now find in his Gospel: and it ran, I conceive, as follows: χώρα Ζαβ., ἡ γῆ Νεφ. ὁδὸν θαλάσσης [καὶ] τὴν παραλίαν [οἰκούντες] καὶ πέραν τοῦ Ἰορ., Γαλ. τῶν ἔθνων, ὁ λαὸς ὁ πορ. ἐν σκότει, εἶδε τὸ φῶς μέγα· ὁ καθ. ἐν χ. [καὶ] σκ. θαν. φῶς ἔλαμψε ἐπ' αὐ-

τούς. Most of the deviations here found from the present text, are, more or less, supported by MSS. The words λοιποὶ οἱ in the common text are evidently from the margin, as also οἰκούντες, which is found in some MSS. As to τὴν παραλίαν, the true reading, I have no doubt, is τῆς παραλίας. But I suspect that even that came originally from the margin; where it was meant to explain ὁδὸν θαλ. In the Alex. and some other MSS. we have both ὁδὸν θαλ. and its gloss; which latter (as is often the case) by degrees expelled the original reading. Εἶδε τὸ, for the textual εἶδεν, or εἶδεν, is found in several of the best MSS. The error is such as often occurs; and here led to the rash alteration of αὐτοῖς into ὡμας. The reading of the Sept., οἱ οἰκούντες, confirms that found in the Codex Cant. and several MSS. of the Italic Version οἱ καθήμενοι.

—καθήμενος ἐν σκότει] Καθῆσθαι oft. signif. as here, to live or be; as Judith v. 3. 1 Macc. ii. 1, 29. Sir. xxxvii. 18. Herodot. i. 45, ἐν πίνθει καθ. Aristoph. Pac. 642, ἡ πόλις γὰρ ὠχρῶσα κἀν φόβῳ καθήμεν. Since, however, the word, in this sense, is almost always connected with terms importing grief or calamity, there may be an allusion to sitting, as being the posture of mourners, see Job ii. 13. Lam. i. 1. Σκότος and φῶς are, in Scripture, used to denote respectively the darkness of irreligion, and the light of the Gospel, and the expression σκιᾷ θανάτου intimates the result of the former, namely, spiritual death in trespasses and sins.

—εἶδε φῶς μέγα] Strange is it that so many Commentators should regard the term φῶς as here intended to denote felicity. As to the passages they adduce from the Class. writers to establish this sense, they are not, in a case like this, of any great weight. Besides, it is not what the word might mean, but what the context here, and especially that in the passage of the Prophet may show, does mean. Now it is plain from the passage of Isaiah, whence v. 15 and 16 are derived, that the terms γν. and φῶς must literally denote the light of true knowledge in truths of the Gospel, implying of course the permanent bliss inseparable therefrom. But from the context in Isaiah (espec. at v. 5 and 6) it must appear that both the Prophet and the Evangelist had in mind, and designed to advert to One, even Christ, as the Author of that light, the 'Sun of righteousness' (Mal. iv. 2).

—ἀνέτειλεν] So the Classical writers speak of the coming of some public benefactor as a light

18. ἀμφίβληστρον] Meaning the large drag-net, as distinguished from δίκτυον, the small casting-net thrown by the hand.

19. δεῦτε ὀπίσω μου] Δεῦτε for δεῦρ ἴτε, is here and at xi. 28. xxii. 4. Mark i. 17. vi. 31, used to denote venite or adepte. The ὀπίσω μου has reference to the custom for disciples to follow their master; and the whole phrase is equiv. to 'Be (or become) my disciple.' So in Diog. Laert. ii. 48, Socrates is said to have called Xophon with the words ἵππου τοῖνον καὶ μάναυν.

— ἁλιεῖς ἀνθρώπων] i. e. 'able to draw men over to the Gospel.' So Plato, in his Sophista, compares the teacher of wisdom to a fisher; and in Stob. Serm. p. 313, Solon says: 'Ἐγὼ μὴ ἀνασχῶμαι ἵνα ἀνθρώπων ἁλιεύσω;

21. ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ] Not, 'in the boat.' Πλοῖον, indeed, is a general term to denote a vessel of any size; but it must here denote a skiff, or bark.

23. περιήγεν] olēi, peragravit. See my Lex. — περιήγεν ὅλην τ. Γ.] Tisch. edita ἐν ὅλῃ τ. Γ., from B, C, and one other MS.; while Lachm. reads ὅλη τ. Γ., from MS. B. But there is no warrant for either change against the united testimony of all the MSS. except three (for I find the text rec. in all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), further strengthened by all the Versions. Not to mention that the construction thus arising, is elsewhere, I believe, unprecedented. The ἐν may have proceeded from certain ancient Critics misconceiving the true rationale of the construction, which depends on the verb περιάγω being taken as an intransitive, by ellipsis of ἑαυτὸν, a use of περιάγω very rare in the Class. authors, and only found in the later and less pure ones, where it is confined to the construction absolute of this verb. Thus it appears that the Critics in question stumbled at the construction with accus. (though it recurs infra, ix.

35. xxiii. 15. Mark vi. 6, sine var. lect.), from their not being aware that the accus. is governed by the prepos. in composition, and accordingly supplied ἐν, at the same time changing ὅλη into ὅλη. Other Critics, however, chose to retain the accus. and supply αὐτοῖς. So in Scriv. MS. X is read αὐτοῖς ὅλην.

— ἐν ταῖς συναγωγαῖς] On the term συναγωγὴ see my Lex. New Test. I would add, that the origin of Jewish synagogues is a debated and doubtful question. If not so early as the traditions of the Targums claim, they may have arisen, not earlier indeed than the Babylonian captivity, but after being introduced into use there, may have been, at the return thence, brought to Judæa; but been vastly extended during the times of the later and pious kings of Judah, who probably promoted the use of them as a means both of strengthening the defences of true religion against the influence of surrounding heathenism, and of promoting the edification of its professors. It would seem that the use of synagogues had arisen as early as the period when the emigration of Jews to the great heathen cities commenced, and that it had been very early introduced into the large commercial cities of the heathen nations containing numerous Jewish immigrants. They were then, however, probably not regular edifices, but resembling the προσευχὰς of later times, (on which see my Lex.) though subsequently existing on a great scale among the Jews during the period of the Captivity, and, after the return from thence, introduced both in Jerusalem and in all the cities and large towns of Judæa, as a necessary means of instructing the ignorant, and keeping the people generally apart from the heathen, or semi-heathen mixed population.

— νόσον καὶ πᾶσαν μαλακίαν] The terms are not here synonymous, though they sometimes are. Νόσος rather denotes a thoroughly formed disorder, whether acute or chronic; μαλακία, an incipient indisposition, or temporary malady.

24. ἡ ἀκοή αὐτοῦ] "The report, or fame of him." So the Latin auditio for fama. Ἀντιοῦ

προσήμεκαν αὐτῷ πάντας τοὺς κακῶς ἔχοντας, ποικίλαις νόσοις καὶ βασάνοις συνεχομένους, καὶ δαιμονιζομένους, καὶ σεληνια-is Genitive of object for περὶ αὐτοῦ; found in Joseph. Ant. p. 786, 45, ἐφίκετο ἀγγαλία περὶ αὐτοῦ.

— βασάνοις συνεχομένους] Βάσανος signif. 1. a touchstone; 2. examination, or trial, by torture; 3. torture itself; 4. as here, any tormenting malady; see more in my Lex. Συνίχσθαι is often used with a Dat. of some disorder; and has reference to such as confine the patients to their bed.

— καὶ δαιμονιζομένους, καὶ σεληνιαζομένους] Notwithstanding the learning and talent which have been so profusely expended in support of the hypothesis of Mr. Mede, Dra. Mead and Freind, and Mr. Farmer, that these δαιμονιζόμενοι were merely lunatics, it is utterly untenable. The disorders could not be the same: that of those possessed with demons being precisely distinguished, not only from natural diseases in general, but from lunacy in particular. It is true, that among both Heathens and Jews, lunacy and epilepsy were commonly ascribed to the agency of dæmons (the spirits of dead men, or other evil beings); and it must be granted, that there are some passages of Scripture (as Matt. xvii. 11, 15. John vii. 20. viii. 48, 52. x. 2) which prove that the terms σαλν., ἐπιληπ., and δαίμ., were sometimes used synonymously. But that will not prove that they were not properly distinct from each other. And surely when distinguished, their being sometimes used synonymously ought not to affect their proper acceptation. The great preponderance, too, of the latter over the former seems to evince an intention, on the part of the sacred writers, to prevent the false conclusions which might be drawn from the diseases having many symptoms in common, by marking those cases of possession which Jesus relieved, by some circumstances not equivocal, and which could never accompany an imaginary disorder. And when it is urged, that the Evangelists merely adopted the popular phraseology of their countrymen, without any belief in the superstitions connected therewith;—just as with us the word 'lunatic' is used without assenting to the old opinion of the moon's influence—that is taking for granted the very thing to be proved, and confounds a distinction, important to be always kept in view,—that between popular phraseology and doctrine. Mr. Mede was led into the view adopted by him, from having, he says, 'observed it to be God's gracious method, in the course of his revealed dispensations, to take advantage of men's habitual prejudices, to support his truth, and keep his people attached to his ordinances.' But the learned writer should have known how to distinguish between rites and doctrines. They were rites only, of which the Almighty availed himself, for the benefit of his servants, to counteract their fondness for Pagan usages: in matters of doctrine, the like compliance could not be granted them without violating important truths; and therefore Scripture affords us no example of such a condescension. And surely, to support a false opinion concerning diabolical superstitions would have been contaminating the purity of the Christian faith. Moreover, when it is urged, that no reason can be given why there should have been demoniacal possessions at the time of our Lord, and not at the present day, we reply that these possessions might then be permitted to be far more frequent than at any other period, in order that the power of Christ over the world of spirits might be more evidently shown, and that He who came to destroy the works of the Devil might obtain a manifest triumph over him. Mede, Farmer, and others, indeed, insist much on the highly figurative character of Oriental style, and compare those passages of Matt. viii. 26. Luke viii. 24. Mark iv. 39, where Jesus is said to have 'rebuked the winds,' and 'rebuked the fever.' But as to the former expression, it is, in fact, only equiv. to the motus componere fluctus of Virgil: and the expression rebuking the fever is but a strongly figurative one, to denote repressing its violence. And when it is urged, that in the demoniacs no symptoms are recorded, which do not coincide with those of epilepsy or insanity at the present day, we may ask, If an evil spirit were permitted to disturb men's vital functions, have we any conception how this could be done without occasioning some or other of the symptoms which accompany natural disease?

It must, moreover, be borne in mind, that these demoniacal possessions have an intimate relation to the doctrine of redemption, and were, therefore, reasonably to be expected at the promulgation of the Gospel. The doctrines of demoniacal possessions and of a future state were equally supported by the acts and preaching of Jesus and his Disciples, and are equally woven into the substance of the Christian faith; the doctrines of the Fall and of the Redemption being the two cardinal hinges on which our holy Religion turns. To form a right judgment of the matter in question, it should be considered what part the Devil bore in the economy of grace. Now, in the history of the Fall, Satan is found tempting, through Eve, the first man, Adam, to disobedience; for which his punishment by the second Adam (who restored man to his lost inheritance) is, at the time of the Fall, denounced in the terms of 'bruising his head by the seed of the woman.' When, therefore, we find this restoration promised by the death of Christ, we may reasonably expect to find that punishment on the tempter, which was predicted in the history of the Fall, recorded in the history of the Restoration. And so, indeed, we often find it. See Luke x. 18, where Christ receives his Disciples from the missionary labours as conquerors returning in triumph. Had the first Adam stood in the rectitude of his creation, he had been immortal, and beyond the reach of natural and moral evil. His fall to mortality brought both into the world. The office of the second Adam was to restore man to that happy state. But as the immortality purchased for us by the Son of God was not, like that forfeited by Adam, to commence in this world, but is reserved for the next, both physical and moral evil were to endure for a season. Yet, to manifest that they were, indeed, to receive their final doom from the Redeemer, it was but fit that, in the course of his ministry, he should give a specimen of his power over them. One part, therefore, of his God-like labours was taken up in curing all kinds of natural diseases. But had he stopped there, in the midst of his victories over physical evil, the proof of his dominion over both worlds had remained defective. He was, therefore, to display his sovereignty over moral evil likewise. And this could not be clearly evinced, as it was over natural evil, but by a sensible victory over Satan, through whose temptation moral evil was brought into the world, and by whose wiles and malice it was sustained and increased. For evil is represented in Scripture as having been introduced by a Being of this description, who, in some manner, not intelligible to us, influenced the immaterial principle of man. The continuance of evil in the world is often ascribed to the continual agency of the same Being. Our ignorance of the manner in which the mind may be controlled by the agency in question ought not to induce us to reject the doctrine itself.

α Mark 2. 7. ζομένους, καὶ παραλυτικούς· καὶ ἐθεράπευσεν αὐτούς. 25 α Καὶ ἡκολούθησαν αὐτῷ ὄχλοι πολλοὶ ἀπὸ τῆς Γαλιλαίας καὶ Δεκαπόλεως, καὶ Ἱεροσολύμων καὶ Ἰουδαίας, καὶ πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου.
V. 1 Ἰδὼν δὲ τοὺς ὄχλους, ἀνέβη εἰς τὸ ὄρος· καὶ καθίσαντος

In short, the hypothesis, that the dæmoniæ were merely lunatic persons, involves, with the semblance of simplicity, far greater difficulties than are found in the common view. Nor can it be shown that Jesus Christ and the Apostles did, in any case, in compliance with the prejudices of their countrymen, teach, or even seemingly affirm, any thing which they themselves accounted as false. How otherwise are we to account for the fact, that the dæmoniæ every where address Jesus as the Messiah? which was not the case with those who only laboured under bodily disorders. And when we find mention made of the number of dæmons in particular possessions, actions ascribed to them, and actions so expressly distinguished from those of the possessed—conversations held by the former in regard to the disposal of them after their expulsion, and accounts given how they were actually disposed of—when we find desires and passions ascribed peculiarly to them, and similitudes taken from the conduct which they usually observe,—it is impossible for us to deny their existence: by acquiescing in which, where we cannot understand, we may and ought to bow our reason to the Giver of reason. On one side, we have the wonderful doctrine, that it pleased the Almighty to permit invisible and evil beings to possess themselves, in some incomprehensible manner, of the bodies and souls of men; and for purposes which we can partly see, but are partly left to conjecture. On the other, we have Christ, the revealer of truth, establishing falsehood, sanctioning error and deception, and consequently being answerable for future and gross impositions, such as have been practised in latter ages! We have the Evangelists inconsistent with themselves; and a narrative acknowledged to be inspired, and intended for the unlearned, unintelligible to the learned, and even involving falsehood! The hands, too, of Infidels are greatly strengthened by any such concession, inasmuch as the admission of such a principle involves the whole of Revelation in uncertainty. Those who bring themselves to believe that Devils and Dæmoniæ were used by our Lord and the sacred writers only as terms of accommodation to Jewish prejudices, may soon believe, that the terms Redemption, Sacrifices, and Satisfaction, came from no better source than figures of speech. Besides, various other awkward consequences arise, which are ably stated by Bp. Warburton, in L. ix. of his Divine Legation, and in his Sermon xxvii. on this text; to both of which I have been indebted for the greater portion of the matter contained in the foregoing Summary; which may suffice to prove that (as the learned prelate observes), “something would have been wanting to demonstrate, if not the power, at least the assumed character of Jesus, had it been exercised only over natural disorders.” But, as observes Dr. Jortin, by casting out evil spirits, He showed that He came to destroy the empire of Satan.

—σληνιαζομένους) lunatic (lit. moonstruck); the symptoms of the disorder being supposed, as with us in the case of lunatics (comp. Milton's ‘moonstruck madness’), to become more aggravated by the moon's increase. But such was also the opinion in the case of epilepsy; and the term σλην. is in the Greek Class. writers referred, not to lunacy, but to epilepsy. So Lucian, Tox. 24, and Manetho iv. 81. 216, to which many recent Commentators refer the use of σλ. here. And this is confirmed by Cæsarius (a Greek Father of the fourth century), Dialog. 2, containing a sort of dissertation on the question πῶς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον σληνιαζομένους λέγει τοὺς ἐπιληπτικούς. And so Hesych. explains ἐπιλήπτω by δαιμονιζόμενος, and ἐπιληπτικὸς by κατεχόμενος, ‘possessed;’ and we find from Isidor. Orig. iv. 7, that epileptic persons were vulgarly called lunatics. That the word here refers to epilepsy, is probable from the only other passage where it occurs in the New Test., Matt. xvii. 15, since, from comparison with the parallel passage, Mark ix. 17, and Luke ix. 39, it is plain that the person was afflicted with epilepsy; inflicted, however, by an evil spirit; so that, as Suicer says, ‘ἐπιληψία simul et δαιμονιασμὸς laboravit.’ And so in the Acta Thomæ, § 12, are conjoined as synonymous ὑπὸ δαιμονίων ὀχλούμενοι and σληνιαζόμενοι.

25. ἀπὸ τῆς Γαλιλαίας καὶ Δεκαπόλεως, καὶ Ἰερ. καὶ Ἰουδ. καὶ πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου] The ἀπὸ must be repeated at πέραν τ. ‘I., and by πέραν τ. ‘I. is meant the region beyond, or on the other side of the Jordan, more usually called Perea. By Δεκαπ. is meant, not the whole country which comprehended the ten cities and the territory pertaining to each, but has a very peculiar sense, which I have had much difficulty in ascertaining, and have pointed out at large in note on Mark vii. 31.

V. This and the two following chapters comprehend what is called the Sermon on the Mount (wherein are contained the great outlines of Christian practice); which some have supposed was not delivered all at one time, but is only a collection of sayings at different times delivered by our Lord. Yet (to use the words of Mr. Simeon, Hor. Hom.) 'as our Lord went through all the cities, towns, and villages, of Judea, instructing the people, it is reasonable to suppose that he should have frequently delivered the same truths in nearly the same expressions, because the same instructions were necessary for all. The repetition of them, therefore, at different times, and at distant places, is no reason why they should not have been delivered all at once, when so great a multitude was attending his ministry, and he had gone up on a mountain for the purpose of addressing them with more advantage, since they could not be accommodated in any house.' Moreover, the words of Ch. vii. 28, 29, show that this was one continued discourse, or rather that these were the chief topics contained in it, together with the principal illustrations of them; the design of our Lord being to make known the nature of that kingdom, which he had announced as being about to be established, and to rescue the moral law from the false glosses put upon it by the Pharisees.

CH. V. 1. ἀνέβη εἰς τὸ ὄρος] I am more than ever of opinion, with Bp. Middl., that this expression, τὸ ὄρος, must here denote, as at Luke xiv. 23, the mountain-district of Galilee, distinguished from the other two, as in Gen. xix. 17. Josh. ii. 22, meaning the mountainous range embosoming the sea of Galilee. So, too, I find, Mr. Green, Gram. N. T., p. 158, assigns this sense of 'mountain-district' here and xiv. 23, also at xv. 29. Mark iii. 13. Luke vi. 2. Mark vi. 46. Luke ix. 28. That the present passage must be added to those, he thinks plain from comparing iv. 8—v. 1 with Mark iii. 7—13; and he justly remarks, that the notion of Mount of Tabor being the Mount of Beatitudes is on this ground [also on another suggested by Bp. Middl.] untenable. Such a use of τὸ ὄρος is, as I believe, unexampled in the Class. writers, except in Dionys. de Situ, already noticed by me.

—καθίσαντος αὐτοῦ] not put for καθίσαντι αὐτῷ, which is unnecessary; for the gen. absol. is found in Hdt. and other writers. Καθ. has reference to the posture in which the Jewish doctors taught.

2. ἀνοίξας τὸ στόμα αὐτοῦ] This is not a Hebrew periphrasis for speaking; for the expression may rather be considered as a vestige of the redundancy of primitive phraseology; afterwards retained with verbs of speaking, and generally employed on introducing discourses of importance.

3. μακάριοι οἱ πτωχοὶ τῷ πνεύματι] The sense here partly depends upon the construction, and is a debated point. Many modern expositors join τῷ πνεύματι with μακ.; while more, and nearly all the ancient, construe it with πτωχοὶ; which is preferable; for the former method, though it yields a tolerable sense, is too harsh, and breaks that uniformity of expression which runs through the several μακαρισμοί, while the latter is confirmed by Is. lxi. 2.

—οἱ πτωχοὶ τῷ πνεύματι] The sense of this expression is well represented by Euthym., in accordance with which is that of Augustin, cited by T. Aquinas in loc., 'humiles et timentes Deum,' in other words, 'walking humbly with God,' non habentes inflatum spiritum; and so denoting the opposite to what is expressed at Col. ii. 18, by φυσιοῦμενος ὑπὸ τοῦ νοσὶ τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ, and what stands widely distinguished from the ταπεινοφροσύνη there mentioned—that affected lowliness, servile humility, under which lurks spiritual pride—in like manner as οἱ πραεῖς, at v. 5, adverts to, not a mere outward lowliness of demeanour, but the inward and genuine heart-πραότης (the 'meek lowliness' of Spenser) enjoined by St. Paul, Eph. iv. 2, where, having, it would seem, this saying of our Lord in mind, he brings together these two beatitudes, and places them in the same order, while adverting to the leading dispositions of the Christian's conversation, μετὰ πάσης ταπεινοφροσύνης καὶ πραότητος. By placing the beatitude expressed by οἱ πτ. τῷ πνεύματι first in order, our Lord may have meant to intimate that the foundation of all other Christian graces is laid in genuine humility. Polycarp must have so thought, since he evidently meant to advert to the two Beatitudes which have mainly the grounds of present blessedness represented as resting on the assured hope of future beatification. We are now prepared to see how it came to pass that vv. 4 and 5 should have been transposed by certain ancient Critics, as we find they were from the Vulg. and Italic Versions, and from MS. D and 33, where the text was (as in numerous other cases) accommodated to those Versions. Nevertheless, on these grounds, however slight, Lachm. and Tisch. have adopted this altered order in their texts, alleging also the authority of several Fathers, but those almost all Latin ones, and therefore carrying little or no weight. Origen indeed so places the verses in T. iii. 740, c (where he treats of the order of the Beatitudes produced), whom Matthæi thinks the original author of this transposition. But as it is found in the Italic Version, that is very improbable; and it rather arose from the false view of the logical coherence above traced; though, in the case of Origen, also by the allegorical interpretation of the verses which he adopted. Be that as it may, his authority is neutralized by himself adducing the verses in their usual order at T. iii. 780. Traces of the same license of transposing verses is occasionally to be observed elsewhere in the MSS. and Versions. Vide infra 7 and 8, 9, and Luke vi. 21. But this is not to be tolerated, and is indeed here unnecessary, since an apt thread of connexion may be traced; for the disposition of the humble-minded in the above sense is nearly allied to that of those who mourn for past sins, however repented of and forsaken, humbling themselves in the sight of God. These are justly termed blessed both in the pardon of those sins, and comforted in the hope of future preservation from future sins, through grace, and final acceptance by the God of all comfort.

4. μ. οἱ πενθῶντες] sc. τῷ πνεύματι, not however to be repeated from the foregoing verse, but to be fetched from the context, the sense being, 'those who mourn spiritually,' in opposition to carnal and secular mourning, meaning that gracious mourning which qualifies for blessedness—that penitential mourning for sins and shortcomings which produces a 'repentance not to be repented of.'

—παρακληθήσονται] 'they shall be comforted,' if not presently, yet surely,—ample provision for their comfort being made by the hope of final acceptance through God's pardoning mercy, and meanwhile with peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.

5. οἱ πραεῖς] 'the meek and forbearing.' It is not, as Chrys. says, apathe which is enjoined, but a regulation of passion. The blessing here promised (taken from Ps. xxxvii. 11) is primarily an earthly, but terminates in a heavenly one; conferring not merely a temporal, but an eternal inheritance. "As to the earthly one, that consists mainly (as Matth. Henry points out) in the manifest tendency of meekness of spirit to produce peace and comfort, thus sweetening the lives of those who may, nevertheless, have much to endure from the harshness of their fellow-men. And thus this branch of godliness hath the promise of the life that now is; not, however, to the exclusion of that which is to come in the heavenly inheritance." As respects the former, which is, he observes, almost the only express earthly temporal promise in the N. T., it may seem difficult to reconcile the above view with the term κληρονομ. But the solution of the difficulty is ready and effectual by alleging that the verb κληρον., like the Heb. נָחַל, should be rendered, not inherit, but obtain, possess (and so it is rendered in the Syr. Version of the Psalmist, and the best modern ones, and is so explained by the best Expositors), to obtain by full possession, and, by implication, to enjoy in solid use—and thus κληρον. is often used in N. T. followed by τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ, or ζωὴν αἰώνιον, or ἀφθαρσίαν. So, too, in Jos. Ant. viii. 13. 8, and occasionally in the later Greek writers, as Diod. and Polyb., as also the corresponding use in our own language of the verb to inherit, as found in our old authors, especially Shakespeare. I cannot agree with those who render γῆν by land, and refer it to the heavenly Canaan, the kingdom of Christ. The word seems here, as often, used in the wider acceptation earth, as it is rendered in our common Version. Accordingly, the general sense is, that 'the meek and forbearing shall especially enjoy whatever portion God hath given them here, and shall hereafter possess the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.' This view is confirmed by the authority of 1 Pet. iii. 8—11, where, after inculcating the exercise of the utmost forbearance, on the principle that our Christian calling invests us with a blessing partly enjoyed here, but to be enjoyed in full possession and absolute fruition hereafter, the Apostle illustrates his meaning by a reference to Ps. xxxiv. 13: ὁ γὰρ ἀγαθὸς—ζητήσάτω εἰρήνην καὶ δικαιοσύνην αὐτῶν. There is no doubt that St. Peter there had in mind the Beatitudes at v. 5 and 9.

6. οἱ πεινῶντες—δικαιοσύνην] i.e. 'those who ardently pursue, and as naturally seek after universal holiness and goodness, as men do to satisfy hunger and thirst.

—χορτασθήσονται] See my Lex. in v. The full sense is, 'they shall be [so] abundantly satisfied as to desire nothing more.'

7. οἱ ἐλεήμ.] merciful, compassionate, i. e. both passively and actively, denoting not only the having a fellow-feeling of human misery, but such a desire to remove or relieve it as shall prompt us to lend a helping hand. Such ἐλεήμονες shall experience that mercy from God, in pardon and acceptance, which they have dealt out to man.

8. οἱ καθαροὶ τῇ καρδίᾳ] as opposed not merely to the external purification of the Pharisees, but also to the mere moral purity of the heathen Philosophers; nay, what is more, inculcating, what is suggested by the context, that inner purity which is produced by faith (comp. Acts xv. 9: τῇ πίστει καθαρίσας τὰς καρδίας αὐτῶν), and hath its fruit in love and mercy. Comp. 1 Pet. i. 22: τὰς ψυχὰς ἡγνικότες—διὰ Πνεύματος ἱεὺ φιλαδελφίας, ἢ καθαράς καρδίας. The phrase τὸν Θεὸν ὄψονται (by a figure drawn from the customs of Oriental courts) means 'shall be admitted to his presence and enjoy his special favour.' Rev. xxii. 4. Comp. Heb. xii. 14: διακίτε τὸν δαίμονα, οὐ χωρὶς οὐδαὶς ὁψάται τὸν Κύριον.

9. οἱ εἰρηνοποιοί] I am now of opinion that the interpretation of almost all the best Commentators, pacifici, 'disposed to peace,' cannot stand, as yielding too feeble a sense to suit the context. If no more were meant than 'those pacifically disposed,' nothing additional would be given here to what is implied in the 1st and 3rd of the Beatitudes. Now, though all those given by our Lord are closely related, they are still distinct. I quite agree with Calvin and Campb. that here must be meant not those only who are studious of peace and shrink from quarrels, but who also sedulously compose such dissension and differences as arise, and who are to all the promoters of peace, thus cutting off all occasions of hatred and quarrel. This is, indeed, by Scripture Philologists affirmed to be an unclassical use of the term, and one which H. Steph. pronounces, as used in that sense, novel; but it is nearly allied to that by which the term signifies pacifical. Nay, I find it used in very nearly the sense here ro-quired in Dio Cass. p. 1216. 58, where the Emperor Commodus is styled αὐτοκράτωρ—εἰρηνοποιεῖ τὴν οἰκουμένην. And so Jul. Pollux, in his Onomasticon, ranks among the qualities of a good monarch εἰρηνοκὲν, εἰρηνοποιεῖς, 'a promoter of peace.'

—οἰοὶ θεοῦ] namely, as imitating and bearing resemblance to God, who is styled the God of peace. See Rom. xv. 33 and 2 Cor. xiii. 11. So Philo de Sacr. 2. 26: οἱ τὸ ἀριστόν τῇ φύσει καὶ τὸ καλὸν δρῶντες οἰοὶ εἰσι τοῦ Θεοῦ. Similar expressions, too, occur in the Pagan Philosophers, who are supposed to have borrowed them from the Scriptures.

—ἐληθήσονται] Not so much by Hebraism 'shall be,' as 'shall be acknowledged by men,' and regarded by God as such; namely, from their conformity to his image, in purity of life and peaceableness of disposition.

10. ἔν, δικ.] Comp. 1 Pet. iii. 14, evidently founded on this passage, ἀλλ' εἰ καὶ πάσχοιτε διὰ δικαιοσύνην, μακάριοι.

11. ὅταν οὐκ ἐπίστανται] On this use of ὅταν with Subj. Aor. see my Lex. in v. Καὶ διώξω. Having in the former verse touched on persecution generally, our Lord here descends to particulars; and notices one special act of it, namely, persecution on account of religion. Διώκειν prop. is a forensic term to denote to prosecute, but may denote to persecute; and the other expressions in this sentence may have reference to insult and violence, as well as injurious.

—ψευδόμενοι] The word is by Lachm. and Tisch. cancelled, on the authority of MS. D, a few cursive MSS. and Fathers. But it is defended by the Pesch. Syr., the Vulg. Versions, and all the primary cursive MSS. Internal evidence, indeed, is rather against than for the word; yet the idiom would seem one of too pure Grecism to have come from the Scholiasts, for it is both rare, and never found but in the very best Greek writers. The only examples of it I have noted are, Hom. Il. v. 685, ψευδόμενοι—φασί. Plato, p. 192, φησὶν—ψευδόμενος, and 337, φασί—ψευδόμενοι (just as here εἰπωσὶ ψευδ.). Lucian T. iii. 534, ψευδόμενος καὶ γρηγοῦν. Jos. Ant. vii. 11. 1, εἰλεγ, καταψευδόμενος, διδ. εἶναι, &c. The absence of the word from the texts of Origen and some Latin Fathers is, indeed, such as to create a suspicion; but, considering how little precision the Fathers were accustomed to observe in adducing texts of Scripture, little weight is to be ascribed to their testimony, unaccompanied by the external authority of MSS. Moreover, the less confidence is due to the testimony of the copies which have not ψευδ., because the very same MSS., and no others, have δικαιοσύνης instead of ἐμοῦ—a manifest corruption of the text. Hence one can scarcely doubt that both alterations proceeded from certain petty critics, who, taking ἐνεκα in the same sense as at v. 10, saw that the sentence 'in my cause' would be here little suitable, and that ψευδ. seemed worse than useless, hence took upon themselves to cancel ψευδ., and alter ἐμοῦ to δικ., thus making the sentiment exactly correspond to that at v. 10. But the word is confirmed by the Constit. Apost. plus semel. 'Ῥῆμα, just before, has been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., from 5 MSS., and some late Versions; but without reason, since it is supported by the great body of the MSS., confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., Vulg., and other Versions; and its Hebraistic character (especially in a Gospel like that of St. Matthew) strongly attests its genuineness. But that Hebr. and unclassical term occasioned the cancelling of the word, especially as the phrase does not occur in the New Test., yet it is found several times in the Sept., e. gr. Exod. xxxiii. 4. Deut. xvii. 1, πᾶν ῥῆμα πονηρὸν. Numb. xiv. 3. Judith viii. 8. By πονηρ. is meant 'calumnious,' as in Æschyl. Choeph. 1045, φήμαι πονηραῖς. Comp. Manil. iv. 573, 'verba maligna.' Other critics, we find, cancelled πονηρὸν, having doubtless in mind Luke xii. 10.

12. χαίrete καὶ ἀγαλλιᾶσθε] The words are not synonymous; but the latter is a stronger term than the former, q. d. 'Yes, exult.' The sense of μισθὸς must not be pressed on, but signifies a reward assigned of mere grace; as infr. xx. 1, and Rom. iv. 4.

—οὕτω γὰρ ἐδίωξαν] Said to comfort them under persecution and affliction, q. d. 'for example, so men persecuted the Prophets, as Jeremiah, Zechariah, Isaiah, and others.'

13. τὸ ἅλας τ. γ.] So Livy, cited by Grot., calls Greece the sal gentium; salt being a common symbol of wisdom. The meaning is, 'What salt is to food, by seasoning and preserving it from corruption, so should ye be to the rest of men.'

—ἐὰν δὲ ἀλισθησεται] Our Lord has here laid down a particular truth on a general principle.

—μωρανθῇ] 'become insipid,' ἀναλον γίνεσθαι, 'lose its saline property,' Mark ix. 50. This sense is derived from that signif. of μωρός, whereby (like the Latin fatuus, and the Hebrew חָרַץ, as applied to objects of taste) it denotes insipid. See my Lex.

—εἰς οὐδὲν ἰσχύει—καταπ. ὑπὸ τ. ἀνθρώπων] From a comparison of this with the somewhat parallel passage of Luke xiv. 34, it would seem that here we have a domestic, as there an agricultural proverb, whereby a thing is said to be good for nothing; at least such is the literal sense conveyed in the passage of Luke, and virtually such in the present, with which compare Epict. ii. 4, where, apostrophizing the bad man, he tells him that he is fit for nothing but to be cast out of doors, and to be thrown on the dunghill, like a broken vessel. The application is obvious.

— βληθῆναι ἔξω, καὶ καταπ.] Lachm. and Tisch. edit. βληθῆναι ἔξω καταπατεῖσθαι, from two uncial and two cursive MSS. But that is an evidence which would be insufficient in almost any case, esp. in one where external authority, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version, is so strongly opposed to the reading; and also internal evidence, as existing in its having every appearance of being a correction of style by the Alexandrian Grammarians.

14. τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου] The Article refers to the sense implied; the sense being, 'the means of enlightening the minds of men with true religion; through whose instrumentality from the fountain of light, the world is enlightened,' as the globe is enlightened by the rays of the sun; which is, in the proper sense, τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου.

— οὐ δύναται πόλις κρυβῆναι, &c.] It is best to suppose that in these words is implied the corresponding clause, 'So neither can you remain in secret; the eyes of all being turned upon you.' Thus ver. 16 will supply an admonition founded on what is said in the two preceding verses.

15. καίουσιν] for the more Classical ἀπrouσι, which is used by Luke viii. 16. xi. 33. Yet examples of it have been added, though chiefly from the later writers, and in the passives. The sentence contains a proverbial saying, to express depriving any thing of its utility, by putting it to a purpose the farthest from what it was intended for.

17. καταλῦσαι] 'to abrogate, to annul.' A sense, as applied to laws, or institutions of any kind, of frequent occurrence. See my Lex. Our Lord here anticipates an objection; namely, that his doctrines differed, in many respects, from the Mosaic; and that therefore his system could not but destroy that promulgated by God to Moses, and borne testimony to by the Prophets. And yet it was not to be imagined, that the all-wise Being would lay down a law, as a rule of life, under one dispensation, which should be at variance with what he had promulgated under another. By τὸν νόμον must, however, be meant, in some sense, the law of Moses; that being the invariable sense of the word in the Gospels and Acts: though some understand the ceremonial, others the moral law. Each may be said to be meant. For the Ceremonial law was completed by our Lord, in his answering the types and fulfilling the prophecies,—after which it was to cease, the shadow being supplied by the substance; the Moral, by his exalting its precepts to a spirituality before unknown, and purifying it from the corruptions of the Jewish teachers; for it is plain from the whole of Scripture, that the ceremonial law alone was abrogated, while the moral law was left, as being of perpetual obligation. And thus, in either case, the law was meant to be, as St Paul terms it, our παιδαγωγός, or usher unto, and preparer for, the Gospel, and to cease when it had answered the purpose for which it was originally designed, as a part of the great plan of Divine wisdom and mercy, for the salvation of man.

— τὸν νόμον ἢ τοὺς προφ.] It seems clear that Christ does not allude to the sacificial and typical parts of the law, but only the moral parts of both the law and the prophets, as comprehending the substance of the whole Scriptures, the latter as being supporters and interpreters of the former; accordingly, πληρῶσαι here signifies 'to fill up or unto,' so answering to ἀναπληρῶσαι, 'to carry out the bare letter in the full spirit,' as a limner's sketch in outline is filled up, so as to form the complete picture. See Chrys., Theophyl., and Euthym.

18. ἀμὴν] See my Lex. Ὁ οὐρανὸς καὶ ἡ γῆ form a periphrasis for the universe, which the Jews supposed would never utterly perish, but be constantly renewed. See Baruch iii. 32. i. 11. Ἐπεὶ δὲ παρέλθῃ ὁ οὐρ. is a proverbial phrase, often occurring in Scripture (see my Lex.), and sometimes in the Class. wr., to denote that a thing can never happen. So Dionys. Hal. vi. 95, where it is agreed in a treaty, that there shall be peace μέχρις ἂν οὐρανὸς τι καὶ γῆ τὴν αὐτὴν στάσιω ἔχωσι.

— ἰῶτα—κεφαλαί] Ἰῶτα denoted properly the letter Jod [י] (the smallest of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet), and hence, figuratively, any thing very small; κεφαλαί, the points, or corners, which distinguished similar letters of the Hebrew alphabet, but were used figuratively to denote the minutest parts of any thing. Similar sentiments are cited from the Rabbinical writers. Thus our Lord means to express, in addition to the eternal obligation, the boundless extent of the moral law, as demanding the utmost purity of thought, as well as innocence of action.

— ἕως ἂν πάντα γένηται] 'Until all shall come to pass,' i. e. be accomplished, namely, by the fulfilment of the legal types and prophecies, and the complete establishment of the moral law.

19. ὅς ἐὰν οὖν λύσῃ] 'Shall transgress.' A sense common in the Classical writers. The οὖν seems to have reference not to the verse immediately preceding, but to v. 17.

— μίαν τῶν ἐλαχίστων] 'One, even of the least of these commandments.' Here there is an allusion to the practice of the Pharisees, who, agreeably to their own lax notions of morality, divided the injunctions of the law into the wrightier and the lighter. Any transgression of the latter they held to be very venial; and, by their own arbitrary classification of the former, they evaded the spirit, while they pretended to fulfil the letter of the law.

— καὶ διδάξῃ οὕτω τοὺς ἀνθρώπους] i. e. 'He who shall both himself break and teach others to break.' There are cases in which the teaching others to do wrong may be worse than the doing wrong ourselves. One may be the result of sudden temptation; the other is done deliberately and on principle. So it has been well observed by a profound and original thinker: "Les passions déréglées inspirent les mauvaises actions: mais les mauvaises maximes corrompent la raison même, et ne laissent plus de ressource pour revenir au bien."

— ἐλάχιστος κληθήσεται] Said per meiosis for, 'he shall be the farthest from attaining heaven,' i. e. 'he shall not attain it at all.' By the antithesis, μέγας must as often be taken for μύιστος.

20. λέγω γὰρ ὑμῖν, ὅτι, &c.] The connexion between this and the foregoing verses may be best perceived by understanding the γὰρ as equiv. to our why in its ratiocinative sense, 'Why [so far am I from having come to destroy the Law, &c., that], I tell you that, except your obedience shall exceed in spirit and kind that of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter,' &c. Thus in the next verse our Lord proceeds to illustrate the spirit and true scope of certain specific precepts of the Law, at the same time correcting the wrong application of others by the Scribes and Pharisees.

— ἰὰν μὴ περισσεύσῃ, &c.] Here our Lord fully declares his meaning; openly naming those whom he had before only hinted at. The sentiment is, as it were, an answer to a question; q. d. 'What, will not the righteousness of the law, as exhibited in the lives of such holy persons as the Pharisees, save us? No such thing—for I plainly tell you, that unless,' &c. Δικαιοσύνη must here denote piety and virtue, purity of heart and life.

— οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθῃ] 'Ye shall by no means enter.' On this idiom see my Lex. The form denotes exclusion from the blessings of the Gospel.

21, 22. In order to elucidate his meaning, our Lord proceeds to vindicate several of the commandments of the moral law from the corrupt interpretation put upon them by the Scribes.

— τοῖς ἀρχαίοις] It is matter of dispute whether this should be rendered 'by, or to them of old time.' The former is adopted by most of the Commentators from Beza downward; the latter, by the Fathers and the ancient translators, and a few modern Expositors, as Doddr., Campb., Rosenm., Kuin., and Jebb. So Jos. Antiq. viii. 2. 4. The former is very suitable to the context, and confirmed by the usage of the later writers, espec. the Sept., Jos., and the New Test. Thus the words will be akin to a Talmudic saying, which may be εἰρηκασιν οἱ ἀρχαῖοι ἡμῶν, (meaning the Jewish legislators from the age of Moses downwards,) thus Grecised; and so νομοθεῖται ἡμῶν in Joseph. Bell. iii. 8. 5. However, the rendering 'to the ancients' is equally supported by grammatical propriety, and seems entitled to the preference, both because the sense thus arising is equally suitable, and because wherever the formula occurs in the New Test. and Sept., accompanied with ἐρρήθη, it is never followed by any other subat. but that denoting the persons to whom the words are spoken. Besides, this view is supported by the authority of all the ancient Versions and many Fathers.

— ἔνοχος ἔσται τῇ κρίσει] 'will be liable to the judgment.' So Plato, ἔνοχος ἔστω νόμοις ὁ τοῦτο δράσας, By τῇ κρίσει is meant an inferior Court of Judicature, consisting, as the Rabbins say, of 23, or according to Jos. of 7 judges.

22. τῷ ἀδελφῷ] for ἑτέρῳ, any one. An idiom arising from the Jews being accustomed to regard all Israelites as brethren.

— εἰκ] 'without sufficient cause;' implying also above measure. For such a person (to use the words of Aristotle cited by Wetstein) is angry, οἷς οὐ δεῖ, καὶ ἔφ' οἷς οὐ δεῖ, καὶ μᾶλλον ἢ δεῖ. Editors and Critics, however, are divided in opinion as to the genuineness of the word; which is rejected by Erasmm., Bengel, Mill, Fritz., Lach., and Tisch., but received by Grot., Wets., Griesb., Matthæi, Vater, and Scholz. The authority of MSS. for its omission is very trifling; and that of versions slender. And although that of the Fathers be considerable, yet inferior to that for the word. Internal evidence is indeed rather against it, since more likely was it to have been put in than put out. And though authorities are very few [add, however, Brit. Mus. 17,982 and 10,943, 1 m.], yet they are weighty, confirmed by several early Fathers. On the other hand, however, an equal number of early Fathers defend it; and Justin M. is more than balanced by Irenæus and Cyprian, Hilary, Lucifer, Cyril, Ephr. Syr., Isid. Pel., Const. Apost., and the most ancient copies of the Italic Vers., also the Pesh. Syr.; besides which, evidence of this kind for a word is more weighty than that against it.

— ῥακά—μωρί Of these two terms, the former is, Lightf. says, 'an appellation of utter contempt and scorn, to denote one utterly despicable, and, as answering to the Hebr. רָקָא, empty, must denote metaphor. one empty, or destitute of any estimable moral qualities, good-for-nothing, vile, as in Judg. ix. 4, where the persons by whom Abimelech murdered his brethren are called רָקָא Sept. καυνοὶ καὶ δειλοὶ; in which passage by δειλοὶ, intended further to evolve the sense, is meant homines nequam, 'wretched, profligate fellows.' And again, in Judg. xi. 3, συνιστράφησαν πρὸς ἱεφθαὶ ἄνδρες καυνοί, 'wretched, beggarly fellows.' As to the other term, μωρί, it is best regarded as a term expressive of utter abhorrence, equiv. to wicked wretch, miscreant.

— ἵσθαι ἵσται αἰ. τ. γ. τ. π. for ἵσχοι βληθῆναι, &c., as Num. xxxv. 31, ἵσχος ἀναίρειθῆναι, equiv. to, 'he shall be liable to a punishment amounting unto Gehenna.' Γέεννα is formed from the Hebr. גֵּי הֵן (the valley of Hinnom), a place s.e. of Jerusalem, called Γαῖσνα at Josh. xviii. 16 (and probably a deep dell; φάραγξ, as it is rendered at Josh. xv. 8), where formerly children had been sacrificed by fire to Moloch; and which long afterwards was held in such abomination, that the carcases of animals, and dead bodies of malefactors, were thrown into it; which, in so hot a climate, needing to be consumed by fire (which was constantly kept up), it obtained the name γέεννα τοῦ πυρός. Both from its former and its present use, it was no unfit emblem of the place of torment reserved for the wicked, and might well supply the term to denote it.

23. As the former verse forbids ill-timed and excessive anger and hatred, so following enjoin love to our neighbour. And since the Pl anger, hatred, and reviling are offences; and thought that they the wrath of God, if sacrifices a rites were accurately observed taught, that external worship i the sight of God, unless it be meek and charitable spirit.

— δῶρον] i. e. 'what was offered at altar.'

23. ἴαν οὖν προσφ., &c.] Here we have an inference drawn from the guilt and peril temporal of all hostility and bitterness of spirit forbidden in the foregoing verses.

— ἔχει τι κατὰ σου] Scil. ἐγκλημα, cause of complaint; which is implied by the context. The same expression occurs at Mark xi. 25. Rev. ii. 4.

24. διαλλάγηθι] i. e. '[do thy endeavour to] be reconciled with;' namely, by offering every satisfaction in your power for the injury done. Thus Philo de sacrificiis, p. 841, says, that 'when a man has injured his brother, and, repenting of his fault, voluntarily acknowledges it, he must first make restitution, and then come into the temple, presenting his sacrifice, and asking pardon.' Thus we are taught that vain is all external worship of the Deity, if the duties towards our fellow-creatures be neglected. Προσφ. is a sacrificial term, on which see my Lex.

25. Our Lord having explained the 6th commandment, inculcates the duties contained in it, particularly that of seeking reconciliation with an offended brother. This he does 1. (in the preceding verses) from the consideration of the offence which a want of a conciliatory spirit gives to God; and 2. (in this and the next verse), from a prudential consideration of the danger to which it exposes ourselves.

Here, then, is inculcated a general maxim as to the expediency of speedy reconciliation with an adversary. And this is illustrated by an example derived from common life; for ἵσθι εὐνοῶν is seemingly an idiomatic expression of ordinary life, like our 'be friends with,' equiv. to γίνου εὖνοε αὐτῷ καὶ φίλος, as Euthym. well explains, become friends with him, equiv. to 'be friends one to another.' Comp. Diod. Sic. T. i. 176, εὖνοισιν ἀλλήλοισι. The ἵσθι is not pleonastic, but intensive.

— τῷ ἀντιδίκῳ] The word signifies properly an opponent in a suit at law; but here a creditor, who is about to become a plaintiff, by suing his debtor in a court of justice.

— ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ] 'in the way,' namely, to the Judge. For from Heinecc. Antiq. Rom. iv. 16, 18, we find that sometimes the plaintiff and defendant used to settle their affair by the way; and then the latter, who had been summoned to trial, was dismissed.

— σε παραδῶ] These words were cancelled by Lach. and Tisch., on the authority of MS. B and two others, but restored in Tisch. 2, very properly, since they had been thrown out by Critics merely to get rid of a tautology.

— ὑπηρέτῃ] ‘the person who carried into execution the sentence of the Judge,’ whether corporal punishment or fine, and called by Luke xiii. 58, πράκτωρ, probably the more exact term.

²⁷. τοῖς ἀρχαίοις] These words have been rejected by all the later Editors, and rightly; since they are found in few of the MSS., and are sanctioned by scarcely any Versions or Fathers; and we can far better account for their insertion than their omission.

²⁸. γυναῖκα] i. e. a married woman; which sense is required by the context and the almost general use of μοιχεύω and μοιχεία in the Scriptures. Βλέπων is for ἐπιβλέπων, passionately ‘gazing upon,’ for ἐποφθαλμιῶν. Our Lord means to say, that it is not the act only, but the unchaste desire also (what is called at 2 Pet. ii. 14, the ‘adulterous eye’) which is included in the commandment. Ἐπιθυμία has been well defined ‘such a desire as gains the full consent of the will, and would certainly terminate in action, did not impediments from other causes arise,’ thus making the essence of the vice to be in the intention. So also thought many of the sages of Greece and Rome; ex. gr. Juven. Sat. xiii. 208, ‘Scelus intra se tacitum qui cogitat ullum, Facti crimen habet.’ Indeed, the ancient philosophers admitted that there was a moral defilement adhering to lascivious thoughts. So Eurip. Hippol. 317, makes Phædra exclaim, χεῖρας μὲν ἀγναί, φρήν δ’ ἔχει μίσσμά τι.

— ἐπιθυμῆσαι αὐτήν] So for αὐτῇ; 10 uncial and many cursive MSS., which has been received by Griesb., Matth., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch., very properly, espec. since internal evidence is quite in its favour. The constr. with accus. is indeed very rare in pure Greek writers, but it is found in Xenoph., Menander, Philo, and Joseph., Steph. Thes., as also in passages of Clem. Alex.

and Greg. Nyss. there cited. Moreover, it occurs several times in the Sept., and was probably an Hellenistic form, though at the same time extending to the common Greek idiom, from which it was derived by Menander (as suited the language of common life, and adapted to the comic dialogue), and by Xen. Cyr. viii. 2, 1, who occasionally adopts common Greek idioms.

²⁹. εἰ δὲ ὁ ὀφθαλμὸς—σκανδαλίζει σε] ‘If thy right eye prove a stumbling-block to thee,’ ‘occasion thee to stumble,’ ‘lead thee into sin.’ The Hebrews were accustomed to compare lusts and evil passions with members of the body; for example, an evil eye denoted envy. Thus to pluck out the eye, and cut off the hand, is equiv. to ‘crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts.’ Comp. Gal. v. 24, and mortify your members, Col. iii. 5. The sense therefore is: ‘deny thyself what is even the most necessary or desirable, what is as dear to thee as thy right eye (the most precious of the members, ‘cujus usus,’ says Pliny, ‘vitam a morte distinguit’), or as necessary as thy right hand (the most useful of the members), when the sacrifice is demanded by the good of thy soul.’ Why the right eye is mentioned, may be that that was essentially necessary to the purposes of war, as it was then carried on. The sentiments contained in this passage are illustrated by Wets. from various passages of the Class. writers. Phil. Jud. vol. i. 241, 19. Seneca Ep. 51, ‘Proijce quæcumque cor tuum laniat; quæ si aliter extrahi nequirent, cor cum illis evellendum erat,’ equiv. to ἐξελθεῖν here, of which use see my Lex. New Test. In this, and numerous other such like passages, scattered up and down in the Philosophers who lived after the promulgation of the Gospel, we may see a far higher tone of morals than had been before maintained; which can be ascribed to nothing but the silent effect of the Gospel (as is the case in every age), even on those who refused to receive it.

³¹. Having before adverted to the 7th commandment, our Lord takes occasion to allude to αὐτῇ ἀποστάσιον. ³³ Ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι ὃς ἂν ἀπολύσῃ τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ, παρεκτός λόγου πορνείας, ποιεῖ αὐτὴν μοι-

that abuse of the Judicial law,—which, though intended to regulate and repress divorces, had only rendered them more frequent, and become almost as pestilent to good morals as adultery itself. "Ὅτι is om. in B, D, L, & 15 cursive MSS., and is cancelled by L. and T. 2 Ed. on authority quite insufficient (I find the word in all the Lamb. and Br. Mus. copies), espec. in a case like this, where ancient Versions and Fathers are of little weight, and where internal evidence is in favour of the word, from the greater probability of its being removed than inserted. In fact, this use of ὅτι after verbs of saying or speaking (which is quite Hellenistic), occurring often in the Sept., is freq. absent in the Alex. MSS., and the word is often cancelled by L. and T. See Matt. ix. 18. xx. 12. xxi. 16. xxiii. 31. xxvi. 25. Mark i. 27, 40. ii. 16. v. 23. vi. 16, 18, 23. vii. 6. viii. 24, 28. xii. 6, 29. Luke vii. 22. xii. 27. xix. 46. John iv. 41. vii. 31. viii. 33. ix. 23. xiii. 37. xviii. 6, et al. iii. 10, et al. The Critics, it seems, cancelled the word as pleonastic and unnecessary; though it is occasionally found in the purest Greek writers; not, however, with even the semblance of pleonasm. It may suffice to have stated this once for all, to show why in such a case as this I have generally declined to cancel, or even bracket, the ὅτι.

—ὃς ἂν ἀπολύσῃ, &c.] We are to bear in mind, 1. that the Jews were permitted to divorce their wives without assigning any cause; 2. that our Lord, neither here nor at Matt. xix. 3, meant to give political directions; 3. that he, moreover, did not contradict Moses, who even himself never approved of the arbitrary divorces of his times (see xix. 8); and, 4. that the Jewish Doctors in the age of Christ were not agreed on the sense of the passage of Deut. xxiv. 1, which treats of divorce. Those of the school of Hillel maintained that the wife might not only be divorced for some great offence, but כִּי כָּל עֲוֹן כַּתָּא פָּסָאן אֵלֶיָּהּ, for any cause, however slight, so that a writing of divorcement, in due form, was given to her. On the other hand, that of Shammai contended that כִּי כָּל עֲוֹן, the term in Deut. xxiv. 1,—which was the subject of the dispute,—and which the school of Hillel understood of any defect of person, or of disposition, could only mean something criminal, as adultery. See Selden de Ux. Heb. iii. 18. Lightf. Hor. Heb. in loc. infra. From the words of Christ, xix. 3, compared with x. 2, seq., it is clear that Moses meant the words to be taken as those of the school of Hillel interpreted them; and yet it is plain from Matt. xix. 8, and Gen. ii. 24, that Moses did not approve of arbitrary divorce. The Jewish Doctors, however, had presumed to change a moral precept into a civil institution. [To speak in plainer terms, many things which Moses had tolerated in civil life, in order to avoid a greater evil (see Matt. xix. 8, and note), the Pharisees determined to be morally right; as in the case of retaliation. Ed.] Jesus, therefore, who did not intend to give political directions, here teaches in what case, salvâ religione et conscientiâ, a wife might be divorced. (Kuini.)

32. For ὃς ἂν ἀπολύσῃ, B, K, L, M, Δ, and about 40 cursive MSS., have πᾶς ὁ ἀπολύων, adopted by L. and Tisch., on considerable, but not competent, authority, espec. since internal evidence is adverse, from the probability of that reading being derived from the parallel passage of Luke (sine v. l.). The reading λεῖκην ποιῆσαι ἢ μὴ λ. edited infra, v. 36, by Lach. and Tisch. from B and 2 other MSS., is a vain alteration proceeding from the polishing school of Critics. This is indeed confirmed by MS. L, and I find by the Leic. MS. (teste Jacks.) But from the character of those MSS. we cannot place confidence in what seems, I repeat, a mere alteration for the sake of removing a difficulty, but one which is liable to objection not easily to be removed.

—πορνείας] Commentators and Jurists are much divided in opinion as to the exact sense of this term. It is generally interpreted adultery. That, however, would seem to require μοιχείας; and as adultery was a capital offence, it would appear unnecessary to denounce divorce against such as were guilty of it. Some understand by it fornication before marriage: others, incest, or vice generally; and Mr. Morgan, in his work on Marriage, Adultery, and Divorce, religious apostasy, or idolatry. But, suffice it to say, that to suppose so highly figurative a signification to be employed in a passage intended to give a most important regulation for all future ages, is like supposing a law to be couched in a riddle. The very same objection lies equally against all the other new interpretations; and still more against the ingenious conjecture of Pringle, πορνῆσις. On such an occasion as the present (and that when the words of Matt. xix. 9 were pronounced), the term must be taken in its ordinary signification. Πορνῆ (like the corresponding term in our own language), denotes one who yields up the person, whether for hire, or for the purposes of sensuality; and, by implication, unlawfully. And consequently, the term πορνεία, as applied to females, denotes unlawful commerce with the other sex. But that, in a married woman, will involve adultery; and therefore the term may well be used in that sense. Thus, at Rom. i. 29, πορνεία must include adultery; as also in other passages; for which see my Lex. And as to the objection which has to many seemed so formidable as to set them upon devising new interpretations, namely, that adultery was punished by the Jewish law with death,—that involves no real difficulty at all; for our Lord, in pronouncing on this deeply important matter, was legislating for all future ages, and therefore could have no reference to the Mosaic law, espec. as it was now on the point of being abolished. It was sufficient for us to be informed, that adultery may authorize the divorcement of the offending party. Whether and how far the offence should be punishable by the Magistrate, was a question of secular polity, with which our Lord did not interfere, and with which Religion has nothing to do.

—For μοιχεῖσθαι MSS. B, D, and 6 later cursive MSS. have μοιχευθῆναι, which has been edited by Lachm. and Tisch., but without reason, since external authority for it is very slender, (I find μοιχᾶσθαι in all the Lamb. and Br. Mus. MSS.) and internal evidence is against it, from its having every appearance of being a false correction intended to introduce a more classical reading, the canon criticus, as adduced by T. Magist. p. 619, being: μοιχᾶται ὁ ἀνὴρ, μοιχεύεται δὲ ἡ γυνή. And, indeed, I know of no passage of any Classical writer of any age where this rule is broken: nor does an instance of its breach occur even in the Sept. But the rule is broken in a passage of St. Mark x. 12, and therefore that it should be so here is not surprising.

33. The Pharisees distributed oaths into the weightier and the lighter, and forbade perjury only when the name of God was contained in the oath; but if that was omitted, they held it no offence, or a very slight one; as they did also mental prevarication, by swearing with the lips, and disavowing the oath with the heart. A standard of morality even below that of the heathen. See Hom. II. i. 312. Now it is this use of vain oaths, which directly led to perjury,—that Jesus here means to prohibit. He is, therefore, not to be understood as forbidding judicial oaths; but (as appears from the examples he subjoins) such oaths as are introduced in common conversation, and on ordinary occasions. See Joseph. B. J. v. 12.

— οὐκ ἐπιорκῆσεις.] Ἐπιорκεῖν may mean either to swear falsely, and not ex animo; or, to violate one's oath. Both however are here to be understood. The words ἀποδώσεις δὲ . . . σου are to be taken (like ὃς δ' ἐν φωνίᾳ, &c. at ver. 19) as an interpretation of the Jewish Doctors. Thus there will be an easier connexion between the doctrine of the Pharisees, expressed in these words, and the opposite one of Christ. (Kuin.)

34. seq.] Here are instanced the oaths most frequently used by the Jews; and that oaths very similar to those of the Hebrews were used by the heathen, Wetstein has shown.

— ἐν.] Heb. בְּ per, 'by.' On the difference between the Class. and the Hellenistic construction of ἐν see my Lex.

36. ἐν τῇ κεφ. σου] This was a practice common to both Greeks and Romans. The hand, it should seem, was placed on the head during swearing; implying imprecation in case of perjury, since the head was peculiarly spoken of in such imprecations. See Herodot. ii. 30.

— οὐ δύνασαι· ποιῆσαι] There is something here at which many Interpreters have stumbled; and some would read, from conjecture, μίαν τρίχα λευκὴν ποιῆσαι μέλαιναν, 'even one single,' the μίαν being emphatic. But that cannot be admitted. Others attempt to remove the difficulty by interpretation, thus: 'thou canst not produce, or bring forth, one hair, white or black.' This, however, is doing violence to the position of the words, and yields a jeune sense. There is no reason to abandon the interpretation of the ancient, and most of the modern Interpreters, who understand it of change of colour; q. d. 'thou hast no power even over the colour of thy hair; to make one hair, whether white or black, otherwise than what it is.'

37. ἔστω] Lachm. and Tisch. read, from one MS. (B) ἔστω—a very specious reading, strongly recommended by its Hebraistic idiom, and which is found also at v. 48. But it is scarcely to be supposed that the true reading has been altered in every other copy. The same remark applies to ραπίξαι, for ραπίσαι, in the next verse but one, which has been adopted, on the same authority, by Lachm., though not by Tisch., who ought rather to have received the latter than the former, especially considering that it derives some confirmation from a passage further on, vii. 24, ὅστις ἀκούει, where some MSS. I predict, will be found to have (what was probably read by the Ethiopic translator) ἀκούσαι [I have since found it in Br. Mus. MS. 16,183. l. m.]. This use, however, of the Present is an idiom of the common dialect in most languages, including our own. For ἔτι, just after, the same MS. (B) and some others have εἰς, which has been received by Lachm. But ραπίξαι ἔτι occurs both in the Class. writers (though only with genit.) and in the Sept.; while ραπ. εἰς is found, I believe, no where, and arose, I suspect, from an error of the Scribes, since εἰς and ἔτι are sometimes confounded.

— ναὶ ναὶ, οὐ οὐ] Most Commentators regard this passage as a kindred one to that in James v. 12, and take the first ναὶ and οὐ to signify the promise, or assertion, the second ναὶ and οὐ its fulfilment; construing: ὁ λόγος ὑμῶν ὁ ναὶ, ἔστω ναὶ: ὁ λόγος δ' οὐ, ἔστω οὐ, comparing Rev. i. 7, and 2 Cor. i. 18, 19, and Maimonid. Thus the adverb will be converted into a noun; which is frequent both in the Scriptural and Class. writers. This method, however, does violence to the construction; and the passages cited are of another kind. It is therefore better (with Chrysostom, Kuin, and Fritz.) to suppose that the ναὶ and οὐ are repeated, by way of expressing seriousness and gravity; q. d. 'be content with a solemn and serious affirmation or negation.'

— τὸ περισσὸν τούτων] lit. 'what exceeds or goes beyond these': a sense often found in

ὅτι ἐρρήθη· “Ὁφθαλμὸν ἀντὶ ὀφθαλμοῦ, καὶ ὀδόντα ἀντὶ ὀδόντος.” ³⁹ εἰ Ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν μὴ ἀντιστῆναι τῷ πονηρῷ· ἀλλ’ ὅστις σε ῥαπίσει ἐπὶ τὴν δεξιάν σου σιαγόνα, στρέφον αὐτῷ καὶ τὴν ἄλλην· ⁴⁰ καὶ τῷ θέλοντί σοι κριθῆναι, καὶ τὸν χιτῶνά σου λαβεῖν, ἄφες αὐτῷ καὶ τὸ ἱμάτιον· ⁴¹ καὶ ὅστις σε ἀγγαρεύσει μίλιον ἐν, ὕπαγε μετ’ αὐτοῦ δύο. ⁴² ἢ Τῷ αἰτοῦντί σε †δίδουν καὶ

Sept., also in Jos. Ant. viii. 154. xvi. 24. τοῦ πονηροῦ. It is debated whether the sense be, ‘the Evil one,’ or ‘evil.’ The Article will here (as Bp. Middlet. observes) determine nothing, because the neuter adjunct. may be used as a subst., and so τὸ πονηρὸν at Rom. xii. 9. The former sense is thought to be supported by the words of Christ Himself at John viii. 44, and in the Lord’s Prayer; and there is every reason to think it was adopted by the ancients. Thus we may render ‘springs from the temptation of the Evil one.’ See, however, my note on vi. 13, which rather confirms the former view. It is, however, I agree with Mr. Alford, immaterial in which of the two senses the expression is understood, since the evil of man’s corrupt nature is, in Scripture, spoken of as the work of ὁ πονηρός, and is in itself τὸ πονηρὸν.

38. There is here a reference to the practice of the Jews as to retaliation in kind for an injury done to any one. Now the Law (Exod. xxi. 24. Lev. xxiv. 20) had sanctioned this principle; but only, we may imagine, as exercised by the civil magistrate for the satisfaction of the injured party. The Scribes, however, extended it to authorize private vengeance; against which our Lord protests, as being mere revenge.

39. μὴ ἀντιστῆναι τῷ πονηρῷ] Since the verb ἀντιστασθαι not only signifies to withstand, but not unfrequently (from the adjunct) to retaliate upon; we may, with Kuin. and Schleus., adopt that sense here. But I prefer, with others, to explain it ‘to set oneself in a posture of hostile opposition,’ [in order to retaliate.] Τῷ πονηρῷ means the injurious person, the injurer; so the Sept. render πονηρὸν by ἀδικῶν as well as πονηρός. Moral maxims similar to the above are adduced from the Heathen Philosophers. That the commands in this and the following verses are not to be taken literally, as enjoining the particular actions here specified, but the disposition of forgiveness,—is apparent, not only from its being usual in the East to put the action for the disposition, but from the manner in which the precepts are introduced.

—ραπίσει] The word corresponds to our rap or slap; and was chiefly, as here, used of striking on the face; which was regarded as an affront of the worst sort; and was severely punished both by the Jewish and Roman laws.

—σου] is omitted in about 15 cursive MSS. (to which I add, 1 Iamb. and 3 Br. Mus. MSS. and 6 Scriv.), and placed after οἶα. in MSS. B, D, a reading adopted by L. and T. But the authority is insufficient, and external evidence is against the cancelling; for the word was, I suspect, lost by the variation of position, as in very many other passages.

40. θέλοντί σοι κριθῆναι] Kuin. and others think that κρίν. is here to be taken in a figurative sense, of quarrelling, disputing, &c. And they cite Hesych. κρινόμεθα ἀντὶ τοῦ μαχόμεθα καὶ διαλεγόμεθα, where I would read μαχόμεθα· καὶ διαλυόμεθα. So Thucyd. i. 145, δίκη ἱστοιοὶ εἶναι διαλύσθαι περὶ τῶν ἐγκλημάτων. But this amounts to no positive proof. And the use of κρινεσθαι in the Sept. for γιν and γιν is but a weak one. It is better, with almost all Interpreters, ancient and modern, to take κριθῆναι in its proper sense, as a forensic term signifying ‘to be implicated at law;’ as in a similar expression of Thucyd. i. 39, δίκη ἰσθλῆσαι κρινεσθαι (where see my note), and probably Hesych. ubi supra. Θέλοντι is said by the Commentators to be redundant; but the word is scarcely ever such, and least of all here, the sense being, ‘to him who is disposed.’ By χιτῶνα is denoted the under garment; and by ἱμάτιον the upper: usually of greater value than the former. Indeed, from the circumstances of its being used as a blanket, to wrap the person in by night, it was not allowed by the Law to be taken by the creditor, though the χιτῶν might. See Exod. xxii. 26, sq.

41. ἀγγαρεύσει, &c.] Meaning, ‘Rather than resist any public authority requiring such service for a certain distance, go with the ἀγγαρος (or King’s Courier) voluntarily twice the distance.’ The King’s Courier had authority to press horses and carriages, either for the post or for the public service generally; and, when necessary, could compel the personal attendance of the owners. See Hdt. viii. 98. Xen. Cyr. viii. 6, 17. Jos. Ant. xiii. 3. The term was derived from the Persians, who first introduced the use of regular Couriers, to transmit intelligence; a custom which was adopted among the Romans (who exacted this service from the provincials), and is yet retained among the Turks.

42. Here we have an injunction engrafted on the foregoing, by the association of ideas; a yielding spirit extending to both.

—τῷ αἰτοῦντί σε δίδουν, κ.τ.λ.] This injunction, however seemingly absolute and unlimited, must yet be interpreted, for the practical carrying out, with due reservation, and not only admit, but require limitation, according to the circumstances of the two parties concerned—the Applicant and the Bestower,—thus affording room for the exercise of Christian wisdom, as well as benevolence, whence may arise the well-timed compliance, and the as timely refusal; timely as regards the actual circumstances of the Applicant and the Bestower, as to the needs of the one, and the ability of the other. Another example of this twofold application of an injunction with reference to the two parties concerned in carrying it out, as found in 2 Tim. iv. 2, at least according to the scope of the passage inculcated in my note. But to advert to the var. lect.

—For δίδουν Lachm. and Tisch. read δός, from B, D, and 2 cursive ones [I add Colbert.

4 ap. Jacks.], and Clemens, perhaps rightly; for δίδου may have been introduced from Luke vi. 30; and certainly in the Lord's Prayer, while Luke uses δίδου, Matt. uses δός. In fact, Matt. elsewhere uses δός, but never δίδου. The reverse is the case in the Gospel of St. Luke. St. Mark and St. John follow the custom of Matth.; so that δός occurs there several times, δίδου never. The same may be said of the use in the Sept. Yet St. Matt. may have used the form δίδου, and the testimony of the MSS., except 4 (for δίδου is in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), is too strong to be overborne by merely internal evidence.

43. τὸν πλησίον σου] The term ὁ πλησίον in the Sept. and New Test. often denotes, like the Hebr. עַרְבּ, one who is connected with us in any relation, whether of consanguinity, or friendship, or even proximity; though sometimes, as here, as in Gen. xxvi. 31. Joel ii. 8, it is applied to one connected with us in that of country or religion; the Jews regarding all Gentiles as enemies. See Jos. Ant. ii. 6. 5.

Although, in the passage of Scripture here alluded to, (Levit. xix. 18,) it is not expressly added, 'thou shalt hate thine enemy,' yet the Jews thought it deducible from the words ἀγαπήσεις τὸν πλησίον, and countenanced by various precepts in Scripture concerning the idolatrous nations around them; which precepts they extended to all heathens; whom, it seems, they emphatically termed their enemies.

44. ἀγαπᾶτε τοὺς ἐχθροὺς ὑμῶν] Meaning the love, not of predilection, but of benevolence, as shown to a fellow-creature and probably fellow-Christian, and extending to the disposition to render good for evil, by doing what in us lies to benefit them, whether by word or deed. How little this was the precept and practice of the heathens, as well as of the Jews, is well known, and may be imagined from the maxim so pithily expressed in Thucyd. i. 34, ὁ ἀλαχίστα τὰς μεταμέλειας ἐκ τοῦ χαρίζεσθαι τοῖς ἐναντίοις λαμβάνων, ἀσφαλέστατος ἂν διατελοῖν.

The words εὐλογεῖτε—ὑμᾶς, absent from B and some other MSS. and several Fathers, have been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. Internal evidence is indeed against them, but they are defended by the early ancient Versions; and the authority of early Fathers against them is not so strong as their authority would have been for them. However, they may have been an insertion from Luke vi. 28, as also may the next words ἐπηρεαζόντων; and they, too, are cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., though not on such strong grounds as the foregoing words, and they are found in the early Versions. The ὑμᾶς after ἐπηρεαζόντων ought not to have been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., from only two MSS., espec. since it is confirmed by the parallel passage of Luke, and yet was not likely to be introduced thence, and not necessary, in all the MSS. but two.

— εὐλογεῖτε] The simplest and truest interpretation is that of Kuin., 'bene iis dicite,' 'give them good words.' Καταράσθαι may very well be understood of reviling in general, equiv. to λοιδορεῖν, 1 Pet. iii. 9. So at 1 Cor. iv. 12, λοιδορεῖν and εὐλογεῖν are similarly opposed. There seems, indeed, to be a climax in the clauses of this verse.

— τοῖς μισοῦσιν] This, for the vulg. τοὺς μισοῦντας, all the Editors from Mill to Tisch. are agreed is the true reading. It is one of the Hellenistic idioms to use the dative after καλῶς ποιεῖν instead of the accus., which is the Classical usage. The same difference subsists with respect to the next term, ἐπηρεαζόντων.

— ἐπηρεαζόντων] which should seem to denote ill treatment generally, whether by words or deeds.

45. υἱοὶ τοῦ πατρὸς] i. e. 'assimilated to him by conformity of disposition,' as children usually are to their parents. See John viii. 44.

— βρέχει] equiv. to ὑεῖ, lit. 'causes it to rain,' 'causes rain to fall upon.' So Sept. in Amos iv. 7, ἐπὶ πόλιν—βρέξω. So in Job v. 10, God is designated as 'the Giver of rain,' τὸν δίδοντα ὕετον ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν. The Class. usage has ὑεῖ Ζεὺς, or ὁ Θεὸς.

46. ἔχετε] This is not put for ἔχετε, as Kuin. and others say; but the sense is, 'have ye [laid up] in the word of God?' See v. 12. vi. 1.

47. ἀσπάσῃσθε] This includes (species for genus) the exercise of all the offices of kindness and affection.

— ἀδελφοὺς ὑμῶν] i. e. your countrymen. Very many MSS., with the Edit. Princ. and other early Edd., together with many ancient Versions and Fathers, have φίλους, which was preferred by Wets., and received into the text by Matth. φίλους was adopted from the Erasmus Edd., by Steph., on slender MS. authority. Yet it is so strongly supported by Critical probability, that it requires little; φίλους being, as Grot. and others have seen, evidently a gloss. However, ad. has since been found in many ancient and good MSS. (to which I add Lamb. MS. 1193, of the 8th century), and all the best Versions, and is retained by Griesb., Scholz, Lach., and Tisch.

— τί περισσόν] The sense, 'quid eximius,' 'very excellent,' which I have hitherto adopted with all the best modern commentators, is supported by the authority of the Syr. and Pers. Versions. And this use of the word is frequent in the Class. writers from Hdt. to Longus. It also occurs in Sept. at Dan. vi. 15, σοφία περισσή, and vi. 13, πνεῦμα περισσόν ἐν αὐτῷ. Eccles. vii. 17. I am, however, not sure that the Vulg. Version, followed by E. V. quid amplius? as being more simple and natural, may not be the truer. Render, 'What more than, or beyond [others] do ye?' So the Ethiopic Version, Beza, H. Steph., P. Brug., and Grot. And this rendering is confirmed by the words, supra v. 37, τὸ δὲ περισσόν τούτων, 'what is more than, beyond these?' Nor is this absolute construction of περισσός (in which a genit. of comparison is implied) without parallel elsewhere, e. g. Eccles. ii. 15: ἵνατί ἰσοφισάμην ἰγὼ τὸ περισσόν; where, for τὸ περισσ., I would read τότε περ., 'why was I then wise more than [he]?' or [than another]. So Joseph. Antiq. xvi. 2. 4: ἡξιωσάμην περιττόν οὐδέν, nihil amplius, and xiv. 14. 2: Μάλῃ δὲ μεταβιῶντι Ἡρώδην οὐδὲν τοῦτου περισσώτερον ἰγίνετο, nihil amplius erat.

For τελῶναι 3 uncial and 13 cursive MSS. with several Versions and Fathers have ἔθνικοι. I add 3 Lamb. and all the best Mus. MSS.; which is edited by Griesb., Lach., and Tisch., and indeed the antithesis favours it. However ἔθνικοι might arise from a wish to strengthen the antithesis; whether it did is uncertain, but internal evidence is rather in its favour; and accordingly I have now received it, but with some hesitation; especially since τελ. is supported by the Pesch. Syr. Vers.

For οὕτω, τὸ αὐτὸ has been received by Lachm. and Tisch., from 4 uncial and many cursive MSS., to which I add one Lamb., and Br. Mus. 1810, 11, 838, perhaps rightly. For, in addition to strong external authority, it has the support of the Pesch. Syr. Vers., and it is besides borne out by internal evidence, as existing in the great probability of its having been altered to οὕτω at v. 46, in order to remove a tautology. Thus in MSS. D, Z, and 5 others, the foregoing τὸ αὐτὸ was altered to οὕτω, and the reading has been received by Lach. and Tisch., as wrongly there, as rightly here.

48. ἴσαθε] Fut. for Imperat., according to the Commentators. Nay, Abrech. affirms that ἴσαθε is equally imperative with ἴστε. But it is more correct to say, that it bears an affinity to the Imperat. and (as Fritz. has suggested) is a delicate way of signifying what is directed to be done. Nor is this a Hebraism; but it is found both in Greek, Latin, and English. See Win. Gr. § 44. 3. The sense is 'you are required to be τέλειοι;' 'fully and completely righteous.'

Comp. Eccles. xlv. 17, and 1 Pet. i. 15, also Isocr. p. 239, τελείους ἀνδράς εἶναι, καὶ πᾶσας ἔχειν ἀρετάς. It is obvious that the precept must be taken with limitation, as at Job i. 1; the meaning being, that 'we are to aim at that perfection, especially in acts of benevolence to our fellow-creatures, which pre-eminently characterizes the Deity.' Nor is this limitation arbitrary; but is suggested by ὥσπερ, for which L. and T. needlessly edit ὥς; which, like some other adverbs of comparison, does not denote equality in the things compared, but consimilarity; q. d. 'in the same manner, though not in the same degree.'

VI. The religion of the Pharisees was distinguished from that of Christ as much by its motives as by its rule of action. Our Lord, therefore, next proceeds to warn his disciples against hypocrisy and ostentation in external duties, as he had done against their neglect. This he does by reference to the three principal modes of evincing regard to religion—almsgiving (1–4), prayer (4–9), and fasting (5, seqq.). He warns them that those who were influenced by so unworthy a motive as ostentation, must expect no other reward for such performances than that applause of the world which has actuated them thereto.

1. προσέχετε] Tisch. adds δὲ, from E, Z, and about 12 cursive MSS., with the Syr. and some later Versions: while Lachm. rejects it,—justly, for not only external authority (it is absent from all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS., and all Scriv. except 2); but internal evidence is against it. It was, doubtless, introduced by those who thought that some particle of connexion is wanting. But none was needed, since there is evidently a transition of subject; the discourse, as Chrys. and Euthym. ably point out, passing from actions to motives. As to the Syriac and other Versions, in a case like this Versions have scarcely any authority for a particle, though not a little against a connective particle. Moreover, the gravity of the injunction involved in προσέχετε would, of itself, make the Asyndeton very suitable; and it occurs with this very word infra xvi. 6, sine v. l. et f. 11. Luke xii. 1, sine v. l. Luke xxi. 46, sine v. l. Acts v. 35. 'It is different where the context requires a particle of ratiocination, as in Luke xxi. 34, προσέχετε δὲ ἑαυτοῖς, though even there the MS. E, and not a few others, have not the δὲ, and Acts xx. 28, though even there the οὖν is cancelled by Lachm., from MSS. A, B, D, and 5 cursive MSS. with Vulg. Version. It is very difficult, and almost impossible, to determine as to the conflicting claims of ἑλεημοσύνην and δικαιοσύνην. On reconsidering the matter, I am now inclined to think that δικ. was the original reading, for I doubt not that ἡγεῖα was in the Hebrew original: and that, we know, often denoted almsgiving, espec. in the Samaritan and Chaldaic dialects. Internal evidence is as strong as possible for δικ., and its bearing is ably indicated by an eminent expositor, who, after showing that δικ.

θεν τῶν ἀνθρώπων, πρὸς τὸ θεαθῆναι αὐτοῖς· εἰ δὲ μήγε, μισθὸν οὐκ ἔχετε παρὰ τῷ πατρὶ ὑμῶν τῷ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς. ^{2 a} Ὅταν ^{a Rom. 12.} οὖν ποιῆς ἐλεημοσύνην, μὴ σαλπίσῃς ἔμπροσθέν σου, ὥσπερ οἱ ὑποκριταὶ ποιοῦσιν ἐν ταῖς συναγωγαῖς καὶ ἐν ταῖς ῥύμαις, ὅπως δοξασθῶσιν ὑπὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων. ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, ἀπέχουσι τὸν μισθὸν αὐτῶν. ³ Σοῦ δὲ ποιούντος ἐλεημοσύνην, μὴ γινώτω ἡ ἀριστερά σου τί ποιεῖ ἡ δεξιὰ σου· ^{4 b} ὅπως ἡ σου ἡ ἐλεημοσύνη ^{b Luke 14.} ἐν τῷ κρυπτῷ καὶ ὁ πατήρ σου ὁ βλέπων ἐν τῷ κρυπτῷ, αὐτὸς might very well pass into ἐλεμ., but not the reverse, adds another reason for preferring δικ., namely, because the vis dicendi demands that the general term δικ. should at v. 1 first be placed, and then the special and particular term ἐλεμ. be subjoined at v. 2, and seq. But it is strange that he should, a little further on, conclude by saying that δικ. is here put for 'alms-giving;' for though it seems so put in Prov. x. 2. Tobit ii. 11. xii. 9—11, and often in the Cod. Apocr. N. T., yet here it seems first used in the general sense benevolence, kindness (caritas), liberality, and then in the special one 'beneficence,' 'bounty to the needy by alms-giving,' the former constituting the root, and the latter the trunk and branches of the virtue in question, the latter term denoting the fruits of benevolence, as evinced in benevolence to those that need our aid, whether by helping them in their struggles for maintenance, or in alms-giving to those who are destitute and helpless.

— ἐλεημοσύνην] The reading δικαιοσύνην, adopted by Lachm. and Tisch., has internal evidence in its favour, but not sufficient external authority to warrant its being received into the text. The Class. use is ἐλ. διδοῦαι.

— ἴχετε] is not put for the Fut., but is to be taken as at v. 46, where see note.

The alteration of ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς into ὁ οὐράνιος by Lachm. and Tisch. from 5 uncial, and about 16 cursive MSS. (to which add Lamb. 1175, Scriv. P. Br. Mus. 16, 184, 7141), is warranted by considerable, but not competent authority, being opposed by a vast preponderance of external testimony, confirmed by internal evidence and the Pesch. Syr. Version. The same remark applies to infra xxiii. 9; the critics having in both cases chosen to alter ὁ ἐν τ. οὐραν. to ὁ οὐράνιος, from vi. 14. 26. 32. xv. 13. xviii. 35.

2. μὴ σαλπίσῃς, &c.] It is better simply to take the verb in a metaphorical sense, and, by a proverbial manner of speaking, of ostentation in giving (so Cicero says buccinator existimationis); with allusion to the custom, common to all the ancient nations, of making proclamations, &c., by sound of trumpet, q. d. Be not as the hypocrites, who, devoid of all benevolence, and actuated either by superstition, self-interest, or vain-glory, seek only the praise of men; and therefore, as it were, sound a trumpet before them, to proclaim their alms-giving.

— οὐ ὑποκριταί] See my Lex.

— συναγωγαῖς] Grot. Wolf, Elsm., Kuin., and others take the word of places of public concourse, to the exclusion of synagogues. But those must surely be included, as being the places where alms were especially distributed.

— ἀπέχουσι] This is not put for ἀφίξουσι, but is Present used of what is customary; and the ἀπό is very significant, the sense being, 'they receive out (or, in full) their reward,' 'have all that they will ever have.' So Luke vi. 24, ἀπὶχεται τὴν παράκλησιν ὑμῶν. Joseph. Bell. i. 30. 6, ἀπὶχω τῆς εὐσεβείας τὸ ἐπιτίμιον.

3. μὴ γινώτω—σου] A proverbial saying frequent in the Classics and Rabbins, implying such secrecy, as to escape, if possible, the observation even of ourselves.

4. ὁ πατήρ σου—φανερῶ] Meaning, that 'however secret, it will be fully known to the Searcher of hearts, will be well pleasing to Him, and be openly rewarded by Him.' 'Αποδοῦσιν, scil. μισθόν, the reward of God's favour and blessing here, and life everlasting hereafter.—'Εν τῷ φανερῷ. The words are omitted in a few MSS., Versions, and Fathers, here and at verse 6. And they are, in one or other of the passages, cancelled by some Critics, but defended by others. There is, I conceive, far too little external evidence to authorize cancelling them in either of the first two passages; and internal evidence is very strong for them in the former. And, as to the latter, it is surely less probable that they were inserted by those who wished to complete the antithesis, than that they were cancelled by those who stumbled at the repetition: in removing which, some cancelled the words at v. 4, others at v. 6, and others at v. 18; and as the point was a doubtful one, and the marks of doubt probably left in all the passages, some bold or blundering scribes omitted them in all three; which was better than to cancel, as Griesb. has done, the first and third, and leave the second. However, as external evidence (both in MSS., Versions, and Fathers) is decidedly against the words at v. 18, and as internal evidence is unfavourable to them, I have, for critical consistency, felt bound, while I defend them here and at v. 6, to bracket them at v. 18. On attentively reconsidering this difficult question, I see no reason to alter my decision, which I now find confirmed by the suffrage of the very learned Anger, Evang. Synop., and of Bp. Jebb, Sac. Lit., p. 161, seq., where he shows that the absence of the words here and at 6 and 18 (found in Lachm. and Tisch.) would seem unaccountable, and their partial rejection (namely, at v. 18) not demanded. That they are genuine in the first 2, and perhaps the 3rd, he thinks probable from various arguments, critical and moral. And that probability is, he conceives, converted into certainly by the laws of Parallelism, which decide the point at issue by demanding their presence. But, were the laws of Parallelism far better founded than they are, they could not decide a point like the present; that can only be done by a just consideration of external authority in conjunction with internal evidence, and arising out of various critical considerations. When that process is gone through, and the scales of judgment as to internal evidence held by a nice and steady hand, it will be found that there is every reason to think the words genuine at v. 4 and 6; but very probably, though not certainly, interpolated at v. 18, from the foregoing two passages. I have said not certainly,—for the words may have been inculcated the third time, for deeper impression on the minds of the hearers. Just as at Mark ix. 44, 46, 48, where the words ὅπου ἡ σκῶληξ αὐτῶν οὐ ταλαιτᾶ, καὶ τὸ πῦρ οὐ σβέννεται are thrice repeated; though they in 2 of the 3 times are absent from 4 uncial and about 5 cursive MSS. (nearly the same as those which omit them here), and removed by the same Critics as here, and their work approved by the same Editors, Lachm. and Tisch. I have, however, lately found more evidence against the words than I expected, they being absent from all the Lamb. MSS. except 1, all the Scriv. MSS. except 2; and all the Brit. Mus. MSS. except 1 or 2. On the other hand, there are, I apprehend, irresistible arguments for the genuineness of the words at v. 4 and 6, derived from a just consideration of the context; for, waving the laws of Parallelism, it is, as Bp. Jebb observes, not only demanded by the antithetic ἐν τῷ κρυπτῷ, but seems forced out by the reiterated notion of concealment pervading the foregoing context. This, indeed, is freely acknowledged by Maldonati, who here deserts his favourite Vulgate, and prefers the Italic (confirmed as it is by the Pesch. Syr.), on the very same grounds as those propounded by Bp. Jebb. The same view, too, was long ago taken by Euthym., who, after ably tracing the logic of the passage, remarks (doubtless following some ancient Father), that there is a latent gradation upward [i. e. climax], q. d. ‘You will have the meed of approbation from men,—not a few, but all,—and not merely men, but angels and archangels, at the general assembly of just men made perfect.’ Dr. Camph. would not have evinced here a rashness unusual to him by removing the words in all three verses, had not his mind been warped by the sophistry of Wakef.; though, from that influence it would have been disabused, had his eye rested on the following able remark of Dr. Whitby: “It is observable, that the very thing which we are forbidden [to seek] from men on earth is [mercifully] made part of that reward, which we shall receive in heaven at that great Day of account, when our faith and charity shall be found to our praise and glory.” The existence of the words in the text at so early a period as the age of the Pesch. Syr. and Italic Versions, forbids the hypothesis which has been broached, of their being introduced by Critics, who thought them called for by the context. As to the difficulty which has been started of accounting for the removal of the words at so early a period as the age of the formation of the Vulg. and the writing of Cod. B, that is not formidable, since we have only to ascribe it to the influence of ORIGEN, out of deference to whose judgment the words might well be removed by Jerome, who bowed too much to the Theological Giant of his age. There is, as Wets. has shown, every reason to think (espec. from the existence of the words in the Italic and their absence in the Vulg.) that Origen, who is known to have rejected them, did so because he thought it improbable that our Lord, in admonishing his disciples not to pay regard to the judgment of men, would have introduced, as a motive to the observance of this admonition, that the reward should be in public. But this was a most rash sitting in judgment on the words of inspired Scripture, though indeed too much in character with that mighty Master in Israel. The above matter of fact unravels the whole mystery of the absence of the words from a few copies such as abound in similar licentious alterations originating in the false principles of a dangerous system, held in common, to a certain degree, by Origen, and completely by certain modern Heresiarchs and innovating Critics, unaware, we may hope, that such a system must destroy all confidence in the integrity of the written Word of Scripture given to every man to profit withal, not λογομαχεῖν εἰς οὐδὲν χρήσιμον, ἐκαστοστροφῇ τῶν ἀκουόντων.

The αὐτός is cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., from 5 uncial and 15 cursive MSS. (to which I add Lamb. 1175. Scr. S. U. Mus. 7140). But external authority for the word,—strengthened by the Pesch. Syr. Vera,—is confirmed by internal evidence, as existing in the greater likelihood of its being removed, as unnecessary, than inserted for the purpose of strengthening the sense. As to the argument urged by Fritz., that had Matth. so intended, he would have written οὗτος,—I answer, that αὐτός is elsewhere so used in the New Test. for οὗτος. Thus in this very Gospel, xii. 50, we have ὅστις γὰρ ἀποκρίσῃ—αὐτός μου ἀδελφός, κ.τ.λ., where a few copies have οὗτος, derived from the parallel passage of Mark iii. 35, also in John vii. 4. xiv. 10. As to 1 Cor. vii. 13, the reading οὗτος, received by L. and T., is unsustained; nor is this use other than pure Greek, if αὐτός be used merely as taking up again the subject, or object, of the verb, which is the case in all the passages just cited. But if taken (as not unfrequently elsewhere in the New Test.) as emphatic, Classic propriety would require οὗτος, though αὐτός is found in the less pure Greek of John i. 27, and vii. 4.

5. For προσεύχη and ἔση, Lachm. and Tisch. read προσεύχεσθε and ἴσαθε, from MSS. B, Z, and 3 cursive ones, the Vulg. and Italic Versions, and some Fathers. But the vast preponderance of external authority, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version, for the singular forms, forbids the change; espec. considering that internal evidence is in favour of the text received; in short, it is plain that the plural forms were introduced by Critics, who thought them required by the plurals further on, and were not aware that this use of the singular is a characteristic of the popular style in address.

PER. 1. ἀγιασθήτω—σου] for δοξασθήτω, as Chrys. explains. Imperat. for Optat. to strengthen the sense.—Τὸ ὄνομά σου. Namely, 'all that the name of God includes'—God himself in all his attributes and relatives. Hence, then, it is prayed that 'the existence of God may be believed, His attributes and perfections adored and imitated, His supremacy acknowledged, and His Providence owned and trusted in.'

10. PER. 2. ἐλθέτω ἡ βασιλεία σου] Here we pray that the kingdom of God, meaning the Gospel, may be diffused over the whole earth, by the conversion of both Jews and Gentiles; so that all, being members of God's kingdom of grace on earth, may finally be partakers of his kingdom of glory in heaven.

PER. 3. γενηθήτω τὸ βέλημα—γῆς] i. e. 'May the dispensations of thy Providence be acquiesced in by us on earth with the same ready submission and willing alacrity, as they are obeyed in heaven.' At ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς there is an ellipsis of οὕτως, which is frequent both in the Scriptural and Class. writers; e. g. Thucyd. viii. 1, καὶ ὡς ἰδοῦσιν αὐτοῖς, καὶ (for οὕτως καὶ) ἵπποισιν αὐτά.

11. As the three first Petitions respect the glory of God, so do the three last the bodily necessities and spiritual infirmities of man.

—ἄρτον] This word, like the Hebr. אֶרֶץ, denotes, by an oriental figure, all the necessities of life (τὰ ἐπιτήδεια τοῦ σώματος, James ii. 16).

—ἐπιούσιον] On the sense of this term, Commentators are by no means agreed; the difficulty being increased by the word being not found in the Class. writers, and occurring elsewhere only in the parallel passage, Luke xi. 3. Hence we are compelled to seek its sense, as best we may, from its etymology. Of the interpretations propounded, only two have any semblance of truth. 1. That of Salmas., Grot., Lightf., Valck., Michaelis, and Fritzsche.; who take it for τῆς ἐπιούσης ἡμέρας, and as equiv. to εἰς αὔριον. The derivation, however, on which it is founded is irregular, and the word contrary to analogy; not to say that this view is at variance with our Lord's command at v. 25 and 34, μὴ μεμεν. εἰς τὴν αὔριον, which implies prayer. Greatly preferable is that of the ancient Fathers and Commentators in general, and the Syriac Version; and, of most moderns, H. Steph., Beza, Mede, Toup, Kuin., Schleus., Wahl, Rosenm., and Matthæi, who, deriving the term from οὐσία, 'subsistence,' assign as the sense, 'sufficient for our subsistence'; i. e., belonging to, sufficient for; in which I must finally acquiesce. As to the objections advanced by word-catchers who animadvert on the liberty taken in forming the term ad similitudinem περιούσιος, and using οὐσία in an unusual sense, one might answer, with Matthæi, "De οὐσία sensu metaphysico hic plane non est cogitandum (Christus non egit cum Metaphysicis) sed de sensu populari." Accordingly I am, as before, inclined to suppose the term, and its present use, to be derived from the language of common life, which would account for no example of the same having been found. So Origen, who adopts this interpretation of ἐπιούσιος, affirms (de Orat. § 16) that "this use is found neither in the Greek philosophers and Class. writers, nor is employed ἐν τῇ τῶν ἰδωτῶν συνηθείᾳ, but was fabricated by the Evangelists." But to this I cannot assent without better reasons. We cannot argue from Origen's ignorance of such a popular use of the term, that it did not exist. The word ἐπιούσιος might very well have been in use, being formed like ἐπιόδιος, equiv. to ἐφόδιος, which Hesych. explains ἀρμόδιος εἰς ὁδόν. The main objection, however, is that οὐσία is used not for substance, but subsistence, existence, to which the above answer of Matt. might suffice; but another and better may be adduced in the actual use of οὐσία in that sense adduced from Porphyry. de Abet. cited by Toup on Suid., t. ii. 575, Ἀπαρχὴ γὰρ ἑκάστου ὧν διδάσκῃ ἡ θυσία, καὶ δι' αὐτῶν τρέφει, καὶ εἰς τὸ εἶναι συνίχει τῆς οὐσίας, 'by which the Deity nourishes our substance (essence, being, life) and keeps it together so as to be, or exist.' This surely yields a sufficiently good sense, without any serious breach of the norma loquendi.

12. ἄφες ἡμῖν τὰ ὀφειλήματα] Answering to δ. ἀμαρτίας in the parallel passage of Luke. This usage of the word arises from this; that obedience being a debt we owe to God, who ever commits sin, thereby contracts a kind of obligation, to be paid by suffering the punishment awarded to delinquency. And ἀφίεναι signifies to remit the penalty, i. e. to forgive. Τοῖς ὀφειλ. ἡμῶν, i. e. 'those who sin against us,' those who fail in their duties and obligations to us.

—ὡς ἀφίμεν] The best modern Commentators are of opinion, that ὡς here signifies for, or since; a signif. frequent in the Class. writers, and confirmed, they think, by the parallel passage in Luke. But that is not decisive; since the prayer is known to have been delivered on two occasions, and with a slight variation. Neither, I apprehend, is the ὡς to be regarded, with most Interpreters, as conditional. It rather denotes similarity of kind, than comparison; sicut, 'even as.' Comp. Eph. iv. 32.

—For ἀφίμεν, Lachm. and Tisch. edit ἀφάκεμεν, from B, Z, and 2 cursive MSS., 1 and 124 in marg., to which I add (from Jacks.) Barb. 1, and to the Forz-Jul., and Harl. copies of the Vulg., for dimissimus I add the Lamb. MS. (of the 7th century). The Syr. Vers. is strongly alleged by Griesb., Scholz, and Tisch.; for it has the Present tense. Mr. Alf. asks what authority there is for ἀφίμεν. I answer, the evidence is silentio of all the MSS., except five, together with those few that have ἀφίμεν, to which I add L. 1176 and 1189. All the rest, and all the Scriv., and Br. Mus. MSS., have ἀφίμεν, as have all the copies at Luke xi. 4, except those, comparatively few, that have ἀφίμεν. Hence I can scarcely doubt that Matt. wrote ἀφίμεν, or possibly ἀφίμεν, whatever Luke might do;

μὴ εἰσεύγῃς ἡμᾶς εἰς πειρασμόν, ἀλλὰ ῥύσαι ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ. ὅτι σοῦ ἐστὶν ἡ βασιλεία καὶ ἡ δύναμις καὶ ἡ δόξα and, at any rate, that ἀφίκαμεν was an alteration proceeding from the Alex. Critics, who thought that the Aorist expressive of custom would be better Greek.

13. ΠΕΤ. 6. μὴ εἰσεύγῃς—πειρασμόν] q. d. 'Suffer us not to be led into, abandon us not unto, temptation,' i. e. (by implication) so as to be overcome by it.

—τοῦ πονηροῦ] It is debated whether the sense here be evil, or the Evil one, ΣΑΤΑΝ, q. d. 'from [the temptation of] Satan.' The evidence for the latter sense is thought to preponderate; particularly as it is found in the Jewish formularies, from whence this clause was taken. And it was adopted generally by the ancient Interpreters. Though, indeed, neither of those reasons is decisive. And here the neutral sense, as Lampe has shown, recommends itself as the more simple and emphatic one, and more required by the opposition in temptation; and finally, as denoting that which the truly pious far more earnestly desire and pray for. That τὸ πονηρὸν is agreeable to the usus loquendi, I have shown at John xvii. 15.

—ὅτι σοῦ &c.] The genuineness of this doxology has, to most Critics, appeared doubtful; and, with the exception of Matthæi, all the more eminent Editors from Erasm. and Grot. down to Scholz, Lach. and Tisch. have rejected it. It is, indeed, supported by almost all the MSS., by the Pesch. Syriac, and most of the other Versions, and by some Greek Fathers. But, on the other hand, it is not found in at least 8 MSS., all of very high antiquity, and in others is marked as doubtful; nor has it any place in the Italic, Vulgate, and some other Versions, and it is omitted in many of the Greek and all the Latin Fathers. And as doxologies of this kind were much in use among the Jews (see 1 Chron. xxix. 11) and early Christians, there is some reason to suppose that it was interpolated from the ancient liturgies, in which we know it formed the response of the people, the prayer alone being pronounced by the priest. It is far more likely to have been introduced from the Liturgies, than to have been removed from the passage because of its not being contained in the parallel one of St. Luke. It is, indeed, argued that the Greek Church would never have presumed to add, from their liturgies, to a form of prayer by Christ himself. But it may be replied, that they never did formally, or at once, add it; the doxology might have been introduced gradually, and, probably, at first written in a different character, or in red ink, and in the margin, as is the case in several MSS. And when it is alleged, that the Latin, and some Greek Fathers purposely omitted the clauses, to remove a discrepancy between Matt. and Luke; that is taking for granted what cannot be proved. Besides, there was a far more serious discrepancy involved in the clause immediately preceding; that too not being found in the Vulgate and Italic Versions, nor in the Fathers in question. But they did not attempt to remove that discrepancy. Why then this? It has, indeed, been urged, that this doxology materially interrupts the connexion between the ὡς καὶ ἡμεῖς ἀφίκαμεν and the admonition founded on it at v. 14, and therefore was likely to be thrown out. But the omission of the clause, does not entirely remove, though it greatly lessens the harshness of the interruption; and the allegation itself takes too much for granted. As to the argument founded on the sublimity, beauty, and appropriateness of the clause in question, it is very inconclusive; for the ancient Liturgies, both Greek and Latin, being chiefly founded on Scripture, abound in passages of great sublimity and beauty. And as to the appropriateness, that is not inconsistent with the clause being insinuous: for suitability could alone cause it to be introduced here. And a spurious passage may be fitted to any context, as well as a genuine one. Its being found, too, in the Pesch. Syr. Vers. will not absolutely prove its genuineness, or, at any rate, that it was not introduced from the liturgies above mentioned; for those liturgies, ascending to the time of Barnabas and Clemens, were far more ancient than the highest antiquity ever claimed for the Pesch. Syr. Vers. The passage, however, could not have been interpolated in the Pesch. Syr. Vers. (from the later Syr. Vers.), because it is, I believe, found in the very ancient Syr. MSS. in the Br. Mus.; one as early as the 5th century. Surely it does not follow, as Matthæi alleges, that we must receive the passage of 1 John, if we reject this; since there may be equal consistency in rejecting both. At all events, if we reject this, we must reject it on the ground that, as Bp. Marsh observes (Lect. part vi. p. 27), 'internal evidence may show that a passage is spurious, though external evidence is in its favour;' and if we reject that, we must reject it on the ground that (in the words of the same learned Prelate), 'no external evidence can prove a passage to be genuine, when internal evidence is decidedly against it.' That cannot, however, be said to be the case here, since internal evidence is quite adverse; and external by no means (confirmed by the Syr., Æthiop., Sahid., Armen., Pers., and Arab. Epp. Vers. the Const. Apost. iii. 8. 2. vii. 24. 1 (sine v. 1.), Chrys., Isidor. Pel., and the Cod. Brix. of the Italic Vers.) is so overwhelmingly great (I find the passage in all the Lamb. and Br. Mus. copies) that I do not feel warranted in continuing to place the words within brackets. After carefully weighing all that occurs in the Collectanea of the Rabbinical illustrators,—Lightf., Schoëttg., Wets., Meusch.,—I find much to confirm, and nothing to impair, the authenticity of the words. Since our Lord was pleased to adopt (see Schoëttg. sup. v. 9) so much of the rest of the Prayer from the Jewish formularies, why should he not this, which regularly accompanied the use of those Eucharisties employed, it seems, as a response in public, and an ejaculation in private prayer. That the prayer was twice brought forward by Christ,—first in the Sermon on the Mount, unasked, and secondly about half a year afterwards, when asked (as recorded in St. Luke), is granted by all the Harmonists. But if the concluding clause and the Amen are regarded with Lach. and Tisch. as interpolated, one cannot imagine why the Disciples should have asked for that which they had already received to the full. But if we suppose the Conclusion and the

Amen to be genuine, all things are in their natural order, and all difficulty vanishes; for the reason for the request in Luke is obvious, namely, because they needed something which they as yet had not. They might, as Lightfoot suggests, regard the first direction as containing a public form of praying, as evinced by the addition of a concluding Doxology, so like the public Responses in the Temple, and also by the Amen used only in public assemblies; accordingly they entreat that He would teach them to pray privately: whereupon He gives them the same Form as before, with the omission of the concluding Doxology and the Amen. Thus all is clear and intelligible; but if we cancel the Doxology and the Amen we encounter difficulties unsurmountable. That the concluding Doxology and Amen were in the Apostolic age used with the Prayer in public I cannot doubt, though whether it was used on the present occasion by our Lord I would not affirm to be positively certain; but that it was I have no doubt. That it was in the text of the Original Hebrew Gospel I feel persuaded; and probably in the Greek Gospel; though, that being intended chiefly for the use of Hellenists and Gentile Christians, it may have been withdrawn as unnecessary for them (hence its absence in St. Luke's Gospel), or afterwards removed in certain copies; but not until after the period of the framing of the Pesch. Syr. and Sahidic Versions, and even then its absence was prob. almost confined to the Western Church, where St. Luke's Gospel was held in peculiar estimation.

14, 15. ἐὰν γὰρ ἀφήτε, &c.] In order more to impressively recommend the virtue mentioned in v. 12, our Lord, in the Hebrew manner (see Is. iii. 9. xxxviii. 1. Jer. xxix. 11. Deut. ix. 7), propounds the same sentiment, both affirmatively and negatively. And this and the verse following are illustrative of the preceding (Kuin.). We are not, however, to understand hereby, that the practice of this, or of any other single duty, can obtain God's favour, where other Christian virtues are neglected; for, as Bp. Jer. Taylor says, 'though negative precepts are absolute, yet affirmative promises admit of this limitation,—if no other condition of salvation be wanting.'

—τὰ παραπτώματα ὑμῶν.] These words are cancelled by Tisch., from MS. D, and a few cursive ones, but retained by Lachm.—very properly, for the overwhelming superiority of external authority is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and other Versions. Internal evidence may, indeed, seem against it (see Griesb. Comm. Cr. 73), but in reality it is not, for it is more likely that the words should have been accidentally omitted by scribes than inserted by critics, espec. since they often omit words when they almost immediately recur.

16. There is here (as Calv. remarks) a return to the doctrine supra, v. 1, 7, and having there commenced to reprove ostentation in fasting and prayer (interposing as to the latter a rule of prayer), our Lord now proceeds to urge a like injunction as to another branch of religion, Fasting, where reality in the sight of God, and not appearance in that of men is to be studied: 'ne (says Calv.) scilicet tantopere servire theatro studeant, quam Deum habere operum suorum testem.' Wherefore, in order to exclude ostentation, he enjoins Reality there, which is to be the spring of action, and not mere formal injunction. Accordingly in the exercise of fasting they are to avoid every thing of ostentation, whatever savoured of pretence or leant to hypocrisy, espec. by an affected equality of person, or dress, or screwing the countenance into a semblance of devotion devoid of reality; in short, practising the various arts of religious grimace, so seditiously cultivated in the school of Pharisaic hypocrisy.

The term σκυθρ. (on which see my Lex.) is peculiarly apposite as respects hypocrisy, since the words ὑποκριταί and σκυθρωποί were not unfrequently conjoined in the Class. writers, e. gr. Diod. Sic., and Lucian, which latter in his Piscat. inveighs against pretended philosophers, ascribing to them a 'grim-visaged hypocrisy.'

From thus expressing what his disciples are not to be and not to do, our Lord in the next words proceeds to show what they are to do while fasting, where the injunctions ἀλειψαί τὴν κεφ. and νίψαι τὸ πρὸς. form only a figurative mode of expressing what we understand by appearing as usual; for the Jews, like the Greeks, regularly washed and anointed the face, except at times of mourning. See Dan. x. 3. The scope of ἀνίχνυσαι τὸν μισθὸν αὐτ. (on which see Note supra) is, as Bucer says, "to point out that all that the hypocrites will derive from such dissimulation is, that which alone they sought, the breath of popular applause, the praise of men, the being all but worshipped as saints, but no more; not a whit of approbation, much less reward, from God." As respects philological points, φανῶσι stands for the more Class. φανώντα, as in Aristoph. Ran. 1063, ράκι' ἀμυσχών, ἵνα ἱλαίσωτο τοῖς ἀνθρώποις φανώντ' ἑλπίαι. The use of the Particip. here, not Infin., as in the above passage of Aristoph., and often in the best writers from Homer downwards, was not accidental, since, as Kühner and Jelf point out, we must espec. in Attic prose, and even the Ionic of Herodotus, distinguish between the use of the Infin. and the Particip., the former denoting 'what appears, or is likely to be;' the latter, what is apparent, or manifest, what manifestly is. (So Hdt. vii. 137, 175. Æsch. Pers. 791, and also Thucyd. i. 2. 1. iii. 45, where see my Notes.) And that sense is here most suitable, q. d., 'in order that they may seem to men as manifestly fasting.'

—ὅταν δὲ νηστεύητε] meant, not of public and enjoined, but of private and voluntary fasting.

and most careful consideration of these passages, I am quite of opinion that the rendering of our common Version (which is supported by all the ancient ones), 'ye have received,' at Luke vi. 24, is right, and that of our common Version here, 'ye receive,' is wrong. The framers of that Version, and some others, were, it seems, not aware of that nice idiom in the use of the verb ἀτίχω, by which the present tense of ἔχω, on account of its having no first aorist, is used in the aor. I sense, i. e. accept, 'I have received.' Examples of this are not unfrequent, both in the later Class. and Sept. So Plut. Sol. C. 22, τὸν δὲ μισθὸν ἀτίχει, habuit fructum, 'he has had his reward;' and so in Themist. p. 120, E, τὸν καρπὸν ἀτίχειν, rendered by Xyl. and Wyt. fructum percipere.

18. ἐν τῷ κρυπτῷ] Lachm. and Tisch. edit ἐν τῷ κρυφαίῳ, from MSS. B, D, and two cursive ones (and I cannot add a single other), very inadequate authority, espec. since internal evidence draws two ways. St. Matthew may have used the form ἐν τῷ κρυφαίῳ, considering that κρυφαῖος occurs not unfrequently in the Sept., and ἐν κρυφαῖοις in Jer. xxx. 24. Lam. iii. 10. Sapient. Salom. xvii. 3; also ἐν κρυφ., Jer. xliiii. 9, in the Jewish Versions; yet that it should have been altered to ἐν τ. κρυπτῷ in all the copies but 4 is exceedingly improbable.

— ἀποδώσει σοι] On further considering the disputed question as to the authenticity of the next words, ἐν τῷ φανερῷ, I am still less disposed than ever to consider them genuine. Internal evidence is certainly against them; and as external authority is at least equally divided (for besides nearly the whole of the uncial MSS., and a very large number of the cursive ones, to which I add all the Lamb. MSS., and nearly all the Museum ones, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., Vulg., and other Versions are without them), we are warranted in excluding them altogether, as introduced from supra, v. 4 and 6, where see my note, and the quotation from Bp. Jebb. How the learned prelate could have brought himself to think the probability far greater, that a copyist might have accidentally dropt them from v. 18, than, accidentally, or by design, have transferred them from v. 4 or v. 6, I am at a loss to imagine. The case is quite the contrary. A copyist could scarcely have dropped them accidentally; nay, he would rather have felt the want of them, espec. as he had found them twice in the foregoing context. He could not have introduced them accidentally, and scribes scarcely ever took the liberty of introducing any thing by design; that was left for their superiors, the soi-disant Critics, to whose achievements in that respect the most ancient MSS. bear ample testimony.

19. μὴ θησαυρίζετε, &c.] Θησαυρὸς properly signifies a repository for valuables; but sometimes, as here, the treasure itself so deposited, i. e. such precious moveables as are usually treasured up; e. g. gold, silver, &c. (either in the mass, or worked up into plate), and costly apparel, in which the riches of the ancients very much consisted. So Thucyd. ii. 98, χωρὶς δὲ ὅσα ὑφαντά τε καὶ λεία, καὶ ἡ ἄλλη κατασκευὴ, where see my note. To these two last the words following chiefly allude.

— σὴς καὶ βρώσεις ἀφ.] On the disputed meaning of βρώσεις, I know not of any sufficient proof that it ever signified 'the rust in metals.' And the Hendiadys supposed by many is baseless, since there is an allusion to something different from σὴς. Now, since our Lord by σὴς καὶ βρ. meant to designate riches generally, and since σὴς has a manifest reference to the riches which consisted of numerous garments and webs of cloth laid up for many years' use (see James v. 2, seqq.); and yet those could not constitute the whole of what might be termed riches, so something else must be designated; and what can be so naturally imagined as the wealth of agricultural produce, such as corn, wool, and fleeces, called, in Luke xii. 18, τὰ γυνήματα καὶ τὰ ἀγασθὰ? Now these too are liable both to mildew and the ravages of insects before they are garnered, and, after being garnered, are subject to weevils and other destructive insects. Now βρώσεις may denote either, especially the former. Thus in Mal. iii. 11, Sept., it is used of the mildew or blight, which is there represented as destroying the fruit of the ground. Accordingly βρώσεις is best taken, in the most general sense, to denote the decay and deterioration, whether by erosion or attrition (even the wear and tear of time), to which all the possessions in question are liable, whereby they are 'disfigured,' ἀφαν. and ultimately 'destroyed.'

— διορύσσουσιν:] scil. τὸν τοίχον, more usually supplied. The walls in the East being chiefly of hardened clay, the houses are very liable to be thus broken into.

Εἰ οὖν τὸ φῶς τὸ ἐν σοὶ σκότος ἐστὶ, τὸ σκότος πόσον! 24 Ὁὐδεὶς δύναται δυσὶ κυρίοις δουλεύειν ἢ γὰρ τὸν ἓνα μισήσει, καὶ τὸν ἕτερον ἀγαπήσει· ἢ ἐνὸς ἀνθέξεται, καὶ τοῦ ἑτέρου καταφρονήσει. Οὐ δύνασθε Θεῷ δουλεύειν καὶ * μαμωνᾷ. 25 Διὰ τοῦτο λέγω ὑμῖν μὴ μεριμνᾶτε τῇ ψυχῇ ὑμῶν, τί φάγητε καὶ τί πίητε· μηδὲ τῷ σώματι ὑμῶν, quite insufficient. It was doubtless an alteration to adapt the word better to the singular σου at the next verse; the purblind Critics failing to see that the plural ὑμῶν is as suitable to a general injunction as the singular σου is to a particular illustration, which is made such for effect's sake. Thus at v. 24 the plural form is resumed, when the language of injunction is resumed. Had Lachm. perceived the nature of v. 22, 23, he would not have added σου to ὁ ὀφθαλμός, which involves little less than absurdity. The good sense (or good sensius) of Tisch. preserved him from this sad blunder.

22. The preceding truths are now illustrated by an apt similitude.

— ὁ λύχνος τοῦ σώματος, &c.] Some interpret ὀφθαλμός ἀπλούς, a liberal mind; and ὀφθαλμός πονηρός, a covetous one; which sense has been thought to be required by the preceding and following words. And several phrases in the Sept., the N. T., and the Rabbinical writers, are adduced, to countenance this mode of interpretation. Yet it involves some confusion; and the words εἰν οὖν—φῶς may be better taken (with Chrysost., Theophyl., Euthym., and others among the ancients, and most of the recent Commentators) in their proper sense; so that ἀπλούς be interpreted sanus, integer, clear, and πονηρός, depraved, sickly, dim; of which signif. many examples are adduced by Kypke and Elsnar; to which add Epicharm. ap. Clem. Alex. p. 844, Pott.: καθάρων εἰν οὖν ἔχρει, ἅπαν τὸ σῶμα καθάρων εἶ. By τὸ φῶς τὸ ἐν σοὶ is meant the light of conscience. So, among the passages cited by the Commentators, Philo, borrowing from Aristot. Top. i. 14, says, ὅτι οὐκ εἶν ἐν ψυχῇ, τοῦτο ὀφθαλμός ἐν σώματι. With the φῶς ἐν σοὶ, 'the light within thee,' I would compare φῶς καρδίας in Æsch. Eumen. 619, which admirable passage Schutz. would not have tampered with, ilotic manibus, had he perceived the force of the expression φῶς καρδίας, for want of which perception he propounds the vain conjecture ἐν δέει for ἐν φάει. The passage should be pointed thus: Τίς δὲ μηδὲν ἐν φάει | καρδίας ἀνατρέφων, | ἢ πόλις βροτός θ', ὁμοίως, ἢ ἄν σίβει δίκαν; Render, 'But who that does not nourish aught [of reverence] in the light of his heart (i. e. in his conscience), whether it be a state or a man [(person) individually], alike, [for that] would any longer venerate justice?' Here, then, is an apt comparison, in which the duty of fixing the attention on heavenly things is illustrated by reference to the case of the eye in the body, by regulating its motions; q. d. 'As the natural eye, when healthy, regulates the motions of the body, so does the mental eye direct the soul.'

23. εἰ οὖν τὸ φῶς—πόσον] The marked opposition between the terms τὸ φῶς and τὸ σκότος, together with the logical coherence of thought in the passage, call for the interpretation of Chrys. and Euthym. adopted by Maldon. and Fritsch. according to which the sense will be: 'If, then, the light that is within thee (that of reason and conscience) is darkness—the darkness within thee (that of the passions, by nature dark)—how great must that be!'

24. οὐδεὶς—δουλεύειν] It is implied by the context, that the two masters are of contrary dispositions, and give contrary orders; though in point of fact it is impossible to be devoted to two masters; though a man may render some service to both. The words μισεῖν and ἀγαπᾶν are to be taken in a qualified sense, as denoting to love less, or love more; of which there are many examples both in the Sept. and the New Test. 'Αντίχριστος is a stronger term than ἀγαπᾶν, as denoting close connexion and strong attachment.

—καταφρονήσει:] 'will hold cheap, abandon;' so Jos. Ant. iv. 8, 2, εὐσεβείας, ἥς (the religion) νῦν ἔχετε, καταφρονήσαντες, εἰς ἄλλον μεταστήσῃς τρόπον.

—οὐ δύνασθε Θεῷ δουλεύειν, &c.] So it is remarked by Pausan. iii. 23, 2, ἀνθρώπων γὰρ ἀφορώντων ἐς κέρδος τὰ θεῖα ὑστερα λημμάτων.

—μαμωνᾷ] This reading for vulg. μαμμ., is found in most of the MSS. and almost all the Lamb. and Br. Mus. MSS., and many Greek Fathers; and is confirmed by the parallel passage of Luke, and by its derivation from the Chaldee and Syriac ממונה. It has been received by Critical Editors. The word in Chaldee and Syriac properly signifies riches; but, like the Greek πλοῦτος, it is here personified.

25—34. Here our Lord warns against covetousness, and excessive anxiety about the supply of bodily wants, by 4 arguments for trusting in God's Providence.

25. μὴ μεριμνᾶτε] 'take no anxious thought,' 'be not anxiously solicitous;' as in Phil. iv. 6, μηδὲν μεριμνᾶτε. And so in the parallel passage of Luke, μὴ μεριμνήετε, 'be not tossed with anxious cares.' This first argument against anxiety is: 'If God has given us life and bodies fitted for enjoyment, surely he will not deny us the lesser blessings of food and clothing.' At v. 26 we have the second argument. Ἐμβλέψατε, 'survey, contemplate.'

μάλλον ὑμᾶς, ὀλιγόπιστοι; ³¹ ἢ Μὴ οὖν μεριμνήπροστεθήσεται ὑμῖν. ³⁴ Μὴ οὖν μεριμνήσητε εἰς ἣ γὰρ αὐρίον μεριμνήσει τὰ ἑαυτῆς. ἀρκετὸν τῇ ἡαυτῆς.

32. τὰ ἔθνη ἐπιζητεῖ] A kind of argument often made use of in the Old Test., in order, as it were, to shame the Israelites into virtue, by showing them that they lived no better than the unenlightened heathens. That they should have eagerly sought after such things, was not wonderful; since they had no belief in, or dependence on, the Providence of God; and in their labours, or their prayers to the gods, solely regarded temporal blessings; as we find from Juvenal, Sat. x.

33. [ἡτ. πρ. τὴν βασ. &c.] L. and T. here edit ζ. πρ. τὴν δικ. καὶ τὴν βασιλ. αὐτοῦ, solely on the authority of MS. B and some MSS. of the Vulg. But this would be authority far too slender to warrant the removal or alteration of even a petty particle, much less to alter the wording of one of the weightiest dicta of our Lord, espec. considering that it presents what, if not nonsense, is any thing but what the serious inquirer would expect. Accordingly, I have thought fit to retain, with all the preceding Editors, the text rec., which I find in all the Lamb. and all the Brit. Mus. MSS., and which derives confirmation from the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions also, besides Cyprian, Hilary, Clem. Alex., and Just. Mart. In short, the text which L. and T. have constructed, is, I apprehend, found no where; for, as Griesb., Scholz., and Tisch. affirm that the MS. B, with 2 others, has τοῦ Θεοῦ instead of αὐτοῦ, L. and T. ought, as they professed to base their procedure on the reading of that MS., to have edited ζ. δ. τ. τὴν δικαιοσύνην καὶ τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ, which would at least make sense. But the reading was, I doubt not, devised by the critical Reviser of the text, for the purpose of removing the awkwardness which attaches to αὐτοῦ, considering that it is, by position, referable to τὴν δικ., though thus αὐτῆς would be required, as Calv. ought to have seen, for which failure he was mercilessly arraigned by Maldon., who, however, wrongly explains τ. δ. τοῦ Θεοῦ to mean the righteousness which God had prescribed to us; since it rather means the righteousness which He requires to be wrought by us, not in us; for it is not the forensic righteousness of Justification that is here meant—that doctrine was after promulgated—but, as I have already explained, holiness of conversation, godliness of life,—that righteousness, both external and internal, usually understood by holiness and godliness, which becometh those who are members of God's kingdom of grace, and such as is the fruit of a true and living faith. We shall now see how unnecessary, rash, and detrimental to this great Gospel dictum, was the course taken by the ancient Critic before ad-verted to, of altering the order c surely, in this earnest seeking, God (which answers to what we familiarly express by RELIGION) must come first, and then the righteousness thereto pertaining.

— πρῶτον] In a superlative sense, 'first of all, in the first place,' and as the first object.

— τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ] i. e. the religion promulgated by God, its promises and blessedness. See my Lex.

— τὴν δικαιοσύνην αὐ.] i. e. 'that mode of justification which he hath revealed, and the righteousness and holiness which it requires' (see James i. 20); not that righteousness, or system of morality which the Jews had devised, consisting chiefly of ceremonies and mere externals.

34. μεριμνήσει τὰ ἑαυτῆς] Lachm. and Tisch. cancel the τὰ, from 5 uncial MSS. and Theophyl.; doubtless from that being in Griesbach's estimation the more harsh and unusual reading; whereas Mr. Alford thinks the sense is clearer without the τὰ. 'De gustibus non disputandum.' But were that the case, external evidence would be quite against the word. But, as it is, internal evidence is not in its favour; for an expression is not to be brought in which is quite contrary to propriety of language. And a most competent judge (my late friend Canon Tate) attests that this is the case with the reading μεριμν. ἑαυτῆς; for, says he, "I find not a single example of the construction with the genit. without τὰ; that of the genit. with μεριμν. occurs both in the New Test. and the Classical writers. That of the dat. occurs in both. Hence the various readings περι ἑαυτῆς, ἑαυτῇ, and ἑαυτήν. But μεριμν. is used with an accus. of thing freq. in Classical writers; as Xen. Mem. iv. 7, 6, ταῦτα μερ., and elsewh. with ἐργα, which is here implied, as in 1 Cor. vii. 32, 33, 34, and Phil. ii. 20, which passages sufficiently defend the construction here." How, then, it may be asked, arose the deviation from the common reading, and these various fluctuations of reading? I answer, the former from the scruples of certain ancient Critics, who stumbled at a complete action being ascribed to a thing, as discharging the business and consulting for cares of the day. But such a criterion as that were worthy of Martinus Scriblerus; espec. since this is, like that in the next clause, a proverbial form of speaking, similar to that saying of a Rabbinical writer: "Sufficit afflictio horā suā;" (where, for hora sua, read horā suā). Comp. a similar sentiment in Æschyl. Agam. 243, ecq., where it is declared that "the trouble, whatever it may be, that befalls men, is best borne on the day itself: to renew it by looking back on the past, or to anticipate it by looking forward to the future, were alike foolish and destructive of happiness." So Eur. Hel. 338, μὴ πρόμαντις ἀλγίων, Προλάμβανε — γόους, 'the morrow will take (i. e. let it take) thought for its own matters.'

— τῇ ἡμέρᾳ] Some Commentators supply ikásthēnē. But it is better to suppose the Article used with reference to παροῦσα, the (present) day. Kakia is put for kákousis, talainōpōria; a sense found in the Sept. (see Eccles. vii. 15. Eccles. xix. 6. 1 Macc. x. 46), but not in the Class. writers.

VII. 1. μὴ κρίνετε—κριθῇτε] Almost all Commentators take κρίνετε for κατακρίνετε, chiefly because in the parallel passage of Luke vi. 37, μὴ καταδικάζετε καὶ οὐ μὴ καταδικασθῇτε is added. But I agree with Fritz in preferring the interpretation of Chrysost., by which κρίνετε is taken of sitting in authoritative judgment over others, acting as censors of their faults. And καταδικάζω may be understood in the same way, but only in a stronger sense, of rash, severe censure.

2. ἐν ᾧ γὰρ κρίματι] The ἐν is not redundant, but answers to the Hebr. 3. Instead of ἀντιμετρηθήσεται, μετρηθ. has been received by the unanimous consent of all Editors. The other was doubtless derived from the parallel passage of Luke.

3. τί δὲ βλέπεις] Render, 'how beholdest thou,' i. e. 'how is it that thou,' &c., τί being = πῶς in next v. See supra, v. 25, and a Rabbinical writer cited by Wets. on Luke vi. 19.

— τί δὲ βλέπεις τὸ κάρφος—δοκὸν οὐ κατανοῶ] Of the passages from Class. writers here adduced by the Commentators, only one is really to the purpose, namely, that cited from Horat. Serm. i. 3. 25: "Cum tua pervideas oculis mala lippus inunctis, | Cur in amicorum vitium tam cernis acutum?" To this I now add the couplet of a Poet (Menander), cited by Plutarch de Curios, c. i., and de Tranq. c. 8, τί τὰ λλότρινον, ἀνθρώπε, βασκανάτατε, | Κακὸν ὀφθαλμοῖς, τὸ δ' ἴδιον παραβλέπεις; which passage was doubtless in the mind of Horace, and accordingly confirms the reading received, malis, for which Bentley would read male, where the παραβλ. of Menander confirms the reading of Bentley, from 2 copies, prōvideas for prætervideas.—Κάρφος, epithimer; as opposed to δοκὸν, plank. There is reference to a proverb of frequent use with the Jews, against those who, severe upon the slight offences of others, were insensible of their own crimes. Many similar sayings are adduced both from the Rabbinical and Classical writers.

4. ἀφες ἐκβάλω] There is, as I have shown, no ellipse of ἵνα. Render, permitte eximam.

6. μὴ δῶτε—χοίρων] Least any one should suppose all liberty taken away of judging, even concerning matters the most manifest, Christ subjoins a precept fraught with that prudence, which he elsewhere directs to be joined with simplicity (Grot.). The precept is couched in two adagial sayings. Similar ones are adduced from the Rabbinical, and even the Classical writers; to which may be added from Aristot. ap. Themist. p. 234, μήτε ρίψαι σοφίαν εἰς τοὺς τριόδους. By dogs and swine are meant respectively the brutal and ferocious, and the gross and licentious; those brutal and sensual persons, who were so refractory, and given up to the lusts of the flesh, that, far from receiving the truth, when proposed to them, they resisted and blasphemed it, and impeded its growth.—Τὸ ἅγιον. By this is meant consecrated meat, i. e. meat offered in sacrifice, which no unclean person was to eat. So Levit. xxii. 6—16. But under this figure is represented religious truth in the Gospel, holy and precious in itself, and therefore not to be thrown away; as it would be by being bestowed on those who could not appreciate it, any more than swine would pearls. As illustrative of τοὺς μαργαρίτας, &c., it appears from the Rabbinical writers that the Jews called the precepts of wisdom pearls. And our Lord more than once compares the truths (espec. the more recondite ones) of the Gospel to precious gems. See Matt. xiii. 46. The general sense, then, is, 'Do not proffer holy admonitions to those who will scorn and abuse them.'

—μήποτε καταπατήσωσιν—ὑμᾶς] Many Commentators take καταπ. of the swine, and στραφίντες ῥήξωσιν of the dogs, per chiasmum. This, however, is so harsh, that it is better, with others, to refer bois to the swine; στραφίντες having reference to the oblique direction in which swine make their attack.

κρούετε, καὶ ἀνοιγήσεται ὑμῖν. ⁸ πᾶς γὰρ ὁ αἰτῶν λαμβάνει, καὶ ὁ ζητῶν εὐρίσκει, καὶ τῷ κρούοντι ἀνοιγήσεται. ⁹ ἢ τίς [ἐστίν] ἐξ ὑμῶν ἄνθρωπος, ὃν ἐὰν αἰτήσῃ ὁ υἱὸς αὐτοῦ ἄρτον, μὴ λίθον ἐπιδώσει αὐτῷ; ¹⁰ καὶ ἐὰν ἰχθὺν αἰτήσῃ, μὴ ὄφιν ἐπιδώσει αὐτῷ; ¹¹ Ἐὶ οὖν ὑμεῖς, πονηροὶ ὄντες, οἴδατε δόματα ἀγαθὰ διδόναι τοῖς τέκνοις ὑμῶν, πόσῳ μᾶλλον ὁ πατὴρ ὑμῶν ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, δώσει ἀγαθὰ τοῖς αἰτοῦσιν αὐτόν! ¹² Πάντα οὖν ὅσα ἂν θέλητε ἵνα ποιῶσιν ὑμῖν οἱ ἄνθρωποι, οὕτω καὶ ὑμεῖς ποιεῖτε αὐτοῖς· οὗτος γὰρ ἐστὶν ὁ νόμος καὶ οἱ προφῆται.

8. ο αἰτῶν] Namely, aright. 'Ο ζητῶν, i. e. what is expedient and proper. 'Τῷ κρούοντι, i. e. who earnestly, and with faith, addresses himself in prayer. 'Ανοιγήσεται, 'it shall be opened.'

9. ἢ τίς—ἄνθρωπος] As to the τίς, Elen. and Fritz. rightly suppose an anacoluthon, by which two interrogations are blended; thus, 'an quis est e vobis homo, quem, si filius hominis porposcerit, num forte lapidem ei porrigat?'—'ἢ τίς—ὑμῶν ἄνθρωπος, scil. ὢν. So I have pointed; the sense (as the argumentation requires) being: 'What father is there of you, though but a man, who, if his son, should ask him for food, would present to him, &c.? If therefore ye [men], evil as you are,—evil as compared with Him who is emphatically good, even God,—and morally evil from the evil inherent in you by the corruption of your nature, know how,' &c. This supplying of the word πατήρ (harsh though it be) from the subject-matter is confirmed by the parallel passage of Luke xi. 11: τίνα δὲ ὑμῶν τὸν πατέρα αἰτήσῃ; The construction is not a little perplexed in both passages; but to read (as do Lachm., Tisch., and others, from two MSS.) αἰτήσῃ; for ἰδὲ αἰτήσῃ, greatly increases the irregularity; and to remove ἰδὲ, as does Lachm., from two MSS., destroys the construction altogether. Thus there will remain the slight irregularity of an anacoluthon (see Elen. and Fritz.), and also a commixture of two interrogations in one sentence, which, though it ought to be avoided in regular composition, yet here, by its grata negligentia, imparts nature and spirit to the passage. The examples taken from a stone and a fish are derived from two adagia found also in the Classical writers (ἀντὶ πέτρης σκορπίον) representing, by a familiar illustration, those who disappoint the just expectations of others, by giving them not the thing they ask for and need, but something else; which, though similar to it, yet it is not only not the thing they want, but wholly useless, or even noxious.

11. πονηροί] The ancients, and, of the moderns, Grot., Elen., and Schoëttg., explain this evil, corrupt; most recent Commentators, avaricious. But for the latter sense there is little or no authority, nor indeed propriety. The term seems simply used by way of comparison with the all-perfect and beneficent FATHER, ὁ ἀγαθός, Ps. lxxiii. 1, the good Being,—GOD; in contrast with frail and erring man, easily warped by passion.

—οἴδατε—διδόναι] Here οἴδατε διδ. does not stand for didote; nor is οἴδατε for potestis, as Elen. explains it; but we are to regard this as one of those idioms of common life, by which that which is properly applicable only to men's mind, is applied to the animus or disposition. Thus the best rendering will be, with the Persian Version, 'ye are disposed to give.'

—δώσει ἀγαθὰ] The ἀγαθὰ signifies such things as it is fitting for, and such as may be expected from ὁ ἀγαθός (Ps. lxxiii. 1), the Fountain of all good both in nature and grace; all things that pertain to men's true good both for this world and the next; though the latter is principally had in view, as is plain from the parallel passage of Luke xi. 13, where, for τὰ ἀγαθὰ we have πνεύμα ἁγίου, meaning spiritual blessings, the gifts and graces of the Spirit, such "good things as pass man's understanding."

12. The example of the truth and mercy of God, the encouragement afforded, and his readiness to pardon, assist, and accept us, form the primary argument with which this saying is enforced, and form its connexion with the preceding verses.

—πάντα οὖν, &c.] The force of the οὖν is illative, or denoting inference, espec. when a speech is brought to an end, and when the conclusion from what has been said is collected into one pithy apophthegm. So used, it occurs several times in the present discourse of our Lord; e. gr. v. 24, 43. vi. 31, 34, μὴ οὖν μεριμν.; and vii. 12, where the οὖν has reference to all the injunctions from v. 1 downwards to v. 24, πᾶς οὖν ὅστις ἀκούει. The injunction thus ushered in presents a golden rule of equity familiar to the Jews, and not unknown to the Gentiles.

The sense of οὗτος—προφῆται is, 'This is the sum and substance of what is contained in the law and the prophets on the relative duties of men.' It is all one, in the meaning and result, with that νόμος βασιλικός, James ii. 8, which comprehends the whole of the Second Table of the Law, with all the several offices reducible to each commandment therein.

13. Here there is no connexion with the preceding. The words (as we find from Luke xiii. 24) being spoken at another time, and in answer to the inquiry of the disciples, 'Lord, are there few that shall be saved?'

—εἰσελθετε, &c.] i. e. strive to enter (as expressed in the parallel passage, Luke xiii. 24), namely εἰς τὴν ζωὴν. Here, as in Cebes xii., the comparison is chiefly to a gate opening into a narrow road leading up to a citadel. The τῆς implies that there is another gate, leading to the broad road, which we are not to enter. Similar comparisons and parallel sentiments are adduced in the Heathen writers.

καὶ εὐρύχωρος ἡ ὁδὸς ἡ ἀπάγουσα εἰς τὴν ἀπώλειαν καὶ πολλοὶ εἰσιν οἱ εἰσερχόμενοι δι' αὐτῆς· ¹⁴ ὅτι στενὴ ἡ πύλη, καὶ τεθλιμμένη ἡ ὁδὸς ἡ ἀπάγουσα εἰς τὴν ζωὴν! καὶ ὀλίγοι εἰσιν οἱ εὐρίσκοντες αὐτήν. ¹⁵ ^h Προσέχετε δὲ ἀπὸ τῶν ψευδοπροφητῶν, ^h οἵτινες ἔρχονται πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἐν ἐνδύμασι προβάτων, ἔσθωθεν δὲ ^h Micah 2. 11. ^h Inf. 24. 4. ^h 2 Tim. 3. 5. ^h Acts 20. 20.

[14. ὅτι στενὴ ἡ πύλη, &c.] On again carefully re-considering the state of the evidence, so as to determine the true reading, I am of opinion that, vast as is the preponderance of external authority for τί (which has the support of the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Vera., almost all the Lamb. and Br. Mus. MSS., and also of Chrys. and Euthym.), yet that the true reading is ὅτι, inasmuch as the τί expressive of wonder, or admiration, would, as Bp. Jebb observes, here ill accord with the didactic gravity of the subject, or the dignity of the Divine instructor; whereas ὅτι agrees with the purpose of these words, which is to give a second reason for the admonition at v. 13, εἰσελθεῖτε διὰ στενῆς πύλης, an admonition not repeated at v. 14, but left to be mentally supplied, or, at least, the exhortation founded on it. 'Do so! for, or, because,' &c. Thus the two verses form one sentence, and we should print αὐτῆς· ὅτι, as in the 1st edit. of R. Stephens, and that of Tisch., who has very properly restored the ὅτι, which had been discarded, and τί brought in by all the editors from Matth. and Griesb. to Scholz and Lachm. All the difficulty, observes Bp. Jebb, found in ὅτι and the double γάρ, is removed by resorting to the principle of a double reference to a common antecedent. The τί seems to have been a very ancient alteration of certain critics, who, not perceiving the peculiarity of the construction, could find no sense in ὅτι. In order to comprehend the full scope of the words and the ratiocination therein, we must mark the emphasis meant to be laid on the words πλατεία καὶ εὐρύχ· and τὴν ἀπώλειαν in the first clause, and στενὴ καὶ τεθλιμμένη and τὴν ζωὴν in the second. The reasoning intended is this, that the narrow gate and the strait road is to be entered on because the wide gate and broad road leads not to life, but to perdition. The narrow-gate road is to be entered on because that gate and way leads to life and salvation. This view of the scope of the words was, I find, long ago seen by Bucer and Calvin, and also Bp. Jebb. Thus the first reason is meant for encouragement and comfort, under self-denial and hardship; the latter, for warning. As respects the clause καὶ πολλοὶ εἰσι—αὐτὴν and καὶ ὀλίγοι εἰσι—αὐτὴν, these were thrown in to strengthen the main purpose; and the first was meant for warning not to fall into the folly of supposing, that to follow the many must be the safe way; whereas those many do but throng the road to destruction. The second was meant both for warning (by exciting a holy fear lest haply they should fail of the grace of God unto life by not being of those few), and for rousing to exertion and diligence by pressing in at the narrow gate and treading the pent-up road. This is confirmed by the answer of our Lord, Luke xiii. 24, to the question, εἰ ὀλίγοι οἱ σωζόμενοι (which seems to have been suggested to the Apostles by these words of our Lord on a former occasion), ἀγωνίζεσθε ('strain every nerve') εἰσελθεῖν ('to effect an entrance') διὰ στενῆς πύλης, ὅτι πολλοὶ ζητήσουσιν εἰσελθεῖν καὶ οὐκ ἰσχύουσιν. To account for the extreme difficulty of entrance, we must suppose the πύλη to denote not simply a gate opening into a road leading to some city or town, but a pass-gate affording entrance into a country, and called πύλη. Such was the πύλη into Greece from Thessaly to Locris; the one from Syria into Cilicia;—which passes were secured by strong stone-work portals, surmounted by towers commanding the road; which was cut through the rocks, and consequently narrow and rocky, and hemmed in (τεθλιμμένη) by precipices, so as to be very difficult to be traced and trodden, even when an entrance had been forced by the πύλη, which well illustrates the expression εὐρίσκοντες αὐτήν. Of the many similar passages adduced by Wets. and others no one is at all to the purpose, except the passage of Cebes, Tab. § 12, adduced by me in Rec. Syn., which, indeed, 'forms,' as Mr. Alf. says, 'a remarkable parallel;' but only, I should say, so far as to show from its exceedingly strong resemblance to this passage the existence of plagiarism; whence it is plain that the Tabula could not have been written by the well-known hearer and friend of Socrates, but by another Cebes, a Stoic philosopher, mentioned by Lucian and Athenæus, who lived in the age of the Emperor Aurelius, and who had, like some other philosophers (e.g. Epictetus, Arrian, Philostratus), read and in many ways profited by the Scriptures.

[15. προσέχ·—ψευδ.] The thread of connexion is with the immediately preceding ὁ εὐρίσκ., q. d. 'But, in your endeavours to find this narrow and hardly traceable road, beware of pretended guides,' namely ψευδοπροφ., meaning 'false teachers,' such as are spoken of in 1 John iv. 1, comp. with 2 Pet. ii. 1, not the 'false prophets' at xxiv. 11, 24. Mark xiii. 22. Rev. xvi. 13. xix. 20, and sometimes spoken of in Sept. and Jos., namely, persons falsely claiming a Divine commission; since the language is too general to admit of that; the caution being meant for universal application in every age. And considering the weighty nature thereof, I see not how the introductory particle δὲ can be dispensed with; though cancelled by Lachm. from B, and about a dozen other MSS. (to which I add Scriv. y, Br. Mus. 1810, 171, 982, Cov. 1), though with his not unusual inconsistency L., at Matt. xvi. 11, introduces a δὲ after προσέχ., on equally insufficient authority, and where no authority, however great, would suffice. In both passages the δὲ was, I suspect, lost by the carelessness of scribes, who often omit δὲ, as generally expressed by an obscure abbreviation. As respects the phraseology here, προσέχ. ὁπό is Hebraistic and Hellenistic Greek oft. occurring in the Sept., though never in the Class. writers; and the word ἐαυτοῦ is understood, which is expressed in Luke xvii. 3.

In ἐνδύμασι προβάτων there is an allusion

εἰσι λύκοι ἄρπαγες. 16¹ Ἀπὸ τῶν καρπῶν αὐτῶν ἐπιγνώσεσθε αὐτούς. το το μηλωτή (sheepskin, or sometimes a cloak made of the fleece roughly worked up) with which the false prophets would clothe themselves, in imitation of the true ones; see supra iii. 4; and also, as it seems, the false teachers among the Pharisees.

—λύκοι ἄρπαγες] The expression occurs elsewh. only in Lycoph. Cass. 1309, and Oppian. Venat. iii. 293; from the latter of which passages we find that it denotes a particular species of wolves, also called ἄρπαγες, from their being peculiarly rapacious for prey, and insatiable.

16. ἀπὸ—αὐτ.] 'By their fruits shall ye (may ye) thoroughly know them;' adverting to this as the proper test of man's real character. By καρπ. are meant partly their fruits in doctrine, and partly in practices and actions. Comp. Thucyd. v. 26, τοῖς ἔργοις ἀθρήσει καὶ εὐρήσει, κ.τ.λ. In μῆτι συλλέγουσιν, &c. there is a sort of adagial illustration, found also in Theogn. Admon. 537: οὔτε γὰρ ἐκ σκίλλης ῥόδα φύεται, οὐδ' ὕακινθος· οὐδέ ποτ' ἐκ δούλης τίκουν ἑλευθέριον.

—σταφυλὴν—σύκα] Lach. and Tisch. (1st edit.) edit σταφυλάς, from B, and 7 other MSS.; though in his 2nd edit. T. restores σταφυλὴν—very properly, since the strongest external authority is confirmed by internal evidence, σταφυλάς being plainly a gloss of some critic, who saw that it, like uva in Latin, is used generically for the plural, as not unfreq. in the Sept., and sometimes in the Class. writers; so that it is no wonder that in the Syr., Vulg. Ital., Arab., and Sahid. Vers. the plural should be used; though that will not prove that those translators read σταφυλάς, since they render the singular σύκα just after by a plural. But the Æthiopic and Persic translators express it by a singular, showing that they must have had σταφυλὴν in their copies; which is also supported by the parallel passage of Luke vi. 44, though even there σταφυλάς is found in MS. L, and 3 others, and yet no Editor advocates it, though there all the ancient Versions use the plural. However, it would seem that in fact σταφ. is here used for grapefruit, as in Is. v. 2, Sept., like σύκα for fig-fruit. The same corruption of the singular σταφυλὴ into the plural occurs in Rev. xiv. 18, πρύγνησον—ὅτι ἠκμασάν αἱ σταφυλαί, in the ordinary text, found in the majority of MSS., and retained, inconsistently enough, by Lachm., as also by Tisch. in his 1st edit., and by Scholz; though in his 2nd edit. Tisch. adopts ἠκμασάν ἢ σταφυλὴ—very properly, since it is found in the best MSS., 30 in number, including the Lamb. MS. and the principal 3 Mus. ones, and it is supported by internal evidence.

—τριβόλων] A low thorny shrub (the tribulus terrestris of Linnæus), so called from its resemblance to the tribulus militaris, or caltrop, composed of three or more radiating spikes or prongs, thrown upon the ground to annoy cavalry.

17. τὸ δὲ σαπρὸν, &c.] The word denotes, 1) what is decayed and rotten; 2) by metonymy, what is refuse and worthless (as old vessels, and small fishes), also, when, as here, applied to trees or fruit, what is of a bad quality.

19. Some Critics are of opinion that this verse is introduced, by interpolation, from Matt. iii. 10. The objection, however, that it impedes the course of reasoning, will be lessened, if we consider it as an awful admonition incidentally thrown in.

21. οὐ πᾶς ὁ λέγων, &c.] I have already shown that the lingua proprietatis will not allow οὐ πᾶς to be taken (as some Expositors maintain they should) for no one, but requires that οὐ should be connected with the verb, as a negative marking distinction. I would add, that the strong opposition between λέγων and ποιῶν shows that the former must be understood of the service of the lips only, as contrasted with that of the heart,—a service evinced in faith working by love and obedience. In short, we have here represented profession as opposed to practice, q. d. 'Not all, who with the lips acknowledge me as their Lord, will attain to the blessings which I come to bestow; but those only who likewise perform what my Father commands.'

—ἐν οὐρανοῖς] Τοῖς οὐρ. is edited by Lachm. and Tisch. from B, C, Z, and 5 others. 1 add Lamb. 1175, Scr.: yet all the MSS. have ἐν οὐρανοῖς at xii. 50, and xviii. 10 and 14, as also in xvi. 17, as Lachm. and Tisch. themselves edit. So that the reading here, and infra, x. 32 and 33 (where Lachm. and Tisch., on equally slender authority, likewise prefix τοῖς), is, at any rate, an open question. In St. Mark the article is always found in, I believe, all the copies; and so in St. Luke. The usage in St. Paul varies, since he sometimes has τοῖς οὐρ. and at others οὐρ.

22. ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ] i. e. the day, or time,

Κύριε, Κύριε, οὐ τῷ σῷ ὀνόματι προεφητεύσαμεν, καὶ τῷ σῷ ὀνόματι δαιμόνια ἐξεβάλομεν, καὶ τῷ σῷ ὀνόματι δυνάμεις πολλὰς ἐποιήσαμεν; ²³ ° καὶ τότε ὁμολογήσω αὐτοῖς· ὅτι οὐδέποτε ἔγνω ὑμᾶς· ἀποχωρεῖτε ἀπ' ἐμοῦ οἱ ἐργαζόμενοι τὴν ἀνομίαν. ²⁴ P Πᾶς οὖν ὅστις ἀκούει μου τοὺς λόγους τούτους, καὶ ποιεῖ αὐτοὺς, ὁμοιώσω αὐτὸν ἀνδρὶ φρονίμῳ, ὅστις ᾠκοδόμησε τὴν οἰκίαν αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τὴν πέτραν ²⁵ καὶ κατέβη ἡ βροχὴ, καὶ ἦλθον οἱ ποταμοὶ, καὶ ἔπνευσαν οἱ ἄνεμοι, καὶ προσέπεσον τῇ οἰκίᾳ ἐκείνῃ, καὶ οὐκ ἔπεσε· τεθεμελίωτο γὰρ ἐπὶ τὴν πέτραν.

implied in the foregoing words; the period for the final admission or rejection of all persons.

— προεφητεύσαμεν 'have preached the Gospel' and prophesied.

— τῷ σῷ ὀνόματι δυνάμεις π. Render, 'in thy name (i. e. by virtue of thy power) we have done many miracles;' not, 'wonderful works, as it is rendered in E. V. The above version is required by the context; and that it is the true one, will appear from what I have said in the note on 1 Cor. xii. 10. That miracles were sometimes performed by such men (however their lives were at variance with the Gospel), we learn from Origen contra Cels. iv. p. 7. Prophesying, casting out of devils, and other miracles, are specified by way of showing that no gift or endowment, however exalted, without faith and holiness, will avail to our acceptance with God.

— οὐδέποτε ἔγνω ὑμᾶς] i. e. 'I never recognized you as my servants, or approved you.' So 2 Tim. ii. 19, ἔγνω Κύριος τοὺς ὄντας αὐτοῦ. This is considered a Hebraism; γν having the sense approve. But some examples are adduced by Wets. from Greek writers; not, however, quite to the point. Far more apposite is one from Iæsus adduced by me in Recens. Synop. Σὺ δὲ τίς εἰ; σοὶ δὲ τί προσήκει θάπτειν; οὐ γινώσκω σε ('I do not recognize you'), οὐ μὴ εἰσὶν τὴν οἰκίαν.

— ἐργαζόμενοι τὴν ἀνομίαν] The purity of the Greek is established by a passage of Themist. adduced in Recens. Synop., i. e. οἱ ἐργαζόμενοι ἀρετήν. Ἐργ. is a far stronger term than ποιεῖν, and signifies to do any thing studiously and habitually, to make a trade of it. The Art. here has an intensive force; q. d. every kind of iniquity.

²⁴. Our Lord now closes his discourse, which contains the great outlines of human duty, by a most apt and forcible comparison.

— πᾶς οὖν, &c.] This is regarded as a Hebrew construction for πάντα οὖν ἀκούσονται—ὁμοιώσω ἀνδρὶ. But it may be better called a popular construction, and a relique of primitive simplicity of diction, such as is found in Herod. and all unstudied writers and speakers, in every language.

— ὁμοιώσω αὐτόν] Iachm. reads ὁμοιωθήσεται, from B, Z, and 12 cursive MSS. I add Lamb. 1178, Brit. Mus. 16,184, Scr. u., a few later Versions, and Fathers. But internal evidence is quite against it; and, as Bp. Jebb observes, propriety of sentiment, as called for by the context, rejects it. Moreover, ὁμοιώσω is confirmed by another passage, infra xi. 16, and also by Luke, xiii. 18. 20. The reading evidently arose from the alteration of some Critic, probably Origen (whose purpose it was to conform the reading here to that at v. 26, πᾶς ὁ ἀκούων—ὁμοιωθήσεται, &c.), or from a gloss of a Scholiast. Whereas, as Bp. Jebb truly remarks, the distinction here between ὁμοιώσω and ὁμοιωθήσ. was studiously designed; for when the fruitful hearer is to be characterized, our Lord himself institutes the comparison: when the foolish and unprofitable hearer, it is otherwise managed; the comparison is then matter of common fame—he shall be likened to, as though he were unworthy of Christ's own personal attention.

— προσέπιπτον] This is to be referred, not to οἱ ἄνεμοι alone, but also to the foregoing nouns, βροχὴ and ποταμοί, and the verb ἔπνευσαν, as producing the downfall. This was distinctly seen by Chrysost. and by the Persic translator. Of course the same remarks hold good of προσέκοψαν at v. 27. The floods and the winds are the greatest agents in such an overthrow, and espec. the former; inasmuch that, in the parallel passage of Luke vi. 48, 49, the only agent mentioned in this overthrow is ὁ ποταμός, so called as proceeding from a πλημμυρα, or inundation, arising either from the sea or some mighty river. Accordingly, I would point and render as follows: καὶ κατέβη ἡ βροχὴ καὶ ἦλθον οἱ ποταμοὶ καὶ ἔπνευσαν οἱ ἄνεμοι· καὶ προσέπιπτον, 'and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew; and they (i. e. the floods and winds) beat upon,' &c. By ποταμοί are denoted floods, or torrents (the ποταμοὶ χιμαῖρροι of Homer), arising from sudden gushes of heavy rain, and producing inundations.

— τεθεμελίωτο γὰρ ἐπὶ τὴν πέτραν] i. e. 'the rocky ground,' as opposed to τὴν ἄμμον just after, 'the sandy ground.' In τὴν πέτραν, there is an allusion to Christ as the Rock of our salvation, by our building upon Him (as a house upon a firm foundation) by faith, working through love and obedience. There seems throughout this lively similitude reference to Isa. xxviii. 15—18.

q Luke 6. 40. ²⁶ ^a Καὶ πᾶς ὁ ἀκούων μου τοὺς λόγους τούτους, καὶ μὴ ποιῶν αὐτοὺς, ὁμοιωθήσεται ἀνδρὶ μωρῷ, ὅστις ᾠκοδόμησε τὴν οἰκίαν αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τὴν ἄμμον ²⁷ καὶ κατέβη ἡ βροχὴ, καὶ ἦλθον οἱ ποταμοὶ, καὶ ἔπνευσαν οἱ ἄνεμοι· καὶ προσέκοψαν τῇ οἰκίᾳ ^r Mark 1. 23. ²⁷ ἐκείνη, καὶ ἔπεσε· καὶ ἦν ἡ πτώσις αὐτῆς μεγάλη. ²⁸ ^r Καὶ ²⁷ ^b Luke 4. 32. ἐγένετο, ὅτε [συν]ετέλεσεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τοὺς λόγους τούτους, ἐξ-

26, 27. Many similar sentiments (espec. one of Rabbi Elisha) are adduced by Wets. from the Rabbinical writers.

28. συντεῖλ.] Lachm. and Tisch. read τεῖλ., (from B, C, Z, and about 18 cursive MSS., to which I add Lamb. 1175, Scriv. h. p. s. y.) which may be the true reading, and the other a gloss; but συντέλεισας τὸν πειρασμὸν occurs sine v. l. at the only other similar expression in New Test., Luke iv. 13, and συντ., Luke iv. 2, sine v. l.

— ὡς ἐξουσίαν ἔχων] scil. τοῦ διδάσκειν, 'as one having authority to teach,' i. e. self-derived power;—not as the Scribes, who rested only on that of their Doctors;—as one not the interpreter, but the maker of the law; and accordingly using the authoritative expression ἐγὼ δεῖ λέγω. Luke iv. 36, has ἐν ἐξουσίᾳ, as applied to his λόγος, or manner of speaking; an expression standing for ἐξουσιαστικός.

VIII. 1. καταβάντι—αὐτῷ] Lach. and Tisch. read καταβάντος—αὐτοῦ, from a few ancient MSS. and Chrys., a reading confirmed by internal evidence, but which I cannot confirm from any Lamb. or Br. Mus. MSS. As to προσελθ., v. 2, which has been, instead of ἐλθών, received by the same editors, from B, E, M, Δ, and about 8 cursive MSS., to which I add Br. Mus. 5468, 1810, 11,836, Lamb. 1177 and 5 Scriv. MSS.; and internal evidence is in its favour. Not improbable is it that προσελθ. should have been altered to ἐλθών, in order to remove the inconvenient repetition of πρός. Moreover, προσελθ. is very often used in narrations in the Gospels; ἐλθ. less frequently.

2. προσεκύνη] 'Not,' says Whitby, 'as denoting an acknowledgment of the Divinity of our Lord; for the term was one expressive of civil adoration, and only paid to him as the Messiah, or a prophet sent from God.'

— ἰὰν θέλῃς, δύνασαι] This appears from the examples in Wets. to have been a form of earnest and respectful address, much used by those who sought for relief, espec. from physicians.

Thus both expressions may be considered highly emphatical.

— καθαρίσαι] A word used peculiarly of healing leprosy, and which has reference to the legal impurity supposed to be incurred by the disease, which could only be removed by the cure of the disorder.

3. ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα] There is here neither pleonasm nor Hebraism, as is commonly supposed. Nor is the expression, as others think, devoid of force; though it may be regarded as a relique of the circumstantiality of ancient diction.

— ἥψατο αὐτοῦ] This was done, Wets. says, more medicorum. And he adduces many examples of a similar use of the word. But our Lord seems to have touched the leper, both to inspire him with confidence (as conceiving that unless with the power as well as with will to heal him, he would have incurred pollution, and possibly infection), and also to make the bystanders see plainly that the cure was effected by his touch. Our Lord, too, in most cases, condescended to accompany his words by corresponding actions, as the Prophets had done before him. See 2 Kings v. 11, and Note on Matt. ix. 18. As to the violation of the law hereby involved, it must be remembered that works performed by Divine virtue were exempted from the ritual precepts.

4. μηδενὶ εἶπης] An injunction doubtless only meant to extend to the period when he had presented himself to the Priests, for examination. Considering the great multitude of bystanders, it was impossible to prevent the transaction from being made public; so that the object of the injunction must have been, to keep the officiating priest ignorant of the transaction, that he might not maliciously deny the leper to be perfectly clean; which would disappoint the benevolent object of the miracle. It has been supposed (not without reason), that this transaction is placed here by the Evangelist (for certain reasons) out of its proper chronological order.

— προσένεγκε] Lachm. and Tisch. read προσένεγκον, from B, C, to which I add Lamb.

 ἵνα μου ὑπὸ τὴν στέγην εἰσέλθῃς· ἀλλὰ μόνον εἰπὲ * λόγῳ, καὶ

1192. 1. m. and internal evidence is in favour of the reading, from the extreme rarity of the form, which occurs at least in the simple verb, also in the Sept. at Gen. xxvii. 7, ἐνεγκον, in all the best MSS., though the second Aor. form, ἐνεγκε, is found in 12 inferior MSS. It prob. occurs elsewhere in the Sept., though I have not met with it, nor at all in the Class. writers; yet St. Matt. may have used the form, espec. as he uses the Aor. 1, not 2, as one might expect that he would; and it may have been altered to the second Aor. form, as occurring in Mark and Luke sine v. 1.

— εἰς μαρτύριον αὐτοῖς] It has been debated whether αὐτοῖς has reference to the priest, i. e. the priests (ἱερεῖς being taken distributively), or to the people. Though there is some harshness in the latter mode (since the antecedent does not exist in the preceding context); yet propriety requires it; for the offering could be no testimony to the priests. It may, however, be understood of both.

5. I have here and elsewhere followed L. and T., in adopting the form Καφαρναούμ, as found in all the most ancient MSS., confirmed by the earliest Versions,—such as the Pesch. Syr., the Sahid., Copt., Arab., Ital., and Vulg. Versions,—confirmed by Jos. Bell. iii. 10. 8, (whence in Jos. de Vita, § 72, for Κεφαρναῦμ should be amended Κεφαρναῦν or Κεφαρναάμ, as the MSS. partly confirm,) and also by Origen, as moreover by the Hebrew derivation from קפ, a village, and נח. And so Jos. calls it κώμην, though he elsewhere uses the terms κώμη and πόλις of the same place. And so κώμη in Mark viii. 23, 26. It was prob. a large unwall'd country town.

— προσῆλθεν αὐτῷ ἐκατόνταρχος] The best Commentators are agreed that, from the striking similarity of circumstances between this transaction and that recorded at Luke vii. 1—10, they must be the same. The points of difference are very reconcilable; παῖς being, both in the Classical and Hellenistic Greek, often used for δούλος, servant; like puer in Latin; and used because such services as are performed by our footmen or valets, was originally rendered by boys. Hence the name was afterwards retained, when a change was made in the person. And as to the Centurion here being said to solicit for himself what in Luke he intreats through the medium of his friends, the Jews, and in some measure the Greeks and Romans, were accustomed to represent what was done by any one for another, as done by the person himself. See Mark x. 3, compared with Matt. xx. 20. And though Matthew does not (as does Luke) tell us that he was a proselyte, yet he says nothing to the contrary. See Grot., Lightf., Kuin., and Fritz.

6. βίβληται] A term appropriate to sick persons confined to their couch. See my Lex.

— δειν. βασανίζ.] The propriety of this expression, if at least the disorder was palsy, has been debated, inasmuch as palsy, whether attended with contraction or with remission of the nerves, does not, medical men say, occasion any great pain. Hence it has been conjectured that the disorder was tetanus, which by the ancient physicians was classed with palsy. And this may seem very well to square with Luke's words κακῶς ἔχων, equiv. to δεινῶς ἔχων of Hippocr. and Libanius. But it may be doubted, whether the two expressions δειν. ἔχ. and δειν. βασ. differ any more than in this, that the expression used by Luke and Hippocr. is the purer Greek, and that of Matth. the Hellenistic one found in Jos. Ant. ii. 14. 4, and Philo, and censured by Grammarians, as T. Magist. and Harpocr., also by Lucian, Solœc. 2. 6, εἰπόντος βασανίζεσθαι τὸν παῖδα αὐτῷ (read αὐτῷ) νοσούντα, prob. a satirical hit at this very passage (as oft. in the Philop.); and yet Lucian ought to have known that the term does occur in the purest of Greek prose writers, Plato, p. 922, βασανισθέντες ἰκανὸς ἐν νόσσοις. The sense intended seems at any rate to be what, in common parlance, we express by 'grievously' or 'badly afflicted,' equiv. to 'affected.' And this is quite suitable to what is suffered at one stage of paralysis (for to suppose tetanus would be quite unsupported by proof), namely, when the disorder is passing into apoplexy, at which time it inflicts agony so great as to speedily occasion death, as in the case of paralysis so accurately described in 2 Macc. ix. 55, seq., ἐν τῷ καιρῷ ἰκίνοιο ἐπλήγη—καὶ ἐκποδίσθη τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ, ἀπεφράγη τὸ στόμα αὐτοῦ, καὶ παρὰ λυθῇ, καὶ οὐκ ἰδύνατο ἵτι λαλῆσαι λόγον καὶ ἀπίθανον ἐν τῷ καιρῷ ἰκίνοιο μετὰ βασιάνου μεγάλης, where ἐπλήγη does not mean 'he was plagued,' but 'he was struck' (with the palsy), a 'vox solennis de hac re'; and τῷ καιρῷ ἰκ. denotes the aforesaid crisis of the disorder, when it passes into apoplexy.

7. καὶ—Ἰησ.] Lachm. and Tisch. cancel καὶ ὁ Ἰησ. the latter from B, the Copt. Vers., and one MS. of the Italic—quite insufficient authority; the former from B, and one other, with the Sahid. and Armen. Versions; to which I add the Pesch. Syr., Arab., and Pers. Versions, and the Lamb. of the Vulg. (of the 7th or 8th century)—authority which, in the Gospel of St. John, might warrant the placing the καὶ in brackets, but in St. Matthew by no means.

8. ἰκανός] for ἀξιος, used at John i. 27. Luke xv. 19. Comp. Matt. iii. 11. The full force of the expression will depend upon whether the Centurion was a proselyte or a heathen,—whichever he was, we may regard the words as constituting a formula expressive of profound humility.

Tisch. are, with reason, agreed. The two readings are found in the best and greater part of the MSS., including nearly all Lamb. and Br. Mus. copies, confirmed by Versions and Fathers.

9. ἄνθρωπός εἰμι ὑπὸ ἐξουσίαν] Sub. τασσοόμενος, which is expressed at Luke vii. 8, in some MSS., and in Diod. Sic. cited by Munthe, and, indeed, introduced here by Lach. from MS. B, 3 copies of the Ital. and the Vulg. Versions. But it is not in the very ancient Lamb. copy, and was probably not in the original text. At any rate, nothing can be more uncritical than Lachmann's course, since scarcely any authority could establish so manifest a marginal scholium. The sense is not what some Commentators maintain, 'I am a man holding authority' (for that would require ἔν ἐξουσίᾳ τασσοόμενος); but (as the parall. passage of Luke requires) 'I am a man placed under authority,' viz. the authority of my superior officer: and there is an argument à minori ad majus; q. d. 'If I, too, who hold but a subordinate office, yet have others subject to me, so that I can order my soldiers and servants, who obey at a word; much more canst thou, who art under no control, and hast supernatural power, cure disorders at thy simple fiat.'

10. πίστιν] The word here denotes faith in its general sense; namely, a full confidence in the power of Jesus to work the miracle in question; prob. originating in the cure of the nobleman's son, at Cana, only a day's journey distant.

10. After ἀκολ. Lach. adds αὐτῷ, from MS. C and 5 others, with the Ital. and Vulg. Versions—to which he might have added the Syr., Arab., Pers., and Æthiop. Versions. But Versions in such a case as this are of no weight. I find the word, indeed, in the Lamb. 1176, and the Br. Mus. 5731 and 1810 (both of the same class as the above 4, and of the same Alexandrian recension) also 4 of Matthei's MSS.—authority, however, quite insufficient, espec. as set against internal evidence, which is in favour of the text. rec. The Critics, it seems, stumbled at this absolute construction of ἀκολ., though it recurs at xxi. 9. Mark x. 32. xi. 9. Luke xxii. 54. Acts xxi. 36. 1 Cor. x. 4, in most of which passages some MSS., more or less, have the pronoun subjoined, and also some Versions; but Lach. did not adopt it there—then why here? The alteration of reading adopted at the end of the verse by L. and T., from B and 5 or 6 other MSS., is quite unauthorized. There may be recognized in παρ' οὐδενί plain marks of the text being tampered with from the Sahid. Ital., and Æthiopic Versions, but in two ways; and in the reading adopted by L. and T. the two are oddly jumbled together. It is plain that the Critics thought the passage needed emendation, but could not agree on the mode. Some, like Marcion, thought the comparison of faith should be more direct and personal,—not perceiving that were such personal comparison necessary, it may be said to be implied in the context, as the Pesch. Syr. Transl. seems to have been aware. Accordingly, they introduced παρ' οὐδενί, and cancelled ἐν τῷ Ἰσραὴλ, while others introduced παρ' οὐδενί, but inadvertently left ἐν τῷ Ἰσρ. untouched.

11. πολλοί] Namely the Gentiles; for they were such, as compared with the comparatively few υἱοὶ τῆς βασιλείας, the Jews. It is meant that the centurion's faith would not be a solitary case; but that very many heathens would, in like manner, have faith, and be converted.

—ἀνακλιθήσονται] A convivial term (like ἀνακλιθεῖν, κατακλιθεῖν, and others), adapted to the Oriental custom of reclining, not sitting, at table. Both the Scriptural, Rabbinical, and Classical writers (adapting their language to the ordinary conceptions of men) represent the joys and glories of heaven under the figure of a banquet; and consequently with imagery suited thereto.

12. υἱοὶ τῆς βασιλείας] Scil. τοῦ Θεοῦ, i. e. the Israelites, for whom the happiness of that kingdom was especially destined; and who had arrogated to themselves a place there, to the exclusion of other nations. Υἱός is oft. used, by Hebraism, to denote a person having some kind of connexion with, as partakers of, the thing signified by the following noun in the Gen.: as Luke x. 6, υἱὸς τῆς εἰρήνης; Luke xx. 36, υἱοὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως; Acts iii. 25, υἱοὶ τῆς διαθήκης. See more in my Lex. Thus here the meaning of οἱ υἱοὶ τῆς βασιλ. is, 'those to whom the privileges of the kingdom belonged,' as those to whom the Messiah was principally sent.

—σκότος τὸ ἐξώτερον] Compar. for superl. The metaphor is continued by an allusion to the total darkness without, as compared with the brilliant light within the banqueting-room. There may be, as some think, an allusion to the dark and squalid subterranean dungeons, into which the worst malefactors were thrust. Thus there will be an impressive image, to denote exclusion from heaven, implying positive punishment. Comp. Eurip. Bacch. 482 (ed. Matth.), Καθεῖρσαι αὐτὸν ἰππικαῖτε πύλας Φάτνηςιν, ὥς ἂν σκότιον εἰσορᾷ Κνίφας.

— ἐκεῖ ἵσται—ὀδόντων] Ὀδόντων is not, as some say, pleonastic; though the word is sometimes omitted in this phrase. Wets. compares Juv. Sat. v. 157. To which add Soph. Trach. 1074, βιβρυχα κλαίων.

— ἐκεῖ ἵσται ὁ κλαυθμὸς καὶ ὁ βρ. τῶν ὁ.] The article has the force of notoriety, and it is rightly ranged by Mr. Green (Gr. New Test., p. 222) under that head, though in a somewhat different usage, as being one of the instances of the employment of an expression familiarly current at the time, but the history and precise meaning of which must now be a matter of conjecture. I am inclined to think that there is allusion to some well-known passage of the Sept. Version, or of some of the other three Versions of the Old Test.

¹³. For text. rec. ἑκατοντάρχῳ adopted, all the Editors from Griesb. to Tisch. read ἑκατοντάρχῳ, from very strong external authority, to which I add that of all the Lamb. MSS. but two, all the Scriv. ones except three, all the Br. Mus. ones except MS. 5559 and 16,184. But in 1810 the —γ is on rasure, and in 14,744 is —χ^ω. Some others, too, are falsely stated; thus the Leicr. MS. has not (as Scholz says) —χγ, but —χω. Moreover, when we consider that v. 5 and 8 the form ἐ—ος is found in all the copies, it would seem improbable that Matt. would here vary, espec. as at xxvii. 54 —χος occurs sine v. i. And considering that the form —ος not unfrequently occurs in the Sept., it is most probable that St. Matt. would use that form, though in St. Luke both —χος and —χης seem used. Of the two forms, —χης is the more ancient, as found in Æschyl., though —χος occurs in Xen., and both forms in Plut. and Diod. Sic.

— ἐν τῇ ᾧρα ἐκείνῃ] 'at that very instant;' for ᾧρα sometimes signifies, like the Chaldee and Syr. ṭṭaw and Hebr. ṭṭā, not hour, but time, and sometimes, like καῖρὸς, a point of time.

¹⁴. ἔλθων] i. e. as we learn from Matthew and Luke, immediately after leaving the synagogue at Capernaum, where he began his public teaching.

— βεβλημένην καὶ πυρέσσουσαν] Per hendiad., q. d. 'laid up of a fever,' κατέκειτο πυρέσσουσα, Mark i. 30: συνεχομένη πυρετῷ μεγάλῳ, Luke iv. 38.

order. See Fæsi (Econ. Hippocr. The miracle here recorded did not, as in some other cases, consist in the cure of an incurable disorder, but in the mode of cure,—instantly and by a touch.

— διηκόνει] waited, or 'attended upon him,' with hospitable assiduity. This διακονία is evidently recorded as a proof of the completeness of the cure. See note supra, iv. 11.

— αὐτῷ] So for the text. rec. αὐτοῖς, almost all the best Editors are agreed. It has every support from MSS., Versions, Fathers, and early Edd., confirmed by internal evidence; αὐτοῖς was prob. brought in from Mark and Luke. And though it was the duty of a hostess to attend to all her guests; nor would the good matron fail to do so; yet her chief attention would be paid to her august Deliverer; which is prob. all that Matthew meant.

¹⁶. ὀψίας] The Hebrews reckoned two ὀψίαι, the early, from the ninth hour to our six o'clock, or sunset, and the late, from sunset to nightfall. From Mark i. 32, it appears that the later one is here meant; namely, after sunset. Thus the sabbath (for we find from Mark i. 21, that it was a sabbath day) had ended when the sick were brought; and hence they brought them without scruple.

— λόγῳ] 'by,' or 'at a word.'

¹⁷. αὐτός—ἐβάστασιν] The words are from Isa. liii. 4, where are described the sufferings of Christ for the sins of the world. And they are supposed, by some Commentators, to be applied by way of accommodation. Yet, since the Jews considered dangerous diseases as the temporal punishment of sin, and as our Lord often addressed those whom he healed, with 'thy sins be forgiven thee,' it may be granted that the prophecy had a double fulfilment; first, in the removal of corporeal maladies, and secondly in the remission of our sins, by the sacrifice on the cross. See 1 Pet. ii. 24. The verbal variation here between St. Matthew and the Sept. is ably reconciled by Hoffmann, and also by Abp. Magee, On the Atonement, vol. i. p. 415, seqq., who refers ἀσθενείας and the corresponding Hebrew word עֲוֹנוֹת to bodily maladies (a signif. not unfrequent in the Classics, e. gr. Thucyd. ii. 49); νόσους and עֲוֹנוֹת to diseases of the mind; the former clause signifying Christ's removing the sickness of men by miraculous cures; the latter, his bearing their sins on the cross. The Unitarian perversion of the passage, whereby it is made to relate to the removal of diseases only, without any reference to a propitiatory sacrifice, is completely refuted by the learned Prelate above mentioned. 'It is not surprising (he observes) that so distinguishing a character of the Messiah, as that of his healing all manner of diseases with a word (a character, too, which Isaiah himself has depicted so strongly at ch. xxxv. 5, that our Lord [Matt. xi. 5] quotes the words in proof of his Messiahship), should be introduced by the Prophet in a passage, where his main object was to represent the plan of our redemption by means of Christ's sufferings; especially as the Jews so connected the ideas of sin and disease, that an allusion to one must suggest the other.'

o 1 Kings 19. αὐτοῦ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Κύριε, ° ἐπίτρεψόν μοι πρώτον ἀπελθεῖν

— See more in Dr. Henders., who has fully proved, on the admission of the heterodox Gesen. himself, that the Heb. נָסָא, as used with nouns denoting sins, signifies not only 'to suffer for one's own sins,' but 'to expiate for another's sins by vicarious suffering.' Also, that in like manner נָסָא signifies not only 'to bear, as a burden, what another cannot bear,' but 'to bear, or suffer vicariously;' the notion of punishment being implied. 'The Unitarian perversion of the sense (continues Dr. H.) could only be worth attention, if it could be shown that the application made by the Evangelist was designed to exhaust the meaning of the Prophet. But the instances (adduced) of miraculous cures were merely an incipient fulfilment of the prediction; a type or specimen of what was to be fully effected by our Lord's mediation generally. The Jews were taught to regard disease as the temporal punishment of sin; and since the Prophet clearly shows, in the following verse, that the end to be attained by the substitutionary sufferings of Christ was the removal of punishment from the guilty, the quotation was appositely applied to the removal of bodily distempers, as a partial attainment of that end.' For a further vindication of the true force of the passage the reader is referred to Dr. Henderson on Isa. liii. 4, where he observes that the Evangelist chose to follow, in citing, the Hebr. rather than the Sept., and was content to give the general sense, passing over נָסָא = οὐτως.

18. Ἰδὼν—ἐκέλευσεν κ.τ.λ.] Not so much as being incommoded by the number of applicants for cure; but rather because our Lord systematically avoided keeping a multitude long together, to prevent any suspicion of encouraging sedition. On εἰς τὸ πέραν see my Lex., and my Note on Thucyd. i. 111.

19. εἰς for τῆς] A use thought by some to be Hebraistic; though it occurs in several of the later Greek writers.

20. αἱ ἀλώπεκες—κλίνῃ] This was meant to warn him of the difficulties he would have to encounter in following so destitute a master; and may lead us to suppose that the scribe was desirous of becoming Christ's disciple from interested motives only. Φωλεοὺς denotes dens, or lair, and κατασκηνώσεις, not nests (which would be νοσσηαί) but simply 'places of shelter,' roosts, such as those where birds settle and perch.

— ὁ Τίς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου] This title, taken from Dan. vii. 13, where everlasting dominion is ascribed to the Messiah under that designation, and now first assumed by Christ, occurs 61 times in the Gospels, and is always used by Christ himself, never by any other person. See John v. 27. iii. 13. vi. 62. It occurs once in the Acts, (vii. 56) (employed by the martyr Stephen); and occurs in the Apocalypse. Thus it is clear, that from the corresponding term ὁ Τίς τοῦ Θεοῦ, this title belongs to Christ κατ' ἐξοχὴν; and that both taken together decidedly prove that Christ, in some manner unknown to us, united in his person both the human and the divine nature, 'was very man and very God'; thus negating the opposite tenets of Socinians and of Gnostics. It is well remarked by Bp. Middl. (on John v. 27) that in a variety of places in which our Saviour calls himself the Son of man, the allusion is either to his present humiliation, or to his future glory. 'Now if (continues he) this remark be true, we have, though an indirect, yet a strong and perpetual declaration, that the human nature did not originally belong to him, and was not properly his own; consequently we may consider this simple phrase so employed, as an irrefragable proof of the Pre-existence and Divinity of Christ.' 'If, indeed,' as Mr. Coleridge observes, 'Christ had been a mere man, why should he have called himself "the Son of man?" But being God and man, it then became, in his own assertion of it, a peculiar and mysterious title.'

21. ἄλλος for ἄλλος, i. e. either one of the twelve, or of the disciples in general; said by tradition to be Philip. His father was, if not dead, probably at the point of death.

— For εἶπεν L. and T. edit λέγει from MSS. B, C; to which I add Lamb. 1176; insufficient authority to warrant the change, though internal evidence is in favour of the reading. And εἶπαι may be an alteration of the more simple term λέγει, not unfrequently used by Matt. and Mark, and often by John; though in several of the places where λέγει occurs in John. and Matt., and Mark, it is found altered to εἶπαι in one or other of those MSS. like D, which abound with unlicensed readings.

— ἐπίτρεψόν, κ.τ.λ.] A request (implying that he had been called by our Lord) in itself reasonable. Thus Elijah permitted Elisha to go and bid adieu to his parents: and it was regarded as the bounden duty of children to take care of the funerals of their parents; Christ, however, καὶ θάψαι τὸν πατέρα μου. ²² Ὁ δὲ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Ἀκούθει μοι, καὶ ἄφες τοὺς νεκροὺς θάψαι τοὺς ἑαυτῶν νεκρούς.

²³ Καὶ ἐμβάντι αὐτῷ εἰς τὸ πλοῖον ἠκολούθησαν αὐτῷ οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ. ²⁴ Καὶ ἰδοὺ, σεισμός μέγας ἐγένετο ἐν τῇ θαλάσῃ ὥστε τὸ πλοῖον καλύπτεσθαι ὑπὸ τῶν κυμάτων αὐτὸς δὲ ἐκάθευδε. ²⁵ Καὶ προσελθόντες οἱ μαθηταὶ [αὐτοῦ] ἤγειραν αὐτὸν, λέγοντες· Κύριε, σῶσον [ἡμᾶς]· ἀπολλύμεθα! ²⁶ Καὶ λέγει αὐτοῖς· Τί δειλοὶ ἐστε, ὀλιγόπιστοι; ²⁷ Τότε ἐγερθεὶς ἐπετίμησε τοῖς ἀνέμοις καὶ τῇ θαλάσῃ, καὶ ἐγένετο γαλήνη μεγάλη. ²⁷ Οἱ δὲ ἄνθρωποι ἐθαύμασαν, λέγοντες· Ποταπὸς ἐστὶν οὗτος! ὅτι καὶ οἱ ἄνεμοι καὶ ἡ θάλασσα ὑπακούουσιν αὐτῷ.

was pleased to refuse the request, for reasons unknown to us, and which doubtless arose from circumstances peculiar to the case.

²³ τὸ πλοῖον] How wrongly the τὸ is here cancelled on very slender authority by Lach. and Tisch. will appear from my note, infra, ix. 1.

—καλύπτεσθαι] fero submersi = Mark's γειμίζεσθαι, and very reconcilable to Luke's συνιπλῶνντο.

—αὐτοῦ] This is omitted in 7 uncial and about 50 cursive MSS., to which I add 7 Lamb., and 11 Br. Mus., and 8 Scriv., all of them very ancient, and was cancelled by L. and T.: but there is no evidence to justify more than bracketing the word, as I have done; espec. since internal evidence draws two ways, and the Pesch. Syr. Vers. confirms the presence of the word.

As respects the ἡμᾶς, cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., on the authority of B, C, and 4 cursive MSS., that the pronoun is sometimes, though very rarely, omitted in the Class. writers, I admit. Thus Ζεῦ, σῶσον! occurs in the Greek Anthology (see Jacobs ad Anth. Gr. x. p. 141), but I know of no other certain example. Of such omission, however, there are found no instances in the Scriptural writers; nor would the idiom be one agreeable either to the style or (as respects circumstantiality) to the nature of Scripture. Accordingly, in the Old Test. the pron. is almost always expressed; and in the New Test. (in the only passage where it could be found), Matt. xiv. 30, we have in all the MSS. Κύριε, σῶσόν με, and in the Old Test., Ps. iii. 7, Κύριε, σῶσόν με, and vi. 1, Κύριε, σῶσόν με. Jer. ii. 27, ἀνάστα—καὶ σῶσον ἡμᾶς. Ps. xi. 1, Σῶσον με, Κύριε, et al. sæpe. Yet the absence of the pronoun is countenanced by Ps. cxvii. 25, ὦ Κύριε, σῶσον δὲ, where the pron. me is expressed in some copies, as also in 2 Kings xiv. 4, σῶσον, βασιλεῦ, and 4 Kings vi. 26, σῶσαι, βασιλεῦ, where the pron. me is subjoined in some MSS. So also in the Hebr. and Syr. Vers. of Ps. xii. 2, 'Lord, save, salvum præsta; where the Sept., Vulg., and Arab. Versions, unwarrantably express the pronoun, though that is in our Bible Vers. very properly left understood. I know of no other instance; and could any such be adduced, it would make no difference, for the omission of the word in such cases is to be attributed to that kind of suppression which may be expected from the pathos of earnest entreaty for help.

—ὀλιγόπιστοι] by distrusting Christ's power to save, as well asleep as awake. As they had undertaken this voyage at His command, it was a culpable distrust in Him to fear that they should perish in it; and this merited the marked, but well-measured rebuke of our Lord.

—ἐπετίμησε—θαλάσῃ] A highly figurative expression, signifying 'he restrained its fury,' as Luke iv. 39, ἐπ. τῷ πυρετῷ. So Ps. civ. 9, ἐπέτιμῃσεν τῇ ἐρυθρᾷ θαλάσῃ. lxxxix. 9. civ. 7. The suddenness of the perfect calm is a proof of the reality of the miracle; for after a storm, the sea is never perfectly smooth, until some time has elapsed.

²⁷ ποταπός] 'Qualis quantusque sit!' The men might well regard our Lord as super-human; since to 'still the raging of the sea,' was always reckoned among the peculiar operations of God, inasmuch that in Ps. lxxv. 7, it forms as it were a designation of the Deity.

28. ἐλθόντι αὐτῷ] L., and T., and Alf. edit ἐλθόντος αὐτοῦ, from MSS. B, C, and 10 others (to which I add Lamb. MS. 1176), with some copies of the Ital. Vers.; though Versions in such a case as this are of no weight. That the reading is only an alteration of shallow Critics, appears from my note on Mark v. 2. As respects the καὶ in the preceding verse being cancelled by L. and T., on the authority of 1 MS. (C) and some Versions (no evidence in such a case), that was most uncritical, since far more likely was it to be omitted in one MS., by accident, than to have been introduced into all the rest from Mark and Luke.

— We are now arrived at the wonderful transaction of the Gadarene demoniac (or demoniacs). On the nature and design of which illustrious miracle, see Horne's Introd., vol. i. 227.

Instead of two demoniacs, Mark and Luke mention only one. Yet that by no means negatives the existence of two; since, as Le Clerc remarks, 'Qui plura narrat, pauciora memorat; qui pauciora memorat, plura non negat.' See more in Thom. Aquin. in loc. Matt. and Mark do not say that there was no more than one; or they specify only one, as being, for some reason, more remarkable than the other, evidently from his greater fierceness, ungovernableness, restless roving, and other traits presented in Mark's touchingly graphic account.

— εἰς τὴν χώραν τῶν Γεργ.] For a statement of my views respecting the territory of the Gerg., and of the reasons upon which they are founded, the reader is referred to EXCURSUS I. at the end of this volume.

— χαλεποί] The word signifies, (1) hard, harsh, or rough, as applied to things; and (2) is used figur. to mean harsh and cruel, as said of persons; and savage or fierce, as said of brutes or brutish men, who cannot be tamed.

— διὰ τῆς ὁδοῦ ἐκείνης] Namely, the road which passed by the tombs; for, as the burial-places were always outside of the cities, so it sometimes happened that the roads leading to the city passed by the side of, and sometimes through them.

29. τί ἡμῖν καὶ σοί] An idiom frequent both in Hellenistic and Class. Greek. See Wets., and my Lex. in v., in which there is an ellipsis either of κοινὸν (expressed by Ach. Tat. and Leon. Tar. ap. Wets.) or πρᾶγμα, expr. in passages of Demosth. and Nichomachus cited in Recens. Syn. The sense of the phrase varies with the context; but it usually implies trouble-some or unauthorized interference. See note on John ii. 4. Here it seems to be, 'what hast thou to do with us, what authority hast thou over us?' Ἰησοῦ before Τί ἐ τοῦ Θεοῦ is omitted in B, C, L., and 15 other MSS. I add L. 1177; Br. Mus. 15,581; Scriv. h. y., and cancelled by Griesb.; but without sufficient reason, since vast external authority, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Vers., is strengthened by internal evidence, inasmuch as the word was more likely to be omitted by accident in comparatively a few MSS., than brought in from Mark and Luke. Τίς, found in many Lamb. and some Br. Mus. MSS., is an ancient reading worthy of attention: for, as Matthæi suggests, 'sigla Ἰησοῦ ante Τίς facile negligebatur.' See note on John ii. 4.

— πρὸ καιροῦ] 'before the appointed time,' i. e. the day of judgment, against which evil spirits 'are reserved to be chained in torments in the pit of destruction.' See 2 Pet. ii. 4. Jude 6.

30. μακρὰν ἀπ' αὐτῶν] There is here no real discrepancy between Matt., Mark, and Luke, since the expressions in the latter, ἐκεί, πρὸς τὰ ὄρη or ἐν τῷ ὄρει do not refer to distance, but only denote that the swine were grazing at or on the hill (Mount Hippos), and probably on the side or acclivity, which, according to the best Maps, could not be distant more than about a mile; and the scene of the miracle seems to have been at about the middle of the plain between Mount Hippos and the Lake; and certainly indefinite as is the term ἐκεί, it must imply more or less of proximity. Yet there is no real discrepancy, since the term μακρὰν is, like all terms denoting length, a comparative term, the force of which must be fixed by the context and the circumstances of the case. Accordingly, μακρὰν may be used, like Lat. procul, to denote 'at some distance off.' So μακρόθεν in Luke xviii. 13, and μακρὰν in Sept. Exod. xxxiii. 7, where the Vulg. has procul, which is confirmed by the Targum. It is plain that the herd of swine were within view of the demoniacs. But, in a country like Palestine, where, as all travellers attest, large bodies (like a vast herd of swine) may be seen at distances which would be thought incredible elsewhere, at any rate two or three miles. That the Pesch. Syr. Trans. must have so taken the μακρὰν, is plain from his rendering by ܡܫܝܬܐ ܕܥܝܢܐ, lit. 'beyond, over against them.' The very same Syr. particle is, indeed, used at James ii. 3, to render the Greek ἐκεί, lit., 'over-away,' equiv. to 'out of the way,' and may serve to account for ἐκεί in the passages of Mark and Luke, who seem to have had before them St. Matthew's Hebrew Gospel, in which was מרחק, which they took to mean ἐκεί, as in the passage of James, as also in Heb. xii. 8, though it never, I think, means simply there, but ilinc, as opposed to hinc, meaning in the opposite direction, as in Rev. xxii. 2. As respects the reading of the Vulg. non longe, I find not an atom of support to it either in MSS. or Fathers.

σκομένην³¹ Οἱ δὲ δαίμονες παρεκάλουν αὐτὸν, λέγοντες· Εἰ ἐκβάλλεις ἡμᾶς, † ἐπίτρεψον ἡμῖν ἀπελθεῖν εἰς τὴν ἀγέλην τῶν χοίρων. ³² καὶ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Ὑπάγετε. Οἱ δὲ ἐξεληθόντες ἀπῆλθον εἰς τὴν ἀγέλην τῶν χοίρων καὶ ἰδοὺ, ὥρμησε πᾶσα ἡ ἀγέλη τῶν χοίρων κατὰ τοῦ κρημνοῦ εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν, καὶ ἀπέθανον ἐν τοῖς ὕδασι. ³³ Οἱ δὲ βόσκοντες ἐφυγον, καὶ ἀπελθόντες εἰς τὴν πόλιν, ἀπήγγειλαν πάντα, καὶ τὰ τῶν δαιμονιζομένων. ³⁴ Καὶ ἰδοὺ, πᾶσα ἡ πόλις ἐξῆλθεν εἰς συνάντησιν τῷ Ἰησοῦ καὶ ἰδόντες αὐτὸν, παρεκάλεσαν ὅπως μεταβῇ ἀπὸ τῶν ὁρίων αὐτῶν.

IX. ¹ Καὶ ἐμβὰς εἰς τὸ πλοῖον, διεπέρασε, * καὶ ἦλθεν εἰς α Ch. 4. 12.

It seems, indeed, confirmed by the Persic Vers., which, however, was occasionally modified from the Vulg. It arose either ex ingenio Hieronymi, or may have crept in by mistake, the final 'em' in 'autem' being taken for an abbreviation of non. Thus in the very ancient Lamb. MS. any unskilled person would read 'autem longe.' If Jerome wrote longe, he meant to render literally, as did the Æthiopic Transl.; and so longe in the Latin Vers. of the Cod. Sangallensis, prob. from the Italic Version. The 'non' could not creep in, though it might be lost.

31. ἐπίτρεψον ἡμῖν] Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch. read ἀπόσπειλον ἡμᾶς, from B, and five cursive MSS., and several Versions. But that is very insufficient authority for discarding the received reading, which has the support of the Pesch. Syr. Vers.; though we may suspect that ἐπίτρεψον ἡμᾶς ἀπελθεῖν was introduced,—for the sake of softening the harshness involved in ἀπόσπειλον ἡμᾶς,—in words formed on Luke's ἵνα ἐπιτρ. αὐτοῖς εἰσελθεῖν. Here, however, we have not εἰσελθ. (the peculiar and, as it were, technical term to denote forcible entry, and possession, and occupation, as of a house), which is employed in the parallel passages of Mark and Luke, and which also occurs infra, xii. 45, and Luke xi. 26. Accordingly, I rather suspect that ἀπόσπειλον ἡμᾶς was an alteration of the Alexandrian critics, who thought such called for by the imper. ὑπάγετε, and did not perceive that it may be the imperative permissio.

32. ὑπάγετε] This is not merely an Imperat. of permissio, but it includes the force of exhortation, like the Lat. Ite, and our Away! and the εὐθὺς of the parallel passage of Mark v. confirms this view, which is further strengthened by the following of Eurip. Cycl. 52, ὕπαγ', ὦ ὕπαγ', ὦ. Aristoph. Nub. 1298, ὕπαγε· τί μὲλλεις; that the Pesch. Syr. Trans. so took the word, is highly probable.

— The removal of τῶν χοίρων by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. from B, C, M, and some 8 or 9 other MSS., and some Versions, was very uncritical, since external authority forbids it, and internal evidence is opposed to it, considering that the words have every appearance of having been cancelled for the purpose of removing a seeming pleonasm and tautology.

As respects the reading just before adopted by Lachm., Tisch. (1st edit.), and Alf., τοὺς χοίρους, on the authority of B, C, and 7 other MSS.

(to which I add Lamb. 1176), it is an alteration introduced by certain Critics from the passages of Matt. and Mark, as, indeed, Tisch. probably since saw, considering that in his 2nd edit. he has restored the text. rec. The reading ὑπάντησιν instead of συνάντ. edited at the next verse by Lachm., from one MS. (B) is quite unauthorized here, and also at xxv. 1, where it is edited by L. and Tisch. from B, C, and 1 other MS. It may, indeed, seem confirmed by John xii. 13, ἐξῆλθον εἰς ὑπάντησιν: but there the copies fluctuate between ὑπάντ., and ἀπάντ., and συνάντ.; though ὕμ. seems the true reading. But the phraseology of St. John is no rule for St. Matt., and the slenderness of authority forbids the change, espec. since the phrase εἰς συνάντησιν occurs foll. by dat. of pers. perpetually in the Sept., but never in the Class. writers, except once in Hippocrates: hence it was likely to be used by St. Matt.; and overpowering external evidence shows that it was used by him. In fact, the reading εἰς ὑπάντ. arose, in those few copies, I suspect, from carelessness of scribes, the s final being absorbed in the σ initial, and from the usual confusing of ν and π. See examples in Gregor. de Dial. Schaeff. p. 76, 726, 730, 747.

— κατὰ τοῦ κρημνοῦ] down the precipice of the cliff. An expression freq. in the Class. writers, but without the article, employed by all the three Evangelists, as presuming the same knowledge on the part of the reader as of the writer. The whole sea-coast, indeed, of the lake is precipitous; and κρημνοῦ refers to the rocky coast simply, and not to any particular rock or steep.

33. καὶ τὰ τῶν δαιμον. [also the matters concerning, the circumstances which had occurred respecting the possessed, &c.] = Mark's πῶς ἐγένετο τῷ δαίμ.

IX. 1. ἐμβὰς εἰς τὸ πλοῖον] Lachm. and Tisch. cancel τὸ, on the authority of 3 uncial and 6 cursive MSS. [to which I add Lamb. 1187, 1188, 1193, 1189 (semel), Br. Mus. 1810, 11,830. Scriv. a. x. y.] But internal evidence, as well as external authority, is quite in favour of the word, the art. here having reference to the boat in waiting on our Lord. So in Matt. xiii. 2. Mark v. 21, et sempis. Mr. Alf., indeed, terms this force of the art. here, and in some other passages, a mistake; and he accounts τὸ πλοῖον generic. But, to use his own words just after, "surely the time is past" for such a dealing with the use of the Art., after the labours of so many able philologists, from Bp. Middl. to Mr. Green, Gram. N. T., of whom the latter, adverting to the practice of some writers, unconsciously to presume the same familiarity with certain localities or certain circumstances respecting any thing, on the part of their readers as is possessed by themselves, which has (he adds) occasioned the use of the Art. in some cases where it appears at first sight strange. Of this he gives exx. in the use of τὸ ὄρος by the Evangelists, when denoting the mountains (rather the mountain range or rocky cliff) embosoming the Lake of Galilee; a form of expression very natural to persons familiar with the country, but strictly correct only when addressing others which are so too. He then instances ἡ οἰκία as used of the house which was the resort, or residence, of our Lord at Capernaum, Matt. xiii. 1, 36. xvii. 25. Mark ix. 33. x. 10, and concludes with τὸ πλοῖον as said of the vessel [skiff or bark] which was in attendance on the shores of the Lake [prob. the property of the sons of Zebedee], Matt. ix. 4. xiii. 2. Mark iv. 1. vi. 32. viii. 10, in which passages there is no suggestion in the context to cause the occurrence of the Article. In all which preceding cases (of the three kinds) he observes that the testimony of certain MSS. in favour of the omission of the Article is rendered suspicious by the difficulty which attends their presence, which might well lead to their suppression by critical interference. Though, on the other hand, in order to justify the hypothesis of their interpolation, some motives must be assigned for it; and if not, the received reading must be the true one, — τὸ πλοῖον] i. e. either the vessel which had brought them over, or the ferry boat.

— ἰδίαν πόλιν] So εἰς τὴν πόλιν αὐτοῦ in 1 Sam. viii. 22. This expression denoted not only the place of any one's birth, but residence; and, according to the Jewish laws, a year's residence gave citizenship.

2. καὶ ἰδὼν, &c.] The place of this transaction, and its remarkable publicity is learned from Mark ii. 1, 2, and Luke v. 17.

— ἰδὼν τὴν πίστιν αὐτῶν] i. e. 'on seeing the [strength of] their faith,' evinced by what we find from Matthew and Luke, of their conveying the sick man to Jesus, even by breaking a hole through the roof. In ἀφείωνται we have a perf. pass. form cognate with the perf. act. Doric ἀφίωκα, and equiv. to ἀφείνται. Hence we see how undeserving of attention is the reading ἀφίενται found in MS. B, and adopted by Lach. here, and at Mark ii. 5, from inattention to, or ignorance of, this grammatical nicety; though it is more than a marginal scholium. The reading ἀφίενται in D, which I find also Br. Mus. 11,836, comes to the same thing, on presenting another form found also in vi. 12, D, and E, where see note. The Lamb. and Br. Mus. MSS. present many vv. ll., but they are only itacistic variations of ἀφείωνται.

At the next words L. and T. add σου αἱ ἁμαρτίαι from MSS. B, C, M, and 5 or 6 cursive ones; to which I had Br. Mus. 1810, 5468, 6184, 11,300, 179,821, n. 19,387. But σοι is here a term too essential to the force of so significant a form of expression as the present to be well dispensed with; and both the σοι and the σου are found in Mark ii. 5, and Luke v. 20, and retained by L. and T. However the state of the evidence as respects σου warrants its being placed within brackets. It may have been introduced from Luke v. 21, and 23. At 5 I still retain σου for text. rec. σοι from all the most ancient uncial MSS., and 30 or 40 cursive ones; to which I add the most ancient Lamb. and Br. Mus. MSS.

— ἀφείωνται—σου] This was the first occasion on which our Lord brought forward His power to forgive sins, which, as we learn, the Scribes acknowledged to be peculiarly appropriate to Divinity. This power was here demonstrated by the miraculous removing of the malady, as a proof that the sin which produced it was forgiven; whereby our Lord tacitly claimed to be greater than a Prophet, as on an occasion soon after, greater than the Temple. One cannot but admire the heavenly wisdom with which Christ was pleased gradually to reveal this his Divine mission, according as the minds of his hearers were able to receive it.

3. εἶπον ἐν ἑαυτοῖς] A popular form of expression, like our English one; equivalent to διαλογιζόμενοι ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις in Mark and Luke.

— βλασφημεῖ] In using this term the persons in question took for granted (and hence are reproached as ἐνθυμούμενοι πονηρὰ, evilly and unjustly) that Jesus was not sent from God; and hence falsely concluded, that by professing to be a Divine Legate, he was blasphemous and impious towards God.

4. ἰδὼν—τὰς ἐνθυμήσεις αὐτῶν] This use of ἰδὼν for εἰδώς, 'perceiving, being aware of' = ἐπιγινώσκω in Mark and Luke (founded on Hebraism), is not unfrequent in the N. T., Philo, and Joseph., though L. edits εἰδώς from Br. Mus., and not a few cursive MSS. (I add Br. Mus. 1810, 11,838, and Scriv. 1. m. n. p. γ.); but wrongly, since it is evidently a gloss, or false correction, from xii. 25, εἰδώς τὰς ἐνθυμήσεις αὐτῶν, though there D and 3 ancient cursive MSS. have ἰδὼν. Hence any change here is quite forbidden. How our Lord thus knew was, of course, by the Divine power indwelling in Him (see John ii. 24 seq., comp. with Ps. xlv. 21), involving an attribute of Deity. See Chrys. and Euthym., who comp. 2 Chron. vi. 30, οὐ ἐπιστάσαι καρδίας μονώτατος, and 1 Sam. xvi. 7, Sept., ὁ βλέπων τὰς ἐνθυμήσεις τῶν ἀνθρώπων. The οὗτοι just after is cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. from B, C, D, and a few curse MSS., the Vulg., &c., and some Fathers. But Fathers and Versions are in such a case as this of little weight. However the Pesch. Syr. confirms the ὑμεῖς, which undoubtedly ought to be retained, and was only, I suspect, removed by the framers or revisers of the most ancient MSS. because it is not found in the other Gospels; those Critics not perceiving the emphasis inherent in the pronoun, which emphasis may be expressed, in other words, thus: 'How is it that, while charging me with blasphemy, ye yourselves incur the guilt of evil surmises, producing calumnious words?' Comp. Matt. xv. 19. διαλογισμοὶ πονηροί. 1 Tim. vi. 4, ὑπόνοιαι πονηραί.

—[ἰνατί] The force of the expression is only to be explained by ellipsis. The complete phrase is ἰνα τί γίνηται, 'ut quid fiat,' 'to what end?' 'wherefore?' See my Lex.

—The ὑμεῖς is cancelled by L. and T., from B, C, D, and 9 or 10 cursive MSS. But internal evidence, as well as external authority, is in favour of the word, from the greater probability of its being removed than inserted. It was, I suspect, partly omitted from carelessness, and partly because its position varied in the copies; for some MSS. (to which I add Lamb. 1176) have ὑμεῖς after ἰσθ, and such seems to have been the position in the copy used by the Pesch. Syr. Transl. The presence of the word in that Version greatly confirms the evidence in its favour derived from so many MSS., to which I add all the Lamb. ones.

5 & 6. There is in these vv. an irregularity of construction, which has perplexed the Commentators; most of whom are of opinion, that the words τότε λέγει τῷ παραλυτικῷ are parenthetical. It should rather seem that the words ἰνα εἰδῆτε—ἁμαρτίας are said per apostrophen; as Luke xix. 12. xxii. 42; q. d. 'It were as easy for me to pronounce, Thy sins are forgiven thee, as to say [i. e. with effect], Rise and walk. But, that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, [I have done as I have.] Then, addressing the paralytic, he said, Arise,' &c. If this be not admitted, as taking too much for granted, we must regard this construction as coming under the head of Synchysis, such as occurs even in the purest Class. writers, espec. Thucyd., by which the address and the narrative are intermingled—the first member of the former two constructions being joined with the second of the latter. But, to revert from words to things, we are justified in saying with Campb. that, 'although both, and with effect, were equally easy to our Lord, yet in the former case the effect was invisible, and might be questioned by the multitude; whereas the immediate consequence of the latter was an ocular demonstration of the power with which it was accompanied; and to say the one with effect, which effect was visible, was a manifest proof that the other was said also with effect, though the effect was invisible.'

—For ἰγείραι, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read, from most uncial and many ancient cursive MSS., ἰγείρει. Which of the two is the true reading, is a question of no easy determination, espec. since neither occurs either in the Sept. or in Joseph.; and, while propriety of language may seem in favour of the Middle form, ἰγείραι, equiv. to ἰγείρου, yet the number, and occasionally the excellence of the MSS., is in favour of the Act. intrans. ἰγείρει, which is sometimes so used in the purest Greek writers, as Eurip. Iph. in Aul. 624. And other exx., besides the present, of verbs so employed, may be seen in Porson's note on Eurip. Orest. 288. So also our Eng. verb to rouse is used in our best older writers. Yet the very circumstance of the use being found in the Class. writers, only tends to raise one's suspicion that ἰγείρει came from the Alexandrian correctors; espec. considering that the Middle form, at least in the Imperat., no where, as far as I can find, occurs in the Class. writers. Accordingly, internal evidence is so much in favour of ἰγείραι, that it ought always to be retained, except against preponderating external authority; which is very much the case here, for I find it in all the best Lamb. and Mus. MSS. For want of knowing this to be a Middle form (and what is more a Middle Reflex. form, such as ἐυφραίνεσθαι in Luke xii. 19; ὁμοιοῦσθαι, Matt. vi. 8; besides other examples, and several adduced in Jelf, Gr., § 362. 6—8, where he remarks that this reflex. force is applied to Active as well as Middle forms as here ἰγείρει), the ancient correctors sometimes introduced ἰγείρου for ἰγείραι; and at other times ἰγείρει: of which many exx. will come under our notice. The Middle form not only nowhere occurs in the Class. writers, but was marked as improper by the ancient grammarians. So Zonar. Lex., p. 605, gives the rule: 'Ἐγείρου χὼρὶ λέγειν, οὐχὶ ἰγείραι, he does not say οὐκ ἰγείρει, which, from its rarity, was perhaps unknown to him. On the whole, internal evidence is so decidedly in favour of ἰγείραι, that I have thought fit to retain it except where strong external authority, based on both the Western and the Eastern Recension, may outweigh internal evidence. As to ἰακισμ, which Alf. adverts to, it cannot be brought in here, there being, as far as I know, no example of such in any MSS. on any passage.

6. ἄρον σου τὴν κλίνην] Namely, as a proof of his cure. So Lucian Philop. cited by Elsner, says of a slave called Midas, that after he had been cured of a serpent's bite, he took up his σκεῦος, and went into the country.

read, from 2 MSS. and some copies of the Vulg., ἰφοβήθησαν. But that reading arose, I doubt not, from the Critics failing to perceive the peculiar force of the term ἰθαύμ., which has nearly the sense of ἰθάμβησαν, 'they were astounded,' denoting a feeling compounded of amazement and awe. Comp. Mark x. 32, ἰθαμβούντο καὶ ἰφοβούντο, and Acts ix. 6, τρίμων καὶ θαμβῶν. Thus in the passages of Mark and Luke it is expressed by ἐξίστασθαι and ἐκστασις, lit. 'were out of their wits with astonishment.' Compare Mark vi. 51, ἐξίσταντο καὶ ἰθαύμαζον. And θαμβῶς, at Luke iv. 36, and Acts iii. 10, denotes wonder mixed with awe and fear, as also in Pind. Nem. i. 85.

— τοῖς ἀνθρώποις] This is usually considered as Plur. for Sing.; but, as Grot. and Fritz remark, the Plural has place in sententia generali.

9. καθήμε. ἐπὶ τῷ τελωνίῳ] I have already shown at large, that this disputed phrase cannot mean 'sitting for the receipt of custom' (with some), nor 'sitting at the toll counter' (with others),—a sense of τελ. devoid of proof. I still think that τελώνιον was used in this sense, toll-booth, as is certain from Pollux, On. ix. 28, where, among the places about a port, he mentions τὸ τελώνιον, and cites in proof of this Posidipp. in his Κῶδιον,—τὸν παῖδ' ἄνε σπείδοντα πρὸς τὸ τελώνιον. Moreover, the term καθήμενον, used in conjunction with τελ., rather requires this sense of τελ. than those others. However, instead of being explained, as it is by some, merely to denote occupation, it ought rather to be regarded as put graphic, and with allusion to the sitting posture of office-keepers, which was the customary one both in the East and in Greece. Thus Alexis, in his Pylad. fr. i., has Δεκατεύσουσι (i. e. tax-gatherers) τὰς οὐσίας ἐν ταῖς πόλεσι, καθήμενοι, 'sitting' (viz. at their stalls). Hence it is best to understand the term τελ. to here denote place, in some such sense as is capable of proof; and that sense is toll or custom-office, sub. οἰκημα (meaning a mere booth or shed), where the port-dues for the import and export of commodities on the Lake of Genesareth were paid, Capernaum being the only port on the lake, and consequently would be likely to carry on no inconsiderable commerce.

— ἠκολούθησεν αὐτῷ] He had no hesitation in doing this, as being, doubtless, well acquainted with the character of Jesus. It is generally agreed, from the great similarity of the narrations, that the Matthew here and the Levi of Mark ii. 14, and Luke v. 29, are names of the same individual, espec. as it was usual with the Jews to bear two names. The Evangelist follows the custom of the ancient historians in general; who, on having occasion to speak of themselves, use the third person, to avoid egotism.

10. ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ] 'in his house,' i. e. of Matthew, as appears from Mark ii. 15, and Luke v. 29, if, at least, the feast was the same; which, however, Mr. Greswell denies; but without sufficient reason; and the use of the Article requires the former view. See note, supra, v. 1. It is better to suppose the mention of the feast anticipated; for Abp. Newc. has shown, that a period of nearly six months intervened between the call of Matt. and this feast.

— ἁμαρτωλοῖς] The word generally in the Gospels denotes either heathens, or, as here, such Jews as associated with them, and were considered on a footing with them.

11. διὰ τί—ἐσθίει] From the passages cited by Wets. and others, it appears that the Heathens as well as the Jews, accounted it a pollution to eat with the impious.

12. οὐ χρεῖαν—ἔχοντες] A proverbial saying, under which is couched the intimation 'If you be spiritually well, and need not the spiritual physician, you want not my presence; the spiritually sick are those who need my aid, and accordingly my proper place is with them;' q. d. 'It is not the healthy, but the sick who need the physician for the body; why then complain that I, the Physician of the soul, exercise my ministry among the spiritually sick?' The words at the next verse, οὐ γὰρ ἤλθον, &c., properly refer to, and are connected with, these, and not with the immediately preceding πορευθίντες δι—θυσίας, which form an interposed and hypoparathetic clause. Thus the true connexion may be traced thus: ['my proper place, I say, is found with the spiritually sick. Why? because my business is with them, seeing that I came not to call just persons, but sinners to repentance.' The interposed clause was thrown in by way of vindication of his own conduct and censure of theirs, which implied an ignorance of what, as professors and teachers, they ought to have known, as being contained in Holy Writ, that God prefers the offices of benevolence and philanthropy to the external rites of the ceremonial law, much more to the observances, only formed to sustain that law, such as avoiding close intercourse with heathen and sinful persons. So far from πορευθ. δι being, as some think, redundant, it is highly significant (as indeed is required by the air of this redori, which is pointed by the δι of reply, as in Luke xii. 14. xiii. 8. Acts xii. 15. xix. 2, and in Classical writers); q. d. 'Go and set about learning what Scripture teaches you;' for it is not a mere Rabbinical formula ciliandi, as Schoettg. and Surenhus. imagined, though the sentiment itself has a parallel in one of Rabbi Eleazar ap. Wets.: 'Facere eleemosynam (equiv. to ἔλεος here) probatur Deo plusquam sacrificium.' The idiom in καὶ οὐ denoting not a simple, but comparative negation, is common to both Hebrew and Greek phraseology. As respects the concluding words εἰς μετάνοιαν, they have no place in B, D, V, Δ, and about 15 cursive MSS., to which I add Lamb. 1175, 76. Scriv. o. p., Br. Mus. 17,470, 15,581, and Cov. 1 (om. by Mill), confirmed by the Syr., Sahid., Æthiop., Pers., Arm., Ital., and Vulg. Versions, and several Fathers, as Clem. Rom., Origen, Ephr. Syr., and others; and internal evidence is rather against than for them, considering that the words were more likely to be introduced from Luke v. 32, than cancelled. However, external authority for them is so strong, and internal evidence against them not decisive, that I cannot consent to remove them, with Griesb., Lacin., and Scholz, but, as before, shall place them within single brackets,—espec. as the Canon of preferring the more difficult reading is here not applicable,—for I cannot agree with Fritz. that "they are quite necessary to the course of thought, and yet cannot be supposed left understood." It is, indeed, difficult to fix limits to the use of subaudition in composition so little regular as that of the New Test. Besides, καλεῖν in this absolute use occurs in Matt. iv. 21. Rom. ix. 11. 1 Cor. vii. 17. Gal. i. 15. Col. i. 12. 1 Thess. v. 24. 1 Pet. i. 15. 2 Pet. i. 3. The authority of Clem. Rom. 2 Cor. 2, is decisive against the words, and so is Just. Mart. Apol. i. 15; and though he once elsewhere cites with the addition εἰς μετάνοιαν, yet he might advert not to Matth., but to Luke v. 32.

¹⁴ τότε προσέρχ.—[Ἰωάν.] From the parallel passages of Mark and Luke, it appears that the disciples here mentioned were those not of John only, but also of the Pharisees, who asked this question; which, it seems, was put in order to account for the difference between them and the disciples of Jesus, as to the practice of fasting in private; which, if John was the forerunner of Christ, they might think unaccountable, espec. as John's disciples might wonder that Jesus did not at least now resort to it, as a natural expression of sorrow for the present captivity of him who was the forerunner of their Lord. Our Lord, in reply, intimates the reason for this diversity by the use of three illustrations, all serving to establish the important lesson ever to be remembered by those who seek to reform mankind, namely, that we should study fitness and propriety in all the observances propounded for that end. The first of these is one derived from a marriage celebration.

¹⁵ μὴ δύναται—νυμφίος] Our Lord's reply is in all three Gospels introduced by the use of an interrogative form in order to express strong negation; and so far from the term δύναται being, as Kuin. and some other Expositors suppose, redundant, is, when thus taken with the μὴ interrogative, to be considered as strong an expression as could well have been chosen to denote what goes far to constitute a sort of moral impossibility, by designating that which is altogether repugnant to what either custom requires or propriety dictates, or again, what inclination would call for; in all which cases, especially in the two first, some limitative clause is left to be mentally supplied. Thus, in the Sept., at Gen. xliii. 32, οὐ γὰρ δύναται οἱ Αἰγύπτιοι συνεσθῆναι μετὰ τῶν Ἑβραίων, one or both of the two first-mentioned senses seem called for; and at Plutarch de Discr. c. 45, and Polyb. vi. 53. 13. x. 37. 9, and Thucyd. i. 11, the third of those. The second of those limitations seems to have place here, i. e. a possibility consistently with the nature of the thing in question. The only other example, as far as I know, is found in Hdtot. vii. 134, καλλισθέσαι θυομίσεις οὐκ ἰδύνατο, where, for want of perceiving the dense brevity, so frequent in the Father of History, and the implied limitation denoting what cannot in the nature of the thing be, the deeply erudite Valcknaer resorted to the very course pursued, as we see, by so many of the ancient Critics on the Greek Testament, and, altering what he could not understand, proposed to read οὐκ ἔγιντο for οὐκ ἰδύνατο. But to revert from words to things, in viol τοῦ νυμφῶνος, we have a Hebraism, to denote 'those attached to the bride-chamber,' the intimate friends of the Bridegroom, who go to fetch the bride. In thus employing the term νυμφίος, our Lord used language descriptive of Himself, under the title (ὁ νυμφίος) applied to Him by John the Baptist (see John iii. 29, ὁ ἔχων τὴν νύμφην νυμφίος ἐστίν). And indeed this was a title given by the Jews of old to the Messiah, with reference to his chosen people, as ἡ νύμφη, and by way of intimating the close union between God (or the Messiah) and the ancient people of God. See Isa. liv. 5—10. Jer. lii. 14. Hos. ii. 12. Eph. v. 32. 2 Cor. xi. 2. In the New Test. this designation is applied to Christ, as the Bridegroom of his bride (νύμφη), the Church, Christ's Holy Catholic Church, being the whole body of his faithful people in every age

ὁ νυμφίος ; Ἐλεύσονται δὲ ἡμέραι, ὅταν ἀπαρθῇ ἀπ' αὐτῶν ὁ νυμφίος, καὶ τότε νηστεύουσιν. ¹⁶ Οὐδεὶς δὲ ἐπιβάλλει ἐπίβλημα ῥάκους ἀγνάφου ἐπὶ ἱματίῳ παλαιῷ· αἶρει γὰρ τὸ πλήρωμα αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ τοῦ ἱματίου, καὶ χεῖρον σχίσμα γίνεται. ¹⁷ Οὐδὲ βάλλουσιν οἶνον νέον εἰς ἀσκοὺς παλαιούς· εἰ δὲ μίγῃ, ῥήγνυνται οἱ ἀσκοί, καὶ ὁ οἶνος ἐκχεῖται, καὶ οἱ ἀσκοὶ ἀπολοῦνται· ἀλλὰ βάλλουσιν οἶνον νέον εἰς ἀσκοὺς καινοὺς, καὶ * ἀμφότεροι συντηροῦνται.

(see Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. IX.), so as to intimate the close union between himself and that people, his Church. The application intimated, though not expressed, is this: 'With you it is a time of sorrow, and it is fit that you should mourn and fast; but not so with my disciples: it is with them, so long as I am present, a time of joy, unsuitable to mourning and fasting. The proper time for those observances will be when I am taken away; then they may and will fast.'

— ἐλεύσονται δὲ ἡμέραι—τότε νηστεύουσιν] Our Lord here expresses his unwillingness to disturb, by unseasonable austerity or bootless mourning, that joy which his disciples felt in his gracious presence; intimating, however, that the time would soon come, when his removal from them by final deprivation might render voluntary fasting sometimes a seasonable exercise of devotion; and at other times involuntary fasting might have to be endured as a consequence of the painful situation in which their ministry would place them.

16. Here we have the 2nd illustration. Οὐδεὶς ἐπιβάλλει, &c., 'no one clappeth a patch of undressed cloth,' &c., i. e. rough from the weaver, and which has not yet passed through the hands of the fuller. Thus the expression answers to the καὶνὸν of Luke. Ἐπίβλημα is Hellenistic Greek for ἐπίρραμμα.

— αἶρει γὰρ—γίνεται] Mark, more fully: αἶρει τὸ πλήρωμα αὐτοῦ τὸ καινὸν τοῦ παλαιοῦ. Luke gives the general sense, and more plainly. By this it is meant that the two substances being dissimilar (one rigid and the other supple) will never wear well together, but the rigid will tear away part of the supple. The comparison is popular; and in the application suggested by this and the metaphor in the next verse is a lesson inculcating the inexpediency of imposing too grievous burthens on them, during their weakness and imperfection, as new converts;—that all things should be suited to circumstances;—and that, as we forms the taste, so men's long accustomed modes are not speedily to be changed, nor can they be suddenly initiated into unwonted austerities. 'My new doctrines would not match with the old rites of the Pharisees. Their doctrines required much fasting; which would to my system be incongruous. Nay, if my new doctrines were to be pieced on their old ones, the rent would only become worse, and the incongruity the more obvious by juxtaposition.'

17. Here we have the 3rd illustration. Βάλλειν, for ἰμβ. is used to signify infundere, both in the Scriptural and Classical writers.

— ἀσκοὺς] flasks made of goat or sheep skins, used in all the ancient nations, and still employed in the Southern parts of Europe. Now these, as they are not so easily distended when they grow old and stiff, so they are more liable to burst by the fermentation of new liquor. The application suggests the inappropriateness of Christ's doctrine being connected and intermixed with that of the Pharisees; q. d. 'New things should be put and kept together, in order that they may perfectly amalgamate.' The result points out the complete failure of any such attempt, by representing not merely the damaging, but the utter destruction of both the substances—the spilling out of the wine and the total destruction of the vessel. It was fit that, as old things had passed away, all things should remain new.

— ἀμφότεροι] This reading has been, with reason, received by Griesb., Matth., Lach., Scholz, and Tisch. The text. rec. has every appearance of being a mere error of the scribe, though one existing at a very early period, as we may judge from its having place in the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions.

18. ἀρχων] Scil. τῆς συναγωγῆς, which is expressed in Luke viii. 41. He is by Mark v. 22 called εἰς τῶν ἀρχισυναγῶγων, and named Jairus. The εἰς for τῆς, after ἀρχων is found in most of the MSS., the Edit. Princ., and the best of the Versions; and is, with reason, adopted by the best Editors.

— ἄρτι ἐτελεύτησεν] 'is by this time dead,' or 'as it were dead.' This is agreeable to Mark's ἰσχύτως ἔχει, and not irreconcilable with Luke's ἀπὸ θνήσκου.

— ἐπίβηες τὴν χεῖρά] 'Agreeable to the custom of our Lord, as it had been also of the prophets; who, in praying for the benefit of any person, used to put their hands upon him.' (Grot.) See Num. xxvii. 18. 2 Kings v. 11. Matt. xix. 13. Acts iv. 30.

— ζήσεται] The interpretation of this word must depend upon the sense assigned to the former ἐτελεύτησεν; but in the popular acceptation it is susceptible of either the signif. to be restored to life, or to continue to live, which must imply recovery from her sickness.

19 Καὶ ἐγερθεὶς ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἠκολούθησεν αὐτῷ, καὶ οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ.

20 ^p Καὶ ἰδὼν, γυνὴ αἰμορροοῦσα δώδεκα ἔτη, προσελθοῦσα ^p Mark 5. 25. Luke 8. 43. ὤπισθεν, ἤψατο τοῦ κρασπέδου τοῦ ἱματίου αὐτοῦ· 21 ἔλεγε γὰρ ἐν ἑαυτῇ· ἂν μόνον ἄψωμαι τοῦ ἱματίου αὐτοῦ, σωθήσομαι. 22 Ὁ δὲ Ἰησοῦς ἐπιστραφεὶς καὶ ἰδὼν αὐτήν, εἶπε· θάρσει, θύγατερ· ἡ πίστις σου σέσωκέ σε. 20. αἰμορροοῦσα] It is not clear whether by this we are to understand a flux from the os azurum, or the os matricis. The former seems the more probable (see Dr. Mead cited in Rec. Syn.); but a passage of Levit. xv. 33 may be thought to favour the latter opinion. One thing is certain, that a flux of blood, of either kind, is the least curable of all distempers.

— τοῦ κρασπέδου] Not so much the hem, as the tassel (i. e. one of the lower tassels) of the garment (see Num. xv. 37); which had four corners, called πτέρυγα, from each of which was suspended a tassel of threads or strings. To touch either of the two lower ones was regarded as a mark of profound respect. This, however, is not to be regarded as exclusively a Jewish custom; for I have in Recens. Synop. adduced three examples (from Arrian, Athenæus, and Plutarch) of heathens touching or kissing the fringe of a great man's robe as a mark of respect, and to gain his good will and favour. The secrecy and delicacy here employed may be attributed to the nature of the disorder, which was considered unclean.

21. σωθήσομαι] 'I shall be restored to health.'

23. τοὺς αὐλητὰς] The antiquity of the custom of wailing for the dead, and expressing grief by tearing the hair and mangling the flesh, appears from various parts of the O. T.: it was common to both Greeks and Romans, and still continues in some barbarous or semi-barbarous nations. Besides these offices by relations, there were others hired to join in the howling, and to sing dirges, accompanied by wind-instruments. So Jos. Bell. iii. 9. 5, πλειστοὺς δὲ μισθοῦσθαι τοὺς αὐλητὰς, οἱ θρήνων κατήρχον αὐτοῖς.

— θορυβοῦμενον] This would properly mean tumultuans; but the word must, as appears from Mark v. 39, τί θορυβεῖσθαι καὶ κλαίειν; include the sense of lamentation, namely, such tumultuary responses as the præfices would make in concert.

24. οὐ γὰρ—καθεύδει] I am ready to grant with Mr. Alf. that no inference can be drawn from these words as to the maiden's actual death. Yet the tenor of the whole narrative of the three Evangelists taken together rather suggests the idea of her being actually dead. And though this is, strictly speaking, not here recognized by the Evangelist, yet the words taken in their popular acception carry with them that notion. Moreover, what our Lord did was such as to convey to the people the idea that he raised the maiden from the dead. Nay, the very strong term in Luke, ἐξίστησαν, and the yet stronger in Mark, ἐξίστησαν ἰκανῶσι μεγάλην (taken with the strict injunction at Luke viii. 56, to divulge the matter, i. e. the miracle, to no one), forbids the idea that there was only a restoration to animation from a deep trance. The passage of John xi. 11 cannot avail to the determination of the question, because the words here (the same as those found in Mark and Luke) are not the words used by our Lord there. However, perhaps our Lord did not mean to assert any thing either way, but merely meant thus to intimate to the persons present that she was not so dead that they had occasion to make these preparations, he being come to awaken her as out of a sleep. We are not to suppose that our Lord spoke with any mental reservation (for which the Jesuits contend), or any suppressed qualification (which would suppose him to speak by enigma, like the ὀνειροκρίτης in Artemid. L. i. 26: ὁ πατήρ σου οὐ τίθηνκεν, ἀλλὰ κοιμάται); but that the terms employed were meant to be taken with the due limitation necessary in all such brief declarations, q. d. 'She is not so dead as not to return to life, which is the idea necessarily associated with death, as conveyed in the familiar periphrasis to 'go hence and be no more seen.' Why our Lord was pleased to use this reserved manner of speaking has been ably pointed out by Maldonat, who concludes his Annotation with the remark: "Loquitur ergo Christus ex eorum opinione, non quam habebat ipse (credebant enim verè fuisse mortuam), sed quam eos habituros fuisse sciebat, si cognovissent paulo post fuisse surrecturam."

25. ἐξῆλθῃ] 'was dismissed,' 'put forth,' or desired to withdraw. This and many such terms in both Hellenistic and Classical writers are not to be strained, but to be understood populariter. Our Lord excluded the people, in order that those whom he wished to be spectators of the miracle (as the parents, and Peter, James, and John, see Mark v. 37—40) might view what was done without interruption.

— ἐκράτησε τῆς χειρὸς] Not as a form of raising any one, nor through courtesy, or more medicorum, as many Commentators say; but, as usual, to accompany the miracle with some act, as that of touching. So at v. 29, 'he touched the eyes of the blind man.'

— ἐνεβριμήσατο αὐτοῖς—λέγων, &c.] In the use of the term ἐμβρ. here and at Mark i. 43, in an exactly similar context, there is (as also in Symm. Vers. of Is. xvii. 13) an earnest charge, under threat of displeasure, to do a thing. This arises from the leading idea of perturbation, or agitation of mind, on which I have before remarked, tracing the true etymology of the word in my Lex. N. T. in v. by a reference to Æschyl. Sept. 461. This I now find confirmed by Cyrill. ap. Suid. in v. It is not, as would appear from the Lexicographers, so confined to the N. T. and Sept. as not to occur elsewhere. It is used not only by Æschyl., but by other writers of considerable purity of style, as Lucian, Menander, Liban., and others. The reason why our Lord was, on occasions like this, and that at Mark, pleased to conceal his miracles, has been variously speculated on, by no one so ably as Dr. Whitby; though even he was not sufficiently aware that this matter is one of the secret things which belong unto the Lord, and which not being revealed to us, can only be seen by mortal men as "through a glass darkly."

a strange perversity, they choose to ascribe the dumbness to disorder. Only, they say, 'the Evangelists thought proper to retain the common expression.' But this would be inconsistent with the character of honest men, much less ambassadors from God, and at variance with the firm belief of demoniacal possession, elsewhere so apparent in their writings. Besides, the truth and dignity of the miracle will not, as is alleged, remain the same. It would not be the same miracle; and the dignity would be far less. For though Dr. Mead expresses his surprise 'that divines should contend so eagerly for demoniacal possession, as if something were wanting to demonstrate Christ's power, when exercised only over natural diseases'; yet what has been said supra iv. 24, will abundantly prove that something would have been wanting to demonstrate, if not the power, yet the assumed character of Jesus, had it been exercised only over natural diseases. Assured we may be, that, in proportion as the soul exceeds in dignity the body, so must the suppression of evil from superhuman agents, exceed that of evil produced in the regular course of nature. Besides, the very terms employed show that the removal of the dumbness was occasioned by the expulsion of the demon. Not to say that the amazement of the people (see note supra, ver. 8) necessarily supposes the cure of demoniacal possession, not that of disease; for the latter had been very frequently seen in Israel, and evinced by the Prophecy; nay, even so far as occasionally to raise the dead.

— οὐδέποτε ἐφάνη οὕτως] On reconsidering this peculiar form of expression, I am still of opinion that there is here an ellipsis of γερόμενον, the uncommonness of which may be ascribed to the circumstance of this belonging to colloquial idiom. And instead of supplying here either τοῦτο or τοιοῦτο, we may best regard ἐφάνη as an impersonal, πρᾶγμα being implied.

— ἐσκυλμένοι] It is almost impossible to imagine stronger authority, internal and external, than exists for this reading, which has been approved by nearly every Commentator, and received by all the Editors from Wets. downwards. As to the common reading, ἐκλελυμένοι, it is plainly a gloss. The sense of ἐσκυλμένοι is harassed, troubled; namely, with the burdensome rites and ceremonies of the Law, and especially the irksome traditions of the Pharisees. The word denotes properly tear, as applied to dogs and other animals (Angl. worry). So Æschyl. Pers. 583, γναπτόμενοι σκύλλονται, and figur. to harass, trouble, as at Mark v. 35. Luke viii. 49. 3 Macc. iii. 25. iv. 6. While, however, the term is, we see, as old as the time of Æschyl., it was in process of time disused by the Attic writers, perhaps on account of its cacophony. Yet it was afterwards recalled by the later Greek writers, from the time of Artemidorus downwards, but only as used in the sense to be hunted or baited, by that figurative acceptance found in our English verb bait, as used by our old English writers (esp. Shakspere); and such, from the words following ὡς πρόβατα μὴ ἔχοντα ποιμένα, appears to be the allusion intended in the present passage, whereby the words become (what they were probably meant to be) graphic.

— ἐρριμμένοι] i. e. not scattered, as some render, but lit., tossed aside, abandoned, unprotected. See Wets. As to the next words, see note infra, xv. 24. Similar pastoral images occur in 1 Kings xxii. 17. 2 Kings xvi. 23. Judith xi. 19. ³⁷. ὁ μὲν θερισμὸς—ὀλίγοι] Probably a proverbial saying, including an agricultural comparison, not unusual in the Rabbinical writings.

³⁸. ὅπως ἐκβάλῃ] not simply 'would send forth,' but 'would despatch forthwith;' the term being a forcible one, meant to intimate the urgency of the occasion, which admitted of no delay. Vain is it that Bretschn. adduces, in support of the usual sense emitte, 1 Macc. xii. 27, ἐπέταξεν Ἰων. ἰτοιμάζεσθαι εἰς πόλεμον δι' ὅλης τῆς νυκτός, καὶ ἐξίβαλε προφύλακας κύκλῳ τῆς παρεμβολῆς, since there could not be found a passage affording stronger proof than that of the sense despatch.

X. 1. ἐξουσίαν πνευμάτων ἀ.] The πνεῦμα is a Genit. of object; as in Ecclus. x. 4, ἐξουσία τῆς γῆς. John xvii. 2. Rom. ix. 21, and several passages of the Class. writers cited by Raphael and others.

2. ἀποστόλων] This important term properly denotes ἀπεσταλμένοι, one sent by another, on some important business, as in Hdol. i. 21, where it signifies a herald, and 1 Kings xiv. 6. But (in imitation of the name given to an officer sent by the High-priest and Sanhedrim to the foreign Jews, to collect the tribute levied for the support of the Temple) it is, in the New Test., almost always used to denote a 'person employed to convey the message of salvation from God to man,' as said of the twelve Apostles; who were peculiarly so called, as being at first espec. sent out by Christ, and commissioned to preach the Gospel in Judæa; and who afterwards, with Paul and Barnabas (who were supernaturally selected for the work), received full and extraordinary authority, not only to promulgate his religion throughout the world, but to found and regulate the Christian Church; and espec. to ordain teachers and pastors, who should thereafter govern it by ordinary authority.

— πρῶτος—Πέτρος] i. e. first in order, as being first called (see iv. 18), not first in dignity; for Christ seems not to have authorized any difference in rank. If he had done so, the Evangelists would have noted it; but they have not; for the names are recited by them in various order. Judas, however, is always named last, and Peter usually first; and John and his brother James third and fourth, or fourth and fifth.

4. ὁ Ἰσκαριώτης] The ὁ was brought into the text by the Elzevir Editor, and has been retained by Wets. and all the more recent Editors, except Matthæi and Tisch., who cancelled it: and many of the Lamb., Br. Mus., and Scriv. MSS., are without it; certainly its genuineness is doubtful.

5. εἰς ὁδὸν ἰθὺν.] for εἰς ὁδὸν ἢ ἀγεῖν εἰς τὰ ἔθνη, the Genit. here being a Genit. of motion, as in Gen. iii. 24. Jer. ii. 18, ἡ ὁδὸς Αἰγύπτου.—Εἰς πόλιν, sub. τινά; for it is wrongly taken by Kuin. of 'the city of Samaria;' which would require the Art. See Luke ix. 52. John iv. 5.

7. πορευόμενοι δὲ κηρύσσετε λέγοντες] The common rendering, 'and as ye go, preach, &c., has been thought objectionable on the ground that to do this by the way, or by the bye, could not be the purpose of our Lord to command, but rather to do it as something primary and principal. And certain it is, that the main purpose of this verse is to inculcate the nature and substance of the message they were to deliver. V. 5 states, 1, their mission; 2, the persons to whom they were not sent; v. 6, the persons to whom they were sent; v. 7, the substance of the message they were to deliver. I know not why κηρύσσειν should be rendered preach. It simply denotes the solemn proclamation, publicly announcing the advent of the new dispensation. And πορεύομαι ought not to be so much considered in itself, as in conjunction with κηρύσσειν. Accordingly, the sense of the words may be best thus expressed: 'Moreover, go and make public proclamation to this effect; the kingdom,' &c. Comp. 1 Pet. iii. 19, τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασι πορευθεῖς κηρύττειν. So, too, in the sense of publicly proclaiming or announcing anything, κηρ. is used in Mark i. 4. Luke iii. 3. xii. 3. xxiv. 47. Acts x. 37, espec. Luke iv. 18, κηρ. ἀφίστην. This use of the Pres. πορευόμενος, with a verb denoting action, and sometimes implying motion, is very rare, though freq. in the aor. 1 mid. πορευθεῖς. I know not of any other example in the New Test., nor in the Sept. Something like it is found in Ecclus. xxxi. 26, οὕτως ἄνθρωπος νηστεύων ἐπὶ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν αὐτοῦ, καὶ πάλιν πορευόμενος, καὶ τὰ αὐτὰ ποιεῖν. Now it cannot be doubted that Sirachides there would not have hesitated to write δε πορευόμενος ποιεῖ, or ποιεῖ τὰ αὐτὰ.

8. νεκροὺς ἐγείρει.] The authenticity of these words is very doubtful, for external authority for and against is almost equally balanced, and they have been cancelled by Scholz and Tisch., and I find them absent from all the Lamb. MSS. except 1, all the Mus. MSS. except 2, and all the Scriv. MSS. except 2. I cannot, however, venture to do more than place them within brackets, for internal evidence may be urged for as well as against them. If genuine, we may suppose that they have reference to the period comprehended under the more extensive commission which the Apostles received after our Lord's resurrection, John xx. 21. I have not followed the change of position adopted by Griesb. and Lachm., because it is not based on competent authority, and it would keep out of sight one principal cause for the words having been, though genuine, lost out of the context.

—δωρεὰν—δότε.] A sort of proverbial saying, which must, as appears from Luke x. 7, be confined to what went just before; namely, the dispensing of miraculous gifts; and therefore cannot be drawn into an argument against the maintenance of Christian ministers. All that is meant is, that they were not to make a trade of their miraculous gifts,—as the Jewish exorcists did of their pretended power to cast out devils,—but in a disinterested exercise thereof.

9. μὴ κτήσῃσθε] 'ye must not provide, or furnish yourselves with' (as the word often signifies in the best Class. writers). Comp. Luke xxii. 35. This may be illustrated from the customs of the Essenes, of whom Josephus, Bell. ii. 8, 4, says, that whatever they had was always thrown open to the use of their travelling brethren, just as if it were their own. Διὸ (he adds) καὶ ποιοῦνται τὰς ἀποδημίας οὐδὲν ὄλως ἐπικομιζόμενοι, 'providing nothing additional;' so ἐπὶ κ. in Dio Cass. l. 50. 11.

—εἰς τὰς ζώνας ὑμῶν.] These words (to which μὴ κτήσῃσθε χρυσόν μηδὲ ἄργ. μηδὲ χαλκόν must be all referred) signify, 'for your purses,' i. e. for your travelling expenses. Ζώνας signifies properly girdles; but the Oriental nations (and even the Greeks and Romans), used the belt, with which their flowing garments were confined, as purses—a custom still subsisting in the East, and in Greece.

10. πήραν] A sort of wallet, generally of leather, used by shepherds and travellers, for the reception of provisions, and mentioned both in the Old Test. and in Homer.

—δύο χιτῶνας] This does not forbid the wearing of two coats at once (for the ancients μηδὲ † ῥάβδον ἄξιός γάρ ὁ ἐργάτης τῆς τροφῆς αὐτοῦ εἶστιν.

generally wore two on a journey), but a change of coats.

— ὑποδήματα] A sort of strong shoes, for long journeys. On other occasions sandals were worn. These ὑποδήματα they were not to provide, but (as Mark more clearly expresses it) to use sandals only. An injunction which may be ascribed to the desire of our Lord to exclude even the slight forecast and provision implied in providing themselves with strong shoes, as if they could not always depend on procuring sandals. Ῥάβδον is found in most of the MSS., including almost all the Lamb., Mus., and Scriv. copies, the Copt., Arm., and later Syr. Vers., Theophyl., the earliest Edd., and is adopted by Wets., Scholz, and Tisch., and at Luke ix. 3, it may be the true reading. But it is quite at variance with Mark vi. 8. Besides, we can far better account for the change of ῥάβδον into ῥάβδους, than the contrary. The critics stumbling at a singular noun, after several plural ones, changed the singular into the plural. Thus it appears, that the external evidence for ῥάβδον (including several ancient MSS. and the best Versions, as the Pesch. Syr.) is nearly equal to that for ῥάβδους. And the internal evidence is almost wholly on its side. Under these circumstances, I have thought proper (with Griesb., Matth., Fritz., and Lach.) to retain ῥάβδον. The sense will thus be quite reconcilable with Mark vi. 8. The disciples are here directed not to provide themselves expressly for this journey with even a staff, but to take with them their ordinary staff only, if they had one: (the failing to perceive which force of the words produced the false reading ῥάβδους;) and we may be permitted to suppose that our Lord designed, under this minute particular, to convey the strictness and absoluteness of the prohibition to make any provision whatever.

— ἄξιός γάρ, &c.] A proverbial expression (occurring also in Levit. xix. 13, and Deut. xxiv. 14, 15) importing, 'You may cheerfully trust the providence of God to take care of you while engaged in such a cause; and you may reasonably expect to find subsistence among those for whose benefit you labour.' They are forbidden to encumber themselves with any articles of raiment besides what they were wearing, or with money to purchase more, because they would be entitled to a supply from those on whom their labours were bestowed; and money would be but an incumbrance, nay, might be even a snare.

11. ἄξιός scil. παρ' ὧ μάλιστα ἂν, 'of your company,' and so xxii. 8. Though the absolute use, which is found both in the Scriptural and Classical writers, and is supported by the ancient interpreters,—may be preferable.

12. εἰσερχ. δὲ—ἀσπ. αὐτήν] The expression εἰσερχ. δὲ is intended to be emphatic, q. d., 'Immediately on entering the house, salute it,' i. e. 'do it so quickly as to be the first to salute it,' as was well pointed out by a writer in the Catena in Matth., Edit. Cramer; and the Catenist well suggests the instruction intimated therein as follows: Τῷ δὲ πρώτῳ ἀσπάζεσθαι μετριάξιν αὐτοὺς παρασκευάζει καὶ ἐν τούτῳ. Μὴ γὰρ ἰπεῖδῃ διδάσκειται, φησὶν, διὰ τοῦτο περιμένετε παρ' ἑτέρων ἀσπάζεσθαι· μάλλον μὲν οὖν ὑμεῖς προηγάσθε τῇ τιμῇ (Rom. xii.). He then proceeds to point out the scope of the next words thus: Δεικνύει δὲ ὅτι οὐκ ἀσπασμός ἐστι τοῦτο φιλότι (not a bare salutation), ἀλλ' ἀλογία (where read ἀλλ' εὐλογία), but a benediction, and invocation of good from God, Heb. xii. 17, ἐπάγει, λέγων· Ἐὰν ᾗ ἁγία ἡ οἰκία, ᾗξει ἐπ' αὐτήν· ἂν δὲ ὑβρίζῃ, οὐ μόνον οὐδὲν ἐκ τῆς εἰρήνης (the invocation of Peace) νομιζήτε (read κομισήται), ἀλλὰ καὶ τὰ πῶν Σοδόμων ὑπομονεῖ (read ὑπομνεῖ).

Since writing the above I find that the Annotation in Catena was mainly derived from Chrysost. on St. Matth. in loc., where εὐλογία is found, and also expressions equivalent to κομίσεται and ὑπομνεῖ. The somewhat obscure and variously explained words ἡ εἰρήνη ὑμῶν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς ἐπιστραφήτω have no direct exposition from either Chrysost. or the Catenist; but the indirect explanation derived from their Annotations confirms that of Euthym. (founded doubtless on some other ancient and trustworthy Greek Father), who explains it to mean non enim inermes eratis, lit., 'let it be fruitless, unproductive of any benefit, be considered such, be as if you had never invoked the benefit.' This view is confirmed by the same peculiar expression occurring in Ps. xxxv. 13, which may be rendered: 'And let my prayer return unto my bosom,' i. e. 'become fruitless.' This rendering of στῆρι is confirmed by the Sept. in the Alex., and other MSS. ἐπιστραφήτω, also by Solomon Jarchi.

— ἀσπάσασθε αὐτήν] Meaning the family, as in the next verse, and as the word is often used in Scripture. Compare, however, Eurip. Herc. F. 593, προσεῖπέ θ' ἰστίαν; and Soph. Phil. 540, προσκύσαντες (Schol. ἀσπασάντες) τὴν ἐσθλοσύνην. Ἀσπ. includes all the customary tokens of courtesy, suitable to all, each according to their age and station.

13. ἐλθέτω] This, and ἐπιστραφήτω just after, are commonly regarded as examples of Imperat. for Future. But it is better, with Fritz., to take the sense to be 'volō pacem vestrām,' &c. Εἰρήνη means the benefit of your peace, &c., or blessing; or, 'the good and blessing which you have invoked by way of salutation.'—Πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἐπιστραφήτω. This is used in a popular sense, to signify 'let it' = 'I wish it to become void and ineffectual.' So Isaiah lv. 11, οὐτὼς ἔσται τὸ ῥῆμά μου, ὃ ἐὰν ἐξέλθῃ ἐκ τοῦ στόματος μου, οὐ μὴ ἀποστραφῇ, ἕως ἂν τελεσθῇ ὅσα ἐν ἡβύλαις. See also Ps. xxxv. 13, and vii. 16. Thus it is meant, that if the persons were worthy to receive the blessing prayed for, they would have it; if not, the wish would 'come back to the giver.'

εἰρήνη ὑμῶν πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἐπιστραφήτω. ¹⁴ * Καὶ δε εἰν μὴ δέξηται ὑμᾶς, μηδὲ ἀκούσῃ τοὺς λόγους ὑμῶν, ἐξερχόμενοι τῆς οἰκίας ἢ τῆς πόλεως ἐκεῖνης, ¹ ἐκτινάξατε τὸν κονιορτὸν τῶν ποδῶν ὑμῶν. ¹⁵ * Ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν ² ἀνεκτότερον ἔσται γῇ Σοδόμων καὶ Γομορρῶν ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κρίσεως, ἢ τῇ πόλει ἐκεῇ. ¹⁶ * Ἰδοὺ, ἐγὼ ἀποστέλλω ὑμᾶς ὡς πρόβατα ἐν μέσῳ λύκων γίνεσθε οὖν φρόνιμοι ὡς οἱ ὄφεις, καὶ ἀκέραιοι ὡς αἱ περιστεραί. ¹⁷ * Προσέχετε δὲ ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων παραδώσουσι γὰρ ὑμᾶς εἰς συνέδρια, καὶ ἐν ταῖς συναγωγαῖς αὐτῶν μαστιγώσουσιν ὑμᾶς. ¹⁸ * καὶ ἐπὶ ἡγεμόνας δὲ καὶ βασιλεῖς ἀχθήσεσθε ἕνεκεν ἐμοῦ, εἰς μαρτύριον αὐτοῖς καὶ τοῖς ἔθνεσιν. ¹⁹ * Ὅταν δὲ παραδῶσιν ὑμᾶς, μὴ μεριμνήσητε πῶς ἢ τί λαλήσητε· δοθήσεται γὰρ ὑμῖν ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ, τί λαλήσετε. ²⁰ * οὐ γὰρ ὑμεῖς ἐστε οἱ λαλοῦντες, ἀλλὰ τὸ Πνεῦμα τοῦ πατρὸς ὑμῶν τὸ λαλοῦν ἐν ὑμῖν. ²¹ * Παραδώσει δὲ ἀδελφὸς ἀδελφὸν εἰς θάνατον, καὶ πατὴρ τέκνον καὶ ἐπαναστήσονται τέκνα ἐπὶ γονεῖς, καὶ θανατώσουσιν αὐτούς. ²² * καὶ ἔσεσθε μισούμενοι ὑπὸ πάντων διὰ

14. καὶ δε εἰν] This is not for εἰν δέ τις; but εἰν is for εἰν. The construction is popular. Moreover, ἐκείνης is for ἐκείνου, by the figure πρὸς τὸ σμμ. The Genit. ποδῶν is governed by the ἐκ in ἐκτινάξατε. Lach., indeed, inserts ἐκ before ποδῶν from MS. C, and a few cursive ones; but Tisch. rejects it, and rightly, since internal evidence, as well as external authority, is quite against it. And the use of ἀπὸ before ποδῶν at Luke ix. 5, does not apply here; where the Genit. of relation, 'as to your feet,' i.e. which cleaves to your feet. Compare Luke x. 11, τὸν κονιορτὸν τῶν κολληθέντα ἡμῖν. Shaking off the dust from the feet at persons (as Acts xiii. 5) was a symbolical action, disclaiming all intercourse with them.

15. ἀνεκτότερον] 'easier to be borne.'

— ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κρίσεως] 'in the day of judgment.' Some Commentators understand this of the destruction of the Jewish nation. But that, as Whitby observes, is rather 'styled the day of vengeance; and is otherwise inapplicable here.' The expression, then, must, notwithstanding the omission of the Article (on which see Bp. Middleton), be understood of the day of final judgment.

16. Ἰδοὺ, ἐγὼ ἀποστ.] There is much force both in the ἰδοὺ and the ἐγὼ. 'Together with the resumption of the subject of their sending, they are reminded of the august Sender, q. d. 'Mind ye, it is I who send you; ' ἐγὼ ὁ πάντα δυνάμενος, as Euthym. says. 'I, who have all power (see Matt. xxviii. 18) both to send and to protect my legates.'

— γίνεσθε—πρίστει] We have here two appropriate similes (common in the Classical writers), intimating the dangers to which they would be exposed, and the best means of avoiding them. Φρόνιμοι, prudentes; provident and wary. Ἀκέραιοι, 'simplices, artless.' So Rom. xvi. 19, θίλω δι' ὑμᾶς σοφοῖς μὲν εἰς τὸ ἀγαθόν, ἀκεραίους δὲ εἰς τὸ κακόν, 'as to evil and deceit;' which passage, being evidently founded on this saying of our Lord, supplies its best comment. The word of warning in γίνεσθε φρόνιμοι serves to introduce here a word of admonition in προσέχετε ἀπὸ τ. ἀνθρ. to beware of the persons just mentioned. Comp. Acts ii. 40. By συνέδρια are here to be understood the provincial tribunals which existed in most towns, and even villages. That συναγωγαῖς must be taken in like manner, is plain from the parallel passages in Mark and Luke.

20. οὐ γὰρ, &c.] The Commentators regard this as a comparative negation, like non tam—quam; of which there are many examples in the Scriptural and Classical writers. But Winer, in his Gr. Gr., denies this qualified sense always to have place in οὐ followed by ἀλλά; and after discussing several passages where the formula is found (as Acts v. 4, and 1 Thess. iv. 8. 1 Cor. i. 17, and the present passage), he shows that the sentiment is enfeebled when the οὐ is translated non tam. Here, he observes, the reference is not to the physical act of speaking, but to the sentiment uttered; which was to be really imparted to the Apostles by the Holy Spirit. 'Ἔσται Pres. for Fut.; or it may stand for are to be, populariter. The sense is: 'for ye are not to be the speakers, but the Spirit of your Father [is to be] that which speaketh [i. e. the speaker] in you.' The Apostles, observes Dr. Henderson, were to employ human language; but this was not to be the fruit of their own mental operations: it was to result from the supernatural influences of the Holy Spirit, prompting, controlling, and guiding those operations.'

21. ἐπαναστήσονται] Kuin., Rosenm., and others, take this as a forensic term, to signify 'they shall rise up as witnesses.' And they appeal to Matt. xii. 41. But there ἐν τῇ κρίσει is added. Hence I see no reason to abandon the usual interpretation, as referred to hostility, attack, and persecution, which is well supported by Wets., Kypke, and Fritz.

 23 Ὅταν δὲ διώκωσιν ὑμᾶς ἐν τῇ πόλει ταύτῃ, φεύγετε εἰς τὴν ἄλλην. ἀμὴν γὰρ λέγω ὑμῖν οὐ μὴ τελέσητε τὰς πόλεις τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, ἕως ἂν ἔλθῃ ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. 24 Οὐκ ἔστι μαθητὴς ὑπὲρ τοῦ διδάσκαλου, οὐδὲ δούλος ὑπὲρ τοῦ κύριου αὐτοῦ. 25 Ἄρκετὸν τῷ μαθητῇ, ἵνα γένηται ὡς ὁ διδάσκαλος αὐτοῦ, καὶ ὁ δούλος ὡς ὁ κύριος αὐτοῦ. Εἰ τὸν οἰκοδεσπότην † Βεελζεβοῦλ ἐπεκάλεσαν, πόσῳ μᾶλλον τοὺς οἰκιακοὺς αὐτοῦ; 26 Μὴ οὖν φοβηθῆτε αὐτούς· οὐδὲν γάρ ἐστι κεκαλυμμένον, ὃ οὐκ ἀποκαλυφθήσεται· καὶ κρυπτὸν, ὃ οὐ γνωσθήσεται. 27 Ὁ λέγων ὑμῖν ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ, εἶπατε ἐν τῷ φωτί· καὶ ὃ εἰς τὸ

24. οὐκ ἔστι, &c.] This is meant to suggest a motive for bearing up under these trials and tribulations, by the consideration that they are no more than even their Lord bore before them. See on Luke vi. 40. What is here said seems formed on a proverb; many examples of this gnome being adduced from the rabbinical writings by Schœttgen, and Wets.

25. Βεελζεβοῦλ] Several Editors and Critics would read Βεελζεβοῦθ, which Jerome adopted into the Vulg., under the idea that it is the same with the Ekronite idol called at 2 Kings i. 2 בַּעַל זַבַּב, the Lord of flies; and that the change of θ into λ was made agreeably to the genius of the Greek language, which admits no word to end in θ. But, besides that for Βεελζεβοῦθ, there is scarcely the authority of one MS. the title was one of honour; like the Ζεὺς Ἀπομύιος, banisher of flies, given to Hercules; whereas, the name here evidently is one of contempt. Hence the best Commentators, with reason, suppose that the name is indeed the same with that of the above-mentioned; but (according to a custom among the Jews, of altering the names of idols, to throw contempt on them), changed to Βεελζεβοῦλ, meaning Lord of dung, i. e. metaphorically, idolatry, or according to others, the 'Lord of Idols.' Hence it was afterwards given by the Jews to the prince of demons.

— The received text, ἐκάλεσαν might seem to claim the preference, on the ground of its being the simpler reading, from which the others, ἐπεκ. and ἀπεκάλ., may have arisen. But it now appears to me not improbable that ἐκάλ. was an alteration of ἐπεκ., proceeding from some critics whose purpose it was to simplify the expression. Ἐπεκάλεσαν, which is supported by very strong external evidence, including all the best Lamb. and Mus. MSS., together with not a few ancient MSS., also some Lamb. and Mus. ones, which have ἀπεκάλεσαν, doubtless an error of the scribes, also ἐπεκαλίσαντο. Nearly the same variation of reading presents itself in Numb. xxi. 3. Judg. vi. 32. and Jer. iii. 19; several other instances, in nearly all which ἐπεκάλ. is to be considered the true reading. And so in N. T. Luke xxii. 3. Acts xv. 22, for ἐπεκαλ. some MSS. have καλ. Ἐπικαλίσθαι very often occurs in the Sept., and not unfrequently in the N. T.; though, in most cases, some MSS. have καλ. The active form (here found), ἐπικαλῶ, is, indeed, rare, espec. in the Class. writers; but it occurs occasionally in the Sept., as in the above passage of Jeremiah, also in iii. 19.

26. μὴ οὖν φοβηθῆτε, &c.] Parallel to this is a similar exhortation (founded on the argument that help in the Lord casteth out fear) in Isa. viii. 12 and 13; and see note on 1 Pet. iii. 14. The sense is, 'Fear not them that shall persecute you, and speak evil of you falsely, for my sake; for God shall be with you, and make your righteousness to be manifest as the light, and the truth, for which you suffer, to be a light to lighten the whole world.' The impressive gnome which follows, οὐδὲν γάρ, &c. (seemingly formed on an adage, and often adduced, though varied according to the occasion), is meant to intimate that the truth, however it may be, for a time, obscured, cannot be extinguished.

27. From confidence and trust in Christ there is here a transition to fearless declaring of the truth with the utmost publicity. As respects the terms σκοτία and φωτί, they are not to be taken literally; nor would I understand them as (they are done by Chrys.) of the obscurity which pertains to things done in a corner. They are, I think, best explained by Euthym., as standing for ἰδίᾳ, equiv. to κατ' ἰδίαν and δημοσίᾳ. And such is the view adopted by Maldon., and Kuin., of modern Commentators, of whom the former compares the Latin versari in oculis et luce hominum, equiv. to in publico. The expression εἰς τὸ οὐς, as being antithetic to σκοτία, may be likewise taken as standing for ἰδίᾳ, though in another sense, namely as (Euthym. saw), for μόνως, as opposed to δημοσίᾳ. So κατ' ἰδίαν, in Matt. xx. 17, and xxiv. 3. Mark iv. 34; and so Mark ix. 2, ἀναφέρει κατ' ἰδίαν μόνως. Whether in εἰς τὸ οὐς there be any allusion to the future communication from the Lord, as proceeding from the Spirit, whom He would send to lead them into all truth, whose secret revelations they were to declare publicly, is far from certain, though it has the authority (in this case more than usually weighty) of Grotius. The other view, however, derives no small confirmation from the expression in the passage of Luke, ἐν τοῖς ταμιείοις. (See note there.) As to κηρύξατε ἐπὶ τῶν δωματίων, few need be told that the house-towers (and still are) flat, and surrounded by a parapet; being, indeed, strictly upper rooms. But the direction, however figurative, is much illustrated by Joa. Bell. ii. 21, 5, οὓς ἀκούετε, κηρύξατε ἐπὶ τῶν δωμάτων. ²⁸ Καὶ μὴ † φοβηθῆτε ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποκτενούντων τὸ σῶμα, τὴν δὲ ψυχὴν μὴ δυνάμενων ἀποκτείνει· φοβηθῆτε δὲ μᾶλλον τὸν δυνάμενον καὶ ψυχὴν καὶ σῶμα ἀπολέσαι ἐν γένει. ²⁹ Οὐχὶ δύο στρουθία ἀσσαρίου πωλεῖται; καὶ ἐν ἑξ αὐτῶν οὐ πεσεῖται ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν ἄνευ τοῦ Πατρὸς ὑμῶν. ³⁰ * Ὑμῶν δὲ καὶ αἱ τρίχες τῆς κεφαλῆς πᾶσαι ἡριθμημέναι εἰσὶ. ³¹ μὴ οὖν φοβηθῆτε πολλῶν στρουθίων διαφέρετε ὑμεῖς. ³² * Πᾶς οὖν ὅστις ὁμολογήσῃ ἐν ἐμοὶ ἔμπροσθεν τῶν ἀνθρώπων, ὁμολογήσω καὶ ἐγὼ ἐν αὐτῷ ἔμπροσθεν τοῦ Πατρὸς μου τοῦ ἐν οὐρανοῖς. ³³ * Ὅστις δ' ἂν ἀρνήσῃται με ἔμπροσθεν τῶν ἀνθρώπων, ἀρνήσομαι αὐτὸν καὶ ἐγὼ ἔμπροσθεν τοῦ Πατρὸς μου τοῦ ἐν οὐρανοῖς. ³⁴ ^b Μὴ νομίσητε ὅτι ἦλθον where we have an instance of an address delivered to a multitude from a house-top.

— ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποκτενούντων] Though there be considerable authority for ἀποκτενόντων, which is preferred by nearly all the principal Editors, yet there seems no sufficient reason for change; since the common reading is more suitable in sense, is found in at least as many MSS., and is confirmed by the parallel passage at Luke xii. 4. See also Matt. xxiii. 37. The true reading is probably ἀποκτενόντων (an Æolic form), found in several MSS., almost all uncial, or very ancient cursive, also not a few Lamb. and Mus. ones; and at Rev. vi. 11. 2 Cor. iii. 6.

— τὴν ψυχὴν] Meaning the spiritual and immortal nature of man; as in James i. 21, and Plato Phæd. ix. 28, ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ ὡς ψυχὴ καὶ σῶμα. On this whole passage, comp. Isa. viii. 12, 13.

²⁹ ἢ—οὐ πεσεῖται ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν] The words ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν were by Griesb. suspected of being an interpolation. But they are absent only from two or three citations (by memory) of Fathers; and though they may seem superfluous, because πεσ. may of itself signify to perish, yet the words were here subjoined for the purpose of conveying a graphic effect, since birds, when struck with death amidst their flight by severe cold, immediately fall to the ground. Comp. Antholog. Gr. iii. 24, εἰς γὰρ ἀγλῶσσοι πεσοῦσα κίμαι. As to the reading, ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς it was doubtless a correction of Grecism by some critic who had in mind Amos iii. 5, εἰ πεσεῖται ὄρνις ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς ἄνευ ἰζινοῦ. These words of our Lord and those of the next v. may be supposed to have formed one of the many proverbia (some of which are preserved in the Rabbinical writers), by which, as the one in the next verse, was expressed the belief of the Jews as to a superintending Providence over the minutest objects of creation. Such, too, was the opinion of the wisest of the heathen sages and writers. But it is here intended to direct attention to the deeply important and most comforting doctrine of a particular Providence exercised by God in the affairs of men, whereby the most trifling things affecting our preservation or welfare are under his care. Comp. Hom. Od. xv. 531, οὐ τοι ἄνευ θεοῦ ἔπτατο δέξιος ὄρνις.

³⁴ μὴ νομίσητε—μάχαιραν] The main scope of what is here said (in words derived from Mic. vii. 6) seems to be to anticipate an objection that might possibly be made against Christianity, on the ground of certain present effects from it,—effects diametrically opposed to that "peace on earth" and "good will amongst men" which true religion might be expected to produce, and which the Gospel was designed to introduce. But it has another and indirect purpose, in tracing out which, we may, with Whitby and Campbell, consider it as an Oriental mode of expressing the certainty of a foreseen consequence of any measure, by representing it as the purpose thereof. Thus our Lord meant to pre-occupy the objection by saying, that such was not the design of his teaching, which was rather to unite more together in the bond of peace; but that, from the perverse opposition of mankind to his Gospel, such would be the sure effect, and inevitable result. Compare similar modes of expression in Luke ii. 34. John ix. 39. Rom. v. 21. As to Mr. Alford's remark, that, with God, results are purposes, it is a truth not here applicable. All we can suppose in this popular address is to show that the results were viewed with full foresight in the Divine Mind as events permitted to happen for wise reasons, in order to the promotion of ultimate good. Μάχαιρα chiefly designates war, but, as appears from the subsequent context, and from St. Luke, private dissension and hostility.

In the peculiar phrase βαλεῖν αἰρήνην, there is a harshness which is best removed by supposing in βαλεῖν a dialogia, whereby the term is used in two different senses, each suited to one or other

of the clauses. In the former by a metaphor taken from sowing, whereby the seed is cast into the ground. So Mark iv. 26, and Pa. cxxv. 6, Sept., though the Class. writers use ἐκβάλλ. or ἐισβάλλ. And as the action of sowing suggests that of a result in the harvest, so the Latin seco, and the corresponding terms in other languages, are used figur. of what produces a sure result (see Gal. vi. 7, and James iii. 18), whether for good, or, as often, for evil; it is, however, used also, and more freq., of evil. Or we may suppose that βαλεῖν is, in the second clause, put for ἐπιβαλεῖν, = ἐπάγειν, to bring upon, and by which will arise a sense very suitable, and supported by Ezek. xiv. 17, 21, Sept.

36. The words of this verse ought not to have been separated from the last, since they are meant to show the sad result of these family dissensions, namely, that every man's enemies are those of his own household, where οἱ οἰκιακοὶ stand for οἱ οἰκεῖοι; as in Plut. Cic., c. 20. How remarkably this prediction was fulfilled, the writings of Josephus strongly attest; e. g. Bell. iv. 3, 2, ἐν οἰκίαις (families) ἤκτιστο τῶν μη ὁμοσούντων τὸ φιλονεικεῖν.

37. ὁ φιλῶν—ἄξιος. Our Lord, after saying that this bitter hatred and variance will be the effect, though not the purpose of his coming, subjoins what is here said as propounding a certain principle for their use, in cases where they might be tempted by the love of their nearest relatives, or by fear of the fiery persecution they would have to encounter, to sacrifice the cause of the Gospel to either of those most powerful incentives, hope, on the one hand, or fear, on the other. The test required is no less than that of paramount love and trust.

38. λαμβάνει τὸν σταυρὸν. There is here an allusion to the Roman custom of compelling a malefactor going to crucifixion to bear his cross. And by carrying the cross is figur. denoted the patient enduring of whatever is burdensome or irksome, in following Christ's example, or fulfilling his precepts. Ἀκολουθεῖ ὀπίσω μου is not a mere Hebraism, but is found in Class. writers.

39. ὁ εὐρὼν τὴν ψυχὴν—εὐρήσει αὐτήν] The verb εὐρίσκειν, when opposed, as here, to ἀπώλλαιμι, signifies to obtain, acquire firm possession of a thing, so as not to lose it. The general sense, then, intended in this Oxymoron, is as follows: 'Whosoever shall [in a time of perilous calamity] possess (i. e. keep firm hold of) his life, will lose it; and whosoever shall [at any time], for my sake (in my cause), lose his life, he shall [afterwards] obtain, possess it.' Of course there is an indirect paronomasia between the two senses of ψυχῇ (life and soul); q. d. he who, by giving up his interest in the Gospel, preserves life temporal, shall lose the life eternal, viz. by making shipwreck of his soul.

40—42. In the three illustrations contained in these three verses the same truth is inculcated; namely, that he who should entertain with kindness our Lord himself or his disciples, in the name or quality of prophets, would thus show his respect and attachment to them, and should not fail of his reward.

40. ὁ δεχόμενος ὑμᾶς ἐμὲ δέχεται] 'and, by converse, consequently he that receiveth not you, receiveth not me.' The treatment shown to an ambassador is in fact shown to his sovereign.

41. εἰς ὄνομα προφήτου] i. e. 'in the character of'; for ὡς προφ. By προφ. seems to be meant a teacher of the Gospel; and by δίκαιον, a pious professor of it.

42. μικρῶν. Meaning disciples, as opposed to teachers; either because μαθητῶν may be understood at μικρῶν, from the context, or be taken substantively, as answering to (what it seems was in the original Hebrew) תַּלְמִיד, and being (as we find from the Rabbinical writings) the name given to disciples. To give a cup of cold water was proverbial for giving the smallest thing. A gift, however, sometimes so acceptable as to be regarded as a great favour. See Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6, 6, a. fin.

[XI. 1. διατάσσω] 'giving injunctions.' — αὐτῶν] meaning not the disciples, or the Jews, but the Galileans; according to the Hebraic idiom of using a pronoun where its antecedent is not expressed, but must be understood from the context. See Matt. xii. 9. Luke iv. 15. v. 17. Acts v. 41.

2. πέμψας δύο τῶν μαθ.] For δύο, Fritz, Lachm., and Tisch., edit, from MSS. B, C, D, P, Z, Δ, and the Syr., Arm., and Goth. Versions, διά, while Griesb. and Scholz retain δύο, and rightly, external authority (I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies) being overpowering. As to the objection made to it by Dr. Mill—that propriety of language would require, not δύο τῶν μαθ., but δύο μαθητᾶς—it is groundless, and overruled by the fact, that the same words occur, sine var. lect., in Luke xii. 29, and also in the parallel passage of Luke vii. 19, from which the first-mentioned editors suppose the words to be derived. But what was there for them to stumble at to induce them to make the change, since the sense is no more developed than according to the text. rec.? The words as they now stand—πέμψας δύο τῶν μαθητῶν αὐτοῦ, εἶπεν—are framed agreeably to the notions of the earliest ages (as we find both from the Old Test. and from Hdot.); according to which, when messengers were sent with a verbal message, the person who sent them is spoken of as speaking by (διά) them, or, according to the phraseology of the Old Test., in the name of. See Jerem. xxvi. 2 and 15, and Ezek. ii. 7. Of this frequent instances occur in Hdot., and some in Thucyd., as vii. 8, where see my note. The critical reviser of the text of B was quite aware of this; and, thinking perspicuity required that at εἶπεν should be expressed something denoting the medium of verbal communication, he hit upon the ingenious expedient of altering the δύο into διά,—an alteration probably suggested by Acts xv. 27, and perhaps by Rev. i. 1.

3. σὺ εἰ—προσδοκῶμεν] 'Art thou He who should come, or must we look for, i. e. are we to expect, another?' q. d. 'Art thou the long expected Messiah?' ὁ ἐρχόμενος being a kind of title of the Messiah (see Hab. ii. 3, and Heb. x. 37), as spoken of under that designation in the Old Test., namely, as the SHILOH, the Adonai-Jehovah, the Angel of the covenant, who should come, and that soon. Comp. Hab. ii. 3. Few questions have been more debated than the purpose of John's sending this message to Jesus. Some ancients and many moderns think that he sent in order to satisfy certain doubts which had occurred to his own mind during his confinement. But surely his view of the descent of the Holy Ghost at Christ's baptism, the testimony he then heard from heaven, the divine impulse by which he recognized Jesus as 'the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world,' and his own reiterated testimonies forbid such a supposition. And to imagine that John's confidence should have affected the strength of his resolves,—or, as Dr. Pye Smith supposes, have drawn from him the language of fretful remonstrance, or peevish complaint, would do great injustice to so noble a character. In short, both those views have been refuted by the most eminent Expositors, ancient and modern. They maintain, that John sent for the satisfaction of his disciples; who, mortified at seeing their master imprisoned for preaching the coming of the Messiah, and disappointed that He whom he testified to be such, should advance no such claim; nor make any attempt to deliver his forerunner: stumbling, too, at the humbleness of Jesus's birth, and the lowliness of his station; and offended at his difference in character from their own ascetic master, had entertained doubts as to his Messiahship. Against these, therefore, the reproof at the conclusion of the reply is, they think, levelled. Hence, it was for their satisfaction John had sent; and as they would not heed his repeated endeavours to remove their doubts, he resolved to refer them to Christ himself, for the removal of their scruples: and our Lord, well aware of his intention, took the surest means of fixing the wavering minds of his disciples, by displaying such supernatural endowments as should completely answer to the predicted character of the Messiah.

But the above view, however specious and ably supported, is scarcely tenable, inasmuch as it is John himself who is represented, both here and in the parallel passage of Luke, as making the inquiry in consequence of what he had heard; and to him our Lord's answer is espee, directed; not to say, that the subsequent context is on the character and position of John. Accordingly, although we cannot suppose that his faith in Jesus, as the Christ, had been weakened by his harsh treatment, we may be allowed to adopt a modified view of the above case, and to suppose that the Baptist, who had been prevented, by his close incarceration, from personally hearing the preaching, and witnessing the miracles of Jesus; and who might have become somewhat dispirited by his sufferings, was anxious to reassure his own mind as well as to strengthen the wavering faith of his disciples as to the Messiahship of Jesus, by obtaining from our Lord's own mouth such a declaration as should set the question at rest. We may observe, that the reply, though not direct and positive by words, is yet so framed as to give them an occasion of answering themselves the question which they had proposed to Christ. Thus it is as if our Lord had said: 'Ye come to learn of me whether I am the Messiah. Your master has told you that I am he, but you will not believe him. Behold therefore the testimony of God; for the works which I am doing before your eyes bear witness that the Father hath sent me.' The description of the works in question is so framed, as to be taken from a prophecy of Isaiah (lxi. 1, and xxxv. 5, 6), of which, it is thereby intimated, these works are the fulfilment. Comp. John v. 31, 36, where our Lord in like manner refers to the works which he doth, as bearing testimony that the Father hath sent him. As respects τοῦ Χριστοῦ being here used (the only time in this Gospel) where we should have expected τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, Mr. Alford says that "the Evangelist purposely avoided saying τ. Ἰησοῦ, in order to show that the works were reported to John not as those of the person whom he had known as Jesus, but of the Christ; and that he was thus led to desire a distinct avowal of the identity of the two." A very ingenious, but ungrounded, view of the case, and merely devised for the sake of confirming his peculiar view as to the scope of the reproof at v. 6. But in reality τοῦ Χρ. was adopted this once by the Evangelist as being more suitable to an occasion which demanded a highly emphatic term,—the sense he meant to express (as Grot. well points out) being such works (of supernatural power) as were suitable; even those ascribed in the ancient prophecies to Christ, and by the performance of which Jesus proved himself to be the Messiah. It is true that the MS. D, and about 15 cursive ones (add Scriv. q. r.), with the Æthiop. Vers., Orig., and Chrys., have Ἰησοῦ—not, however, proceeding, as Dr. Bland thinks, from confusion of Χριστοῦ and Ἰησοῦ (for they are never, I believe, confounded), but a manifest alteration, originating in ignorance, and furnishing one other to the numerous proofs already existing, that there is a class of ancient MSS. which more frequently put out light than impart any. As to Chrys., he probably so cited only from inadvertency.

4. πορευθέντες ἀπαγγεῖλατε, &c.] Thus referring them in proof, not only to miracles among the most illustrious and beneficent ever worked, but some of them, as we learn, from Luke vii. 21, in the presence of John's messengers, to such miracles as it was foretold the Messiah should work; and besides these, such things done as it was predicted the Messiah should do. See Ia. xxix. 18, seq. xxxv. 4—6; so that they, as well as their Master, might be fully assured that the Worker could be no other than the foretold Christ.

5. πτωχοὶ εὐαγγελίζονται] 'the poor have the good tidings of salvation brought to them.' (Comp. Ia. lxi. 1, of which prophecy this was the fulfilment.) A peculiar feature of Christianity, as distinguished from Judaism and Heathenism, whose priests and philosophers courted the rich, and contemned the poor. See John vii. 49.

6. μακάριος—σκανδαλ. ἐν ἡμῖν.] On this force of σκανδ. see my Lex. The indirect reproof here contained was, I apprehend, meant for all those whom it might concern, viz. both John's disciples and John himself, though the use of the singular δε makes it chiefly applicable to John. As respects the disciples, the reproof was likely enough to be applicable; as far as it respects John himself, it is best accounted for by supposing that John had wished Jesus no longer to seek retirement, but publicly to proclaim himself as the Christ; and in so doing he might well incur a portion of the same rebuke which the Virgin Mary received, as mentioned in John ii. 9, and partly our Lord's brethren, John vii.; and the scope of the answer in both cases was, that 'the time was not yet come for such an open declaration; nor was it necessary, since there was undeniable proof afforded by the works done to render all persons inexcusable, who should find any thing either in his person and outward circumstances, or in a doctrine preached, to cause him to hesitate in acknowledging Jesus as the Christ, or to fall away from the faith once received.'

7. The words of this and the subsequent verses were meant to place before the people at large the real character and true position of John, whose dignity of office, as the Baptist, and whose divine mission, as the Herald and the Forerunner of the Messiah, forbade any depreciation of his person, though now in prison, and about to seal his testimony with his blood; and perhaps lying under some imputation, with a few of our Lord's disciples, of levity and inconstancy, considering John's late unreserved avowal of belief in Jesus as the Christ (supra, iii. 14).

—τούτων δὲ πορευομένων] 'when they were gone,' = ἀπελθόντων in Luke vii. 24, the words being meant, not for the disciples, but for the by-standing multitude, who might, from what they heard, and imperfectly comprehended, go away with a lower opinion of John, which this address was intended to counteract. Accordingly our Lord characterizes John as the reverse of wavering, or softness, but hardy and firm; and thus in disposition and character fitted to discharge his high office as a herald of Him who wore the crown of thorns.

—κάλαμον ὑπὸ ἀνέμου σαλ.] i. e. 'a wavering inconstant person,' as easily turned as the reeds of the wilderness tossed about by the wind. Comp. Eph. iv. 14. Heb. xiii. 9.

8. ἀλλὰ τί] This use of ἀλλὰ after interrogations is meant to deny any thing as corresponding to the objective act, q. d. 'If ye deny that we went with that view, for what purpose, then, did ye go?' Μαλακοῖς denotes "soft," and therefore "fine;" whether of silk, linen, cotton, or other materials.

—The word ἡμφίαις, not found in 4 uncial MSS., and some Latin Fathers, and the Ital. and Vulg. Vers., cancelled by Tisch., may be an interpolation from the passage of Luke, where all the copies have it. Yet, considering the very small number of copies, only one cursive, that are without it, we may not without reason suppose it to have been omitted from negligence on the part of the scribes. I have not met with any passage either in the N. T., or the Sept., or the Class. writers, in which the ἐλπίς is found; for certainly the μαλακὰ φοροῦντες in the next verse presents no example, since there ἡμῶν is meant to be supplied from the preceding ἡμφίαις. The expression employed by St. Luke, οἱ ἐν ἡμῶν ἐνδοξῶν ὑπάρχοντες, conveys the same thing in language more refined, and which was probably suggested by Is. lxiii. 1. "Who is this that cometh from Edom? this that is glorious in his apparel?" where the Sept. has ὡραῖος ἐν στολῇ. One or more of the Jewish Versions probably had ἐνδοξος ἐν ἡμῶν, or ἐν ἡμῶν ἐνδοξῶν.

—Βασιλίων Very many MSS., including almost all the Lamb. and Mus. ones, have βασιλίων, which is edited by Matth. and Scholz, but wrongly, for internal evidence is quite against it, inasmuch as it presents an idle circumlocution, in the place of an expression whose simplicity and Oriental air attest its truth.

9. περισσότερον προφήτου 'something (i. e. a person) more exalted than a prophet;' namely, by his supernatural conception and birth, by his important commission as Forerunner of the Messiah, nay as being himself the subject of ancient prophecies.

10. Quoted from Mal. iii. 1. The words, however, differ not only from the Heb. but the Sept. in one or both of which Drs. Owen and Randolph suppose a corruption, but without cause. Ἐπιβλήσεται is only a free version of ἔτι, which scarcely admits of a literal one. Indeed, some MSS. have ἐτοιμάσει, and prob. others in the time of Christ had ἐπισκευάσει, which is a correct version of the Heb. The only real difference in the Evangelists is the supplying (for better illustration of the sense) one word, which is implied in another expressed; and in changing, for better application to the present purpose, μου into σου.

—I have now something both to correct and to subjoin. The Heb. verb עָרַב signifies lit. 'to make to depart,' properly by the removal of any obstruction, and, as said of a road, by removing the prominences, thus levelling it down for use. Comp. Is. xl. 3, 4, which passage affords the best comment on the force of the Hebrew word in the Conjugation Piel. Thus ἐπισκευάσει, 'will get ready for use,' is a sufficiently correct rendering. We are not concerned with the Sept. Vera., which all three Evangelists have here agreed to desert, while they concur as to the term substituted. As respects ἐπιβλήσεται, either that rendering was formed on a different Hebrew word from what we now have in the text, or else the Greek term is corrupt; which latter seems most probable. Did the LXX write ἐπισκευάσεται, 'will put in order;' a term used of repairing roads by Demosth., p. 30. 17; and the Syr. and Chald. well render by complanabit. As to the change by the Evangelists of μου into σου—it might suffice to say, that it is a change for better application to the present subject. However, the case now seems to me (as it did, I find, to Hoffmann) to stand thus: In the passage of Malachi we have the Father and the Son speaking, and both saying, each in his own name, Before me; while in the passage of Matthew, Christ, as it were, hides his own divine majesty, as set forth in the passage of Malachi, under such a manner of speaking, by which the quoted oracle seems to be rather addressed by the Father to the Son, than spoken by the Son himself: in like manner as the Temple, which is said to be the Son's in Malachi, is afterwards by the Son (as yet in that state by which he is said to have 'emptied himself of his glory') called the Temple of the Father, John ii. 16, 17. The learned Commentator convincingly sets forth that, by thus making what is said by Jehovah Himself to be addressed to Christ, the Son, our Lord gives a plain intimation of his own eternal and co-equal Godhead.

11. οὐκ ἐγγίγνεται Ἐγγίρεισθαι, like the Hebrew עָרַב, is espec. applied to the birth of illustrious persons.

—The expression ἐν γενν. γυν. is rare, though examples of it are found in Sept. Job xiv. 1, comp. with xxv. 4; Eccl. x. 18, comp. with xxx. 18, and Greg. Naz. It does not occur in the Class. writers.

—ὁ δὲ μικρότερος—μείζων—ἴστιν By μικρ. (signifying lit. 'less than each of the rest') is to be understood not the meanest Christian believer simply, but the meanest Christian prophet or preacher. Such an one is represented as greater than John, in respect of his office, which was to preach Christ crucified, Christ raised from the dead and exalted to sit at the right hand of God, and impart the blessings bestowed on those who shall believe in Him—greater, again, in respect of his doctrine, which was far more spiritual than

John's, and founded on better promises. Moreover, John, though 'not inferior to any one born of woman,' and himself in the closest proximity to Christ's kingdom, never actually entered where the meanest Christian is a citizen of the realm, and has his πολιτεῖα ἐν οὐρανοῖς.

¹² ἡ βασιλεία—βιασαί] Whatever may be obscure in this locus veritatis, one thing is plain,—that the two clauses are closely connected with each other; so that whatever can be shown to be the sense of the former, will fix the sense of the latter. And here it is of importance to attend to the general scope; which (as in all this portion, v. 9—14) is, to set forth the high dignity of the Baptist. As to the interpretations that have been propounded; most of them are either contrary to the scope, or at variance with the connexion, or the usus loquendi; esp. those which are founded on attributing an active or middle sense to βιάζ. Leaving, therefore, to βιάζεται its natural force (as a passive), it will be best interpreted (with almost all the ancient and the best modern Commentators) as put for βιάειν κρατεῖται, 'impetu quodam et cupide excipitur Messias regnum.' Mr. Alford, too, finally acquiesces in it, but scruples at the proof of this Passive sense adduced by Meyer from Xen. Hist. v. 2, on the ground that the reference is incorrect. But even could it be verified, it would not be decisive, as not being of the same tenor. Meyer would have done better in appealing to Thucyd. i. 77, and i. 2, βιάζονται, and Philo, t. ii. p. 494, βιάζονται, also Hom. Il. o. 727. π, 102, βιάζοντο γὰρ βελίσσας. But if this sense be determined, it will fix that of οἱ βιασαί, which cannot (as Hamm., Wets., and Bp. Middl. imagine) denote 'those who had lived by rapine,' as meant of the publicans, soldiers, and the meaner crowd, since this is at variance with the connexion, and yields a forced and frigid sense. From the context, βιασαί must denote 'persons who engage in any thing impetuously and eagerly.' So in the parallel passage of Luke xvi. 16, ὁ νόμος καὶ οἱ προφῆται ἕως Ἰωάννου ἀπὸ τότε ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ εὐαγγελίζεται, καὶ πᾶς εἰς αὐτὴν βιάζεται. Hence the general sense is, 'Since the Gospel has been proclaimed, there has been a rush to it. Men have been earnestly and vehemently pressing to obtain the desired blessing, as if they would take it by force.' Of this eager reception of the Gospel a striking proof presents itself in the circumstance of the multitudes every where thronging the doors and every approach to our Lord's domicile, so as occasionally to prevent the introduction of sick persons who sought his aid.

¹³ πάντες—προεφῆτευσαν] The γὰρ is causal, and has reference to v. 11, for v. 12 is, as it were, parenthetical, and the scope of it is, to point out the dignity of John: from the time of whose appearance the message of the Gospel was received with delight, and its truths were embraced with eagerness, by those whose minds were earnestly bent on forcing their way through the strait gate. The sense (which is obscure from brevity) will be made clearer by regarding προεφ. as put emphatically. We may paraphrase: 'For all the prophets, and other sacred writers of the law (i. e. revelation) of God, and its expounders up to the time of John, did but foreshadow and advert to as far off, the dispensation, which should hereafter be promulgated; whereas John announced it as at hand.'

—αὐτός ἐστιν Ἡλίας] 'He is Elias,' q. d. 'this is the person meant by Malachi iv. 5, and designated under that name.' What is said is not at variance with the disavowal of the Baptist himself, John i. 21; since it is manifest that he was not Elias according to the sense in which Elias was expected by the Jews, i. e. the same person. He only bore the name, by figurative adoption, as being the antitype to Elias, who was the type of what the Baptist would be in after times. That the figurative adoption of a name does not imply an identity, is admitted by the Rabbins themselves; most of whom acknowledge that the prophecy in question relates to the Messiah. The typical character of Elias is manifest from the Gospel; for as the angel (alluding to this prophecy) told Zacharias that his son would be endued with the spirit and power of Elias; so these qualifications were communicated to John in the same manner as the spirit of Moses was given to Elijah by the Holy Ghost. The resemblance between the Prophet and the Baptist was conspicuous; not only in mode of life, manners, and dress, but still more in spirit (with which he was exceedingly jealous for the Lord of Hosts, 1 Kings xix. 10) and in power, whereby he 'turned many to the Lord their God,' Luke i. 16.

¹⁶ Our Lord now proceeds to expose the perverseness of the Jews by an apt similitude.

—τίνι δὲ ὁμοιώσω] A form of introducing a parable or comparison, frequent in the Scriptures and the Talmud.

δὲ ὁμοιώσω τὴν γενεὰν ταύτην; Ὁμοία ἐστὶ * παιδίους ἐν ἀγοραῖς καθημένους, καὶ προσφωνοῦσι τοῖς ἐταίροις αὐτῶν, ¹⁷ καὶ λέγουσιν· Ἡὐλῆσαμεν ὑμῖν, καὶ οὐκ ὠρχήσασθε· ἐβρηνήσαμεν ὑμῖν, καὶ οὐκ ἐκόψασθε. ¹⁸ Ἦλθε γὰρ Ἰωάννης μῆτε ἐσθίων μῆτε πίνων καὶ λέγουσιν· Δαιμόνιον ἔχει. ¹⁹ ἦλθεν ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐσθίων καὶ πίνων καὶ λέγουσιν· Ἰδοὺ, ἄνθρωπος φάγος καὶ οἰνοπότης, τελωνῶν φίλος καὶ ἁμαρτωλῶν. Καὶ

— παιδίους] In this reading all the Editors from Wetstein to Scholz acquiesce, instead of the common one, παιδαρίους, which has very little authority, and every mark of being an alteration of sciolists. Ὁμοία ἐστὶ only denotes that there is a general similarity, by which the two things compared may be mutually illustrated. The reading ἐν ἀγορᾷ arose from certain critics, whose purpose it was to accommodate the reading to that found in the parallel passage of Luke, where it is generic for the plural. The authority for it is so slender, as to be entitled to no attention; while internal evidence is quite in favour of ἀγοραῖς, as being the less obvious reading. Ἀγοραῖς denotes not only market-places, but those broad places in the streets (especially where they intersect each other), which are places of concourse, like market-places. Hence the words ἀγοραὶ and πλατεῖαι are often, in the Sept., used indifferently to express the same Heb. word. Καθῆσθαι is said to be, like the Heb. ruv, used in the sense versari, esse. Yet it may allude to the posture, so suitable to Eastern manners.

— ἐταίροις] The reading, ἐτέροις αὐτῶν, adopted by Tisch., but not Lachm., instead of ἐταίροις, may have arisen from carelessness on the part of the scribes,—by whom the words ἐταίρος and ἕτερος are not unfrequently confounded,—but more probably from alteration by certain petty critics, who had in view the ἀλλήλους of St. Luke, and did not perceive that τοῖς ἐταίροις, in effect, implies ἐτέροις, the sense being, 'to other of their companions,' which is more natural and graphic.

17. ἠὐλῆσαμεν—ἐκόψασθε] Seemingly a proverbial expression; in which there is an allusion to the dramatic sports of children; who, to use their phraseology, 'play at' (i. e. represent) some action or character, espec. by representing either the festivities of a wedding, or the solemnities of a funeral,—those two leading features of the deep realities of life, which the imagination of children takes a pleasure in anticipating. So the Pharisees are compared to wayward children, who will join in no play which their companions propose; since they neither would admit the severe precepts of John, nor approve the mild requisitions of Christ.

— The second ὑμῖν, not found in 5 MSS., has been cancelled by Tisch., but injudiciously. The word was probably removed for the purpose of getting rid of a tautology. But such tautologies, as being true to nature, are quite in place in addresses, like the present, of which earnestness forms a distinguishing characteristic.

18. ἦλθε] This is not redundant, but signifies, 'came forward as a teacher and prophet.' Μῆτε ἐσθίων μῆτε πίνων is an hyperbolic expression, well characterizing the ascetic austerity of John. By the force of the opposition, ἐσθίων καὶ πίνων must denote the contrary, namely, the living like other men.

19. καὶ ἰδὲ. ἡ σοφία—αὐτῆς] On again considering the true sense of this variously explained passage, I am of opinion that ἡ σοφία is to be understood of the wisdom of God in adapting his several dispensations to the necessities of his creatures. And I would render: 'And yet Wisdom (meaning the Divine wisdom which ordered every thing in that case) was, and has been still, justified at the hands of her children,' "all her children," as it more distinctly is said in Luke, vii. 35: in other words, 'Both my disciples and the disciples of John, such as are the children of wisdom,' i. e. who are espec. wise (Prov. ii. 1. iii. 1, et al.), have recognized and found the wisdom of God, who ordered these things, to be perfectly right and just, whether in the way of John's ministry, or of mine, and accordingly vindicate the propriety of each under its respective circumstances. This mode of interpretation is confirmed by the same use of δικαιοῦσιν occurring in Luke vii. 29, δικαιοῦσαν τὸν Θεόν, where see Note. But if this be, as it may justly be supposed, the true view of the scope of the passage, what shall we say of the ignorance and presumption of those critics, who, as we find from the Cod. B, and 124, altered τέκνον into ἔργον, deriving their emendation (!) from some ancient Versions such as the Copt., Pers., Æthiop., and later Syr.? I have not put down, with Griesb. and Scholz, the Pesch. Syr., since the rendering by Tremell. and Schaaf, cultoribus, confirms ἔργον, which, it seems, was rendered freely, as if ἰργατῶν were read, taken metaphorically. I cannot but suspect that the reading ἔργον arose from some marginal Scholium, which drew forth that sense so prominently, as to suggest to the Critics, as it did to the Translators, the reading ἔργον. In fact, a marginal Schol. of this kind is adduced by Matthæi from some ancient MSS., namely, δικαιοῦνται διὰ καὶ ἀπὸ ἔργων σοφία, κατὰ σοφίαν ἐπιτελουμένη (read ἐπιτελουμένην). As to antiquity being pleaded for the reading ἔργον, it is not more ancient than the time of Jerome, who testifies that some Gospels (perhaps Latin evangelaria) had it. Whereas τέκνον is confirmed by the far more ancient authorities of Irenæus, Origen, and Theod., Heracl., and, also it should seem, the Pesch. Syr. Version. In ἡ σοφία the article is used, because in the case of abstract nouns, when strictly such, the article is requisite. And such is here the case, since it denotes, as Euthym. (after Chrys.) points out, ἡ σοφία (τοῦ Θεοῦ) ἡ οικονομήσασα τὸν Ἰωάννην καὶ τὸν Χριστὸν ἐναντίας ὁδοῦ πολιτείῶν λῖνοι διὰ τὴν αὐτὴν

20, 21. After censuring the perverseness of the Jews in general, our Lord now upbraids some of those cities, in which he had chiefly wrought his miracles, for their impenitence.

21. οὐαὶ σοὶ! Meaning, 'Woe is [reserved] to, or for thee!' Said by Divine prescience, and amply fulfilled.

There is such a thing as determined rejection of what is known and felt to be the truth; and it must have been a principle of that kind which called forth these fearful denunciations! (Bp. Turtton against Dr. Wiseman.)

— Βηθσαϊδάν] Βηθσαιδα is found in many MSS. (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), Versions, and Fathers; and is adopted or preferred by every Editor from Mill to Lach., except Griesb., Scholz, and Tisch., who retain the common reading; and rightly; for external evidence is against Βηθσαιδα, and internal by no means in its favour; Βηθσαιδάν being the more difficult reading, and therefore more probably genuine. It is not, as some imagine, in the accus. case, but is a nomin. of Chaldee form.

— σάκκῳ] from the Hebrew שָׂק, a coarse cloth, of linen or rough wool, worn for humiliation; as ashes were sprinkled on the head in token of sorrow. Conf. Jonah iii. 6.

22. πλὴν] Render, 'moreover.'

23. ἡ ἕως τοῦ οὐρανοῦ—καταβιβ.] Expressions which I once thought denoted the height of prosperity and spiritual privileges, on the one side, and the depth of adversity and utter ruin, on the other; ἕως signifying the lower parts of the earth. On further consideration, I am now of opinion that ὑψώθ., though best understood to denote one kind of distinction and celebrity, namely, that of having had our Lord for an inhabitant, and as being the principal scene of his ministry and miracles, may however carry with it a conjoint notion of political celebrity by reason of commercial opulence. In either case, ὑψ. ἕως τοῦ οὐρ. is to be regarded as a hyperbolic and strongly figurative expression, prob. by an image derived from lofty towers (comp. Is. ii. 12. 15), and denoting height of distinction, see also Job xx. 6 (compared with Aristen. i. 11, ἰδοὺς τῇ κεφαλῇ ψαίνει τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, and Hor. Carm. I. i. 36), and also a strikingly kindred passage in Is. xiv. 11—15, espec. v. 13—15, whence, I suspect, the Critics derived the καταβίβη here, instead of καταβιβασθήσῃ, found in a very few MSS., and adopted by Lachm. and Tisch., and again by Lachm., though not by Tisch., at the parallel passage of Luke x. 15. Yet the Critics ought to have seen, that in καταβιβασθήσῃ its Hellenistic phraseology, found often in the Sept., but never in the Class. writers, attests its genuineness. Most awfully was our Lord's prophecy soon fulfilled in the utter destruction which fell upon Capernaum in the time of Vespasian, and during the civil commotions in Galilee; and from which it has never since raised its head.

— ἔμειναν ἂν] Comp. Virg. Æn. ii. 56, "Trojaque nunc staret, Priamiq. arx alta maneret." 24. Comp. supra x. 15.

25. ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ ἀποκριθεὶς ὁ Ἰ. εἶπεν] I am still of opinion that as a connection with the preceding is indicated by the form ἐν ἐκ. τῷ κ., so here,—as in most cases, where there is supposed to be this Hebraistic use of ἀποκριθεὶς, in the sense to address,—there is a real, though indirect, reference to something foregoing. Thus here the reply contained in these words is one to a supposed objection (implied in what preceded) to the mysterious dispensation of Divine Providence; and the purpose of ἐδικαιώθη (which signifies 'is justified and vindicated,' 'cleared of blame') is to encounter this objection, or charge, against the ways of Providence, namely, in granting more abundant means of grace to some persons than to others. Comp. Rom. ix. 14—20, and see notes. Of course by ταῦτα we must understand the above mysterious counsels of Providence, by which the arrogant sinner is cast into condemnation, and the humble and contrite saved, and in either case in such a way that God Himself is justified.

— ἀποκριθεὶς—εἶπεν] This expression is here, as sometimes elsewhere, used where nothing has gone before to which an answer could be supposed: in which most Commentators suppose a pleonasm of ἀποκριθεὶς; others a Hebraism, γὰρ being sometimes so used. There must, however, be some reason for the use of either term; and Whitby seems right in supposing that there is usually a relation to something; i. e. to something which is passing in the mind either of the speaker or hearer, i. e. (as Fritz. says) 'either to some supposed question, suppressed from brevity, to which this is an answer (see Matt. xxii. 1. Luke v. 22. vii. 39 sq.), or to some question which might arise from certain actions.' See Mark ix. 38. Luke i. 60. xii. 51.

— ἐξομολογούμαι σοι] This verb properly signifies to fully acknowledge, with an ellipsis of χάριν (obligation); and, ε consequently, to return thanks, to praise and glorify. This secondary sense it carries when followed, as here, by a Dative; and it often occurs in the Sept. Here, however, the former is included; there being an implied recognition of the justice of the Father's doings.

— ὅτι ἀπέκρυψας—νηπιόις] Meaning, as the best Expositors, ancient and modern, are agreed, 'because, having hidden these things from the wise, thou hast revealed them unto babes:' (by a similar mode of expression to that, Rom. vi. 17. Is. xii. 1.) Here, as elsewhere in Scripture, God is said to do what He is pleased to permit to be done (see Exod. vii. 4, 5. 2 Sam. xii. 11), and what He foresees will be done, under the circumstances in which men are placed, though without any constraining power over the will to produce this result. The σοφοί and the συνετοί have been thought to have reference to the Hebrew, סופים and סנים, different orders of Jewish teachers of the Law. But it should rather seem that σοφοί has reference to acquired knowledge, and συνετοί to natural talents (what we should express by talented, clever); while νηπ., by the force of the opposition, denotes persons of plain understanding: as in Plutarch, t. vi. 128.

²⁷ This verse, with which comp. Matt. xxviii. 18. John xiii. 3, contains a very remarkable declaration of our Lord's personal and mediatorial dignity. By πάντα are meant all things relating to the counsels of God for the salvation of man, through Christ; and the general sense is, 'The revelation of these mysteries and the carrying into effect of these counsels are entrusted to me by the Father. And as no one can fully understand them, or the nature and office of the Redeemer (not even the angels, 1 Pet. i. 10—12), but the eternal Father; so, on the other hand, no one, no person, no created being (implying neither man nor angel), can fully know [for that is the complete sense of ἐπί] the person and character of the Son (τίς ἐστι) but the Father.'—ἐὰν βούληται ἀποκ., 'may be pleased, determine, to reveal.' An irrefragable proof all this of the Divinity of Christ our Saviour.

This doctrine, of a certain subordination of the Son to the Father, and the origination of the attributes of Divinity with the Father (comp. infra xxviii. 13. John iii. 35. xiii. 3. xvii. 2), when connected with what we elsewhere learn of their equality and majesty eternal (see John i. 18. vi. 46. x. 15), and that which follows, of the reciprocal knowledge of the same Divine Persons, involves a mystery which, as it is utterly beyond the power of human understanding to penetrate, it is at once folly and presumption in man to attempt to fathom.

²⁸ δεῦτε πρὸς με, &c.] There is here an inference implied in the με, which is here emphatic, as though our Lord would say that 'such being his person, and his power supreme, to Him must men come, that they may receive strength to help in time of need.' Moreover, as no mere man, or even angel, could have uttered of himself the words of the preceding verse, so we may say of the words of this verse, that no one who was not One with the Father could, with propriety, have spoken them, inasmuch as they are strikingly parallel to the similar gracious invitation in Is. xlv. 22, which is one proceeding from God Himself, in like manner as the words of our Lord, John vi. 35, ἐγὼ εἰμι ὁ ἄρτος τῆς ζωῆς, &c., and of vii. 37, ἐάν τις διψᾷ, ἐρχέσθω πρὸς με, καὶ πινέτω, parallel to those of Is. lv. 1, "Ho, every one that thirsteth let him come to the waters of life," where the "Ho" (lost out of the Sept. text, but found in all the other Versions) answers to the δεῦτε here. Finally, the coincidences between the present words, δεῦτε πρὸς με πάντες, &c., and Is. xlv. 22, will be still more striking if the words of that passage be rendered, not, as they are in our Common Version, "Look unto me, and be ye saved," &c., but, as they ought rather to be, "Turn ye unto me," "Have recourse to me." As the Hebrew permits, and the Sept., Syr., and Arab. Versions require.

— The expressions οἱ κοπιῶντες καὶ πεφορτ. may be referred alike to Jews and to Gentiles, with reference both to the burdens of the Mosaic ceremonial law, and to the burdens of sin under the moral law, even that which the Gentiles acknowledge; and, of course, ἀναπαύσω will be interpreted so as to suit each. The words, indeed, admit of a general application to all who, in every age, labour under a distressing sense of their spiritual weakness, and manifold shortcomings. To such the invitation is, we see, graciously pressed—to come unto Him who is mighty to save. To such as come to him in faith and sole trust he will give rest and peace, of conscience here, and the everlasting rest which re-μένοι, καὶ γὰρ ἀναπαύσω ὑμᾶς. ²⁹ * Ἄρατε τὸν ζυγὸν μου ἐφ' ὑμᾶς, καὶ μάθετε ἀπ' ἐμοῦ ὅτι πρῶος εἰμι καὶ ταπεινὸς τῇ καρδίᾳ· καὶ εὐρήσετε ἀνάπαυσιν ταῖς ψυχαῖς ὑμῶν. ³⁰ * ὁ γὰρ ζυγὸς μου χρηστὸς, καὶ τὸ φορτίον μου ἐλαφρόν ἐστιν.

XII. ¹ * Ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ ἐπορεύθη ὁ Ἰησοῦς τοῖς ἑσάβασιν βασι διὰ τῶν σπορίμων· οἱ δὲ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ ἐπεινάσαν, καὶ ἤρξαντο τίλλειν στάχυν καὶ ἐσθίειν. ² Οἱ δὲ Φαρισαῖοι ἰδόντες, εἶπον αὐτῷ· Ἰδοὺ, οἱ μαθηταὶ σου ποιοῦσιν, ὃ οὐκ

maineth for the people of God hereafter. At v. 29 there is an invitation to them to receive his teaching and to follow his example—and that addressed to all who feel the need of Divine teaching in order to obtain rest to the soul. In the words employed it is implied, that the taking up of this yoke must be purely voluntary, the persons taking it up being willing to be saved by Christ in his own way. In the burden here spoken of, that of corporeal suffering is not excluded; but from the words ταῖς ψυχαῖς—words conveying a spiritual promise—it is plain that the burden especially meant is that of sin, both as respects the guilt and the power of it, consisting of a groaning under it, a deep contrition for it, and such a desire to be delivered from it as is expressed in Rom. vii. 24. The rest here spoken of is to be understood not so much of rest from the power of sin, or even the rest which remaineth for the people of God (Heb. iv. 9), but rather, as is implied in μάθετε ἀπ' ἐμοῦ, that produced by becoming like unto Christ in meekness and lowliness of heart, by the teaching of his word, and the influence of his Spirit of grace, so to learn of Christ as to learn Christ (Eph. iv. 20, where see Note), according to the explanation I have given of the words infra in loco; in short, to be assimilated to Christ in spirit.

²⁹ ἄρατε—ἐμοῦ] Meaning, 'become my disciples' (or, as it is just after said, 'learn of me'); by a metaphor familiar to the Jews, and not unfrequent with the Gentiles, whereby a law or precept is called a yoke, with allusion to oxen which are in harness. Comp. Zech. ix. 9. Πρῶος signifies "gentle," mild in his government; as opposed to the tyranny and haughtiness of the Scribes and Pharisees. This clause, πρῶος—καρδία, is, in some measure, parenthetical; and meant by our Lord to recommend himself to their choice as a teacher.

³⁰ χρηστὸς] As spoken of a burden, the word denotes υῤῥοπος (comp. 1 John v. 3), i. e. what is suited to the strength of the bearers. The meaning is: 'The services I shall require are a reasonable service, and comparatively light.' So Plato, Epist. 8, μετρία ἢ θαῤῥ δουλία: ἀμειντος δὲ ἢ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις. So we have χρηστέος placed in opposition to βαρὺς in Eurip. Ion, 1373, τὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ μὲν χρηστά, τοῦ δὲ δαίμονος βαρὰ.

XII. 1, 5, 12. In the first and last of these verses, whether the intermediate one or not is doubtful, MS. B has σαββάτοις instead of ἑσάβασιν, which is edited by Lachm., but not by Tisch., which one should little expect; espec. considering that internal evidence is quite in favour of σαββάτοις, which is probably the genuine reading of St. Matth. in those passages (and perhaps at v. 5, though unnoticed by some collators); in fact, I find it in Bartolucci's collation. The form occurs, I believe, nowhere else, either in this Gospel or in the rest of the New Test. It is, indeed, exceedingly rare; though a few examples may be recognised in the Sept., namely, 1 Chron. xxiii. 31. Nehem. x. 31. Num. xxviii. 10. 2 Chron. ii. 4. viii. 13. Ezek. xvi. 1 and 4, and occasionally in the vv. ll. of Holmes' Ed. It is also found in Jos. Bell. i. 7, 3. Ant. iii. 12, 6. xi. 8, 7. xiii. 8, 5, in the best MSS., and adopted by the Editors, except, inadvertently, in the last passage. It is true that in Jos. Vit. § 54, we have τοῖς ἑσάβασιν; but, considering that Jos. a little before uses σαββάτων, I suspect that he wrote σαββάτοις, as elsewhere. My persuasion is, that Jos. always wrote σαββάτοις, at least I know of no passage where ἑσάβασιν is in all the copies except in Ant. xvi. 6, 2, and that only in a Decree of Cæsar Augustus. Hence we may imagine it likely that St. Matth. would, alone of the Evangelists, use this peculiar and, it would seem, Alexandrine form, inasmuch as he was the most familiar with the Sept. Version. However, it is, in reality, the regular form, and ἑσάβασιν only an Heteroclite, formed as if from a noun sing. indecl. ἑσάβας, ἑσάβας,—plur. τας—σι. Neither form has place in the Class. writers, except ἑσάβασιν in Meleng. ap. Anthol. Gr. v. 160. 4, and also in a few other writers, but either of very late Greek, or ecclesiastical authors. Such strong ancient authority existing for the reading ἐν σαββάτοις, I cannot doubt that at v. 10 the Cod. B has σαββάτοις, and that, as at v. 5, in the case of Bentley and Birch, it escaped the observation of the collators.

As to the use of the plural where we should expect the singular, this idiomatic form has (by the usage of both the Sept. and the New Test.) only the force of a singular. The Sabbath here meant is (as we find from Mark and Luke) the Sabbath called δευτέρωπρον. Τίλλειν conjoined with ἐσθίειν, implies what Luke expresses by ψάλλοντες. It appears from Deut. xxiii. 25, that it was allowed by the law, to pluck ears of corn with the hand in another's field.

² οἱ δὲ Φαρ.—εἰπον αὐτῷ] Luke makes the words addressed to the disciples; but there is, in reality, no discrepancy; for though addressed to them, they were meant for Jesus, and no doubt uttered in his hearing. Hence Luke himself expresses more strongly than Matthew and Mark, that Jesus made answer to them.

—δ οὐκ ἔστι· κ.τ.λ.] That, however, was a disputed point; for, though Moses had forbidden all servile work on the Sabbath day;—it was a controverted point what was, and what was not such. Reaping was admitted to fall under the former class; and the plucking of ears, being a sort of reaping, was forbidden by the more rigid Rabbis. That rigidity, however, (espec. when the action was done from necessity.) was contrary to the spirit of the law. See Exod. xii. 16. But our Lord only meets the accusation, by urging, that the thing was not done purposely, but from necessity; on the score of which, or for the performance of a work of charity, he shows that the ceremonial law may be dispensed with.

3. I am now inclined to think that αὐτὸς after ἐπείνασε, which has no place in many of the MSS. and some Versions (and as such has been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch.), has been unsuccessfully defended by Matthæi and Fritz. For, after all the learned attempts of Fritz, to show that the word cannot be dispensed with, there appears to me great reason to suspect, what the large amount of weighty external evidence tends to confirm, that, in fact, the Evangelist did not express it, and that the Critics, perceiving something to be wanting to the sense, supplied the word from the parallel passage of Luke, where it is found in all the MSS.

4. οἶκον τοῦ Θεοῦ Not the Temple (which was not then built), but the Court of the Tabernacle, which preceded it.

— τοὺς ἄρτους τῆς προθέσεως for ἄρτους τοῦ προθέμενους, as oft. in Sept. Εἰ μὴ is here generally thought put for ἀλλὰ, esp. since a negative declaration has preceded, and regarded as a Hebraism, and occurring in 1 Cor. vii. 17. Rev. ix. 4. Perhaps, however, it is not put for ἀλλὰ, certainly not for ἀλλ' ἢ=“otherwise than.” In short, the best view of the idiom is to consider it as a condensed mode of expression for οὐδ' ἐξὸν ἦν ἄλλοις, ἢ τοῖς ἱερ. μόνοις. The complete form occurs in Jos. Ant. xiv. 4, 4, εἶδον ὅσα μὴ θεμιτὸν ἦν τοῖς ἄλλοις ἀνθρώποις, ἢ μόνοις τοῖς ἀρχιερεῦσι.

5. ἐν τῷ νόμῳ See Numb. xxviii. 9, from which and other passages of the Old Test. it appears that more beasts were sacrificed (of course slain and prepared for sacrifice) on the Sabbath than on any other day, and of course more servile work done by the priests. From the above, then, and all such passages, the inference is, that the action, which would otherwise be a profaning of the Sabbath, being done by the especial command of God, the priests in doing what they do must be blameless.

— βεβηλοῦσι Not really so, but only in letter, not in spirit: as those may be said to violate a law, by doing what, unless the worship of God had excused it, it would not have been lawful for them to do. So the Rabbins speak, when they say that the Sabbath is lawfully violated by doing such and such sacerdotal works, and that ‘there is no Sabbatism in the Temple.’

6. τοῦ ἱεροῦ—ὧδε Our Lord here anticipates an objection; q. d. ‘But you are no Priest, nor is your work for the benefit of the Temple.’ To which he does not openly say, ‘I am one greater than the Temple!’ but, modestly, ‘here is something (i. e. one) greater than the Temple!’ even the Lord of the Temple, whose coming was foretold by Malachi, iii. 1. Μεῖζον (for μεῖζων), which is adopted or preferred by nearly all the Editors and Commentators, is evidently the true reading; being found in the greater part of the MSS. and many of the Greek Fathers, and confirmed by ver. 41, καὶ ἰδοὺ, πλείον Ἰωῆν ὧδε (ἔστι), and 42, πλείων Σολομώνος, and Luke xi. 31.

7. εἰ δὲ ἐγνώκετε τί ἐστίν A refined mode (as supr. ix. 13) of asserting the excellency of a thing. The passage cited is Hos. vi. 6, before adduced at ix. 13; where see note. ‘Ἐλεος and θυσ. stand, respectively, for the virtues of charity and benevolence, and the works of the ceremonial law.

— ἔλεος So, for ἔλεον, here and supra ix. 13, I read, with Lachm. and Tisch., from a few of the most ancient MSS., confirmed by internal evidence, and the strong support of the Sept. (in Hos. vi. 7, here cited) in nearly all the copies. That MS. B has ἔλεος is probable, since it has it at Matt. xxiii. 23, where it is prob., but not certainly, the true reading. For although from the form being so perpetually used in the Sept., St. Matth. was likely to employ it, yet it was not a mere Alexandrian form, but also one of the Greek of common life, and hence may have been, as says Dindorf on Diod. Sic. iii. 18, often introduced by scribes into ancient and pure Greek writers.

8. Κύριος—ἀνθρώπου Grot. and some other eminent Commentators maintain that ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου here signifies man generally; which may seem to be countenanced by the parallel passage of Mark ii. 28. But in all the other 87 passages of the N. T. where it occurs, the expression signifies the Son of man, the Messiah; which

sense also the Article requires: whereas υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου without the Art. as invariably denotes a son of man, a man. Neither does the ὥστε at Mark ii. 28 compel us to take the phrase to denote man; since it may be continuative, introductory of a new argument, and signify moreover; on which sense see examples in Hoogew. Part. and the notes of Hamm., Whitby, and Dodd. As to the γὰρ of the present passage, it may refer to something not expressed, but merely what is passing in the mind of the speaker; an idiom very frequent in all writers, Scriptural and Classical. And here the suppression is evidently from the same cause that produced the use of μεῖζον for μεῖζον. It will clear the construction to consider ver. 7 as parenthetical, and to refer the γὰρ to ver. 6; q. d. 'There is one here greater than the Temple [and his sanction will warrant the breach of any such ceremonial institution as that of the Sabbath]; for the Son of man,' &c. Thus the δὲ at ver. 6 has an explanatory force, and may be rendered now, as at Mark xvi. 8, εἶχε δὲ αὐτοὺς τρόμος, and John vi. 10. ἦν δὲ χορτος πολλὸς ἐν τῷ τόπῳ. Acts xxiii. 11, in all which cases the passages are admitted to be parenthetical.

The καὶ before τοῦ σαββάτου is not found in the great body of the MSS., including the Lamb. and Mus. ones, nor in several of the Greek Fathers; and is cancelled by almost all the Editors, as introduced from the parallel passages of Mark and Luke.

10. ἦν τὴν] These words, not found in two or three MSS., have been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., but on insufficient grounds. The ἦν may have been introduced from the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke, but not the τὴν; and, indeed, the article is indispensable, since (as we learn from the passage of Luke) it was the right hand. The ἐκεῖ, added in 3 uncial and several ancient cursive MSS., was introduced from Mark and Luke. In the passage of Mark, instead of ξηράν, found in the passages of Matthew and Luke, we have the more definite and technical term ἐξηραμμένην (rather to have been expected from Luke the physician); and indeed ξηραίνεσθαι, as used of a limb, occurs in Galen, and often in the Sept.

—τὴν χεῖρα ἔχων ξηράν] Meaning (by the force of the Article, which is here, and in the parallel passage of Mark, used κατ' ἐξοχὴν), the right hand, as expressed by Luke. This is not to be understood of a partial paralysis, as some suppose; but, according to the most accurate inquirers, of an atrophy of the limb, occasioned by an evaporation of the vital juices, involving an inability to move the nerves and muscles; as in the case narrated at 1 Kings xiii. 4, so that the limbs become powerless.

—ἐπρωτήσαν αὐτὸν, &c.] Mark and Luke only say, 'watched him'; and do not mention any question, at least not expressly; though in the latter it is manifestly implied in the words ἐπρωτήσω ὑμᾶς τι (v. 9).

—εἰ ἔξεστι, &c.] q. d. 'Is it, or is it not?' From the Rabbinical citations it appears that it had been decided by the Doctors unlawful to heal any one on the Sabbath day, unless the patient were in imminent peril of life. So says the Gemara; but not the earlier Mishna. Yet it appears from Luke xiv. 3, that our Lord, at length, made the Pharisees ashamed to advance the principle. So that the thing was tacitly allowed.

11. τίς ἔσται ἐξ ὑμῶν] A mode of address employed when the force of any argument is submitted to the candid judgment of the persons themselves so addressed. Comp. Matt. vii. 11. Our Lord's argument is founded on a Rabbinical canon, which permitted the rescuing of a beast from destruction on the Sabbath: hence he argues à fortiori (as at Matt. vii. 1), the lawfulness of healing a human being. In πρόβατον ἔν there is a Hebrew idiom, the sense being, not, 'one (i. e. a single) sheep,' but, as appears from Luke xiv. 5, simply a sheep. So in Matt. xxi. 19, we have συκὴν μίαν. It occurs perpetually in the Sept., but not in Josephus.—Καὶ ἐὰν ἐμπέσῃ, 'and it should fall.' At οὐχὶ κρατήσῃ there is no ἀνακούλῃ (any more than supra, vii. 9, where is the same double interrogation), but a slight failure in the construction, to be removed by substituting the pronoun δ for the καὶ, 'who, if it should fall into a pit, will not lay hold and raise it,' equiv. to Luke's ἀνασπάσει, 'draw up and out;': a very rare use, prob. Hellenistic, of ἐγείρει, and only, as far as I know, found elsewhere in Philo, p. 707, as said of raising a fallen beast. The scope of our Lord's argument here tends to show, that circumstances of necessity might dispense with some ceremonial observances, which were in general commanded by God; and goes on this base, that ceremonial institutions being only the means of religion, if circumstances occurred where they interfered with the end of it, they were, of course, suspended.

13. Having given this exposition of the true nature of the Sabbath, our Lord at once silences their cavils by miraculously healing the withered hand, and that without any such action as would have been work done in breach of the Sabbath, even by the Divine power of his word only: thus evincing by a miracle that his previous claim of Divine authority, as Lord of the Sabbath, was well founded.

— ἀπεκατεστάθη] The term properly signifies to bring any thing back to its former situation, or state; and figuratively, to restore to health, as in the Sept. and some later writers. I have, with Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch., adopted ἀπεκ. for ἀποκ. from all the most ancient and very many cursive MSS., including nearly all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.

15. ἀνχ. ἐκείθεν] Namely, as we find from Mark, to the sea-coast.

16. ἐπετίμησεν αὐτοῖς, ἵνα μὴ—ποιήσωσιν] For the same reason that He had on a former occasion withdrewn Himself, as knowing that his 'hour was not yet come,' so now does He give this strict injunction, namely, in order to avoid the plots of the Pharisees, and save Himself from their evil designs. Comp. supra, viii. 4, and note.

17. ὅπως πληρ.] Three of the most ancient MSS. have ἵνα, which has been adopted by Lachm. and Tisch., but wrongly; since, considering that St. Matthew employs indifferently either one or the other, this is a case in which external authority of MSS. ought to decide.

18. Ἠδοῦ, ὁ παῖς μου, &c.] This prophecy (from Isa. xlii. 1) differs in the wording somewhat from the Hebrew, and yet more from the Sept.; which is supposed to have been corrupted; and the words Ἰακώβ and Ἰσραὴλ (of which there are no traces in the Heb.) are thought to have been inserted by the Jews, that the passage might not be applied to the Messiah; but without reason. The words were, I suspect, at first, noted in the margin of some very ancient Archetypes; and then were introduced, inadvertently, into the text by the scribes. Thus Eusebius testifies that the words were, in his time, obelized in the Sept. and were not expressed in the other Greek Versions; that is, not even that of Aquila the Jew, nor in that of Theodot.; a patent fact, going far to exclude the above suspicion; which, indeed, is quite removed by another fact, that the Jews themselves understood the Messiah to be the subject of the words. Their most distinguished Rabbis so explain it. Nay, the Chaldaee Paraphrast has, 'Behold my servant, the Messiah!' In short, in the first two verses (at least as far as οὐ σβίσαι), there is no variation from the Hebrew, of any importance; and where there is any at all, it is justified by the Sept. And as to the variation of the Sept. from the Evangelist, it is not (up to the above words) any greater diversity than that of a free version as compared with a literal one; that is, if the words of the Sept. be emended from MSS., and a great corruption, which at present exists, be removed. For such I consider ἀνίστα, which yields a sense directly the reverse to that which is required by the context. I doubt not that the true reading is ἀφίστα, scil. φωνῇ: an ellipse, expressed in Gen.

xlv. 2, Sept. The phrase occurs too in the Class. writers; but only in the complete constr. The elliptical one may have been used in Hellenistic Greek, in the sense 'to exclaim,' lit. 'give out voice.' Comp. Eurip. Phoen. 1454, φωνῇ μιν οὐκ ἀφῆκεν. The reason why φωνῇ was not expressed here is because it is also left understood in the Hebrew. It should seem, that the Evangelist, observing the Sept. not to give a faithful representation of the original, corrected it more in accordance with the Hebrew, and, perhaps, conformably to what had already appeared in the Syro-Chaldaee edition of his Gospel.

It is true that in using the term ἡρέτισα the Evang. may seem to desert both the Sept. and the Hebr. But (as Hoffm. observes) we may suppose that St. Matt. did not so much intend to express the Hebr. word תָּרַח as the immediately following נָחַח, passing by the preceding as not making directly for his purpose. As respects the terms ἐκλεκτός and ἀγαπητός, they are quite synonymous; and the Evang. chose the former, as best agreeing with the preceding ἡρέτισα, at which we must not omit to notice the liberty, not to say, licence taken by Lachm. and Tisch. in cancelling the εἰς, on the authority of 3 MSS., though internal as well as external evidence is quite in favour of εἰς ὃν. So rare a construction, found elsewhere only in 1 Pet., is not to be thus summarily dismissed. Somewhat strange is it that Mr. Alf. should inquire 'what authority there exists for εἰς ὃν?' The authority, I answer, of no less than that of all the MSS., except those 3. It is certainly found in all the Lamb., and all the Mus. MSS. Nor can it be doubted that the Pesch. Syr. Translator had εἰς ὃν. Moreover, that internal evidence is in favour of the reading, cannot be denied. The other ὃν evidently arose from the correction of some Critic who did not well see the Hellenistic character of the phraseology throughout this verse. Though in fact ὃν is not allowed by grammatical propriety, no example of αἰσπ. foll. by accus. being extant. I am aware, that in Theodotion's Version we have ὃν ὑπόδεκσα; but I suspect that he wrote εἰς (which will, I think, be found the reading of MS. C. and which perhaps existed in the Archetype of B.) equiv. to εἰς φ', a construction found in Judith xv. 10. In short, the Evangelist here chose to blend the Version of Theod., and, I suspect, of another Jewish Translator, for in the Hexapla of Origen, instead of Ἄλλῃ the true reading seems to be Ἀλλῃ, i. e. Aquila. In fact, εἰς ὃν is required by the Hebr. וְ, which, though not expressed, is left to be supplied per ellipse from the context—not to say that there is a peculiar emphasis, which Hoffm. points out.

Ἠδοῦ ὁ παῖς μου, supra, the Messiah is spoken of under the designation of παῖς, from having taken πητός μου, εἰς ὃν εὐδόκησεν ἡ ψυχὴ μου. Θήσω τὸ πνεῦμά μου ἐπ' αὐτόν, καὶ κρίσιν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν ἀπαγγελεῖ. ¹⁹ Οὐκ ἐρίσει, οὐδὲ κραυγάσει· οὐδὲ ἀκούσει τις ἐν ταῖς πλατείαις τὴν φωνὴν αὐτοῦ. ²⁰ Κάλαμον συντετριμμένον οὐ κατεάξει, καὶ λίνον τυφόμενον οὐ σβέσει· ἕως ἂν ἐκβάλῃ εἰς νῆκος τὴν κρίσιν. ²¹ καὶ [ἐν] τῷ ὀνόματι αὐτοῦ ἔθνη ἐλπιούσιν.

upon him the form of a servant (Phil. ii. 7), and from his general obedience in quality of Son, to God the Father. So παῖς τοῦ Θεοῦ at Acts iii. 13, et alibi. In the use of θήσω instead of the Sept. ἰδῶκα the Evang. has better expressed the force of the Hebr. preterite prophetic for fut. τυγ. In the use of ἀπαγγελεῖ for the Sept. ἔξοισι St. Matt. may seem to have chosen for the worse, and kept too close to the Hebr. But, as Hoffm. observes, the Evang. thought fit here to act rather as an exegetes, or Interpreter, than a Translator, wishing to show how the Messiah would carry forth judgment (i. e. the τηγ, or 'legem Messiae') to the Gentiles, namely, by announcing it in the preaching of the Gospel, with allusion to the Εὐαγγέλιον as an ἀπαγγελία, or message from God. In the use of ἐρίσει, not κηρύσσεται, the Evang. chose for a general a more special term as denoting the clamour of litigation or contentious disputation, as opposed to placidity and mildness of address, as shown in the meekness of wisdom spoken of by Jas. iii. 13. Again, the term συντετριμμένον is more agreeable to the Hebr. than the συντεθλασμένον of the Sept., and συντρίψει than κατεάξει: and so of τυφόμενον comp. with Sept. κατακλινόμενον. The former term is so used by the best writers from Hdol. to Plutarch, Sol. 1, παρεφύλαξε τυφομένην ἀδρού πυρός ἐτι ἥσσαι φλόγα. In the use of the term συντετρ. there is no allusion such as is traced to our Lord's noiseless and unostentatious course and gentleness of demeanour, nor to his tender compassion for human woe (John xi. 35), but as taken in conjunction with the following metaphor, it must import a deeper spiritual sense, as adverting to the case of a broken and contrite spirit. The case of such is represented as like a bruised reed and smoking flax, with allusion to their weakness and want of fervour and spiritual life. But the reed that is bruised shall not be broken, but supported by Him who is mighty to sustain; and the yet faintly smoking candle-wick shall not be blown out, but blown up. See more in Calvin and Matth. Henry. Here, as often in the Greek writers, by the negation of one thing is implied the affirmative of the contrary, q. d. 'he will strengthen wavering faith, and rekindle nearly extinct piety.'

The greatest difficulty, however, connected with this passage rests on the words ἕως ἂν ἐκβάλῃ—ἐλπιούσιν. There is in the Evangelist a considerable variation from both the Sept. and the Hebrew. Let us, however, first examine the variation between the Hebrew and the Sept. The Sept. by ἰδὼν thought proper to give the meaning intended by the Prophet, rather than the literal expression; which would have required νῆσοι. The sense is, the 'most remote nations, not only the Jews, but the Gentiles.' As to the diversity in ὀνόματι (for the Hebr. τηγ means either law or doctrine) we may, with Schleusner, suppose ὀνόματι to be used in the sense law or doctrine, as in various passages of the N. T., which he so explains in his Lex. I should, however, prefer supposing that the Sept. Translator here, as before, chose to express the general sense in a very free version; and that the Evangelist followed the Sept. as far as he thought it sufficiently faithful, and to his purpose, and no further—thus passing over the ἀναλάμψει καὶ οὐ θρασθήσεται—and no wonder, since they were not essential to his purpose, and the term ἀναλ. perhaps in St. Matthew's copy, as well as all the copies now extant, is nevertheless quite corrupt. I have no doubt that the original text of the Sept. was ἀνακάμψει; and also that a negative particle has here (as occasionally in all writers) slipped out. Thus οὐκ ἀπακ., 'he will not bend back, will not give way or despond' (comp. Cebes as cited by Steph. Thea. in v.) expresses the true sense of the Hebr. τηγ מל, which is, 'will not be so broken in spirit as to despond.' Finally, to advert to the difference between the Hebrew and the Evangelist, this consists, partly in the omission of several words, and partly in the change of others. But neither, I apprehend, involves any real discrepancy; for the sense, as will be seen, is precisely the same. The Evangelist seems to have purposely omitted part of the words, because they were unsuitable to his purpose; and prob. were even then very corrupt in the Sept.: and in expressing the sense of the others, he chose (as is often done in Scripture) to blend together the two clauses עַד שֶׁיִּשְׁמַח עַד שֶׁיִּשְׁמַח and עַד שֶׁיִּשְׁמַח עַד שֶׁיִּשְׁמַח into one, and give the SUBSTANCE of both. So that the sense of the words ἕως ἐκβάλῃ (answering to ἔξοισι in the Sept.) εἰς νῆκος τὴν κρίσιν is this: '[And thus will it be] until he shall have brought out uncertain conflict unto decided victory, so as to send forth [over the whole earth] his Rule of life [the Gospel] conquering and to conquer' (lit. for spiritual conquest), Rev. vi. 2, intimating, that both the preaching of the Gospel in the world, and the power of the Gospel in the heart of true believers, shall ultimately prevail: that grace shall get the upper hand of corruption, and at length be perfected in glory,—such as eye hath not seen, &c., 1 Cor. ii. 9.

21. The ἐν is absent from most of the uncial and many cursive MSS., and is cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch. But I pause, since although internal evidence is against it, yet, considering that both the Hebr. and Sept. have a preposition, the Evangelist was more likely to take the preposition than to reject it; and it seems he adopted the ἐν from the Hebr., though עַד is found in the Sept., and also in Rom. xv. 12. 1 Cor. xv. 19. 1 Tim. iv. 10. vi. 17. v. 5. 1 Pet. i. 13. iii. 3. indeed, be inclined to suspect that the reading arose from the scribes (since ἐν after καὶ very frequently coalesces with the καὶ per crasin), did I not observe the construction with the simple dat. once in the Sept., 4 Kings xviii. 29, and once in the Class. writers, Thucyd. iii. 97, ἔλπ. τῇ τύχῃ. If that be the true reading, the sense will be, as in the passage of Thucyd., 'shall place their hope on His name;' lit. His Law [of life] in the Gospel; thus adapting the πῶς of the Prophet, the Λαὸν (of Moses) to the Gospel, of which the sum and centre is Christ as the Head of the Gospel dispensation, Acts viii. 12.

²² τυφλὸν καὶ] These words, not found in 3 MSS., have been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., who thus run counter not only to the strongest external authority (confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version), but also to internal evidence, as existing in the likelihood of the words being lost from the change of position in τυφλὸν καὶ κωφόν, many MSS. reading τὸν κωφὸν καὶ τ. In such a case omission often occurs.

²³ ἐξίσταντο] 'were quite amazed.' See Lex. Μήτι is to be rendered num, or an forte, not nonne? for the former implies that disbelief preponderates; the latter, belief. The multitude seems to have spoken thus modestly, to avoid offending the Pharisees. By υἱὸς Δαυὶδ is meant the Messiah, promised under that character. The multitude inferred Jesus to be such, from the fulfilment, under their eyes, of the prophecy of Is. xxxv. 5.

— ἀρχοντι τῶν δαιμ.] Not only was an hierarchy of good angels held, but a subordination and headship was believed to exist among the evil ones: and this not only by the Incantatores and Exorcistæ, &c., but by the Rabbis. So in the Rabbinical writers the expression 'caput dæmonum' often occurs; and the name given to him is Asmodeus. So too thought some heathen philosophers, espec. Porphyry, who mentions the ἀρχὴν by the name of Serapis.

²⁵ εἰδὼς τὰς ἐνθυμ. αὐ.] See note, supra ix. 4, where I have shown that these two passages, and several others, where the power of knowing the thoughts of men,—which is constantly represented in Scripture as the attribute of God alone,—must attest the Deity of Christ our Saviour. Our Lord knew not only what they thought, but (ὡς καρδιωγυστής) their hearts, and that to the very core; and well too did he fathom their wickedness which, and not the weakness of their understandings, had dictated the sentiment they had uttered, contrary, it would seem, to their private conviction; which called forth the severe denunciation implied at v. 31. Comp. supra ix. 3, and the parallel passages.

— πᾶσα βασιλεία, &c.] In refuting the above foul imputation our Lord uses a proverbial saying (similar to many cited from the Greek and Rabbinical writers) in which we have an argumentum ab absurdo; q. d. 'The safety of a state or of a family is promoted by concord, and destroyed by dissension'; q. d. If Satan were to combine with me in expelling his demons from the bodies of men, whither he has empowered them to enter, he would be at variance with himself, would act foolishly, and his authority could not continue.

— ἐν Βεελζεβούλ] That there were persons among the Jews who professed to cast out demons by exorcisms, and invocation of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, we learn both from the Scriptures (see Luke ix. 49. Acts xix. 13. Mark ix. 38), and from Joseph. Ant. viii. 2, 5. vii. 6, 3, both from the early Fathers, (as Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Origen, Tertullian, and others,) and from Lucian, Trag. p. 171. The argument, therefore, is, 'If those who cast out demons prove themselves to be leagued with Satan, then must your disciples be also leagued with him; and the censure will apply to them as well as unto me.' It affects not the argument whether the demons were really expelled by such exorcism (though it might sometimes happen, by the permission of God); it is sufficient for the argumentum ad hominem, that the Pharisees thought they were expelled, and did not attribute it to the agency of Satan.—On more mature consideration of this perplexing point, whether the casting out here spoken of was a real, or only a pretended, exorcism, I am inclined to think that the persons in question did sometimes really cast them out. I am induced to come to this conclusion, not from the arguments advanced by Mr. Alf., but from those urged by Dr. Hamm. and Dr. Whitby. The passages adduced by Mr. Alf. (after Whitby) from Irenæus and Justin Mart. are very weighty (those of Origen and Theophilus far less conclusive), and exceedingly curious is that from Jos. Ant. viii. 2, 5. But Mr. Alf. greatly lessens the importance of the passage by admitting there the reading ἰνδόμενοι, which the late editor, Richter, edited, solely from the conjecture of Ernesti; but wrongly, for if the sense thus arising were (which is far from being the case) to the purpose, still that would require ἰνδόντα. The common reading (in Huda. and Haverc.) ἰνδόμενα yields a good sense, but it is destitute of authority. And the ἰνδόμενοι, edited by Dindorf from four MSS., is forbidden by δαίμονια. The true reading is, I apprehend, either ἰαδόμενα, found in the two best MSS., or rather ἰπαδ., incantata, which is confirmed by Origen contra Cels. l. iv. p. 183, seq., where he says that the names of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were used by the Jewish Exorcists ἐν τῷ κατεπαθεῖν δαίμονας, 'in exorcizando demones.' Certainly the term ἰπαδ. is more suitable than ἰνδ., not to say that the passive present of ἰνδῶ is, I believe, unprecedented. If it did occur, it would be written ἰνδόμενος: but the pass. preterite ἰνδεδέμενος was exclusively used. As respects the expression employed of this healing by Jos., κατ' ἡμῖν πλείστον ἰσχύει, it does not mean, 'is of great force,' as Whiston renders, but, 'is widely prevalent.' I cannot, however, concede to Mr. Alf., that the above view is confirmed by the words of the multitude, supra ix. 33, οὐδέποτε ἐφάνη οὕτως ἐν τῷ Ἰσραὴλ, for the gloss Mr. Alf. puts upon the words requires manifest violence to strain out so extensive a sense from a particle. The passage left untortured rather confirms the general opinion, that the exorcisms were only alleged to be such, and admitted by the Pharisees. If, however, the reality of the exorcism be admitted, the argument may, as it has been by Whitby, well traced thus: 'You doubt not that your exorcists do cast out devils by virtue of the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; it will then afford matter for your condemnation, who pass so favourable a judgment on them, to pass so unjust a censure on me, in whom you see evidences of the finger of God, in casting out all manner of evil spirits,' &c. By διὰ τοῦτο—κρίναι it is meant they, i.e. their conduct will afford matter for your condemnation as unjust.

— νιὸί 'sons,' by an idiom derived from the customs of the Jews, denotes disciples. See 1 Kings xx. 35. 2 Tim. i. 2.

²⁸ ἐν πνεύματι Θεοῦ 'by divine energy;' as in Luke xi. 20, ἐν δακτύλῳ Θεοῦ. The reasoning is this: 'But if I cast out demons by Divine power, I perform miracles by the aid of God: hence it follows, that I am sent from God. But if I be sent from God, you should believe me, when I announce to you the kingdom of God.'

— ἔφθασεν] This strong expression means, 'is already come upon you;' i.e. 'sooner than ye expected.' So in Luke xi. 20. 1 Thess. ii. 16.

²⁹ The purpose of this verse is to show, by a fresh illustration, the folly of supposing that he acts by a power from, and consequently inferior to, Satan; since he evinces superiority over him, by overpowering him, and despoiling him of his authority; q. d. 'If (as all must confess) he who binds another is stronger than he who is bound by him, you will easily perceive that I must be far more powerful than the Prince of demons.'

— ἡ πῶς] Of this use of ἡ, or else, as introductory of another comparison, examples may be seen in my Lex. in voc. To which I add Joseph. Bell. ii. 2, 5, ἢν ἡ ποταπὴν —;

³¹ διὰ τοῦτο] for the connexion see note supra. There is scarcely any point in the interpretation of the N. T. which has been more debated than the nature of the BLASPHEMY AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT, of which it is here said, that 'it shall not be forgiven.' It would be a waste of time to read, and useless labour to detail and review, the far greater part of the interpretations propounded by Theologians, ancient and modern, of this verse. In order to ascertain the true sense, it is of importance to attend carefully to the connexion, and to gather what help we can from the parallel passages. Now the connexion should seem to be decided by the formula διὰ τοῦτο, which introduces what is said; and has reference not so much to the words which have just preceded, as to the whole of the foregoing matter; and espec. points at the diabolical calumny which had been uttered by the Scribes, in attributing the undisputed miracles of Christ to the agency of the Devil, as is certain from Mark iii. 28, 30, ὅτι ἔλεγον πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον ἔχει, of which the full sense is ['this denunciation was uttered] because they said,' &c. The main question on which the matter hinges is, whether it be the conduct of the Pharisees on this particular occasion, that is meant, or that of the same persons soon afterwards, by similarly calumniating the supernatural gifts of the Spirit, subsequently poured forth, after the resurrection and ascension of Christ. The latter view is strenuously maintained by Whitby, Baxter, Hamm., Dodd., and Mack., whose arguments are, in brief, as follows: '1. It is declared, that whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him;' and, therefore, the Pharisees, in calumniating his miracles, were not guilty of the unpardonable sin. '2dly. The sin against the Holy Ghost could not be committed during our Saviour's abode on earth, as the Holy Ghost was not given till after his ascension, John vii. 39. xvi. 7. Acts ii. 1, seq. 3dly. In St. Luke xii. 10, our Saviour makes the same declaration respecting this sin, when no calumny against him was uttered.' These arguments, however, are by no means conclusive. As to the 1st and 3d, they proceed on a false supposition; for blasphemy could be committed during our Saviour's lifetime; since, though the Holy Ghost was not given to men until after Christ's ascension, and even then only occasionally and limitedly, to Christ it was given perpetually, and without measure; as is plain from John iii. 34, οὐ γὰρ ἐκ μέτρου δίδωσιν ὁ Θεὸς τὸ Πνεῦμα, where compare the text. The 3d argument has not the least cogency; since in St. Luke the order of the events is very little observed, and the occasions when things were said, are often rather intimated than indicated. The only one of any weight that has been urged is, that the Pharisees present could not be thought utterly inexcusable, since the crowning evidence of Christ's Messiahship, by his resurrection and the subsequent effusion of the Holy Spirit, had not yet been afforded. But that argument is, however specious, inconclusive; and involves a sitting in judgment on our God's proceedings. The crime of the Pharisees was, assuredly, all things considered, greater than that committed by those who afterwards spoke evil of the supernatural gifts of the Holy Spirit. It was, as Archbp. Secker observes, 'the greatest and most wilful obstinacy in wrong that can be imagined, when they and all around them saw the most illustrious and beneficial miracles done in confirmation of the purest and most holy and benevolent doctrines, to stand out in opposition to both; to insist that the Devil conspired against himself, rather than own the finger of God, where it was so exceedingly visible; not only to oppose, but to revile, the strongest evidence laid before them in the fullest manner, and that, very probably, against the secret conviction of their own hearts; such behaviour manifests the most hardened and desperate wickedness.' In short, when we consider the extreme harshness of supposing, that what was said in immediate connexion with the conduct of the Pharisees, and introduced by a formula confining it to that, was not meant to be understood of that, but of another offence which bore an affinity to it, it is abundantly obvious that the interpretation in question is really untenable. There is the more reason to warn Biblical students against embracing it; since it was the adoption of it by the Latin and some Greek Fathers, and the subsequent extension of it to speaking evil of the operations of the Holy Spirit generally, even of his graces, which opened a door to the grievous errors into which those Theologians, of the ancient and earlier modern School fell, who almost made the Sin (as they inaccurately term it) against the Holy Ghost, to consist in a wilful opposition to the teaching of the Spirit, in respect to what such men persuade themselves is alone the truth, as it is in Jesus. Hence the passage has been quoted by Romanists against Protestants, and by Protestants against Romanists; by orthodox Protestants against heterodox Protestants; and might be adduced by the maintainers of the lying miracles of our day against those who reject them. Nay, it has been explained of obstinate resistance to the graces of the Holy Spirit by invincible hardness of heart and impenitence; or of apostasy, or of falling into mortal sins after the grace of the Holy Spirit in baptism. Yet those who maintain these various views are constrained, virtually at least, to admit the crime to be pardonable; which is directly contrary to our Saviour's words. Besides, it could not be the design of our Lord, to utter what should prove, as it were, a trap for the consciences of men; and should operate to fill timid, though sincerely pious persons with vain alarm; much less to furnish arms for Church polemics to wield one against another ad infinitum. At the same time it must be remembered that most of the offences which have been thought to constitute the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost bear some affinity thereto; being, if not blasphemy, at least sin against the Holy Spirit, 'doing despite to the Spirit of Grace, and bringing swift destruction on those who habitually commit them.'

The words of the former clause must not be unattended to, by being, as it were, overshadowed by this latter. The words may best be rendered, 'All sin, yea blasphemy, shall be forgiven;' meaning all [other] sin [not so wilful and presumptuous] shall be forgiven, be pardonable on due repentance and reformation. So, again, by βλασφ. is to be understood all other blasphemy except that subjoined,—all other, whether against God, or, as expressed in the next clause, against Christ, espec. the latter, to which it is restricted in the parallel passage of Luke. Even that, however, we see is pardonable, a provision being made for its pardon in the blood of Christ. See Dr. Waterland's Works, vol. ix. Sermon 28. The passages adduced by Mr. Alford as containing the same declaration in substance as the present, are of a different character. Even the passage of 1 John v. 16, ἁμαρτία πρὸς θάνατον, has a marked difference, as denoting not any single sin in particular, but a course of sinning, implying the habitual commission of presumptuous sin; and that may well be said to be πρὸς θάνατον, not because the means for its pardon are not provided by the satisfaction of Christ, but so utterly unlikely is it to be attained, that the sinning may be said, popularly, to be mortal. The expression at v. 32, οὗτοι εἰς—μέλλουσι, is founded on a Hebr. form, containing the strongest mode of expressing never; and though sometimes used by the Rabbins on occasions of slender moment, has here a peculiar and awful solemnity. The νῦν inserted in many ancient MSS. (including most of the Lamb. and Br. Mus. ones), and adopted by Matth. and Scholz, seems to be a mere interpolation from several passages where the ἄνθρωπος is found, espec. since none of the passages adduced in such abundance by Lightf., Schoettg., and Wets., have it. As respects the words at v. 31, τοῖς ἀνθρώποις, occurring the second time, and cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. on but slender authority, they were expunged by certain Critics for the sake of removing a tautology; though such a use as the one here, on an occasion of deep seriousness, occurs in the best Class. writers, and so far from being pleonastic, is intensive, thus: 'Wherefore such being the case, because you, notwithstanding plain facts, and even self-conviction to the contrary, persist in affirming that I act in concert with Satan, I say unto you—I solemnly apprise you,' &c. In this point of view the sin just about to be marked with the heaviest denunciation, that of an open belying of the present power of the Holy Spirit of God working in and for his kingdom of grace, a determined rejection of what is known and felt to be the truth, assumes a character inexpressibly awful.

33. ἡ ποιήσατε, &c.] 'ponite, suppose, consider,' = old Engl. 'put case.' A Latinism for τίθεις. Xen. Anab. v. 7, 9, ποιεῖν δὲ ὑμᾶς ἐξαπατηθῆναις—ὅτι ἰμοῦ ἤκειν εἰς Φάσιν. There is here a resumption of the course of argument, interrupted by the solemn warning at vv. 31, 32; and the words, which have the air of an adage, q. d. 'account the tree good which produces good fruit, or the reverse,' are by some Expositors applied to the Pharisees, by others to our Lord himself. The latter is preferable, as being more agreeable to the context. But there may be, as in many other cases, a two-fold reference, 1. to the Pharisees, who could not utter good words because their works were evil; 2. to our Lord, who could not be evil since his works were eminently good; q. d. 'If my works be essentially the works of the evil one, then am I corrupt and evil, but if not, your charge is calumny; and if your works be the works of Satan, then it is you who are corrupt, and your charge against me falls back on yourselves.' At v. 34, our Lord retorts on his adversaries the charge they had made against him, and after addressing them by the same title as supra iii. 7, and infra xxiii. 33, indicative of their malicious and calumnious dispositions (see South's Serm., vol. x. No. 9), he accommodates the foregoing similitude by personally applying it to them; where the interrogation has the force of strong negation; q. d. it was morally impossible that they, evil and corrupt as they were in heart, could utter good things; it could not reasonably be expected; their bitter and calumnious words argued the corruption of their hearts. This our Lord confirms by another adagial saying, like several found in the Class. writers; thus intimating, that it was from their corrupt hearts that the evil words of their lips were produced. Of course, in this and the passage from the Class. writers the adagial sentiments are only meant of what is usually, not generally or universally, found to occur. See Bucer and Calv., and comp. Eccles. ii. 15, Sept., διότι ἀφῆκον ἐκ περισσεύματος λαλεῖ, where τῆς καρδίας is to be supplied from the context. The metaphor here (with which comp. James iii. 11 and 12, where the Apostle had probably the present passage in mind), seems derived from a bubbling fountain whence the water issues copiously, περισσεύω. Simil. Jer. vi. 7, q. d. 'The heart is the fountain, the words are the stream.' On the other hand, at v. 35, in θησαυροῦ, the metaphor seems taken from the laying up in store of articles to be brought forth for future use. Thus in the case of the good man, the good thoughts of his heart are laid up to come forth on suitable occasions in good words for edification. Ἐκβάλλει here corresponds to the term used in St. Luke, προφέρει, probably by a Hellenistic idiom; for the Sept. expresses the Hebr. מציץ by either term. As to the examples adduced by Wets. and Kypke from the Class. writers, they are only in sensu deteriori, as we say 'to bolt forth calumny.' But in the Hellenistic use the term is applied to what is good, and I doubt not that St. Matth. used מציץ in his Hebr. Gospel. The good things treasured up in the heart of the good man (good through God's sustaining grace) are the good things of wisdom and knowledge (comp. Col. ii. 3), good dispositions, espec. the Word of God laid up there, the Law of God written there, divine truths dwelling and ruled there. And those good things the good man not only προφέρει, but ἐκβάλλει, casteth forth, even as Joseph out of his stores, or the good householder, ὅστις ἐκβάλλει ἐκ τοῦ θησαυροῦ αὐτοῦ, where Origen, with the Ital. and Vulg. (from ignorance of the diversity) catches up the gloss (for such it is) προφέρει found in one, and only one, Gr. MS. A similar opposition between ἐκβάλλει and the milder term is observable in Ps. cxlvi. 17, Sept., τοῦ δίδόντος χιόνα—βάλωντος κρύσταλλον, 'casteth forth, hurleth his hail' (not ice). Thus there is an intensity of sense imparted, as said of what is done zealously and heartily. I know of no other example, though something like it occurs infra xiii. 52; but in our own language the term to hurl is occasionally so used in the earlier writers, as Spenser, who has "he hurls out vows." As applied to the evil man, the term is espec. suitable; and there the Classical usage of the words quite coincides, namely, to bolt out, hurl forth, as in Hdol. vi. 69, ὡς ἀνολίγ τὸ ἔπος ἐκβάλαι τοῦτο. And so Milton, "hurling defiance toward the vault of heaven." At v. 36 our Lord's address closes with a solemn declaration such as is often to be noted elsewhere, but which is here introductory to warning, in which there is a tacit resumption of the foregoing reasoning; q. d. 'Accordingly, since words spring from the inner fountains of the heart, issue from its secret recesses, as from an inner storehouse, be careful what those shall be there, since words as well as actions will be amenable to judgment at the great day of account. The word καρδίας has been, on competent authority, cancelled by the principal Editors, as introduced either from the preceding verse, or from the parallel passage in Luke. The τὰ before ἀγαθὰ has also been cancelled by Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch., on strong external authority, confirmed by the principal Lamb. and Mus. MSS.; but, as internal evidence draws rather the other way, I am content to bracket it.

³⁶. By ἀργ. is meant, like Lat. otiosus and Engl. idle, 'morally useless,' as tending to no purpose of edification, vain, and by the force of the context, evil, answering to the πονηρὸν at v. 35. Comp. Xen. Mem. i. 2. 57, where to ἐργάτην ἀφίλιμον is opposed ἐργ. ἀργόν. Thus it is not the same as the μαρολογία in Eph. v. 4, nor necessarily equiv. to the πονηρὸν at v. 35, but may denote simply bootless, profitless, with, however, an implied notion of aimless; i. e. where there is no purpose of good, nor any absolute intention of evil. This, if it does not yield so strong a sense, is more suitable to the purpose of warning, as suggesting the inference, 'If so strict an account is to be given of idle, unprofitable, though not intentionally evil, talk,—what, then, of wicked and profane discourse!' Even the heathen philosophers were not unaware of the heavy responsibility for idle words. So Plato, p. 832, says, κούφω—λόγων (idle, vain), βωρυτάτη ζημία, penalty, punishment, as in Thucyd. ii. 24. iii. 44. So, too, Pythagoras ap. Stob. Serm. xxiv. gives the weighty injunction, αἰρετώτερον σοι ἴστω λίθον εἰκῇ (at random, aimlessly) βάλλειν, ἢ λόγων ἀργόν.

³⁸. θέλομεν—ἰδεῖν Meaning emphatic^o a sign from heaven, in some celestial phenomena, as opposed to a δύναμις, a miracle wrought on earth, such as those of Moses and Samuel. This was a demand often made (see infra xvi. 1. Mark viii. 11. Luke xi. 16), and probably founded on a literal interpretation of the prophecy of Daniel vii. 13, which describes the Son of man as 'coming in the clouds of heaven.' It was, indeed, almost a characteristic of the Jews to ask a sign, as appears from 1 Cor. i. 22, οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι σημεῖον αἰτοῦσι. But that the sign then now asked, was one from heaven, would of itself seem highly probable, and it is established by the parallel passage of Luke. They had witnessed several δυνάμεις, or ordinary miracles, on earth; but they now demand the appearance of some such celestial one, as had been given by Joshua and by Elijah, and such as should be the strongest test of Jesus being the Christ. Our Lord, however, well aware that the motive which prompted the request was an evil one, the persons who made it though, being—(as we find from the passage of St. Luke) not the same as those, who ascribed his miracles to demoniacal agency (probably Sadducees), yet, as Pharisees, of the same party in league to destroy Jesus), and well knowing that, after the miracles they had already witnessed, a sign from heaven would have equally failed to produce any permanent conviction, refused to grant the request; at the same time intimating by the exceptive clause εἰ μὴ τὸ σημεῖον Ἰωνᾶ, that such a sign, at least as that in the case of Jonah, would be given in his own case, namely, at his resurrection, as typified in the Scriptural narrative of Jonah. It is true that St. Luke, in the parallel passage, waves the typical allusion, and merely adverts to the moral application of the σημεῖον Ἰωνᾶ, the reason for which has been ably pointed out by Dr. Townson thus: "Our Lord had mentioned the sign of the prophet Jonah, 1st, as prefiguring his own death and resurrection on the third day; and 2dly, as a warning to the Jews, who stood condemned by the conversion of the Ninevites. Now the sign of Jonah seems more important in the first view; but to understand it requires a knowledge of his history, &c., in the Old T." Now that was more than could be expected from Gentile converts, for whom St. Luke chiefly wrote, and who might, as Bp. Jebb says, have been startled by the seeming discrepancy between the typical prophecy and its alleged fulfilment; St. Luke, therefore, mentions it only in the second view, which his context explains. In short, every real difficulty in the typical allusion has been fully removed, espec. by Dr. Lightfoot.

³⁹. μοιχαλὶς See my Lex. This is by some understood of adultery figuratively, i. e. idolatry. But of that there is no reason to think the Jews of Christ's age were guilty. Hence it should rather seem to denote the spiritual adultery of turning away from God by living without God in the world. For the marriage covenant, which the Jewish nation was typified as having entered into with God, might be broken by godlessness as well as by idolatry. The term was quite suitable, since they were miserably degenerated both from the faith and the obedience of their forefathers. That is attested by Josephus in terms, than which stronger can hardly be imagined. Now in so doing, they, as being the peculiar people of God, and alone in covenant with God, had become covenant-breakers in the highest degree, as compared with that of a wife unfaithful to her husband, inasmuch as in the Old Test. God is often represented as the husband of the Jewish people considered as his wife, and their departure from him, involving a sort of spiritual apostasy, is characterised as the sin of adultery. See Jer. iii. 8 and 9, 14. xxxi. 32, and Note supra ix. 15.

— σμ. οὐ δοθ. αὐ., εἰ μὴ τὸ σμ. Ἰωνᾶ] Meaning 'no greater sign than that of which a type was given in the person of the prophet Jonah,' i. e. the resurrection of Christ after lying three days in the grave: though even this astounding miracle was equally ineffectual to convince these infatuated persons.

40. ἐν τῇ κοιλίᾳ τοῦ κήτους] I have heretofore adopted the view of κήτ. taken by Bochart, and since his time, by almost every Commentator of note: but, on further consideration, I am inclined to think it untenable; since, if examined, it will be found only to exchange for one difficulty another equally serious. Bp. Jebb, Sac. Lit. p. 178, seq., has adduced what he considers 'invincible reasons' to prove that a man could not be received into the stomach of a Lamia, or shark, and preserved there without a series of miracles. Whereas, as respects the whale, a safe and practicable asylum would be afforded, though not in the belly, yet in another cavity of that creature, whose throat is immensely large, and provided with a bag, or intestine, so considerable in size, that whales often take into it two of their young when weak, and during a tempest. "In this vessel," continues he, "there are two vents, for inspiration and respiration;" and here, he thinks, the prophet was preserved—not, indeed, without miracle, but with that economy of miracle so often exemplified in Scripture. This view, avowedly borrowed from Abbé Grosier and Dr. Nash, he confirms from an eminent French naturalist, who (without adverting to the case of Jonah) testifies that at the bottom of the whale's gullet there is found a great intestine, very thick, very long, and so large, that a man might pass through quite entire. However, objections there are, such as are not easy to be removed, not only to Bochart's view, but to that of the Abbé as adduced by Bp. Jebb. As respects the former, I cannot find that it has been satisfactorily proved that the gullet of the shark (of whatever species of the shark genus) is sufficiently wide to receive a man. The authorities adduced in Parkhurst Lex. in v. κήτος rest almost wholly on hearsay, and do not come quite up to the point. As to the testimony (which has been urged in proof) of Lycophron, who represents Hercules as swallowed up by a κάρχαρος κύων, that is swal-lized by Æneas Gæzus (cited by Parkh. himself), who calls the fish that swallowed Hercules by the same name as the fish that swallowed Jonah is called in the Sept. and the present passage of St. Matt., namely, κήτος; and that the mythological story of Hercules' being swallowed up and escaping alive out of the fish (whatever it was) denoted by the term κήτος, arose from the sacred history, cannot be doubted. However the other objections to Bochart's view are too formidable to admit of its being safely adopted; and hence I should be disposed to adopt that of Bp. Jebb, were it not for the formidable difficulty I find in seeing how this immense air-tube, open at both ends, can properly (since it does not form a cul-de-sac) be denoted by the term κοιλία; and did I not (what is of more consequence) find no mention of this air-pipe in the whale's maw, even in those most instructive and able works of Beale and Scoresby. Moreover, while even Bp. Jebb freely admits that from the narrowness of the whale's gullet, a man could not pass into his stomach, I find a most competent witness, Mr. Beale in his able Natural History of the Spermaceti whale, testifying (without any reference to the case of Jonah) that "the throat of the Spermaceti whale is capacious enough to give passage to the body of a man, thus presenting a strong contrast to the contracted gullet of a Greenland whale." He further testifies that though the Spermaceti whale is chiefly found in the Southern ocean, it has been seen in almost all seas; and that whales have, however rarely, been seen in the Mediterranean sea, is admitted by Mr. Parkhurst to have been fully proved. And from the immense size of one of them (100 feet long) it must have been a Spermaceti whale, since no whale but that reaches 100 feet, and even that very rarely, seldom more (Mr. Beale testifies) than 84 feet, and that of Jonah is styled μεγάλων κήτων.

I will only add, that although the preservation of Jonah could not even then have been effected without the intervention of miraculous agency, yet must it alike have required the same agency, according to the hypothesis of Bp. Jebb; and that, perhaps, with not less of the economy of miracle which he so studiously inculcates, than in the other case. Whether I have been well or ill employed in taking no little trouble to investigate this obscure and puzzling matter, I know not; also whether I might not have better saved myself trouble, by thinking it, to use the words of Mr. Alf. (as said of 'the making good of the three days and nights during which Christ was in the heart of the earth') "unnecessary to deal with so frivolous a matter" (so Mr. Alf. must have regarded it, from his leaving the matter wholly untouched). But I cannot bring myself to regard any Scriptural matter as frivolous, the proper and reverent treatment of which may tend to remove a stumbling-block out of the way of weak (perchance misbelieving) brethren, or to strengthen the faith of serious, though inquiring, believers.

braism for in τῇ γῇ; but a similar expression occurs in our own and most other languages. On the Jewish mode of reckoning time, by which small parts of days were counted as whole days, and accordingly a space of time not two whole days might be computed as three days and nights, see Horne's Introd. iii. 180 sq. This custom, however, was not, as he imagines, exclusively Jewish; but may also be noticed among the Greeks. Thus Thucyd. vii. 75, τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ ἐπὶ τῆς ναυμαχίας, that being only what we should call the second day.

⁴¹. ἀναστήσονται—κατακρινοῦσιν αὐτήν] There is something refined, and perhaps Oriental, in the turn of this and the next verse, by which the Ninevites and the Queen of Sheba are supposed to bear testimony against the Jews, as to the transactions here mentioned; and, by that testimony, be the means of increasing the condemnation of the Jews by the contrast. So κατακρινεῖ is used also at Heb. xi. 7, and κριταὶ εἶναι supra v. 27.

—μετενόησαν, &c.] The Ninevites had repented at the preaching of Jonah, though he worked no miracles in proof of his Divine mission, and his conduct was in many respects such as to leave no favourable impression; whereas with Christ all was widely different.

⁴². πλεῖον Σολ. ὧδε.] Namely, a greater in all respects, and not least in that wherein Solomon was greatest; for though Solomon was the wisest of men, yet Christ was Wisdom itself, 'the eternal Word' (Prov. iii. 19), 'who is made unto us WISDOM.' (1 Cor. i. 30.)

⁴³—45. The difficulty of this passage is not in itself, but in its connexion, i. e. to determine whether it belongs to the verses immediately preceding, viz. v. 38—42, or to the whole narration, v. 22—42. If to the former, it is meant as a warning to those who had been demanding a sign. And then the most probable interpretation will be that of Kaufmann, cited by Kuin, and adopted by many recent Commentators; q. d. 'Though I were to give you a sign from heaven, yet the effect would be but momentary; the demon of obstinate infidelity and wickedness would surely return, and, seizing you with greater violence, would but increase your final condemnation.' This, however, is rather harsh, and liable to objections which we shall see. Hence it is better to suppose (with others, as Bengel and Mr. Greswell) that the reference is to the whole of the above portion. This, too, is confirmed by Luke bringing in the words of v. 24—26, immediately after the words which terminate v. 30. Moreover, the Article at ἀνθρώπου, which calls for the version, 'the man,' i. e. the kind of person above mentioned, a dæmoniæc, confirms this view. That the reference is not to those Pharisees who had been just asking a sign, but to the unbelieving, or half-believing, part of the Jewish nation in general, would appear from v. 45, τῇ γενεᾷ ταύτῃ, compared with γενεὰ πομπῆ at v. 39. However, there may be meant, as in so many other cases, a two-fold application, 1) to the nearer antecedent case, that of the unbelieving Jews, probably the Sadducees chiefly (so Matt. xvi. 1, προσελθόντες οἱ Φαρισαῖοι καὶ Σαδδουκαῖοι—ἐκπρώτησαν αὐτὸν σημεῖον ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἐπιδιδῶν αὐτοῖς). To them the words, as before explained, are very suitable. But to the Jews at large they are still more suitable, and for them they were probably principally meant; only the unclean spirit will thus rather represent the demon of spiritual idolatry, or world-worship before mentioned, which might indeed seem cast out by a temporary conviction of sin and a superficial reformation; nevertheless, the impression would be but skin-deep, and that soon swallowed up by Pharisaic hypocrisy; in which case they would relapse into their former evil habits as if repossessed, not by one, but by seven other spirits more wicked than the first—a most complete mode of expressing that the last end of this wicked generation should be far worse than the first. That this must be the true scope of the above somewhat obscure passage is plain from the concluding words (found alone in St. Matth.), οὕτως ἔσται τῇ γενεᾷ ταύτῃ, which are meant to fix the scope of the whole,—serving as an application of the foregoing parabolic representation,—to the moral and spiritual state of the Jewish nation. The Jews of former times had been, however, deeply sinning by idolatry and vice, yet partially reclaimed by Divine judgments. But in process of time they had gradually relapsed into all their former transgressions, except that of idolatry. And in our Saviour's time the mass of the nation were given up to ungodliness and vice, under the thin guise of hypocrisy. They had become, as our Lord says, John viii. 33, seq., the willing servants of sin and the Devil. At length, in their last state, so awfully set forth in this prophetic announcement, in the last days of their existence as a nation, they had become so utterly abandoned, that, as we learn from the truthful, but sad, records of their own historian (Josephus), the records of national guilt exhibit nothing at all comparable to the horrible enormities which ushered in the final calastrophe, serving,—not to "point a moral or adorn a tale," but to attest the exact fulfilment of the foregoing prophetic annunciation. An impressive warning is suggested, drawn from the well-known case of a dæmoniæc, who, after a half-recovery, succeeded by a relapse, becomes worse than ever. 2) At the same time, the illustration is capable of a general application suited to all times and persons of every age. With respect to the minor circumstances of the illustration, they are merely accessory, and accommodated to the notions of the Jews, as to the haunts and habits of dæmons (who, they supposed, chiefly abode in waterless deserts), and also as to those of demoniacs. Thus the words ζητοῦν ἀνάπαυσιν (in search of rest) καὶ οὐχ εὕρισκει are accommodated to the latter; since an irrepressible restlessness was a characteristic symptom in the case of the δαμονιζόμενοι, or persons possessed. Conf. καθημένον in Mark v. 15.

⁴⁵ ἑπτὰ] A definite for an indefinite number, to denote a sufficient number for the purpose. —Καὶ γίνεται τὰ ἔσχατα, &c. A proverbial expression. Comp. 2 Pet. ii. 20, 21. Heb. vi. 4. x. 26. The words οὕτως ἔσται—πονηρᾷ serve to show the scope of the illustration; the state of that man being a representation of that of the generation of the men in question, in whose minds and hearts the evil principles of infidelity and wickedness had taken such a hold, that, in spite of every means for their reformation, the evil would return, and the people grow worse and worse.

⁴⁶ From the parallel passages of Mark and Luke it appears that the earnest vehemence of our Lord's address to the unbelieving Jews was by his mother and relations thought to exceed all bounds of discretion, and likely to draw destruction upon him. They therefore sent to call him forth, and prevail on him to desist. This gave our Lord an opportunity of evincing his own single-hearted devotedness to the work his heavenly Father had given him to do, and the near and dear relation in which all his true disciples of every age would bear to him.

—οἱ ἀδελφοὶ αὐτοῦ] It is not agreed whether by this expression are meant brothers, or half-brothers, sons of Joseph by a former wife, or cousins. The ancient Commentators in general adopt the last-mentioned interpretation; which may, however, be accounted for from their desire to uphold the opinion of the perpetual virginity of Mary. But, on an impartial consideration of the question, it will, I think, sufficiently appear that the first-mentioned sense is that required by all the ordinary and most approved rules of philology, which forbid the abandonment of the proper and usual signification of a word without some cogent reason. A reason which certainly does not exist in the present instance; for there is not a particle of evidence that Joseph had a wife before Mary. And the force of Ecclesiastical tradition, that these were cousins of Jesus, is weakened by its want of uniformity, and is well-nigh negatived by what seems much like positive evidence in Scripture (see Matt. i. 25), that Mary had afterwards other children. Besides, the air of the passage further on, ch. xiii. 55, 56, would of itself be sufficient to decide the question; for no one who was ignorant of the debates that have been raised on this question, would ever doubt the meaning to be, the brothers of Jesus, and sons of Joseph and Mary.

XIII. 1. ¹ Ἐν δὲ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκείνῃ ἐξελθὼν ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἀπὸ τῆς οἰκίας, ἐκάθητο παρὰ τὴν θάλασσαν ² καὶ συνήχθησαν πρὸς αὐτὸν ὄχλοι πολλοί, ὥστε αὐτὸν εἰς τὸ πλοῖον ἐμβάντα καθῆσθαι· καὶ πᾶς ὁ ὄχλος ἐπὶ τὸν αἰγιαλὸν εἰστήκει. ³ Καὶ ἐλάλησεν αὐτοῖς πολλὰ ἐν παραβολαῖς, λέγων· Ἴδου ἐξῆλθεν ὁ σπεῖρων

MSS. But that is plainly a Critical alteration (derived from the parallel passages of Mark and Luke), and adopted to get rid of the tautology.

— τίς ἐστιν, &c.] Our Lord put this interrogatory in order to show them, in the most marked manner (δεικτικῶς), who those were that sustained the nearest relation towards him.

50. μου ἀδελφός, &c.] The Commentators notice the ellipse of ὡς, quasi, and compare a similar one of the Hebr. 3; also adducing examples of a similar idiom in the Greek and Latin. But, as Fritz has rightly remarked, no such ellipse must here be supposed, which would destroy the force of the address.

XIII. 1. ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκείνῃ] Meaning the very day on which the events recorded in the preceding Chapter took place. See Luke v. 17.

— ἀπὸ τῆς οἰκίας] Namely, that in which our Lord dwelt at Capernaum.

2. εἰς τὸ πλοῖον] The τὸ is cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., on the authority of a few MSS.; but wrongly, since internal evidence as well as external is quite in favour of it, as will appear from my note, supra viii. 23, and ix. 1, where I have shown that the Art. may denote either the vessel kept for Jesus, or one belonging to the Apostles; or, indeed, both. See Middleton.

— εἰστήκει] 'stabat, was standing.' So εἰστήκεισαν, supra xii. 46.

3. παραβολαῖς] The word παραβολή, in its general sense, denotes, 1. a juxta-position of one thing with another; 2. a comparison of the one with the other, in point of similarity or dissimilarity; 3. an illustration of any thing resulting from a comparison of it with another thing. In Rhetoric it is defined, 'that species of the genus ALLEGORY, which consists of a continued narration of real or fictitious events, applied, by way of simile, to the illustration of moral truth.' In Scripture, it may be defined generally as a similitude, derived from natural things, in order to instruct men in things spiritual. In the Old Test. it sometimes denotes merely a proverb or pithy apophthegm (Heb. מָשָׁל), and sometimes a weighty truth, couched under enigma or figure. While in the New Test. it generally denotes an apologue; namely, a narration applied, with more or less of enigma, by way of simile, to the illustration of moral or religious truths. In this use, the Parable consists of two parts: 1. the Protasis, conveying merely the LITERAL sense; 2. the Apodosis, presenting the thing signified by the similitude, the EXPLANATION, and containing the mystical sense couched therein. The second part may be dispensed with, and was often omitted by our Lord, from the causes adverted to infra, v. 13. For further information the reader is referred to the elaborate Tract of Unger de Paraboliis, and after him Meyer, who, having first shown what a Parable is not [namely, not a mere Fable, since the Fable deals only with the maxims of worldly prudence, while the Parable conveys spiritual truth: the Fable recedes from probability, and teaches through the medium of the fancy, while the Parable adheres to probability, and teaches through the understanding.

(2) not a Myth, since in myths the story is set before us as the truth, whereas the Parable is not represented as fact. (3) not a Proverb, though παραβολή is sometimes so used in Scripture,—being a sort of expanded Proverb. (4) not an Allegory, inasmuch as in the Allegory the imaginary persons and actions are put in the very places of the real ones, and stand instead of them], then proceeds to show what it is, namely, a serious narration, within the limits of probability, of a course of action pointing to and inculcating some moral or religious truth; and deriving its force from real analogies impressed by the Creator of all things on his creatures. See more in Unger and Meyer, Greswell, Trench, and Alf.; not omitting, however, Dr. Campb.

The Parables of Christ were of two sorts: 1. such as contained illustrations of moral doctrines, and the duties of man to man; 2. such as signified, though obscurely and sub involucri, the nature of the Gospel, and the future state of the Church. These could not be understood without the previous comprehension of certain matters which required to be cleared up by our Lord himself, or by the Holy Spirit, who was promised 'to guide the Apostles into all truth.' For the right explanation of the Parables (espec. when they are without the Apodosis), we must, 1. ascertain their general scope or design; which is to be collected from the context, and the occasion on which the parable was spoken; 2. we must first trace the literal or external sense, and then open out the mystical or internal; 3. we must give due attention to historical circumstances, and make ourselves acquainted with the nature and properties of the things whence the similitudes are taken, the peculiar genius of the composition itself, and the local and national circumstances of the hearers; 4. we must avoid a too minute scrupulosity, by pressing on single

words or phrases; nor must we aim at accommodating every part to the general spiritual intent of the parable; since few correspond throughout to the thing compared, many circumstances being introduced which serve only (like drapery in a picture) for ornament and effect. Such may suggest, but they rarely establish, some collateral truth. They more frequently serve only to illustrate the general meaning, and heighten the general effect. To the general scope, then, our attention must chiefly be directed, without entering into too close an examination into minute particulars; a procedure, indeed, which were inconsistent with the simplicity of purpose every where observable in the Parables of our Lord. Indeed, our Lord's own example, in the exposition of some of his own Parables, may teach us to dwell on their general scope, rather than on such minuter features as are but accessory, and subsidiary to the main purpose. We should beware of heaping together, even in fixing the external sense, and discussing the historical circumstances, so cumbrous a load of matter, as, by an over-curious examination into minute particulars, may overlay the beautiful simplicity of the Parable, and rather obscure than illustrate its real import.

To advert to the reasons why parabolic instruction was resorted to by our Lord, in preference to a more regular mode:—1. As it was the most ancient mode of instruction, so it was the customary one throughout the East, and was well adapted to the character of the Eastern nations, where it is prevalent to this day. 2. It had many advantages, both to the hearers and to the speaker, especially, for obvious reasons, the former. Nor was it so very obscure to attentive and inquiring auditors. And as to such as would neither exercise attention and thought, nor seek elucidation from the speaker,—they must be presumed to be indisposed to receive this or any other instruction, and consequently unworthy of it. This mode had also the advantage, as far as it was really obscure (which was only in a comparatively small degree, and chiefly as the Parable was prophetic), of exercising, and consequently invigorating, the understanding.

Of course, the foregoing view of the purpose of parabolic instruction is inconsistent with the opinion strenuously contended for by some learned and able Interpreters (as Maldonati and Calvin), that the Parables were meant not to instruct, but to hide from all but Christ's constant hearers and faithful followers, those lessons of virtue and piety, which his words might to them, but could not to others, convey: in short, that his Parables were adapted to a state of judicial blindness; and consequently, that the real intent of this mode of teaching was punitive. But this is an opinion which, though it may seem countenanced by a few passages of the Gospels, is wholly untenable;

or, to use the words of Dr. Bland, at the close of his instructive note, 'is as unfounded as it is blasphemous.' 'Could (says Dr. Ad. Clarke) the God of truth and sincerity act thus?' In short the insecure foundation on which it rests has been fully evinced by Prof. Ogilvie in the 4th and 5th of his Bampton Lectures, where he uproots the very foundations of such a notion by proving at large, that 'the passages of Matt. ix. 25, 26, and xiii. 10—17 (and the parallels), Luke x. 21, and John xii. 37—40, appealed to by its maintainers, have no such sense as they affirm.' To these details it must suffice here to refer the reader; as also to the subsequent notes on those passages; espec. infra, v. 12. There is the more reason to caution students of the Divine word against this erroneous view, since, as long as the opinion is entertained, that these Parables were spoken for the sake of concealment, not instruction (namely, to punish obstinacy and hardness of heart by withholding information), occasion will be given to run into the other error, against which I have already protested—that of the frivolous minuteness of search after hidden meanings, which ill accord with the beautiful simplicity of parabolical instruction.

To proceed to the first of the subsequent series of Parables, that of the SOWER and THE SEED: it is not a mere apologue, or moral example, but contains an allegory, and relates to the preaching of the word; and consequently its moral is to be found in the success or results of that preaching. See Grew. It is an allegory, which describes beforehand the success of the first preaching of the Gospel, both to Jews and Gentiles; a concealed prophecy, and relating entirely to the first formation, but not to the final constitution of the Christian Church.

— ὁ σπείρων] The Art. here gives the participle the nature of a substantive, i. e. σπωρεὺς, which was unknown to the LXX. This is not a Hebraism, but is frequent in the Greek Classical writers. See Bp. Middl. and Mr. Grew.

4. παρὰ τὴν ὁδὸν] Meaning, 'by the side of,' or upon the hard path through the field, untouched by the plough, so that the seed could not come up.

5. τὰ πετρώδη] Supply χωρία (which is expressed in Thucyd. iv. 9) "rocky ground," τὴν πέτραν, as Luke expresses it. In this Palestine very much abounded. So Laborde, in his Travels, p. 233, says, that 'so great is the natural fertility of the soil, that even the very rocks, wherever water is plentiful, will produce vegetation.'

6. ἐκαυματίσθη] In Palestine, during the seed time, in November, the sky is generally overcast with clouds. The seed then springs up even in stony places; but when the sun dissipates the clouds, having outgrown its strength, it is quickly dried away.

7. ἐπὶ τὰς ἀκάνθας] 'upon thorny ground.'

καὶ ἀπέκνιξαν αὐτά. ⁸ Ἀλλὰ δὲ ἔπεσεν ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν τὴν καλὴν καὶ ἐδίδου καρπὸν, ὃ μὲν ἑκατὸν, ὃ δὲ ἑξήκοντα, ὃ δὲ τριάκοντα.

⁹ Ὁ ἔχων ὅτα ἀκούειν, ἀκούετω ! ¹⁰ Καὶ προσελθόντες οἱ μαθηταὶ εἶπον αὐτῷ· Διὰ τί ἐν παραβολαῖς λαλεῖς αὐτοῖς ; ¹¹ Ὁ δὲ ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν αὐτοῖς, ὅτι ὑμῖν δέδοται γινῶναι τὰ μυστήρια τῆς βασιλείας τῶν οὐρανῶν, ἐκείνοις δὲ οὐ δέδοται. ¹² Ὅστις

By thorns, however, we may understand, not what we call thorns, but various thorny and prickly plants (like our brambles and briers) which spring up with the seed, and at length outstrip it in growth, and choke it up.

8. ἑκατόν] An immense, but by no means unexampled, produce. So Strabo and Pliny testify that the soil in Babylonia never produced less than 200 fold, and sometimes even 500 : the grain, too, being of an astonishing size. See Warnekros' Dissertation on the fertility of Palestine, or Greswell, on Parab. vol. i. 19, sq., who present statements from ancient writers and modern travellers, which fully justify the accounts of Scripture and of Josephus.

10—17. In these verses our Lord, in answer (as we learn from the parallel passage of Mark) to the private inquiry of his disciples, tells them why he employed this mode of instruction, and also the meaning of the parable.

11. δίδεται] 'it is granted' [by Divine grace]; not obligit, as Weta. renders; which is an unjustifiable curtailment of the sense. By τοῖς ἔξω, in Mark, are meant 'those who are removed from intimate connexion with me, and acceptance of my religion.' This name the Jews used to give to the Heathens, as being removed from covenant with God.

— μυστήρια] Μυστήριον (from μύειν, 'to shut up') properly denotes 'something hidden,' withheld, and therefore unknown, either wholly or partly; also something of itself not obvious. So all mystery has been said to be imperfect knowledge. Accordingly, it was applied by the Philosophers to designate the Heathen ἀπόρρητα, 'the mysteries.' In the Scriptures it designates what is naturally hidden to human reason, and only to be known by the revelation of God. Here, however, and often elsewhere in the N. T., espec. in the Gospels, it denotes something disclosed only to certain persons, and not revealed to the multitude; namely, in the present case, the things concerning the plan of salvation, which had not yet been revealed, and were only partially disclosed in our Lord's explanations of his parables. Of course, the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles, are included in these mysteries; and those were gradually disclosed to the disciples, 'as they could bear them,' first by our Lord, and then by the Holy Spirit, which was sent to guide them into all truth. These were matters not in themselves obscure, nor withheld from any desire to conceal necessary truth; but only because the things in question were, for various reasons, not proper to be then communicated to all; but reserved, in their complete explication, for the οἱ ἰσχυριστικοὶ of the disciples. See Greswell in loc.

12. On the adagial saying here (often used by our Lord) there is nothing to object to in the general interpretation of Commentators ancient and modern, by which it is understood to signify, in other words: 'Whoever hath a certain measure of religious knowledge, and takes care to improve it, to him a more abundant measure shall be imparted; but whoever hath not such knowledge, i. e. 'hath it not profitably, by a use of it aright, shall be deprived of it, shall lose it, even that which he seemed to have secured.' It is true that in what is here said, Mr. Alf. thinks there is summed up the double force—the revealing and the concealing properties—of the parable. "By it, he who hath, who not only hears with the ear, but understands with the heart, has more given to him:" and it was, continues he, mainly for this purpose that the Lord spake parables, to be [for the time to come] to his Church revelations of the truth and the mysteries of his kingdom; though for the [present] purpose of hiding their meaning from the hard-hearted [rather dull or gross-hearted. Comp. v. 15, ἰσχυρόν ἢ καρδίαν—καὶ βαρύνει ἡκούσαν] and sensual." But to this view (however helped out by the words I have placed in brackets), which is a modified form of that to which I have already taken such well-founded exception, there are objections sufficiently strong to forbid its adoption. It requires an unwarrantable straining of some passages of Scripture, and as exceptionable an explaining away of the evident import of others. As an instance of the former, suffice it to refer to Maldonati's exposition, at Mark iv. 33, καθὼς ἡδύνατο ἀκούειν, prout digni erant; and of the latter, to Calvin's note on the same text, where, after first almost flatly contradicting the Evangelist, he ends with unexpectedly stumbling on the true import of the words, though he goes far to destroy it by intermixing his own strange view,—that our Lord spoke in parables in order to render his hearers attentive for benefit at another and more convenient season; at the same time remarking that the discrepancy between Matthew and Mark is easy of removal. "Quamvis enim doctrinæ lucem subduxerit reprobia, hoc tamen non obstat quin se accommodaverit ad eorum captum, ut ipsos redderet inexcusabiles!" But this perversion may fairly be ascribed to the Theological system of Calvin. I find no vestige of, nor any countenance to, the extreme view adopted by Maldonati and Calvin in any of the ancient Fathers Greek or Latin; and I cannot but regard it as one of the mere modern novelties, to which may be applied, mutatis mutandis, the language of Hooker, employed on innovations of another kind. "They are not idle reproofs, when the authors of needless innovations are opposed with such negatives as that of Leo, 'How are these new devices brought in, which our fathers never knew?'" I am not, however, prepared to say that our Lord did not in some of his addresses to the Jews (espec. those recorded by St. John), also in prophetic declarations addressed to them, as John ii. 19; supra, xiii. 40, and also perhaps occasionally in a parable, use language which might serve to conceal from one part of his hearers truths which should be perfectly comprehensible and profitable to others. Thus Christ was enabled to deliver evangelical truths to his disciples, which he well knew the Jews would not, at that time, comprehend; though even then the seed thus sown by the way-side in the heart of the non-understanding hearer, might by Divine grace be secured from being caught away by the Evil One, so as to bear fruit and bring forth some measure of produce.

13. διὰ τοῦτο—λαλῶ· ὅτι] Our Lord here condescends to explain his reason for teaching in parables. The Jews (as we have before seen) were addressed in parables, because their hardened wickedness and blind obstinacy had unfitted them to receive instruction of a more explicit kind. Whereas the parabolic mode of instruction was well suited to rouse them from their torpor—to open the avenues of access to their understanding, and hearts. What our Lord means to say is, that the hearts of these persons were so hardened by a long course of wilful and presumptuous sin, that, according to the regular operation of moral causes and effects, they, though seeing, in fact did not see; and though hearing, yet, in fact, did not hear, nor hearken, and consequently could not understand. The expression is a proverbial one, common to both the Scriptural and the Classical writers, and used of those who might see, if they would use their reason, what they now, through inattention and neglect, discern not. So Æschyl. Prom. 456, οἱ πρῶτα μὲν βλέποντες ἴδμετον μᾶτην, κλονέοντες οὐκ ἤκουον. See Grieswell on Parab. vol. i. 58.

—ὅτι βλέποντες, οὐ βλέπουσι, &c.] In the parallel passages of Mark and Luke this is expressed somewhat differently, thus: ἵνα βλέποντες βλέπωσι, καὶ μὴ ἴδωσι, &c. But there is no material difference in the sentiment. In the passage of Matthew we have the fact simply stated; in those of Mark and Luke, the purpose, result.

14. καὶ ἀναπληροῦται] The full sense of this briefly worded form of expression is—'is, as it were, again fulfilled,' meaning 'is being refulfilled,' is more completely fulfilled, in the similar blind obstinacy of the same people.

So that there is not here a secondary use of the formula, by a similar example, but there is a second and more complete fulfilment, as compared to the partial one in the time of the Prophet. This view is substantially confirmed by the suffrage of Hoffm., who has ably shown by an elaborate comparison of the citation here and in Mark iv. 12. Luke viii. 10. John xii. 39, and Acts xxviii. 25, 27, with the words of the Hebr. and Sept. of Is. vi. 10, that there is no real discrepancy, but only that freedom of representing the Prophet's meaning which the inspired writers of the New Test. were justified in using. He has fully evinced that the three Hebr. verbs רָאוּ וַיִּבֶן וַיִּשְׁמַע were correctly rendered by the Evangelists.

15. ἐκάμμυσαν] Καμμύειν is a later Gr. form for καταμύειν, and means, to close the eyelids; literally, 'to draw down the eyelids, in order to avoid seeing a thing.' Of course, the eye of the understanding is here meant. So Philo, p. 589, cited by Loesn. καμμ. τὸ τῆς ψυχῆς ὄμμα. The figurative shutting of the ears (adverted to in the corresponding words of the following clause) is here implied. That would require the term ἴβυσαν. So, in a very ancient life of St. Luke, we have Πρὸς δὲ τὴν ἀληθινὴν διδασκαλίαν τὰ τῆς καρδίας ἴβον ὦτα, καὶ τὰ τῆς διανοίας ὄμματα. Μήποτε is for ἵνα μὴ, ad eo non, in the eventual sense, as in John xii. 40. Thus the general sense of the passage of Isaiah now adduced is, that the Jews would hear indeed the doctrines of the Gospel, but not understand them; would see the miracles wrought in confirmation of its truth, but not be convinced thereby. Not that the evidences themselves were insufficient to establish its truth, but that their hearts were too corrupt to allow their understandings to see the force of those evidences. And the condition of the Jews did correspond, with a sad exactness, to the description of the prophet. It is implied in the following words, that this blindness would continue till the destruction of the Jewish state.—Συνῶσι. This is found in very many MSS., (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. ones.) and is edited (for the common reading συνῶσι) by almost all Editors.

16. ὑμῶν δὲ μακάριοι οἱ ὀφθαλμοί] A mode of expression common to the poetic or the pathetic and animated style, in every language. See Luke xi. 27. x. 23.

24 Ἄλλην παραβολὴν παρέθηκεν αὐτοῖς, λέγων· Ὡμοιωθή

17. πολλοὶ προφῆται—ἤκουσαν] Meaning, that 'they regarded the period when the Redeemer would appear as one which should dispense universal happiness; and they would have rejoiced to see the miracles and hear the doctrine of Christ; but that privilege was denied them, because it was not yet the proper time.'

19. καὶ μὴ συνιέντος] This cannot mean, as it is usually rendered, 'and understandeth it not;' for, as Maldon. and Elsn. observe, the simply not understanding it could not be supposed to involve blame. And we find that our Lord's disciples, in point of fact, did not understand these very parables which He was now delivering. Accordingly, most of the best commentators are agreed, that what is here meant to be denoted is—what does indeed involve blame—the not attending to what is preached, so as to understand it. And of the term as used in this sense, to give attention to, not a few examples have been adduced both from the Sept. and the Class. writers, but not those of the New Test. And, considering that the right reception of divine truth is a matter rather of the heart, will, and affections, than of the mind and understanding, the word seems best explained by Maldon. and Gresw., 'non concipit,' does not embrace, admit, cherish it, lay it to heart; the term being employed with allusion to the case of the natural seed, which, if not embraced and cherished by a kindly soil, must be liable to be caught up by the wind and blown away; and so the engrafted Word, in this case, finds no congeniality on which to work, and hence produces no final effect.

21. οὐκ ἔχει ῥίζαν] It is properly the word that hath no root in itself. (Comp. Col. ii. 7. Eph. iii. 17.) But it is here necessarily transferred to the person; inasmuch as, 'but he does not suffer it to take deep root in his mind,' requires a person. What properly applies to the word (which, strictly speaking, is that of not having any root) being here transferred to the person, the meaning seems to be, 'does not suffer it to take deep root in his mind.' So Plut. de Profect. Virt. 10, δεικνύσι τὸν λόγον ἰντὸς ῥιζοῦμενον ἐν ἑαυτῷ.

—πρόσκαιρός ἐστι] i.e. 'is only a temporary hearer;' his impressions are but transient, varying as circumstances vary, and altogether changing when they change; and thus eventually becomes (as is suggested in the parallel passage of St. Luke) no longer a believer at all.

22. ἡ μέριμνα] 'anxious care' (from μεμερισμένος). So called because μερίζει τὸν νοῦν, it distracts the mind with worldly cares, and so dissipates the attention, as not to leave us 'leisure to be wise' unto salvation, or to attend to the concerns of the soul.

—ἄκαρπος γίνεται] Meaning, as appears from the term τελειοφορ. in the passage of Luke, not that it bears absolutely no fruit, but that it bears none such as comes to maturity and ripeness, but only what drops off prematurely and withers away.

23. ὁ ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν τὴν καλὴν σπαρεῖς] Meaning, as it is expressed in the passage of St. Luke, the persons who ἐν καρδίᾳ καλῇ καὶ ἀγαθῇ ἀκούσαντες τὸν λόγον κατέχουσιν, keep hold of it. It is, however, not to be understood that they are naturally thus honest and good-hearted, and well disposed to receive and retain the seed of the Word, for 'the natural man receiveth not the things of God.' They are made such by divine grace operating on the heart; not, however, such irresistible grace as belongs to any absolute decree of the sovereign Will, but that 'grace given to every man to profit withal.'

24—30. The parable now subjoined by our Lord was meant to represent the different effect of the Gospel when already preached; wherein the field is the world, and the good seed the word of God preached by Christ and his Apostles. (Gresw.) The purpose of the parable was to draw attention to a future public and final declaration of the distinction between the righteous and the wicked; and to found, on the certainty

ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν ἀνθρώπῳ * σπείραντι καλὸν σπέρμα ἐν τῷ ἀγρῷ αὐτοῦ· ²⁵ ἐν δὲ τῷ καθεύδειν τοὺς ἀνθρώπους, ἦλθεν αὐτοῦ ὁ ἐχθρὸς καὶ ἔσπειρε ζιζάνια ἀνὰ μέσον τοῦ σίτου, καὶ ἀπῆλθεν. ²⁶ Ὅτε δὲ ἐβλάστησεν ὁ χόρτος, καὶ καρπὸν ἐποίησε, τότε ἐφάνη καὶ τὰ ζιζάνια. ²⁷ Προσελθόντες δὲ οἱ δούλοι τοῦ οἰκοδεσπότου, εἶπον αὐτῷ· Κύριε, οὐχὶ καλὸν σπέρμα ἔσπειρας ἐν τῷ σῷ ἀγρῷ; πόθεν οὖν ἔχει [τὰ] ζιζάνια; ²⁸ Ὁ δὲ ἔφη αὐτοῖς· Ἐχθρὸς ἄνθρωπος τοῦτο ἐποίησεν. of such declaration, a solemn warning of the necessity of righteousness and the danger of sin. The machinery of the parable is so contrived, as to afford occasion and employ means for the display of some momentous truths, to which our Saviour saw fit to refer, because they were calculated to prove auxiliary to his chief design. The End of the world,—the judicial office He should then assume, and execute,—the Ministry of Angelic beings under his orders,—the opposite Conditions of misery and of glory, to which, after the day of judgment, men shall be consigned,—these momentous facts and events of the Divine dispensations are incidentally disclosed and aptly illustrated. (Ogilvie, Bampton Lect.)

—παρίθηκεν] Render, 'laid before them;' Vulg. proposuit. Exod. xix. 7, παρέθηκεν αὐτοῖς. A metaphor taken from setting food out; as often in the Scriptural and Classical writers.

—ὡμοιώθη] The term here and at xviii. 23, and xxii. 2, is not well rendered 'may be likened, or is likened to.' For I agree with Mr. Green that this is [as also John xv. 6] an aorist present, because (as he remarks) the Parables to which it is in N. T. prefixed, "describe a system of treatment adopted in the Divine counsels."

—σπείραντι] So Lachm. and Tisch. read, from many good MSS., with which nearly all the best Lamb. and Mus. MSS. unite, σπείραντι; and with reason, this being absolutely necessary to the sense, considering that the comparison is, not to a man who sows or may sow, but to one who had sown good seed, i. e. well winnowed, free from all intermixture of weed-seed.

25. τοῖς ἀνθρώποις] It is best to take ἀνθρ. in a general sense; and to suppose, with Grot., that ἐν τῷ καθεύδειν τοὺς ἀνθρώπους is meant for a designation of night.

—αὐτοῦ ὁ ἐχθρὸς] An idiomatic form of expression, designating some particular person as especially such. See 1 Kings xxi. 20.

—ἔσπειρε] Lachm. and Tisch. edit ἐπισπείρει from a few MSS.; to which I add 2 Mus. ancient copies, and the Vulg. and Italic Versions. But this, though it has something to recommend it, as being well suited to the context, is, I suspect, to be traced to the same fertile source of vv. lectt. of this kind, the Alexandrian Critics, who probably had in mind a passage of Pind. Nem. viii. 39, μομφὰν ἐπισπείρων ἀλιτροῖς. Indeed, the word is found also (and as used in the physical sense) three or four times in Theophrast. Hist. Plant., though it is of such rare occurrence (being without examples in Steph. Thes.), that it is little likely to have been known to St. Matthew. That it was a mere correction of Critics may be argued even from this, that the Philologist Dindorf, on H. Steph. Thes. v. ἐπισπείρω, says that St. Matthew ought to have written ἐπισπ.

—ζιζάνια] Some difference of opinion exists as to what plant is here intended. It is with most probability supposed to be the darnel, or lolium temulentum of Linnæus, which grows among corn, and has, in the ear, much resemblance to wheat; but is useless, nay noxious, and therefore deserving of the epithet infelix given by Virg. Ecl. v. 37.

27. οἰκοδεσπότην] This word has the conjoint notions of householder and husbandman, meaning such a householder as cultivated a farm, whether as proprietor, or occupier.

—τὰ ζιζάνια] The Article is omitted in many MSS. and some Versions and Fathers; and is cancelled by almost all the Editors from Wets. to Tisch.

28. For εἶπον, Lachm. and Tisch. edit λέγουσιν, on strong ancient authority, confirmed by internal evidence—perhaps rightly (comp. v. 51, and see note on Mark vi. 31, and infra v. 51)—while Mr. Alf. omits even to mention the var. lect. Lachm. edits αὐτῶν λέγ., from slender authority, though internal evidence is in favour of the ordinary position. The same may be said of Tischendorf's text in his 1st edition, λέγουσιν αὐτῶν οἱ δούλοι. In his 2nd edition he reads οἱ αὐτῶν λέγουσι, but only on the authority of B and one cursive MS.—evidence thus quite insufficient, espec. considering that δούλοι is supported by all the ancient Versions. The true reading probably, but not certainly, is οἱ δὲ δούλοι λέγουσιν αὐτῶν.

30. τῷ κ.] Grieb. Scholz, Lach., and Tisch., cancel τῷ, on the authority of many MSS. (to which I add almost all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), which is confirmed by internal evidence; so that it is probably not genuine. Bp. Middleton's defence of it would be valid, were Matthew's phraseology, what it is not—Classical Greek.

34 Ταῦτα πάντα ἐλάλησεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἐν παραβολαῖς τοῖς ὄχλοις· καὶ χωρὶς παραβολῆς οὐκ ἐλάλει αὐτοῖς. 35 ὁπως

— συλλέξατε πρῶτον] This would be impracticable according to our mode of reaping; but not according to one or other of the two modes frequent in ancient times, and, as we learn from modern travellers, yet in use in the East; namely, either by cutting off the ears separately close to the stalk (leaving the straw on the ground), or by plucking up the whole, ear and stalk, by the root; whereby every ear would pass singly through the reaper's hands to be dealt with as he thought fit; but as the expression is not simply συλλέξατε, but συλλ. εἰς δέσμας (which would not be practicable with the ears alone) we must suppose the latter mode here adopted. On the moral of this parable see Greswell, and on the imagery, comp. supra iii. 12.

— δῆσ. εἰς δέσμας] The εἰς is absent from MSS. D, L, and 6 or 7 cursive ones, confirmed by Orig., Chrys., and Epiphani., and is cancelled by Tisch., though not by Lachm. I have placed it within brackets because internal evidence is against it, from its being more likely to have been inserted than removed. It is true that the elliptical construction is so rare, that I have not found elsewhere a single example. But the complete one is scarcely less so; and vain were it to adduce such passages as Hdol. v. 77, εἰς πίδαας δῆσαντες. The preposition is not in most of the copies of the Ital. Vers., and in 4 of the most ancient copies of the Vulg., to which I add the Lamb. copy of the seventh century. As respects the other Versions, Scholz and Tisch. might have added the Pesch. Syr., in which the preposition has no place, nor was it in the copy used by the Æthiop. Translator, though he renders freely by 'collect,' make up bundles of them. I doubt not that it was an ordinary Greek idiom, and as such not likely to be found in the Class. writers.

31. This, and the parable at v. 33, forms, in conjunction with that at Mark iv. 26, 29, three minor parables, or allegorical comparisons; the moral of which, as Mr. Greswell shows, respectively was, 1. 'the intrinsic vitality of the Christian religion, and the tutelary providence of God; which, after the first rise of the religion into being, would co-operate together to preserve it in being, until the end of its being should be accomplished. 2. The prodigious, sensible disparity between the grandeur, extent, and dominion of the visible Church at last, compared with the smallness and the narrowness of its limits and jurisdiction at first. 3. The diffusive, regenerating, and transforming energy of the Christian doctrines in the complex, as exerted on the wide-spread, inveterate corruptions both of religion and of morality throughout the Gentile world.' As regards the present parable two things are especially worthy of notice, as opposed to each other; the smallness of the seed which gives birth to the plant, and the greatness of the plant which grows out of the seed. The moral of this parable is (observes Mr. Greswell), 'the ultimate extension of the Christian religion, compared with the smallness of its beginnings, and in this view is one of the most remarkable prophecies in the Gospels.'

32. μικρότερον] This is not for μικρότατον. The principle has, moreover, been of late exploded. The phrase, 'as small as a mustard-seed,' was proverbial with the Jews to denote a very small thing.

— μέizon τῶν λαχάνων] 'vegetables;' as we say roots (from λαχάνω). Various writers of known credibility have proved the immense stature which plants raised from small seeds will often, under favourable circumstances, and climates, and in particular soils, acquire. Pliny has given an instance of the malva attaining in Mauritania the height of 20 feet, and a thickness beyond the power of man to span.

33. ζύμη] 'leaven,' which assimilates to its own nature the mass with which it is mixed.

34. χωρὶς παραβολῆς οὐκ ἐλάλει αὐτοῖς] This is regarded by some as not merely applying to the discourses delivered on that day, but as a common hyperbole, denoting that 'his parables were exceedingly numerous.' But the air of the context is such as should rather lead us to refer the phrase to the discourses of Christ at that time; q. d. 'his teaching that day was a continued series of parables.' Indeed, the other sense would not be borne out by facts; for there is no reason to think that our Lord's parables were so exceedingly numerous, but rather the contrary, since the parabolic mode of teaching was not his ordinary but extraordinary mode of teaching, and used only on special occasions, like the present.

— οὐκ ἔλαλει αὐτοῖς] For οὐκ Lachm. and Tisch. read, from 4 MSS., Clemens, and Origen, οὐδὲν. But the testimony of Fathers is in such a case as this very slender; and οὐκ has every appearance of being a mere correction proceeding from the ancient Critics, who thought it required by the ταῦτα πάντα just before. And doubtless a Classical writer would have used οὐδὲν. But the style of St. Matthew is any thing but classical.

35. ἀνοίξω—κόσμου] From Ps. lxxviii. 2, but not exactly agreeing either with the Hebrew or Greek; though ἐρύξομαι might then be in the text of the Sept., and φεύξομαι, the present reading, may be a gloss. The words are not quoted by the Evangelist as a prophecy, but are accommodated to the present purpose. So Hoffmann, vol. i. p. 112—116, after fully justifying the rendering by the Sept., and by St. Matthew, of the Hebr. original, sets forth the application, and acquiesces in the view which I have already adopted, according to which the Psalm is applied, by allusion and accommodation, to Christ and his method of teaching by parables; not, however, understanding by that the Socinian accommodation, but such as the Spirit of Christ, which was in the Prophets (see 1 Pet. i. 11), intended. Accordingly, in the present passage the Spirit of Christ, which was in Asaph, intended so to speak by this prophet, that the Evangelist, influenced by the same Spirit, might speak words fulfilled in Christ. And this view is confirmed by the remarkable analogy which subsists between the two passages, and also between the method of teaching employed by Asaph and that adopted by Christ, as also between the things which the one and the other respectively taught. The term ἐρύξομαι is properly used of the gushing forth of fluids, but figuratively of the pouring forth of free and earnest speech. Κεκρ. ἀπὸ καρ. κ. is a designation of the Gospel, with which comp. Eph. iii. 9, τὸ μυστήριον τὸ ἀποκεκρυμμένον ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων.

— καταβολῆς] The term is properly used of the founding of buildings, but applied occasionally by the Classical writers to the beginning of any thing; and was espec. applied to the world, because, according to the common notion of ancient times, it was supposed to be an immense plain surface, resting on foundations. Lachm. and Tisch. have cancelled κόσμου, on the authority of 3 MSS.; but unwarrantably, since it was more likely to have been omitted in those three than introduced into all the rest. It may have been omitted by being written in abbreviation, and thus passed unnoticed by the scribes; or it might be cancelled by Critics who thought it unnecessary; and, indeed, in later Greek writers καταβ. in the sense beginning occasionally occurs, but in no Classical writer does καταβολὴ κόσμου ever occur (and thus at that our Critics stumbled); though in Plut. de Ag. et Ign. § 2, we have the similar phrase ἅμα τῇ πρώτῃ καταβολῇ τῶν ἀνθρώπων.

36. ἀφείς τοὺς ὄχλους] Wakef., Campb., and Bp. Lonsdale render, not 'having dismissed,' but 'having left the multitude.' But, after careful inquiry, I cannot find the slightest support to it in any ancient authority, unless the Arab. Vers. may be thought such. And although the word is capable of this sense, yet, though found in Matt. xxii. 22, and Mark xiv. 50, it occurs nowhere else in the New Test. or the Sept., nor in the Class. writers; neither is there any sufficient reason to adopt it here, considering that the sense 'having dismissed' is one far more suitable, since it intimates that our Lord, consilio deliberato, sought retirement from the multitude, in order to have private converse with his disciples, and promote their furtherance in the knowledge of the Gospel, both by explaining to them (as he well knew he would be called on to do) one parable, and by laying before them several other important ones, which should communicate the further instruction they required. The multitude at large he had dismissed, and not given admission to this private instruction, probably because they were unfitted to profit by it. Th. Aquinas seems to have had a glimpse of the true scope of these seemingly unimportant words ἀφείς—οἰκίαν, as I have explained them, since he remarks that 'therein is given to us an example, that if we wish to investigate the secret things of the Lord, we ought to enter into a secret and private place;' and he aptly adduces Wisd. viii. 16, εἰσαλθὼν εἰς τὴν οἰκίαν μου προσαναπαύσομαι αὐτῇ (i. e. Divine Wisdom), 'will repose myself upon her,' 'rest on her.' So Nicostr. ap. Stob. Flor. lxx. 12, τῇ γυναικὶ ἀνὴρ—προσαναπαύεται. Comp. Jos. Ant. xx. 2. 1, καθιϋδὼν—τῆς γυναικὸς προσαναπαύ.

38. τὸ δὲ καλὸν σπέρμα, οὗτοί εἰσιν, &c.] Οὗτοί is accommodated in construction to υἱοί, though referring to σπέρμα, which is considered as a noun of multitude. By τοῦ Πονηροῦ we are to understand the Evil One, Satan; so called as being the original author and continual perpetrator of evil.

βολος· ὁ δὲ θερισμὸς συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνός ἐστιν οἱ δὲ θεριστὰι ἄγγελοι εἰσιν. ⁴⁰ Ὡςπερ οὖν συλλέγεται τὰ ζιζάνια καὶ πυρὶ [κατα]καίεται· οὕτως ἔσται ἐν τῇ συντελείᾳ τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου. ⁴¹ Ἀποστελεῖ ὁ Τίς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου τοὺς ἄγγελους αὐτοῦ· καὶ συλλέξουσιν ἐκ τῆς βασιλείας αὐτοῦ πάντα τὰ

ο βαπτ. 8. 12. σκάνδαλα, καὶ τοὺς ποιῶντας τὴν ἀνομίαν ⁴² καὶ βαλοῦσιν

39. συντέλεια τ. α. ἰ.] συντέλ. signifies properly 'a bringing together,' and figur. a consummation, or completion. When joined with nouns of time, it means the completion of the period denoted thereby, whether definite (as συντέλεια τοῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ in 2 Chron. xxiv. 25), or indefinite, as συντέλεια καιροῦ or καιρῶν, or ἡμερῶν, several times in the Sept. and Apocrypha. Συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος does not, indeed, there occur; but it was doubtless used by the Jewish Hellenists, to denote the Hebr. עֵתָא קָדְשָׁא, meaning the consummation of the period appointed for the continuance of the Jewish state, at the close of which the Messiah should appear. Thus it came to denote the end of the world, or present state of things. So in 4 Eadr. vii. 43. 'Dies iudicii erit finis temporis huius, et initium temporis future immortalitatis, quo transivit [I conj. transierit] corruptela.' In the New Test. the phrase always bears this sense; in the use of which the period denoted by αἰὼν is the duration appointed by Divine Providence to the present state of probation, and of the visible Church; pointing to the final consummation of all things, as regards this world.

To advert to the use and force of the Article, Lachm. and Tisch. cancel the τοῦ, on the authority of 5 MSS.; I add Mus. copia. But this is insufficient to warrant the word's being cancelled, espec. since internal evidence is against the change, which has every appearance of being a mere alteration proceeding from Critics who thought that, as there was no article before συντ., there ought to be none before αἰὼν. But from the great notoriety involved in the phrase συντ. τοῦ αἰὼν, the article before συντ. may be dispensed with, whereas αἰὼν. in the sense world cannot. Thus at v. 40 and 49 it is found in, I believe, all the copies; and so at xxiv. 3, though there τῆς before συντ. is absent from 6 MSS. and cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., though at xxviii. 20 in the same phrase it occurs in all the copies. It is true that at Heb. ix. 26, ἐπὶ συντελ. τῶν αἰώνων is found in all the copies. But St. Paul is not St. Matt. Mr. Green, Gr. p. 169, accounts for the omission of the article here before συντελ. on the score of there being a two-fold reference, 1) to the destruction of Jerusalem, and 2) to the end of the world, or the final advent of Christ. But the two events are so combined in ch. xxiv. of Matt. as almost to form one; and it seems best to account for the absence of the article on the principle which I have suggested; but on no principle can the omission of the article before αἰὼν. in the sense 'the world' be either accounted for or justified, except, indeed, in personification (such as that well-known one 'O World, thy slippery turns'). It is true that ἡ before συντελ. is here found in 8 MSS. (to which I add 1 Lamb. and 2 Mus. ones), authority, however, quite insufficient (notwithstanding that Bp. Middl. thought it probably the true reading) because it is forbidden by internal evidence. And the anarthrous use does not need the special dispensation kindly granted to it by the learned Prelate on the score of its being an abstract noun. To pass on to the next clause, I admit that Bp. Middleton's rendering of ἀγγελοι 'are angels,' is justified by the absence of the article. Yet, when I consider that (as Bp. M. grants) this task is at v. 49 and infra xxv. 31 assigned to the angels generally,—and what is more that, while in Matt. iv. 11, we have ἀγγελοι προσῆλθον αὐτῷ (namely Jesus), and at Mark i. 13, οἱ ἄγγελοι διηκόνουν αὐτῷ, though at 1 Tim. iii. 16, we have with the same reference ὡφθη ἀγγέλοις, we may see that no great stress must be laid on so minute a grammatical point as this, which involves no real discrepancy, since where the article is found, the sacred writer is not to be supposed to ascribe the action to the entire Angelic Order, but to individuals of that order.

40. [κατα]καίεται] So I have thought fit to edit, the reading being doubtful. Καίεται edited by Fritz., Scholz, and Tisch., is found in almost all the most ancient MSS., except B, D, to which I add all the Lamb. MSS. (except 1777), and all the most ancient Mus. MSS.; and this reading derives confirmation from John xv. 6. But internal evidence here draws two ways. The compound may have been put in instead of the simple verb, as often elsewhere; and yet there are not wanting passages where the compound has passed into the simple either by the prava industria of the critics or the negligence of the scribes; espec. when the preposition sometimes expressed by abbreviation was likely to be absorbed in the initial letter of the verb, and here κατα written by K might be absorbed in the καὶ following. The reading cannot be determined by the context, since one term was as suitable as the other; and if the sense be, what it would seem by the nature of the metaphor, 'admotioe comburentur,' then πυρὶ καίεται ('are burned by fire'), will be very suitable, though even then κατακ. might express the same thing. So Aristoph. Lysist. 1218, Μῶν ἐγὼ τῇ λαμπράδι ὑμᾶς κατακαύσω; And when we consider that at supra v. 30, we have συλλεξ. τὰ ζιζάνια—πρὸς τὰ κατακαύσαι, and a similar use at Matt. iii. 12, and Luke iii. 17. Rev. xvii. 16, and xviii. 8 (espec. that at v. 42, where of the impenitent wicked it is said βαλοῦσιν αὐτοὺς εἰς τὴν κέμινον τοῦ πυρός, which implies the being utterly burnt up), one can scarcely doubt that St. Matt. wrote κατακ., and we may suppose that the prepos. was lost in the way I suggest. But the reading is an open question.

41. σκάνδαλα] The word signifies a stumbling-block, either in a natural or in a figurative sense, denoting, in the latter case, whatever occasions

αὐτοὺς εἰς τὴν κάμινον τοῦ πυρός. ἐκεῖ ἔσται ὁ κλαυθμὸς καὶ ὁ βρυγμὸς τῶν ὀδόντων. ⁴³ Ὡς τότε οἱ δίκαιοι ἐκλάμψουσιν, ὡς ^{p Dan. 12. 8. ver. 9.} ὁ ἥλιος, ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ Πατρὸς αὐτῶν. Ὁ ἔχων ὅτα ἀκούειν, ἀκουέτω!

⁴⁷ Πάλιν ὁμοία ἐστὶν ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν σαγήνῃ βληθείσῃ εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν, καὶ ἐκ παντὸς γένους συναγαγούσῃ ⁴⁸ ἣν, ὅτε ἐπληρώθη, ἀναβιβάσαντες ἐπὶ τὸν αἰγιαλόν, [καὶ] καθίσαντες συνέλεξαν τὰ καλὰ εἰς ἀγγεῖα, τὰ δὲ σαπρὰ ἔξω any one to err in his principles or practice. Here, however, as it is joined with τοὺς ποιοῦντας τὴν δοξίαν, it must denote, not things, but persons, i. e. false teachers (such as are censured by Peter and Jude), who, under pretence of Christian liberty, inculcated doctrines repugnant to moral virtue, holding vice to be among the ἀδιάφορα, or 'things indifferent.'

⁴⁴ θησαυρῷ κεκρυμμένῳ] Meaning such valuables as, in the insecure state of society in ancient times (from war and political trouble) men were accustomed to bury in the earth. From the present passage, and one cited by Wets. from the Mishna, it appears that the Jewish law adjudged all treasure found on land to be the right of the then proprietor of the land.

—ἐν τῷ ἄγρῳ] Bp. Middl. would, from some MSS., cancel the Article before τῷ ἄγρῳ, where it has no perceptible force. But idioms like this, probably of common life, though difficult to be accounted for, are not therefore to be swept away. See Grcsw.

⁴⁵ ἀνθρώπῳ ἐμπόρῳ] 'A merchant-man.' Such as those found in the East, who travel about buying or exchanging jewels, pearls, or other valuables; a custom illustrated by the citations in Wets., which, with Mr. Greswell's matter, will illustrate the natural history, locality, use, and value of pearls in ancient times. They were costly beyond all other valuables.

sweeps, as it were, the bottom, and was therefore called verriculum. It was, however, not like an ordinary draw-net, being far larger, and intended to take not part of the fish of a pool or stream, but the whole, of every kind, size, and quality. It was formed of cane, osiers, and wattled work. Of this implement the antiquity is proved by allusions to it in Herodot. vi. 31, and Æschyl. Ag. 1353. See more in my Lex.

At ἐκ παντὸς γένους suppl. τινὰ ἰχθύδια, from the context.

⁴⁸ ἀναβιβάσαντες ἐπὶ τὸν αἰγιαλόν] 'having hauled it up on shore.' The term is used of hauling in ships to land. Xen. Hist. i. 1, 2; but no where else of fishing-nets. But since, as appears from John xxi. 8, πλοιαρίῳ ἦλθον—σύροντες τὸ δίκτυον τῶν ἰχθύων, that the net was dragged on shore in tow of the boat, the term appropriate of the boat might be used of the net. Καθίσαντες is passed over by Campb. as pleonastic. But if it adds little to the sense, it increases the spirit of this parabolic comparison, the circumstance of sitting down to sort the fish being graphic, as those in Luke xiv. 28, οὐχὶ πρῶτον καθίσας ψηφίζει, and 31, καθίσας βουλεύεται, by an allusion to the sitting down to a desk, or a council table. The καὶ before καθίσαντες, which embarrasses the sentence, is not found in some MSS.; and in others of great antiquity it is placed before αἰγιαλόν, which indeed removes the difficulty, but by a violation of the proprietas linguæ; since this idiom of the participle of καθίζω admits of no adjunct, being closely connected with the verb following. I would rather cancel than transpose the καὶ, which may have arisen from those Critics who stumbled at two participles to one verb, without any connective particle; and accordingly, as they have often done elsewhere, inserted one. But the participles are here quite distinct; and one is merely put for a verb followed by καὶ. So at v. 46, we have δε εὐρὼν—ἀπελθὼν πέπρακε.

—τὰ σαπρὰ] 'the refuse.' A vox sol. de hac re. See vii. 17, and Note. Ἐξω simply denotes away.

ἐβαλον. ⁴⁹ Οὕτως ἔσται ἐν τῇ συντελείᾳ τοῦ αἰῶνος. ἐξελεύαὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Συνήκατε ταῦτα πάντα; λέγουσιν αὐτῷ·

Ναί, Κύριε. ⁵² Ὁ δὲ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Διὰ τοῦτο πᾶς γραμματεὺς

51. λέγει αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰ.] These words are absent from MSS. B, D, with the Copt., Æthiop., and Vulg. Versions, some copies of the Italic, and Origen—very insufficient authority, esp. since most copies of the Ital. have the words, and some, I doubt not, of the Vulg.; at least, they have place in the very ancient Lamb. copy. Moreover, internal evidence is rather in their favour. I doubt not that they were cancelled for no better a reason, than to remove a seeming tautology between λέγει and λέγουσι. They may have been left out of the Vulg. for another, less obvious reason, suggested by Matth. But be that as it may, the text of B, D, was here, as in numerous other passages, corrupted from some copies of the Vulg. As to the Lamb. copy, which has them, it not unfrequently harmonizes with the Italic, contrary to the Vulg. So that, on the whole, there is not a shadow of reason to cancel the words, which were certainly in the Pesch. Syr. Vers., and, I doubt not, the original copy of the Ital. Vers.

52. διὰ τοῦτο πᾶς, &c.] The διὰ τοῦτο here is a formula, serving to draw an inference from what has been said, and best rendered, wherefore, equiv. to our colloquial well then, q. d. 'If such be the case, well then.' Thus the expression serves to intimate an admonition to use whatever knowledge they now have, or may hereafter attain. It is meant, in short, to be introductory to the weighty parabolical saying of our Lord that follows, of which the exact sense will partly depend on the reading (whether εἰς τὴν βασιλ., or εἰς τὴν βασιλ.), and still more on the force ascribed to the term μαθηταὶ. On re-considering the former point, I am now of opinion that the received text prob. arose from a fuller explanation of the more recondite one τῇ βασιλ.; also that εἰς τὴν β. originated in another explanation of τῇ βασιλ., the true force of which will depend on that supposed to be conveyed by μαθητ., which term has been variously, but inadequately, represented. Thus the sense discipled into the kingdom of heaven (i. e. converted to Christianity) does not draw forth the full sense, since the Jewish γραμματεὺς was not merely a private professor of Judaism, to which any one might be brought by baptism or circumcision, but a teacher of the law. Again, the sense assigned to the term by Fritz, and others, instructed for the kingdom, so as to understand its nature [and preach its doctrines], though it comes nearer to our Lord's meaning, yet is not of itself easily elicited from the term μαθητ., which properly signifies discipled, i. e. made a disciple of and to the spiritual master, just as the μαθηταὶ were of Jesus, and especially the Seventy μαθηταί, who were a sort of Scribes. But this sense discipled carries with it the adjunct; and the word may be explained, 'put on the list of disciples,' and, by implication, taught or instructed in suitable doctrine.

This explanation is permitted by the usage of the verb μαθητεύομαι, which, although it is supposed always to bear the sense 'to be made a disciple of,' yet it is employed in the sense to be instructed in a passage of St. Basil (cited in Steph. Thes. in v.) μαθητεύομαι εἰς τὸ Πρόσχημα σιαντῶ, and two other examples of the word followed also, as here, by Dat., are adduced by Dindorf. Accordingly, we may well admit this pregnancy of sense, by a twofold meaning, in the present instance, espec. considering that the corresponding Eng. verb to be discipled, has been used by writers of note in both those senses. What our Lord, then, means to say is, that every one thus discipled, and suitably school'd, or instructed, so as to become a Gospel γραμματεὺς, is, and will be, like a provident and well-provided householder; who, being furnished with all things necessary for family use,—stores of provisions both salted and fresh (and, in that sense, old and new), brings them forth as occasion requires. 'Εκβάλλει, is, however, not merely for προφέρει (read, indeed, in one ancient MS. and Origen, but by gloss), but has a stronger sense, nearly such as I have pointed out supra, xii. 35, denoting that the thing is done promptly, heartily, and freely. It is meant, then, that the Christian teacher, well instructed in the doctrines of the Gospel, and provided with all the knowledge necessary to make them fully understood, will readily furnish forth things, matters, both old and new. The question, however, is, what is meant by καινὰ καὶ παλαιά? The ancient Expositors are generally agreed that they mean, the Scriptures of the Old and the New Testament; or, what is better, the truths of the Old and the New Dispensation, of course, as contained in the Scriptures of the O. and N. T. I doubt not that this is the principal sense here contained. That this cannot be dispensed with, appears from 2 Tim. iii. 16, πᾶσα γραφὴ θεό-πνευστος—ὠφέλιμος πρὸς διδασκαλίαν—ἵνα ἄριστος ᾖ ὁ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἄνθρωπος, πρὸς πᾶν ἔργον ἀγαθόν ἐξηγισμένος (where see note). But there is nothing to forbid our assigning a more general scope to the words. The full sense may well be all the stores of knowledge of every kind, both new and old, and not merely all the sacred knowledge to be obtained from the wisdom of former ages, in the Philosophical and Ethical writings of the sages of antiquity; thus intimating that the Evangelical Teacher is to be provided with all the stores of Divine, and all human knowledge necessary to his great work, 'ut omnes' (to use the words of Maldon. and Calv.) pro suo quemque captu docere possit, ut omnia ad cuiusque captum prudenter apteque accommodet, omni exemplorum et similitudinum genere ('wise saurs and modern instances') instructus.' Need there is, both of old experiences and of new observations; and to old discoveries he must be ever adding new ones (ὥστε διὰ τῶν διδασκόντων, as was said by Socrates), old truths added by new methods, and ushered in by new observations and illustrations, such as may be called for by the varying circumstances of every age. So much as respects the matter of his teaching: as far as concerns the wording, it must be, as St. Paul says, Col. iv. 6, ἑλκυστὴς ἡρτυμῖνος, 'seasoned with the savour of wisdom,' and the flavour of terseness in expression and variety of style (so Grot. 'pietatis dogmata condire quodam traderet varietate'); lastly, as regards the manner, it must be πάντως ἐν χάριτι, 'courtous and gracious.' I need scarcely add, that the Evangelical Scribe must be spiritually as well as secularly learned, and well informed, taught of God by his Spirit, so as to know the mysteries of God committed to his charge to teach, and also have an experimental and heart-knowledge of the Word of Truth. All this will be necessary, ἵνα ἄρτιος ᾖ ὁ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἄνθρωπος πρὸς πᾶν ἔργον ἀγαθὸν ἐξηρτισμένος, ὁρθοτομῶν τὸν λόγον τῆς ἀληθείας.

— ἀνθρώπῳ οἰκοδεσπότη] See my Lex. in ἀνθρ. iv., where are cited other exx. from N. T. ἐνθ. does not occur with the appellative subst. in the Sept., and not often in the Class. writers; though the antiquity of the idiom appears from the γέννη ταμῆν of Hom. Il. Z. 390, and Od. H. 347, γέννη δέσποιναν. Diod. Sic. ii. 10, γυναῖκος παλλακῆς. So also in Sept. Levit. xxi. 7, we have γυναῖκα πόρνην.

⁵⁴ Πατρίδα] scil. πόλιν, i. e. Nazareth, the place where he had been brought up, and which was therefore, in a certain sense, his country; the expression being used often in the Sept., and Joseph., and sometimes in the Class. writers, of any one's native place, even of a city or town.

— αἱ δυνάμεις] The term δυν. is not well rendered 'mighty works'; for considering that it is associated with ἡ σοφία, by which is denoted

(as appears from Mark vi. 2, ἡ σοφία ἡ δοθεῖσα αὐτῷ) 'imparted wisdom,' it must denote the power of working them bestowed from on High (comp. Acts ii. 22, δυνάμεις καὶ τέρας, and viii. 13, δυνάμεις καὶ σημεῖα); for as in the parallel passage the sense of δοθεῖσα αὐτῷ must be implied in the latter clause from the former, so here imparted powers cannot but be meant.

⁵⁵ τοῦ τέκτονος] Τέκτων means an artisan, as opposed to a labourer; and, according to the term accompanying it, may denote any artificer whether in wood, stone, or metal. But when it stands alone, it always, like our old word wright, denotes a carpenter (as faber and carp) in the Scriptural, and, almost always, in the Classical writers. That such is the sense here intended cannot be doubted; espec. as it is supported by the concurrent testimony of ancient ecclesiastical writers.

⁵⁸ See Note on Mark vi. 5.

XIV. 1. ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ] As to the particular time here meant see Dr. Hales and Mr. Greswell. As our Lord had then been a considerable time engaged in the work of the ministry, it may seem strange that Herod had not heard beforehand of him; for which many reasons have been imagined. The truth seems to be, that he had heard of Jesus, but it was long before his name became known to him, and still longer before it engaged his serious attention.

² παισίν] Meaning the officers of his Court. — αὐτὸς ἡγέρθη ἀπὸ τῶν νεκρῶν] No real inconsistency is there between what is said here and in Luke ix. 7—9. The report had, as we find from the latter passage, originated in others. And if Herod was at first,—as he appears to have been,—perplexed what to think, the terrors of a guilty conscience acting on a weak mind might induce him to express himself in these words of St. Matthew; words which, however, need not be taken of firm belief and persuasion, but only of a sort of half and half opinion, by which a faint kind of assertion is hazarded, doubtfully, rather for the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of those addressed, than aught else; and with this view well accords the expression of St. Luke, διηπόρει, where see Note. It appears, then, that the despot thus spoke to his body-servants in attendance (so Sept. 1 Eadr. i. 30. 1 Kings xvi. 15, 17, and Diod. Sic. xvii. 36, παῖδες βασιλέως) in the listless mood of an effete voluptuary, 'So then this person, it seems, is John the Baptist: he is risen from the dead, and therefore,' &c.; in which latter words there is reference, not (as some suppose) to John's possessing any greater power by having passed through death, but merely to the opinion, natural enough, that if any one were raised from the dead, which could only be by Divine power,—it would be no wonder that he should perform works of Divine power through the spiritual energy imparted to him. The rendering of our authorized Version, 'therefore mighty works do show forth themselves,' is forbidden by the presence of the Article and the true force of ἐνεργήσουσιν. The renderings of Abp. Newc. and Dr. Campb. are almost equally objectionable, and are far from presenting the exact sense intended. The Article must not be deprived of its force; and the verb ἐνεργ. is, as Bp. Middl. has ably shown, to be taken in a transitive sense, and an absolute construction. But the question is what is the exact sense? That assigned by Bp. Middl., 'the Powers, or Spirits, are active in him,' has much to recommend it. That by αἱ δυνάμεις some kind of Agents must be meant, he thinks clear; and that spiritual Agents were so denominated, he has evinced from Euseb. Præp. Ev. vii. 15, and Demonstr. Evang. iv. 9, also that several others of the Fathers employ the word in the same sense he bears testimony. In the first passage Euseb. is speaking of a Jewish Trinity, and tells us that all the Hebrew Theologians, next to God who is over all, and Wisdom his First-born, ascribe Divinity to the third and Holy Spirit, τρίτ. καὶ ἅγ. Δύναμιν, whom they call the Holy Spirit, and by whom the inspired men of old were illumined. But the learned Prelate does not adduce any examples from the Fathers, nor has Mr. Jackson noted any. And that so profound a dogma of Jewish Theology should have been known to a person like Herod, can hardly be imagined. Little probable is it that one, thus speaking what the fears of a guilty conscience, rather than sober reason, suggested, should have had in view any such recondite acceptance. Though I grant that he may have been acquainted with the use of the word Δύναμις as applied to Spirit, viz. a Spiritual Power, whether good or evil; nor can that be overturned by the circumstance that he was perhaps a Sadducee, for of that there is no proof, though that he was practically even an infidel, living without God in the world, is pretty certain. That δύναμις is occasionally so used in the New Test. is only so far a valid proof, as showing the usus loquenti of that age and time. And that it was so applied in the ordinary language of religious conversation by the Jews who were not Sadducees, is scarcely to be doubted; and hence Herod might use it in common parlance. Thus we are not obliged to suppose, with Bp. Middl., so improbable a circumstance as that Herod's remorse or fears should shake his infidelity, so as involuntarily to renounce the two great principles of Sadduceism, the non-existence of angels, and spirits, and of the resurrection. By the use of the term in the plural, αἱ δυνάμεις, was, we may suppose, almost certainly meant the Angelic Powers—the ANGELS. That it is so used in the New Test. is certain from Eph. vi. 12, comp. with i. 21. Rom. viii. 28. Heb. vi. 5, δυνάμεις μέλλοντος αἰῶνος. 1 Pet. iii. 22, ὑποταγίντων αὐτῷ ἀγγέλων καὶ ἱερατικῶν καὶ δυνάμεων. So, too, Chrys. in his Homil. on the Epistle to the Hebrews explains leitourgiká πνεύματα at Heb. i. 14, by leitourgikás δυνάμεις, also Euseb. Præp. Ev. vii. p. 191, says ἀγγελικάς καὶ οὐρανίους δυνάμεις. Thus we see that Powers and Spirits were conjoined as synonymous terms; and on the whole the most faithful, though not the most literal, rendering may be, 'and the spiritual Powers are active in him, energize through and by him (as angelic spirits sent to minister unto the will of God) by the working of miracles.' Thus I find confirmed by Mr. Jackson, who remarks: "Putavit Herodes Spiritus celestes, quos vocat Virtutes (δυνάμεις) operari miracula per Joannem ð mortuis excitatum." This view is confirmed by Euthym., whose words are: ὑπολαβὼν (Herod) ἐκ νεκρῶν ἀναστήσας τοὺτον χάρισμα θεομάτων ἐκ Θεοῦ λαβόντα, &c. Of course, he meant 'received through the medium of the Spiritual Power energizing in him.'

It is a much disputed point, whether ἐνεργ. should be taken in its usual Active sense, or as put Passively for ἐνεργηθῆναι, 'are wrought,' ἐν αὐτῷ being for ἐν' αὐτῷ. The latter is adopted by most Expositors. But though Neuters be sometimes used for Passives, yet that is only when there is something in the regimen of the verb to intimate that. Being construed as Passives, they are considered as such. Now such is not the case here; ἐν αὐτῷ being adapted not to a passive, but an active or neuter verb. Not to mention that this would be contrary to the usage of the N. T., in which wherever a passive sense is required, a passive form is adopted. Moreover, ἐνεργ. is often used with ἐν, never with ἐνδ, or ἐν for ἐνδ. Hence it is best to regard the term as used neuter for Middle Reflexive, ἐνεργούντας, 'exert themselves'; as in Ephes. ii. 2, τοῦ πνεύματος τοῦ ἐνεργούντος ἐν τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς τῆς ἀπειθείας, Gal. ii. 8, and sometimes also in the Classical writers, as Diod. Sic. iv. 38. Pol. iv. 40. Artemid. i. 1, 2.

It is not true that the Passive sense is confirmed by all the ancient Interpreters. The Pesch. Syr. Vera. represents the Midd. Reflex. sense; for surely the Participle Ethpel admits quite as well of that force as of a Passive. It has at least the equiv. neut. sense as active in Eph. iii. 20, and 1 Thess. ii. 13, though there the Lond. Polyglott wrongly adopts the Passive. In the Vulg. 'operantur' evidently means 'are ac-tise, exercise power and virtue.' The same may be said of the Æthiop. Vers.

3. For ἔθετο Lachm. edita ἔπιθ., on the authority of MS. B, and 4 cursive ones; and Tisch. edita ἔθετο. αὐτ. ἐν τῇ φυλ., from MSS. B, Z, and Origen—both baseless alterations, of which the former is a mere marginal gloss, the latter a critical emendation from the polishing school. The removal of καὶ ἔθετο in MSS. D, Z, and the Æth. Vers. came from the same source. The Lamb. and Mus. MSS. confirm the received readings; and φυλ. for τῇ φυλ. is confirmed by Justin Mart. Φιλίππου just after is cancelled by Tisch. (not by Lachm.), from one MS. and the Vulg.—authority next to nothing, since the Cod. D is perpetually altered in the text from the Vulg. The word was probably lost from variation in position. Dr. Mill, indeed, in his Proleg., is quite sure that it was introduced from St. Mark. But it was not likely to have been introduced into all the MSS., except one (I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies); and the Doctor's authority is neutralized by his flatly contradicting himself in his Note in loco. The Pesh. Syr. Vers. confirms the testimony of the MSS., and attests the authenticity of the word.

— δια 'Ἡρωδιάδα] Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5, 2, gives a somewhat different account, ascribing John's imprisonment to Herod's jealousy of his great influence with the people (of whom such multitudes flocked to him), who would be likely to do whatever he enjoined. Whence, says he, Herod thought it better to anticipate his designs (if he had any) by throwing him into prison.

Such is the general sense of Josephus's words, where for τῶν ἄλλων I read τ. πολλῶν, which is required by the context, and must have had place in Epiphanius's copy. Of the words ἠρθησαν τῇ ἀκροασει τῶν λόγων, the sense is, 'were passionately excited by hearkening to his words.' Comp. Thucyd. ii. 37. 3, ἀκροάσει τῶν νόμων, and i. 21, τῇ ἀκροάσει, sc. τῶν λόγων, which words are to be supplied from the context. The words μή τι ἀποστασίου τιμὴ φέροι mean, 'lest [his influence] should have a tendency to produce revolt.' In the remainder of his long and involved sentence there is a close imitation of Thucyd. i. 33. 4. It is evident that Jos. merely relates what was the current opinion of persons in general as to the cause of Herod's putting John to death. It is strange that all the Editors should retain so manifest a corruption as κτείνει for ἐκτείνει, aor. I for pluperf. 'had killed,' which is required by the preceding context, with which ἐκτείνει is closely connected by the γάρ. The sense of the foregoing words, not well expressed by the Translators, is: 'Now it seemed to certain of the Jews (i. e. the adherents of John the Baptist) that Herod's army had been destroyed by God; and very justly, the Deity avenging himself, in the way of punishment, on account of

John called the Baptist; for he had put that person to death.'

But though that may partly be the truth, it is evidently not the whole truth. If John had so much influence with the people as Josephus says, —Herod, we may suppose, would scarcely have ventured to throw him into prison, much less take his life, without some pretext at least. Now this would be afforded him by John's authoritatively (in quality of a Prophet) forbidding the Tetrarch to marry Herodias. And perhaps the manner of his doing this was so blunt and unceremonious, as to be construed into a sort of crimen læsæ majestatis, whereby his life would be forfeited, and might therefore be taken at any time: which accounts for Herod's so suddenly taking it, as well as Herodias venturing to ask it. Thus there is, in effect, no discrepancy at all in the two accounts, which mutually confirm and illustrate each other.

— Φιλίππου] Not Philip the Tetrarch, but another Philip, a son of Herod I. by a daughter of Simon, the High Priest. See Josephus, Ant. xviii. 5, 1.

6. γενεσίων δὲ ἀγομένων] Lachm. and Tisch. read γενεσίαις δὲ γενομένοις, from 4 MSS. But that reading involves a construction unsuitable to the style of this Gospel, and may be supposed to have come from the correctors. Were any alteration made, it should be rather γενεσίων γενομένων, which is found in 2 uncials, and a few cursive MSS., and has the support of almost all the Versions except the Vulg. It is also favoured by internal evidence, in the circumstance of ἀγομ. being a Classical idiom, and more likely to have come from the correctors than from St. Matthew. Yet the overwhelming preponderance of external authority, confirmed by the Pesh. Syr. Version, forbids any change of text. The Commentators are not agreed whether this expression should be understood of the birthday festival of Herod, or that in commemoration of his accession. That the latter was observed as a feast, is certain from Joseph. Ant. xv. 11, 3 (of Herod), and 1 Kings i. 8, 9. Hos. vii. 5. Since, however, no examples of this sense of γενεσία have been added, the common interpretation is the safer; and that the ancients, both Jews and Gentiles, kept their birthdays as days of great rejoicing, is certain from a variety of passages cited by Wets. At γενεσίαις some supply συμπόσιων; others, ἡμερῶν. But no ellipse is necessary, since γενεσία, and also ἐγκαίνια and γενέθλια (which is the term used by the earlier writers) are in fact nomina.

— ὠρχήσατο] Most Commentators (as Grot. and Kuin.) here understand a pantomimic and lascivious dance, recently introduced into Judæa, such as that so severely censured by Juven. Sat. vi. 63, and Hor. Od. iii. 6, 21. Yet that Herod should have permitted, and even been gratified with, a lascivious dance by his step-daughter, would argue almost incredible indecorum and depravity. Hence it is better, with Lightfoot, Mich., Elsn., and Fritz., to suppose that the dance was a decorous one, expressive of rejoicing, and, from the extreme elegance with which it was performed, such as obtained universal admiration.

8. προβιβασθεῖσα] adducta, urged, instigated.' A signif. occurring in the Sept. and also Xen. Mem. i. 2, 17, προβιβ. λόγῳ. Πίνακι, from πίνος, 'a board,' denotes a broad flat dish; a convenient form for the purpose. So Dr. Walsh, in his Travels in Turkey, informs us that the head of Ali Pacha, after being cut off, and sent to Constantinople, was publicly exposed on a dish.

— ὥδε] here, 'upon the spot;' lest in the morning he might repent of his promise, and refuse to perform it. That it should be done almost immediately is suggested by the words of the request, and from the high probability that the feast was celebrated rather at Machærus, where John was imprisoned, or near it; since, as we learn from Joseph. Bell. ii. 4, 2, Herod had a palace hard by.

9. ἐλυπήθη] This is by Kuin. and Wahl interpreted 'was angry.' But there is no reason to deviate from the rendering 'was sorry.' So Mark vi. 26, περίλυπος γενόμενος. Though it might be rendered 'he was chagrined.' The feeling was doubtless a mixed one; chiefly sorrow (on his own account most) and chagrin, not without concern, at being thus taken advantage of; for he could not but feel apprehensive of the consequences of so unpopular an action. His chagrin may also, as Hammond thinks, have been increased by a superstitious dread of any ill-omened occurrence on his birthday. So Martial Epigr. x. 87: 'Natalem colimus, tacete lites.' In short, great must have been the fluctuation of Herod's mind, occasioned by various contending passions and feelings in his bosom, which are well described by Grotius. Διὰ τοὺς ὅρκους, i. e. 'out of a scruple to break his oath before his guests;' for at entertainments there was a delicacy in refusing requests. So Josephus, Ant. xvii. 3, 3, ἐπὶ τῇ τιμῇ τοῦ ὅρκου. The plural (ὅρκους) is for the singular, by an idiom not unfrequent, unless we may suppose that the King, in the excitement of the moment, had repeated his oath.

10. πέμψας] scil. τινά. Mark says σπεκουλάτωρα. That this is not, as Rosenm. considers it, a Hebraism, is plain from two examples from Classical writers adduced in my Recens. Synop. I add Herodian, i. 9, 19, νύκτωρ ὁ Κ. πέμψας ἀποστείμει τὴν κεφαλὴν.

12. σῶμα] MSS. B, C, D, L, and not a few ancient cursive ones (to which I add Lamb. 1178, Scriv. y. Mus. 1810, 17,470, and one other edit. Colin.), have πτῶμα, which is edited by Lachm. and Tisch., but on scarcely sufficient authority; esp. since internal evidence is equally balanced, considering that πτῶμα may have been derived from the parallel passage of Mark, where it is in almost every copy. The usus loquendi will settle nothing, since, though πτῶμα is almost confined to the later writers, yet it occurs several times in Eurip., as used of the bodies of royal personages. Josephus is, however, wrongly adduced for πτῶμα, since σῶμα is there found in all the copies. There is, however, a strong confirmation of πτῶμα in the Pesh. Syr. Vers., where Schaaf wrongly renders by corpus, and not, as he ought to have done, by cadaver, since the term is κνήμ, as in the parallel passage of Mark. Rev. xii. 8, 9, bis. Numb. xiv. 29, 32, meaning the dead body, after decapitation, or other truncatio, not corp, which term denotes the body entire, whether alive or dead. So, too, the Arab. and Coptic Versions, and the Hebr. of Munster. And since the remains taken up by John's disciples could only be the trunk and members, the Syr., Arab., and Coptic terms were quite appropriate, as is also πτῶμα, if, at least, Suidas be right when he, copying the ancient Grammarians, defines πτῶμα by σῶμα ἀνεν τῆς κεφαλῆς (exactly as the Syr. κνήμ): and so Photius Lex. in v. πτῶμα ἠνέκε, though the words ἀνεν τῆς κεφ. are lost in the only copy we have; which I am surprised should have escaped the notice of Porson and Dobree.

For αὐτὸ Tisch. edits αὐτόν, from two MSS. only, B and Θ, and 2 copies of the Ital. Vers.—most injudiciously, since the reading is manifestly an error of the scribes, who very oft. confound αὐτὸ with αὐτῷ and αὐτόν. It is true that αὐτόν may have been in the copy used by the Ital. Translator; but illum and illud are almost as oft. confounded by the Latin scribes as αὐτόν and αὐτό by the Greek. Tisch. could not be ignorant of either fact; but his zeal for the MS. B closed up his recollection, and occasioned him to fall into a sad lapse, from which the better judgment (or better fortune) of Lachm. preserved him; though it was by a narrow escape, as appears from his placing αὐτόν in the margin, which in his first ed. was in the text. On the other hand, the ill-fortune of Tisch. did not allow him to leave the αὐτὸ of his first ed. untouched in the second. What could induce Lach. to place πεῖλοι at v. 13, in the inner margin, I cannot tell. It evidently arose in those five copies that have it, from Itacism, as also in some copies at Xen. Anab. vii. l. 1. The same error beset all the editions of Thucyd. at l. ii. 94, up to Bekker's, who restored πεῖλοι, from several copies, for the vulg. πεῖλοι retained by Arn., but on wrong grounds, as Poppo has at length seen, who in his second ed. has edited περὶ. A very slender portion of palaeographical knowledge, as to Itacism, and of critical, as to the force of internal evidence in some cases overbalancing strong external testimony, would have preserved Poppo and Arn. from making shipwreck of their critical credit.

13. The reading of L. and Tisch. ἀκούσας δέ, for καὶ ἀκούσας, from 4 uncial and 10 cursive MSS. (to which I add Lamb. 1187 and 1188, Scriv. s.), is merely an alteration of Critics, who thought that a particle of transitive and continuative force was here required, rather than an ordinary copulative, like καὶ. But if such a collocation of the particles suffices at other passages, why should it not here?

— καὶ ἀκούσας] 'and having heard [of this],' meaning, however, not the death of John, since that event had taken place some time before,—but what is related at vv. 1, 2, as to the effect which the report of our Lord's miracles had produced on Herod's mind, the intermediate portion, v. 3—12 being retrospective in character, and in construction parenthetic; nevertheless, our Lord's withdrawal into the desert, apart from public notice, seems to have taken place immediately on his hearing of that event. But this may very well have been so; for (as Mr. Alf. observes) 1) 'John's disciples would [rather might] be some days in bringing the news from Machærus to Capernaum; and the report mentioned in v. 1 might reach Herod meantime.' 2) The expression ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ is of sufficient latitude to extend over a not inconsiderable space of time; and 3) as I remarked in my later edition, the message of John's disciples to our Lord may have included tidings of both particulars,—the death of their Master, and the saying of Herod respecting himself. On both which accounts, as well as to avoid the imputation of any blame for any disturbances which might arise in consequence of the late atrocity, our Lord might well seek retirement, both on his own account, and on that of the Twelve from their mission, which, as we learn from Mark vi. 30, 31, and Luke ix. 10, took place contemporaneously with our Lord's hearing of the late event, probably a short time before. And, when we consider the extreme fatigue which both himself and his Apostles had recently undergone, this retirement was as necessary for refreshment as for personal security. In fact our Lord, in Mark vi. 31, adverts to the need his disciples had of refreshing themselves for a short space. Moreover, since Herod was (as we learn from Luke ix. 9) desirous of seeing him (which our Lord, of course, well knew), it was sound discretion, under the then circumstances, to avoid any such interview. Accordingly he sought a place of retirement and safety; for it must be remarked, that our Lord never threw himself unnecessarily into danger, thus reserving himself for the proper time to lay down his life.

— ἀκούσαντες] 'having heard' [where he was].
 — περὶ] Not 'on foot,' but 'by land,' as opposed to ἐν πλοίῳ, 'by boat;' a signification frequent in the Class. writers, and sometimes occurring where there is no opposition expressed or even implied.

14. ὁ Ἰησοῦς] Not in B, D, and 6 cursive MSS., and cancelled by L. and Tisch., on quite insufficient authority, especially as internal evidence is against the removal, from the greater probability of the expression's having been cancelled for the purpose of removing a tautology, than of being added where not needed. The absence of ὁ Ἰησοῦς in MS. Θ and another (add Lamb. 1179), confirms my suspicion of that being only another mode of removing the tautology.

— ἐσπλαγγίσθη ἐπ' αὐτοῖς] Namely, as Mark adds, ὅτι ἦσαν ὡς πρόβατα μὴ ἔχοντα ποιμένα. On this reading ἐπ' αὐτοῖς all the Editors are agreed. The vulg. αὐτοῖς is proved to have been a mere typographical error of Stephens's 3d Edition. On the present narration comp. infra xv. 32, seqq. and John vi. 1—13.

15. ὀψίας γενομένης] i. e. the first evening, which commenced at three o'clock. Nor, considering the aptitude of the place, and the time of year, a little before the Passover, is this inconsistent with the expression of Luke ix. 12, ἡ δὲ ἡμέρα ἤρξατο κλίνειν, for the day is then quite on the wane. That mentioned further on at v. 23, is the second evening, which commenced at sunset.

— ἡ ὥρα ἤδη παρήλθεν] 'the day [time of day] is far spent;' lit. 'gone by;' like the Latin hora. Mark's words are: ἡδη ὥρας πολλὰς γενομένης, meaning, 'when much of the day was now past.' See the note there.

— ἀπόλυσον] After this οὖν is subjoined by L. and T. from MSS. C, Z, and two cursive ones; to which I add Lamb. 1177:—very insufficient authority, espec. considering that internal evidence is against the word; which was evidently introduced by critics, who thought some particle necessary. Though, so far from that being the case, the οὖν destroys the simplicity and force of this earnest address, to which the Asyndeton, found in the passage of Mark since v. 1., contributes not a little. The interpolation in question is to be ascribed to Origen, who cites the passage with the word twice.

18. αὐτοὺς ὧδε] L. and T. edit., from B, Z, and 33, ὧδε αὐτ., I add Vulg. Lamb. But the reading is entitled to no attention, having, I doubt not, arisen either from the carelessness of scribes, or rather from the fastidiousness of Critics, who sought to give a better position to ὧδε, by bringing the adverb closer to its verb, and not last in the sentence. The omission of ὧδε in D, and 1 or 2 cursive MSS. (confirmed by the Copt., Æthiop., and Ital. Vers.), arose either from the variation in position, or was another mode of getting rid of an awkwardness of composition. The same MS. and its assecla oft. remove the ὧδε, e. gr. Matt. xiv. 8. Mark vi. 3. xiii. 2. Luke ix. 41. xv. 17. James ii. 3. It is not certain whether in the MS. B the ὧδε is transposed, or cancelled. I suspect that the original reading was that of D, and that the ὧδε was inserted between μοι and αὐτοὺς a secunda manu. Be that as it may, the Critics ought not to have stumbled at the awkward position of the word, since it is found in this very position infra xvii. 17, in all the copies; though there, in the Vulg. and some other Versions, the adverb is drawn back to its verb. In the Pesch. Syr., however, in both those passages, as also in those before adduced, the adv. is placed last; which circumstance shows the position of the word in copies almost coeval with the successors of the Apostles.

19. καὶ τοὺς ὄχλους ἀνακλιθῆναι] The Versions, both ancient and modern are, I apprehend, all wrong in rendering, 'ordered the multitude to sit down;' for from the parallel passages of Mark, Luke, and John (where we have ἀνέκλιναν ἅπαντας καὶ ἐπέταξεν αὐτοῖς ἀνακλῖναι πάντας), it appears that ἀνακλ. must here have its usual passive force, and that the construction is: κελεύσας (ὥστε) ἀνακλιθῆναι τοὺς ὄχλους, 'having given orders for the multitude to be seated' (collocari in ordine, as L. Brug. explains), namely, as Luke says (ix. 14, where see note), κατὰ κλισίας (or συμπόσια) ἀνὰ πεντήκοντα; implying the collocatio on the part of others.

—τοὺς χόρτους] The MS. D, and 2 or 3 others, have τὸν χόρτον; while B, C, and 7 or 8 cursive ones (add Scriv. o.) have ἐπὶ τοῦ χόρτου, which Lachm. edits, but not Tisch.—very properly, since internal evidence here confirms external testimony. There is no doubt that the ancient Critics, stumbling at the plural form, which is rare, and almost confined to the Poets, introduced the singular, espec. as found in Mark, but could not agree on the case, some preferring the Genit., others the Accus. The former seems to have come from Origen; but it may have been derived from the Vulg. and Italic. The plural form, as being by far the less obvious, must be retained, and the idiom considered of the same nature with the gramina of Horace in the well known 'redeunt jam gramina campis Arboribusque comæ;' where the plural form was adopted in order to match with the plural at comæ, the writer intending that in each case the plural should be taken generically for grass and foliage. I have been the more induced to retain the plural form by bearing in mind the use of χόρτοι for χόρτος in the Greek Poets, espec. Hom. II. xxiv. 640, αὐλῆς ἐν χόρτοις (grass-plots) κυλιόμενος, and Pind. Olymp. xiii. 62, χόρτος ἐν λείωντος (the meadows).

—καὶ] This is rejected or cancelled by almost all Editors, as not found in the greater part of the MSS. and contrary to internal evidence.

—εὐλόγησε] scil. αὐτοὺς, 'pronounced a solemn blessing on them'—the loaves and fishes—as expressed in Mark and Luke, where see note.

—κλάσας] The Jewish bread was formed into cakes; broad, thin, and brittle, like our biscuits; and therefore required to be broken, rather than cut, and thus would leave very many fragments; which accounts for the astonishing quantity thereof gathered up, though by the κλάσμ. we are to understand not only the fragments which would arise from breaking up cakes for so great a multitude, but (as appears from John vi. 13) those also which each person would make in eating. The words following δώδεκα—πλήρεις are in apposition with, and expletical of the preceding; q. d. 'namely, twelve baskets full.'

20. κοφίνοις] This word has occasioned more discussion than one might expect among the Commentators, who are not a little perplexed since these cophini are in Juv. Sat. iii. 14, and vi. 512, connected with hay. The most probable opinion is, that the κοφ. in question were either (as Buxt. thinks) such wicker baskets as had, from the earliest period, formed a part of the household utensils of the Jews (see Deut. xxviii. 5); or (as Reland, Schleus., and Kuin. suppose) such portable flag-baskets as were commonly used by the Jews in travelling through heathen countries, to hold their provisions, in order to avoid the pollution of unclean food. The hay, it is supposed, they took with them, to make a bed. Yet those baskets could not have held any quantity sufficient for that purpose. At any rate the cophini here meant carried no hay. As to those mentioned by Juvenal, they were of a much larger sort, like our kampers, and used for containing various articles of pedlery, such as the foreign Jews, even then, there is reason to think, used to deal in.

21. ἦσαν ἄνδρες ὥσει πντ.] The men (as usual with the Jews) being alone reckoned.

22—33. Mark vi. 45—52. John vi. 14. 21. From ἠνάγκασεν many have inferred the unwillingness of the disciples to depart; influenced by ambitious views, and thinking that, from the multitude being so desirous to make Jesus a King, now would be the time for him to set up his earthly kingdom. The verb, however, like others in Greek and Latin of similar import, is often used of the constraint of moral suasion, or simply of authoritative direction; as in Aristoph. Eq. 508, and Thucyd. vii. 37. This, however, does not hinder us from supposing that our Lord's disciples were but too willing to second the disposition of the multitude to take Jesus by force, and make him a king; espec. as they were convinced that he was the Messiah. Accordingly their dismissal was a desirable step towards getting rid of the multitude, and of an awkward affair. See my note on Thucyd. iv. 125, and viii. 41.

22. The αὐτοῦ, which I have bracketed, is absent from many MSS. (to which I add all the most ancient of the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), and is cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. Internal evidence is against it, and it is probably, though not certainly, spurious. The τὸ before πλοῖον is absent from MS. B, and about 8 cursive ones, and is cancelled by L. and T. by the same error in judgment that they have so often elsewhere evinced, and chiefly occasioned by an ignorance of the force of the Article, though that was long ago pointed out by Bp. Middl., and recently by Mr. Green. See note supra viii. 23. The αὐτὸν just after is absent from D and 4 other ancient cursive MSS., being removed by certain Critics, who knew that in pure Class. Greek it is usually omitted; indeed it is not found in the parallel passage of Mark, though there, strange to say, it was inserted by the framer of the text of the same MS. D.

— τὸ πέραν] Mark adds πρὸς Βηθσαϊδάν, by which I would not (with many) understand the Bethsaida of Galilee, and consequently on the West side of the Lake; but the Bethsaida of Gaulonitis (mentioned at Luke ix. 10) on the East side of the Lake, and near the embouchure of the upper Jordan into the Lake, and which, on being enlarged by Philip the Tetrarch, was called Julias, after Julia, daughter of Augustus. See Jos. Ant. xviii. 2, 1. The real state of the case seems to be this: that Jesus directed the Apostles to pass in a vessel from the place where he had worked the miracle of feeding the 5000 to Bethsaida Gaulonitis, while he should dismiss the multitudes; directing that they should go by sea, and intending himself to meet them at Bethsaida Gaulonitis, and then embark with them, and cross the lake to Capernaum. It may, indeed, be asked, how Bethsaida Gaulonitis could be said to be πέραν with respect to the West side of the Lake? a difficulty which has caused many to suppose Bethsaida of Galilee to be here meant. But the Lake might be crossed in any other direction as well as from West to East, or across the middle. Thus Bethsaida Gaulonitis might be said to be πέραν with respect to the scene of the miracle; though not on the West side of the Lake, whose exact form, however, is, I believe, very imperfectly known. I suspect that the shore of the Lake makes a greater hollow than the maps represent. The reason why our Lord pursued this course was, that the Lake is often very dangerous to cross over at the middle. And it should seem that, from the place where the miracle was worked at Capernaum, it was safer to make the distance by two crossings over; first to Bethsaida Gaulonitis, and from thence to Capernaum. As circumstances, however, fell out, they never went to that place at all.

If this mode be not adopted, far more difficulty will arise in another way, from its being inexplicable why our Lord should send them forward to Bethsaida of Galilee in the way to Galilee, when it would be quite out of the course, and involve the danger of crossing over the middle of the Lake to no purpose.

23. τὸ ὄρος] By this term, found also in Mark and John, is to be understood, not the mountain range generally which skirts the Lake, but that part of it which, in the desert tract before mentioned, rises into a sort of mountain peak, about a mile from the sea, and whither, as the most retired spot around, our Lord repaired both for prayer and for seclusion from the populace, who wanted to make him a king.

24. μέσον] This is not in the accus., with the ellipsis of κατὰ, but in the Nominative, as at Hdol. i. 170. Τίτων γὰρ μέσον εἶναι τῆς Ἰωνίης, and Greg. Naz. 52. ὡς ναὶν μέσην κλυδωνος. The term μέσ. is meant to be taken populariter, of being somewhat far advanced; since from John vi. 19, it appears that they had only gone about four miles.

— βασανιζόμενον] 'violently tossed:' so in Polyb. i. 48. 2, a stormy wind is said πύργους βασανίζειν.

25. For ἀπῆλθε L. and T. edit ἦλθ., from B, C, 2 m. P, and 10 others, with Orig., Euseb., and Chrysa., and many Versions. But Versions are in such a case as this of no weight, and Fathers of very little. The proof of the reading must rest on MSS., which here all, except a very few (I find ἀπῆλθ. in all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), support ἀπῆλθ., which is also confirmed by internal evidence as existing in the circumstance that a compound verb, when the force of the prepos. in comp. is not clear, is often changed to the simple; e. gr. at xxiii. 33, where ἦλθ. is adopted by L., John iv. 47. Now this was more likely to be done here, because this use of ἀπέρχ. followed by εἰς, though frequently occurring in the Sept., is rather rare in the Class. writers, and in the present use. I apprehend, unprecedented; for though Dr. Robins. Lex. in v. adduces Xen. Anab. i. 9. 29 (and he might have added i. 4. 7, Thiem.), yet those passages are not to the purpose, since there the sense is, 'they went off, or over to, deserted to Cyrus.' Whereas the sense here is, 'he went off [shore] unto them.' As respects the reading ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν for ἐπὶ τῆς θαλάσσης, adopted by L. and T. from B, P, and 5 cursive MSS. (to which I add 9 Mus. MSS.), propriety of language might confirm it, yet internal evidence is rather against it; for it was, I suspect, an alteration of certain Critics who were aware of the proper distinction between the use of ἐπὶ with Genit. and with acc. followed by a verb of motion, 'to' or 'towards,' the latter denoting, as is here required, motion along a surface, over to a place, as the end of the motion. So ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν at v. 26, and ἐπὶ τὰ ὕδατα at v. 28, 29. This nicety, however, was not likely to be known to Jews writing in Greek. Besides, as ἐπὶ τῆς θαλάσσης is found at Mark and John, in, I believe, all the copies, it would be likely to be used here. Moreover, B and some of the cursive MSS. here have ἐπὶ τῆς θαλάσσης at the next verse, which has been adopted by L. and T.; and if that be the true reading there, it can scarcely be otherwise here. Upon the whole, I would adopt either the accus. in both verses, or the genit. in both. And, considering the parallel passages, I am inclined to acquiesce in the latter construction.

— περιπατῶν ἐπὶ τῆς θαλ.] 'walking upon the sea.' Thus evincing his Divine power; since this is in Job ix. 8 made a property of the Deity; the words περιπατῶν, ὡς ἐν ἰδιόφω, ἐπὶ θαλάσσης, meaning, 'He who can work impossibilities.' So Hieroglyph. i. 58, says, that the Egyptian hieroglyphic for expressing impossibility was 'a man's feet walking on the sea.'

26. φάντασμα] 'a phantom,' 'spectre,' 'apparition,' 'ghost'; = Class. φάσμα. The Jews, like the ancients universally, believed in the existence of spirits clothed in human form, to which were applied the names φάντασμα, φάσμα, and εἰδωλον. The disciples, some think, supposed it to be either the apparition of their Master, whom they imagined to be dead, or his angel (see note on Acts xii. 15, and so Joseph. Ant. i. 20. 2. v. 6. 1, uses φάντασμα for angel); for it was also the opinion of the ancients that, on the death of the person, his tutelary angel sometimes appeared in his exact form to his friends. Yet, as it is not to be supposed that the Apostles would entertain so low an idea of their Divine Master, it may rather be imagined that they took the appearance to be that of some spectre, they knew not what; for it should seem they were not near enough to distinguish the countenance. Accordingly Jesus addressed to them the words, 'It is I—I am the person—be not afraid.'

27. εὐθέως] L. reads εὐθὺς, from MSS. B, D, as also at Mark vi. 45, from B, L. But I shall be enabled to show that Mark scarcely ever uses the adject. for the adverb. Matth. uses it, as also John, but very rarely; and there is no valid proof that he did so here. The εὐθὺς seems to have come from the polishing school.

28. κέλευσον, &c.] Under bis is also implied enable me to, &c.; for Peter desired a miracle to be worked, to prove that it was really Jesus, and not a ghost of some other person; or a mere 'delusive appearance,' as φάντασμα is rendered in the Pesch. Syr. Version.

— πρὸς σε ἔλθειν] L. and T. edit ἔλθειν πρὸς σε, from B, C, D, and about 12 cursive MSS.; I add Mus. 5468. But the evidence is insufficient; and I suspect that the reading came from certain fastidious Critics, who made the alteration for the purpose of preventing the pronouns coming too close together,—a fault in composition, it must be admitted, yet such as was not unlikely to occur in composition so little studied as that of St. Matth.

31. ἐδίσταςας] The word properly signifies to stand in bitio, undetermined which way to take, and hence gen. 'to be in doubt.' So Eurip. Or. 625, διπλῆς μερίμνης διπτόχου ἰὼν ὁδοῦ.

32. ἐμβάντων] L. and T. adopt ἀναβάντων, from B, D, and 3 ancient cursive MSS., Orig., and Cyrill. But ἐμβ. is confirmed by ἐμβ. supra v. 22, since v. 1., infra xv. 39. John vi. 17, 29. xxi. 3; and in a case where one term is as proper as the other, external authority must decide; espec. where internal evidence draws the same way, which is the case here; since there is little doubt that in the 5 MSS. which alone have ἀναβ., the reading was derived from the parallel passage of Mark, with which comp. Sept. in Jonah i. 3, ἀνίσθι εἰς τὸ πλοῖον,—the only passage, however, where ἀναβ. is used in this sense. Nevertheless, ἀναβ. seems to have been read by the Pesh. Syr. Translators, and is confirmed by the Iamb. Vulg., which has 'cum conscendissent naviculam,' since that would require ἀναβ., not ἐμβ.; for though in Polyb. xxx. 9, 10, we have ἐνίσθι τὸν λίμβον, yet the true reading seems to be ἀνίσθι. That the reading ἀναβ. is Alexandrine, I quite agree with Matthæi. That ἀναβάντος did once exist in some copies, we may infer from the reading of the Ital. Vers.; nay, I find ἀναβάντι αὐτῷ in Lamb. MS. 1193, one of the most ancient of all the cursive MSS., certainly of the ninth, perhaps the eighth century.

—ἐκόπασεν ὁ ἄνεμος] 'the wind lulled, ceased.' The word occurs both in the Sept. and in the Class. writers, as Hdot. vii. 191, ἐκόπαζεν ὁ ἄνεμος. Scriptor ap. Suid., οἱ ἄνεμοι ἐκόπαζον.

33. οἱ ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ] Fritz. and Meyer suppose the persons here mentioned to designate the crew of the ship, as distinct from the disciples. But it was not a ship, but a skiff; which would not require much of a crew. However, since from John vi. 19, ἰληλακότες, and Mark vi. 48, ἐν τῷ ἐλαύνειν, it appears that the skiff was a row-boat. There might accordingly be several persons employed.

—Θεοῦ Υἱὸς εἶ] Bishop Middleton has proved that the want of the Art. would not authorize us to translate 'a son of God,' or 'son of a God.' For, as to the former in the sense prophet, there is no proof that prophets were so called. And as to the latter, which is thought suitable to the ideas of Pagans, there is no proof that these men were such; or, if so, they might join in the language of the Apostles on this extraordinary occasion. And though it is urged, that the disciples were not yet acquainted with the Divinity of our Lord, yet even that must be received with some limitation. That the Messiah would be the Son of God, was a Jewish doctrine; and, therefore, if they acknowledged him as the Christ (a title which they had repeatedly heard him claim to himself), they must have regarded him as the Son of God (though how far they then comprehended the full import of the title 'Son of God' we cannot determine); and thus προσεκύνησαν may be taken in its full sense. And what they themselves heard, they would be likely to impart to the mariners; whose exclamation may thus be understood in the highest sense. Ἀληθῶς, &c. too, implies as much as, 'Thou art really [the character which thou claimest to be], the Son of God.' So the Centurion, Matt. xxvii. 54, exclaims, ἀληθῶς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς ἦν οὗτος, where see note.

35. ἐπιγνόντες αὐτὸν] 'having recognized him;' i. e. as the person who had already wrought so many miracles of healing in their neighbourhood (comp. ix. 30), and ascertained him to be such: an expression found also in Mark vi. 33, sq. Luke xxiv. 16, 31.

XV. 1—20. Mark vii. 1—23. The fame of Jesus had now become so great, that the Jewish rulers thought it high time to put a stop to its further progress.

—προσέρχονται—Φαρισαῖοι] Since, as I have shown, the full construction of this briefly expressed sentence would be οἱ ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις Γραμματεῖς καὶ Φαρισαῖοι προσέρχονται τῷ Ἰ. ἀπὸ Ἱερ., the Article οἱ, cancelled by Lachm. from B, D, and 6 cursive MSS. (and 2 Mus. ones) cannot be dispensed with, nor, as Mr. Alf. thinks, left to be implied; it was prob. removed by those who (like many modern expositors) mistook the nature of the construction. Were it not so, the occurrence of the οἱ in all the copies at Mark vii. 1, would not prove its genuineness here, since the construction is different. Internal evidence is quite in its favour, since it was likely to be cancelled by Critics, who stumbled at the word by not perceiving the force of the Art., esp. as separated from its noun, which propriety of language demands in such a case. Had Bp. Middl. seen this, he would not have given countenance to the removal of the οἱ, as if adverse to his canons. I cannot agree with the Bishop, that the mere probable sense is that some Scribes and Pharisees came from Jerusalem. As to the Syr. Vers., this is a case where Versions have no great weight, and the Syr. does not say 'came from Jerusalem.' In fact, there is no need to supply ἐλθόντες, though found in the passage of Mark, who thereby wished to make more prominent the fact, that those Scribes and Pharisees from Jerusalem (pro-

The reading, Φαρισαῖοι καὶ Γραμματεῖς, found in B, D, and 6 ancient cursive MSS., is worthy of attention, espec. as confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., Copt., Pers., and Armen. Versions, and moreover, having internal evidence in its favour, though it has met with no countenance from L. and T. Yet it derives support from Mark vii. 1, though it is not likely that the mere position of the words should have been altered from thence. It would seem that the statement in Mark is, like many others in that Evangelist, minutely exact. The persons in question prob. consisted of the Ruling Pharisees, who acted as a Committee for the whole body, accompanied by certain individuals of the Scribes, who had been deputed by the body at large to act for them on this occasion. We are, of course, much in the dark on this and many other points of Jewish Ecclesiastical Antiquity, and consequently are left not a little to conjecture. See note on Mark ii. 16.

2. τὴν παράδοσιν τῶν πρεσβυτέρων] Παράδ. signifies a precept, or body of precepts, not written, but handed down by tradition. So Josephus, Ant. xiii. 10, 6, says, ὅτι νόμιμα πολλὰ τινὰ παρέδωκαν τῷ δήμῳ οἱ Φαρισαῖοι ἐκ πατέρων διαδοχῆς, ἅπρ' οὐκ ἀναγίγρῃται ἐν τοῖς Μωυσίαις νόμοις. These νόμιμα were afterwards digested into one body, and called the Talmud; divided into the Mischna (or Text) and the Gemara (or Commentary). By τῶν πρεσβυτέρων are meant, not the elders or members of the Sanhedrim, but 'the ancients,' as in Heb. xi. 2, ἐμαρτυρήσαν οἱ πρεσβ.

3. διὰ τί καὶ ὑμεῖς—ὑμῶν] 'why do ye too,' i. e. 'on your part?' Our Lord confutes them from their own positions; skillfully opposing the παράδοσις τῶν πρεσβυτέρων, &c. to the ἐντολὴ τοῦ Θεοῦ; and before he disputes respecting the tradition to which they referred, he uproots the very foundation on which their whole reasoning was erected; showing, by a manifest example, how often this was at variance with the Divine Laws.

—διὰ τὴν παράδοσιν] Not 'by,' but 'because of,' 'by reason of,' 'on account of your tradition:' ἵνα τὴν παράδοσιν ὑμῶν τηρήσῃτε, as Mark more distinctly expresses it.

4. ἐνετ. λίσγων] L. and T. edit. εἶπεν, from B, D, and 2 cursive MSS., confirmed by some Versions and several Fathers. But the authority is insufficient, espec. as internal evidence is adverse, since it was more likely that εἶπεν should have been adopted in those copies from the parallel passage of Mark, or from the Versions, than that εἶπε should have been altered to ἐνετ. λίσγ. in all the MSS. but 4; at least, I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies. The same alteration has been intruded at Mark xi. 6, from the same uncials and 2 others, with 5 cursive ones, but not the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Origen supports both readings. It is true that Irenæus and Ptolemy are pleaded for the εἶπεν here: but there is in neither case any strict quotation, but a report of the general sense. Besides, it is not the Greek of Irenæus that is adduced, but the Latin Version, likely enough to be altered in order to suit the Latin Vulgate. Moreover, the εἶπεν is as suitable to the Μωσῆς at Mark vii. 10, as the grave and dignified ἐνετείλατο to the ὁ Θεός here, which, as Mr. Alf. observes, supplies a remarkable testimony of our Lord to the Divine origin of the Decalogue; for the second commandment quoted is not in the Decalogue, but taken from Exod. xxi. 16. But that was a point not likely to weigh much with either the ancient Critics or the recent Editors. As to Dr. Mill, there is here displayed his not unusual mutability, since in his Proleg. he flatly contradicts what he had in the work itself affirmed, pronouncing ἐνετ. λίσγων to be a scholium on εἶπεν, as if so plain a term would need explanation. I cannot help suspecting that ἐνετ. was altered to εἶπεν, for no better a reason than to make the antithesis between Divine and human commands the more exact.

—τίμα τὸν πατέρα] Exod. xx. 12. This was understood to comprehend, under obedience and dutiful respect, taking care of and supporting. See Num. xxii. 17. xxiv. 1. Judg. xiii. 17. Deut. v. 16. Eph. vi. 2. So Eccles. iii. 8, ἐν ἔργῳ καὶ λόγῳ τίμα πατέρα. Thus also κακολογεῖν, answering to Hebr. ἤρ, denoted slighting, neglecting [to support]. Such, too, was the mode of interpretation sanctioned by their own Canonists. See Lightf. and Wets. See Exod. xxi. 17. Comp. Deut. xxi. 18. Σου is cancelled by Griesb., Fitch., L., and T. on strong external authority, but internal evidence draws two ways, and the Pesch. Syr., Arab., and Pers. confirm the σου. Besides a few ancient copies have the σου after μητέρα, and hence we may suspect that variation of position might lead to exclusion. Two of the best of the Lamb. MSS. have σου, and at least half of the Br. Mus. copies. The Vulg. Lamb. has the word twice (as in the Pesch. Syr.), and so has Ptolemæus ap. Epiphani. T. 33. 4, as also has the Sept. in all the copies but a few of little note.

—The full sense of the brief phrase θανάτῳ τελευτάτω, formed on the Hebrew, מוֹת יָמוּת, is 'let him come to his end, die, by a violent death,' 'be put to death without mercy,' 'die the death,' to use our old phrase.

5. δῶρον] scil. ἔστω. From the parallel pas-ἐὰν ἐξ ἐμοῦ ὠφελῆθῃς, [καὶ] οὐ μὴ τιμήσῃ τὸν πατέρα αὐτοῦ ἢ τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ. ⁶ καὶ ἡκυρώσατε τὴν ἐντολὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ διὰ τὴν παράδοσιν ὑμῶν. ⁷ Ὑποκριταί! καλῶς προεφίτευσε περὶ

sage of Mark it would seem that ἄωρον is here simply the interpretation of the Hebr. נָצַר denoting any thing devoted—namely, to the service of God. But as it was often employed in making a vow against using any article, it came, at length, to denote any thing prohibited; and, if spoken with reference to any particular person, the phrase imported that the vower obliged himself not to give any thing to the person in question; and thus, if that person were the father of the vower, he was held prohibited from relieving his necessities. Such is the view taken of the term by Lightf., Grot., Camp., Kuin., and most of the recent Commentators. Yet it seems more natural, with the ancient Fathers, and some modern Commentators, to take ἄωρον simply of something consecrated, or rather supposed to be consecrated, to pious uses, by a collusion between the sons and the priests, so as to leave the father destitute. For (to use the words of Bp. Jebb, Sacr. Lit. p. 246) ‘when the Jews wished to evade the duty of supporting their parents, they made a pretended, or at least an eventual dedication of their property to the sacred treasury: or rather a dedication of all that could or might have been given by them to their parents, saying, Be it Corban.’ From that moment, though at liberty to expend such property on any selfish purpose, they were prohibited from bestowing it on their parents. Thus κορβᾶν, ἄωρον, might imply the notion of prohibition; but it could not express it. On either interpretation, however, to say to a parent ‘Corban, &c.’ was a breach of the commandment, in spirit if not in letter, and was virtually κακολογεῖν πατέρα.

—ὁ ἰδὺν ἐξ ἐμοῦ ὠφέλ.] Render, ‘whatsoever thou mightest, or shouldst, have been profited by me.’ The ἰδὺν is for ἰδν, and belongs principally to the verb, but also to δ, to express ever; by an idiom frequent in St. Matthew.

—καὶ οὐ μὴ τιμήσῃ, &c.] There is here no small difficulty in the construction, in which many suppose an ellipsis of some word, such as ὀφείλει. But no ellipsis, properly speaking, can here have place. We may rather suppose an unfinished sentence, some apodosis being wanting to be supplied from the context; of which Fritz. adduces several examples, with references to Critics. Bp. Jebb, indeed, thinks that the context has within itself the full meaning; q. d. ‘Who-soever shall say Corban, &c., must also not honour his father or mother,’ i. e. he is under an obligation not to do so. But this is doing violence to the construction (καὶ οὐ μὴ τιμήσῃ being suspended on ὅς ἂν ἐπῇ), and introducing what would, I apprehend, be bad Greek. It is better, with Winer and De Wette, to regard καὶ οὐ μὴ τιμ. as the consequence of ὅς ἂν ἐπῇ, whereby οὐ μὴ with a subjunct. yielding a future sense, q. d. ‘he shall not need to honour,’ equiv. to, ‘he shall even be free from the obligation thereto.’ As to Olshausen’s mode of supposing καὶ to be Heb. sign of the consequence, that is the least satisfactory of all, as the one first mentioned is the least objectionable; for in the others the καὶ, if not redundant, is at once forced and jejune:—and it is well remarked by Fritz., that ‘although καὶ is sometimes placed at the beginning of an Apodosis, it ought always to contribute something to the sentiment;’ which here would be otherwise. If that method be not adopted, we may best introduce the reading of B, C, D, and 5 cursive MSS. (to which I add Mus. 1810, 17,982, 19, 18,211, 16,943, 15,581, and Covell 1, omitted by Mill), by which the καὶ is removed. So Lachm. and Tisch. edit., and also τιμήσει, from B, C, D, E, Δ, Θ, and 13 cursive MSS., to which I add 1 Lamb., 2 Scriv., and 4 Mus. copies. But it is not indispensable to read τιμήσει, which seems to have sprung from a gloss, or grammatical alteration: and to cancel καὶ is very much like cutting the knot, which is best untied in the first proposed method: and the καὶ is strongly supported by the Pesch. Syr., Ital., and Vulg. Versions. The words ἢ τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ are cancelled by L. and T., on very insufficient authority (only 2 MSS.), and against internal evidence; for it is manifest that the words in those two copies were lost by the repetition of αὐτοῦ. As to the absence of the second αὐτοῦ in not a few copies, that arose from alteration to remove a needless repetition. See supra, v. 4.

6. καὶ ἡκυρώσατε—παράδοσιν ὑμῶν] The καὶ may have the sense imo, ‘yea,’ as at Mark vii. 12, or ‘and’ (so = thus). It is well pointed out by Bp. Jebb, that “our Lord here re-asserts, and with aggravated force, the charge with which he commenced his indignant recrimination; and from mere transgression of the commandment of God he proceeds to absolute nullification thereof.”

7. προειπὴν.] From the use of this term, the earlier Commentators in general regard the subsequent passage, v. 8, 9, as an actual prophecy; while many later ones consider it as only a covert prediction of what should happen, veiled under the language of severe reproof: while, again, others, as Le Clerc, see no prediction at all. But both the 2nd and 3rd modes of interpretation are untenable. One thing may be granted, that the term προφ. does not necessarily designate prophesying future events, but may admit of being taken in the frequent sense of speaking or writing under Divine inspiration. And that Chrys. and Theophyl. so understood the word, is pretty clear from their exposition. Nay, Le Clerc, Mald., Whitby, and Dr. Bland, do not raise the sense of προφ. beyond that of simply speaking; the sense, they say, being only that Isaiah well said of the hypocrites of his age, which is true of the like hypocrites in every age; so meaning, in other words, ‘he said what exactly suits you, inasmuch that he could not have spoken otherwise, if he had really had respect unto you.’ So, too, Dr. Hammond, Bp. Pearce, Abp. Newc., and Dr. Campb. This, however, I consider an altogether unnecessary, and, indeed, objectionable lowering and explaining away of a very weighty and even august term, since the words thus introduced are those of Ἰησοῦν himself. Accordingly, I now agree with Vi-

tringa, Hoffm., and Dr. Henderson, on Is. xxix. 13, that there is not here even an accommodation, or application, by way of illustration, of the words of Isaiah; but that we are warranted in interpreting the words literally of prophecy. So Vitringa: "Demonstrat DOMINUS in his verbis Prophetiam de hominibus sui temporis; et quidem de Pharisæis quos ibidem redarguit." So Bishop Lonsdale, in his late Annotations on the Gospels well remarks: "We here learn that these words of Isaiah, originally spoken concerning the religious state of the Jews in his day, were spoken prophetically, and no less truly, concerning the religious state of the Scribes and Pharisees in our Lord's days." It would, however, have been better to say, 'the words of Jehovah recorded by the Prophet Isaiah, &c.' I find this view confirmed by Euthym, who says (doubtless copying some ancient Greek Father): "Ἀγνὶ (Christus) τὸν προφῆτην εἰς μῖσος, πάλαι κατηγοροῦντα αὐτῶν ἂ νῦν οὗτος (read αὐτός) κατηγορήσῃ· καὶ δεικνύσιν, ὅτι αὐτός ἐστιν ὁ κἀκεῖνα δι' ἰκεῖνου (Isaiah) φθγγόμοις. It was to be expected that the Evangelist should use προφ. and not a simple verb of speaking, since we have supra, v. 4, ὁ Θεὸς ἐντεταλατο, not Μωσῆς εἶπεν, as in Mark. Dr. Henderson well observes, that "while the Prophet [rather God through the mouth of the Prophet] rebuked his contemporaries, his inspired declaration [rather the declarations of God through him] stands on record, as a perpetual rebuke of the evil [rather, the same vice], and bore pre-eminently [rather, looked forward to, foresaw] its fullest development in the religion of the Scribes and Pharisees." There is nothing to censure, but rather approve, in the view taken by Grot., who regards what is here recorded as another fulfilment of the same prophecy [DIVINE declarative prediction]: "Sciendum est (enim) posse unum idemque vaticinium, plus semel impleri; ita ut et huic et illi temporì conveniat, non solo eventu, sed Divinâ etiam verborum directione." That it was meant quite as much for the then state of things in Judæa, may be inferred from the words of the Prophet which follow the passage here quoted, and which are adduced by St. Paul, 1 Cor. i. 19, ἀποκλῶ τὴν σοφίαν τῶν σοφῶν, καὶ τὴν σύναν τῶν συναντῶν ἀθετήσω, which words, as observes Dr. Henders., 'contain a special prediction of the awful judgment that God would inflict on the Jewish nation by means of the infatuation of their Teachers, which received its fulfilment in the days of Christ and his Apostles; for their blind infatuation and deep hypocrisy went far to bring about the destruction of Jerusalem, the downfall of the State, and the dispersion of the Nation.' But if v. 14 has evidently that application, why should not v. 13, espec. as closely connected with it, so as to form a common sentence?

8. The words ἔγγιζει—καὶ are absent from MSS. B, D, and L, and 2 cursive ones, with most of the Versions and several Fathers (to which Jacks. adds Euseb.), and they are cancelled by Griesb., L., and T. But the evidence is only sufficient to occasion suspicion, not to warrant exclusion. Internal evidence ought to be strong indeed to balance so overwhelming a weight of external authority (for I find the words in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies); and the former is here not entirely against the words. The words may have been introduced from the Prophet; but they may also have been removed in those 5 copies because not in Mark, and not necessarily required for the purpose in view. Hence the authority of Versions (except the Pesch. Syr.), is not so weighty as that of MSS.; and that of Fathers is far less so, espec. considering that some of them had probably in mind the passage of Mark, not that of Matt.—So at least Chrys., from whom, and from Origen, the passage may have been curtailed. I doubt not that Matt. wrote the passage as it stands in our text. rec., and that Mark, thinking the above words not essential to his purpose, removed them, agreeably to his custom of condensing where permissible, and enlarging where necessary. The variations from the Sept. (which the Evang. here followed) are next to none: the chief variation is the placing of καὶ between ἀνθ. and διδασκ., which, however, has nothing to correspond to it in the Hebrew; and also a transposition of the words διδασκ. and ἐντάλ., arising prob. from some confusion in the copies, caused by the carelessness of scribes. In v. 9, both the Sept. and St. Matthew differ not a little from the Heb.; and the discrepancy is such as cannot be removed, unless by resorting to so bold an alteration of the Hebrew text as sober criticism will not permit. For though there is no doubt, that for τῇ τῇ Sept. read τῇ τῇ, and for πῶς πῶς read πῶς πῶς; yet although these are slight alterations, they ought not to be admitted, on authority far greater than that of any Version, nor indeed all the Versions; because they break up the construction of the whole sentence, the ὅ γὰρ (inasmuch as) at the beginning of the 13th verse corresponding to γὰρ (therefore) at the beginning of v. 14. The words of the Prophet may literally be rendered, 'Their worship of me is [only] a taught commandment of men, or dictated by their injunction;' i.e. their religion rests only on the precepts of men's teaching, i.e. according to the tradition of the elders, and the interpretation of the Scribes. So that, upon the whole, though there be a discrepancy in words, there is little or none in sense, forming what Hoffmann calls a versio exegetica.

9. ἐντάλμ. ἀνθρ.] i.e. the injunctions, or edicts, of men as contrasted with the commands of God, called in N. T. ἐντολαί. So Mark adds ἀφέντες γὰρ τὴν ἐντολὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ κ.τ.λ. Render, 'teaching as doctrines the injunctions of men;' meaning, teaching as doctrines of God what are the mere injunctions of men. This construction comes under the head of Apposition, as in Luke ii. 30. Rom. viii. 25. Eph. i. 7. ii.

πων. ¹⁰ ^d Καὶ προσκαλεσάμενος τὸν ὄχλον, εἶπεν αὐτοῖς: ^d ^{Mark 7. 14.} Ἀκούετε καὶ συνιέτε! ¹¹ Οὐ τὸ εἰσερχόμενον εἰς τὸ στόμα κοινοῖ τὸν ἄνθρωπον· ἀλλὰ τὸ ἐκπορευόμενον ἐκ τοῦ στόματος, τοῦτο κοινοῖ τὸν ἄνθρωπον. ¹² Τότε προσελθόντες οἱ μαθηταὶ [αὐτοῦ] † εἶπον αὐτῷ· Οἶδας, ὅτι οἱ Φαρισαῖοι ἀκούσαντες τὸν λόγον, ἐσκανδαλίσθησαν; ¹³ Ὁ δὲ ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπε· Πᾶσα φυτεία, ^e ^{John 8. 12.} ἣν οὐκ ἐφύτευσεν ὁ Πατὴρ μου ὁ οὐράνιος, ἐκριζωθήσεται. ¹⁴ † Ἀφετε αὐτούς· ὁδηγοὶ εἰσι τυφλοὶ τυφλῶν τυφλὸς δὲ τυφ- ^f ^{Infra 23. 16.} ^{Luke 9. 39.}

15. 1 Thess. v. 8. Of course, the Apposition is equiv. to καπερ, and hence the καὶ, which Fritz. requires here, is unnecessary. Whether the Sept. meant that by the καὶ introduced, may be doubted—more probably the Vulg. et. As respects the Psch. Syr. and Arab., the rendering, ‘doctrines of human commandments,’ is a free version, though well representing the sense of the Hebrew. To turn from words to things; to teach these mere injunctions of men as doctrines of God, is authoritatively to impose them on the conscience as observances of intrinsic goodness and necessary to salvation. See Bp. Taylor’s Works, xiii. 74.

10. προσκ. τὸν ὄχλον, &c.] Euthym. observes, that, having silenced and put down the objectors, our Lord leaves them as incorrigible, and turns his discourse to the multitude (so called in opposition to the persons of note, the learned and the Pharisees). Comp. John vii. 49, ὁ ὄχλος οὗτος ὁ μὴ γινώσκων τὸν νόμον,—and to them, as better disposed, and more capable of profiting, he addresses the justification of what his disciples had done,—and couches it under a great principle, on which the case in question turned; introducing the explanation by a not unusual form of speech, requesting such attention as might produce a competent understanding.

11. By τὸ εἰσερχόμενον εἰς τὸ στόμα is meant, ‘what entereth into his mouth as food.’ (Xen. Cyr. i. 6, 17, uses τὰ εἰσιόντα) and τὸ ἐκπορευόμενον ἐκ τοῦ στόματος (as we learn from the explanation at vv. 18, 19), ‘evil discourse, emanating from corrupt hearts.’ Κοινοὶ for κοινὸν ποιῶν. Comp. the passages of Plato and Philo cited by me in Recens. Syn.

In thus speaking, our Lord did not intend to abrogate the distinction between clean and unclean things for food. His meaning was only this; that nothing which they should eat was naturally per se impure (and therefore such as could defile the mind of man); but was only so by accident, from the quality, or quantity, by excess. As the best comment on this passage, compare the fuller explanation infra v. 17—20, and xii. 35, 37.

To complete the present narration there should be supplied from Mark vii. 16, 17, εἰ τις ἔχει ὥτα ἀκούειν, ἀκούτω. Καὶ ὅσα ἐσθλὰ ἐκ οἴκου ἀπὸ τοῦ ὄχλου, &c. for the words εἰς, &c., would be a very proper conclusion to so serious an address; and it is plain from the air of the words following, that they were not pronounced in the presence of the multitude, and while the Pharisees remained, but after they had withdrawn from thence, and (as we find from Mark) had returned home.

12. εἶπον αὐτῷ] Lachm. and (in his 2nd ed.) Tisch. edit, from B, D, and 6 other MSS., λέγουσιν αὐ., which reading has internal evidence in its favour (see note supra xiii. 28, and Mark vi. 31), but not sufficient external evidence to warrant its adoption. There is even less authority for the cancelling of αὐτοῦ just before; and internal evidence is rather against it, since it was probably cancelled to remove a sort of cacophony in αὐτοῦ αὐτῷ.

—τὸν λόγον] not ‘the word’ of God, or of the Lord, as Bp. Middl.; but the word before spoken, as Euthym. explains, which involves no violation of the doctrine of the Article.

13. φυτεία] The word properly signifies ‘a planting,’ or ‘setting;’ but by metonymy the plant itself, and here, taken generically, denotes the doctrines, or traditions in question, by an allusion to the mind as soil, and precepts as plants, just as the Word is elsewhere called seed (comp. John xv. 2); a comparison familiar both to the Hebrews (comp. Matt. xiii. 23, 38. John xv. 2. 1 Cor. iii. 6. Psalt. Sal. xiv. 3, ἡ φυτεία αὐτῶν ἐρριζωμένη εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα) and to the Greeks. See the passages cited by Kypke and others. By the ‘planting not planted of God,’ must here be meant the plantation, or system of doctrines (comp. 1 Cor. iii. 6, ἐγὼ ἐφύτυνα) of the Pharisees, doctrines of purely human, not of Divine planting, as being, says Euthym., ἡ παράδοσις τῶν πρεσβυτέρων καὶ τὰ ἐντάλματα τῶν ἀνθρώπων (as opp. to ἡ διδασκαλία τοῦ Θεοῦ). Nevertheless, from Tertullian D. Præscr. Hæret. c. 3, it appears to have been applied to the false system of teaching of Heresy, as opp. to the truth of God, as preserved in his Church Catholic. And so Const. Apost. l. i. c. 1, Θεοῦ φυτεία, ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία.

14. ὁδηγοὶ εἰσι τυφλοὶ τυφλῶν] Render, ‘they are blind guides of blind persons.’ No little force is conveyed by the juxtaposition (as in the passage of Sextus Empir. cited by Wets.) of these two prominent expressions, though spoiled in the reading τυφλ. εἰσι ὁδ. τυφλ. edited by L. and T. from a few MSS., evidently an alteration proceeding from purblind Critics, and adopted, alas! by blind guides. Our Lord does not deny, but admits, that they are guides; and indeed they themselves (as appears from what is said at Rom. ii. 19, 20) claimed to be such, nay more, even ὁδηγοὶ τυφλῶν, διδάσκαλοι νηπίων, and other boastful titles; and such is implied here; our Lord meaning to say, they claim to be guides of the blind, when they themselves are blind, and therefore unable to guide themselves, much less others. The blindness in question was, of course, one not so much of the understanding, as of the heart; the latter deceiving the former. So in Is. xlv. 20, it is said, "a deceived heart hath turned him aside."

^{15.} παραβολήν] The sense of the word here is, 'a moral maxim,' or 'weighty apophthegm.' It is not that Peter did not understand it (for it was by no means obscure, inasmuch that our Lord says καὶ ὑμεῖς ἀσύνετοί ἐστε); but that his prejudices prevented his receiving it. Indeed he could scarcely believe his ears, that a distinction of meats availed not; and therefore asks an explanation.

^{16.} ἀκμήν] Put adverbially for ἔτι, 'even yet,' as not unfrequently in the later Class. writers.

^{17.} ἀφεδρῶνα] A word of the Macedonian dialect, no where else occurring. From its etymon (ἀπό and ἔδρα) it signifies a place apart, and thence a privy, said, by a euphemism, for κοπρών.

^{18—20.} Here our Lord proceeds to say what does defile the man; namely, evil words, as emanating from corrupt hearts. Comp. James iii. 6. He then traces the effects of both, in the principal vices which pollute man; all originating in evil concupiscence. Comp. James i. 14, 15. On the exact force of the terms διαλογισμοὶ πονηροὶ, φόνοι, μοιχεῖαι, πορνείαι, κλοπαί, ψευδομαρτυρίαι, βλασφημίαι, see notes on Mark vii. 21, 23, where they are classified and arranged in regular order.

^{21.} εἰς τὰ μέρη Τύρου καὶ Σ.] Namely, the confines of Tyro and Sidon. As our Lord seems not to have actually entered into the Gentile territories, we may here (with Grot.) interpret eis versus, towards; as answering to our ward in toward. Or, if that be thought too great a licence, we may take μέρη as said for μεθόρια, which is used by Mark. Now μεθόριον denoted a strip of land situated between two countries, but properly belonging to neither; though sometimes reckoned to one or the other. So often in Thucyd.

^{22.} γυνὴ Χαναναία] Called by Mark Ἑλληνιστὴ Συροφοίνισσα, i. e. a Gentile, a Phœnician of Syria. Συροφ. was said by way of distinction from the Phœnicians of Africa, or the Carthaginians. Χαναναία here seems to have been used, and not the more precise term Φοιν., because in the earlier Syro-Chaldee original there was written פנינים. Indeed, it should seem that the word Φοιν. had not been introduced into the vulgar Hebrew; for the word nowhere occurs in the Hebrew of the O. T., but only in the Greek of the books of the Maccabees. That Canaan (as Gesenius observes in his Heb. Lex. in v. פנין) was the domestic name of the same people whom the Greeks called Phœnicians, is evident from the Phœnician medals, on which we find the word פנין. And so the inhabitants of these parts are called Canaanites in Num. xiii. 29. Judg. i. 80, sqq., but 'Phœnicians' in the Sept. Vers. of Exod. vi. 15. Josh. v. 1, but in Hebr. of the above passages 'Canaanites.' In the Sept. (as might be expected) the names Phœnicia and the land of Canaan; Phœnicians and Canaanites are used promiscuously.

The woman was a Gentile by birth, though not, as some have supposed, a proselyte, but a heathen by religion, called Ἑλληνιστὴ by Mark (vii. 25). Yet it does not at all follow that she was an idolatrix; for many Gentiles in those parts were believers in the one true God, and felt much respect for the Jewish worship, though they did not profess it. The word Κύρις, by which she addresses Christ, must, as is plain from the viti David following, mean Lord, not Sir, or Master, as Abp. Newcome and Campb. render. The woman might easily have learnt both the doctrine of a Messiah, and the appellation Κύριος, from the Jews. It appears from St. Clement (Homil. ii. 19), that the name of the woman was Justa, and that of her daughter Bernice; and it appears from that passage and others, adduced by Anger. Harmon., that the preachers of the Gospel in the time of Clement used to sojourn in their journeyings across that border-land at the house of Bernice. For a particular explanation of this narrative, showing the peculiar propriety of our Lord's conduct, in making the manner in which he complied with the request of the Greek heathen (ordained by the providence of God to be one of the first Heathen proselytes) a type of the mode in which the Gentiles should be received, see Horsley's Sermons, vol. iii., and Jortin's Works, ix. 239. — ἐκραύγασεν] This may, with most recent Expositors, be construed with λέγ.; but better with αὐτῷ, as thus yielding a stronger and more definite sense; a mode also confirmed by the similar expression, v. 23, κράζει ὀπισθεν ἡμῶν, and by another at Psalm cxlviii. 9, compared with Job xxxviii. 41.

23. ἀπόλυσον αὐτήν] 'dismiss her;' viz., with the grant of the favour she asks; as appears from vv. 24, 26; our Lord's answer, in which it is implied.

24. ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν.] It is not precisely said to whom the answer was addressed. But it seems most natural to suppose it meant of the last persons speaking, namely, the disciples; and so almost all the Paraphrasts, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., Arab., and Pers. Versions; and that it is required by the nature of the disciples' request, which was evidently one for help to be given her. Yet the answer may have been meant for the woman as well as the disciples, to let her know, as well as the disciples, why he had not complied with their request, nor her entreaty, not even by a word.

— οὐκ ἀπεστάλην, &c.] As the Gospel was first (see Acts xiii. 46) to be preached to the Jews, so our Lord might seem sent peculiarly to them. And accordingly he never did extend his ministration beyond the Jews, at least with such rare exceptions as that in the present case, by personal help. And during his lifetime he caused the offer to be confined to the Jews. Thus, in his injunctions to the Apostles sent to evangelize, he directs them (Matt. x. 5, 6) not to go to the Gentiles, but πορεύεσθαι εἰς τὰ πρόβατα τὰ ἀπολωλότα τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ. So called ἀπολωλότα, with reference to the utter neglect of all due pastoral care by their spiritual shepherds, or chief priests.

27. The woman, we see, uses the same diminutive form as our Lord did,—a form, I would observe, not necessarily conveying contempt (and certainly not hère), but mostly in the Class. an expression of affection towards the humble and attached dependants of the human family, and deserving to be cherished and suitably fed as such, viz. with the fragments of the meal, after the family have eaten as much as they choose. The woman, we see, with female tact, lays hold on this favourable point, thus converting what had the aspect of a slight into a plea to be fed with the crumbs of mercy. The custom here alluded to was one common both to Jews and Gentiles of which I have adduced several examples (in addition to those of Wets.); the most apposite of which (as illustrating the case of such dogs as are in the passage of Mark spoken of as being under the table, namely, domestic dogs), and as presenting almost a picture, is the following: Liban. Orat. 182, C, πρὸς τῆς τραπέζης (read τῆς τραπέζης) κύων οὐ μέγα (equiv. to κυνάριον here) ἐπὶ τοῖν ὀπίσω σκελοῖν ἵζανων, πρὸς αὐτὴν διέβλεπε τὴν τραπέζην κεκνηνός, ὅπως εὐτρεπὲς ἔχοι (read ἔχη) τὸ στόμα πρὸς τὸ ριπτούμενον. The ancients, and some moderns (as Grotius, Le Clerc, Elsn., Schleus., and others), take ναί to import, not 'entreaty' (as others), but assent; which, indeed, is most agreeable to the answer. And though ἀλλὰ does not follow,—as it properly should,—yet, in such pathetic sentences, regularity is overlooked. Here (as often) γάρ has reference to a short clause omitted, to be thus supplied: 'True, Lord! [but extend a small portion of thy help and mercy towards me;] for even (καὶ) the dogs.' &c.

28. Ὡ γύναι, μεγάλη σου ἡ πίστις.] An address of bland courtesy (as at Luke xiii. 12). See note on John iv. 21.

29. εἰς τὸ ὄρος.] Not 'to a mountain,' but, 'to the mountain'; the mountainous cliff, or ridge, which skirts the lake on all sides; and here that to the east must, as appears from Mark vii. 31, be meant.

— ἐκάθητο ἐκεῖ.] Not 'sat down there,' but, 'took post,' 'fixed himself' there as a temporary sojourn. Comp. the very similar passage of John vi. 3, καὶ ἐκεῖ ἑκάθ., and so often in Sept., as 2 Kings xviii. 8. Comp. xxvii. 14. And so Acts ii. 2, οὗ ἦσαν καθήμενοι, commorantes. Schleus., indeed, says that this occurs in the Class. writers; but the two examples he adduces are only of the sense desidere. Accordingly this must be regarded as Hellenistic Greek, formed on the use of the Hebr. שָׁכַן, though of that the only certain example is in Judg. v. 17, where Sept. has παροίκησα, 'sojourned.' Our Lord, it seems, made a brief sojourn on some high ground of the rocky cliff of the lake, during which he healed multitudes of disorders of the very worst class, such as were usually deemed quite incurable, and worked one signal miracle recorded in Mark xii. 32—37, on a κωφὸς μογιᾶλος. See note there.

30. κυλλούς] The Commentators have not made it clear what is meant by this term, and how it differs from χῳλοὺς. In my Recens. Synop. and the two first editions of the present work, I explained it (after Kypke) to mean a person with a distorted limb, like our club-foot. And that the word should have that sense, would seem probable from its derivation; it being cognate with κοῖλος. And that it in fact had such a sense is placed beyond doubt by the evidence adduced by Kypke, espec. from Hippocrates. Yet the adoption of it here is precluded by the use of the word in the only other passages of the N. T., where it occurs, infra xviii. 8. xv. 31. Mark ix. 43, 45, where the sense in question is utterly inapplicable; and the term must plainly mean maimed (ἀνὰ πῃρος), and, as appears from the latter, maimed in the hand, or hands, or the feet; a sense equally applicable, and therefore certainly to be adopted, in the present case. To account for this strange variety of meaning, we may suppose (as in the case of some other words) that the two senses had originally two different terms to express them; and that these came at length, by carelessness, to be merged into one. The two terms were, I apprehend, κυλλός, cognate with κοῖλος, and explained by Hesych. κάμπυλος, and κόλλος, or κόλος, which, as we learn from the Greek Lexicographers, meant κάλλυβος or κόλλυβος; and was equivalent to ἀνὰ πῃρος: a sense which the word might well have, as being derived from κόλω, cognate with κολούω, to curtail. But to turn to the present case; as ὑγιεῖς follows, which would not be applicable to the supplying of a limb wanting, it is best to take the word as used, like our word maimed, of such a grievous hurt as deprives of the use of a limb.

31. κωφοὺς] dumb, as supra ix. 32. xii. 22. Luke i. 22. xi. 4. and Sept. in Hab. ii. 18, rather unfreq. in Class.; and the passages adduced by the Lexx., Hdot. i. 34, and Xen. Cyr. vii. 2, 20, are uncertain, for it is not clearly made out whether the son of Cressus was dumb or deaf; and the probability is that he was both, deaf and dumb, as those born deaf always are. See Aristot. Hist. An. iv. 9. The only examples I know of are Soph. frag. 595, κωφὴν, ἀναυδόν. Aristoph. Ach. 681, οὐδὲν ὄντας, ἀλλὰ κωφούς καὶ παρεξηγημένους, lit. 'out of whistle.' But in this use the pure Greek writers generally thought it necessary to eujoin a term fixing the sense. As to the passage adduced from Xen. Cyrop. iii. 1—19, τυφλοὺς ἢ

 τῆσαι (comp. Levit. xix. 14, with Deut. xxvii. 18), there the sense, as the Commentators ought to have seen, is deaf and dumb. From this passage, and the first-mentioned one of Xen., there is little doubt that most, if not all, of the persons here spoken of were deaf and dumb. The case of the κωφὸς μογιᾶλος in Mark vii. 32, was somewhat different. See note.

— ἐδόξ. τὸν Θεὸν Ἰσραὴλ] Mr. Alf. thinks this last word Ἰσ. was added to the rest, as an expression of joy on the part of the disciples themselves. But surely it is far more applicable to the multitude, who, from the situation of the place (which I have before traced out), were probably almost all Gentiles. It would be nearer the truth to say, that the word Ἰσραὴλ is meant to be emphatic, in tacit opposition to the so-called gods of the heathen. The Gentile beholders of those wondrous miracles might well glorify the God of Israel, seeing that all this was done by the power of the God of Israel alone, since no other could effect it. From the turn of the expression, which is one very rare, I am inclined to think that the Evangelist had in mind Ps. lxxii. 'Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, who alone doest wondrous things' (θαυμάσια)—words ushered in by πάντα τὰ ἔθνη μακαριούνει αὐτόν. Comp. Ps. lxxvi. 8. 'Among the [heathen] gods there is none like unto Thee, O Lord; there is not one that can do as Thou doest. All the nations (πάντα τὰ ἔθνη. Sept.) shall glorify Thy name,' δοξάσουσι τὸ ὄνομα σου. The expression occurs elsewhere only in 2 Chron. vi. 16, and in Luke i. 68, εὐλογητὸς Κύριος ὁ Θεὸς τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ,—an ejaculation likely to have come now from the by-standing disciples, who not only glorified Him as a God in covenant with his people (for that any by-standing pious Jews sojourning there might do), but as having sent the promised Messiah in the person of Jesus of Nazareth.

32. ὅτι ἤδη ἡμέραι τρεῖς—μοι] In this passage, while the sense is plain, the reading is disputable. The textus receptus and the bulk of the MSS. have ἡμέρας; while a considerable number of the most ancient and the best MSS., and some Fathers have ἡμέραι, which has been received by all the Critical Editors from Weta. to Scholz, on the ground of its being the more difficult reading. Yet this introduces an intolerable harshness; for, as Fritz. observes, who ever heard of ἡμέραι τρεῖς for ἡμέρας τρεῖς? This he would remove by inserting εἰς, καὶ after τρεῖς, on the authority of two MSS., two Versions, and some Fathers. But, not to say that the authority is far too slender, we have thus only an exchange of one harshness for another, in the

καὶ before προσμένονσι, which, followed by another καὶ, is scarcely to be tolerated. The difficulty may be better removed by supposing an ellipsis of εἰσι (supplied in D and a few other copies), and either regarding ἥδη τρεῖς ἡμέραι as an interposed clause, to be pointed off by commas; or, if that be thought too harsh, by taking προσμένονσι as not a verb, but a participle predated. The confounding of the two, one with the other, is not unfrequent. Thus in Thucyd. iii. 31, it is only very recently that Critics have seen that ἐφορμῶσι (or rather, as I have shown ought there to be read, ἐφορμούσι) is not a verb, but a participle. Thus the construction will be perfectly regular, and agreeable to a very frequent idiom (on which see Math. Gr. Gr. § 390), e. gr. Xen. Hist. ii. 1, 27, ἔπει ἡμέρα ἢ πέμπτη ἐπιπλέονσι τοῖς 'Aθ'. Thus the literal sense will be: 'There are now three days to them continuing with me,' &c. If, however, it should be thought that the verb subst. in this idiom cannot be dispensed with (though it would seem to be partly supplied by the ἥδη, which almost implies it), we might insert εἰσι after τρεῖς, on the authority of the above MSS., Versions, and Fathers, but reject the καὶ, as having been introduced by certain sciolists who were ignorant of the true construction. The εἰσι might be absorbed by the εἰς preceding. I cannot, however, recommend the reception of εἰσι, because it has exceedingly slender external authority (I find it in not a single copy of the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.); and internal evidence is quite against it. The text I have adopted is confirmed by the support of all the Lamb. MSS. except 3, and of all the Mus. ones except 1, and by the suffrage of Lach. and Tisch. As to the ellipsis of αὐτοῖς, it is by no means harsh. It is in the passage of Thucydides expressed, at least according to the reading αὐτοῖς, approved by Poppo, and rightly received by Arnold.

— τί φάγωσι] The commentators regard the τι as put for ὅ. But pure Grecism would rather require ὅ τι, as in Crates, Θηρία, frag. iii. 3, p. 81, Meineck: Οὐκ ἄρ' ἐτ' οὐδὲν κρεῖας—οὐδ' ὅ τι ἐδυνάσθη.

³⁹ ἀνέβη] So, for ἐνέβη, Fritz., Lach., and Tisch. read, on the authority of many MSS., Versions, and early Edd.; Scholz alone retaining the Vulg. External authority is nearly equally balanced for either; though the most ancient and best MSS. (including nearly all the Lamb. and Mus. copies) have ἀνέβη; and internal evidence is in favour of ἀνέβη, which, from its comparative uncommonness, might easily be changed to the ordinary term ἐνέβη; though it is of unexceptionable propriety, occurring in the N. T. infra at Mark vi. 51, and perhaps supra xiv. 32; in the Sept. at Jonas i. 3, ἀνέβη εἰς αὐτόν, scil. τὸ πλοῖον, also in the best Classical writers, Homer and Thucydides; though confined almost entirely to the earlier authors, the later writers using ἐμβαῖν. Yet ἀναβαῖν, as it was probably the original and appropriate term, so it always continued in use in the common dialect, and from thence was introduced into the Sept. and the New Test.

— εἰς τὰ ὄρια Μαγδαλά] Mark says εἰς τὰ μέρη Δαλμανουθά. Yet there is no real discrepancy; since ὄρια here (as not unfrequently in the Hellenistic phraseology) may mean territory; and Dalmanutha was a small town about three or four miles south of Magdala, and therefore probably in its district. All the difference is, that Mark's account is the more definite, while both are equally true. Thus in Soph. frag. 647, we have ὄρια καλιύθου to denote the road itself. But it should rather seem that the situation in question was a sort of border-land between Magdala and Dalmanutha, and, like the Thurea in Peloponnesus, debatable between Magdala and Dalm., being on the utmost verge of Magd., and yet as being claimed by Dalm., was by some thought to form a part or tract of Dalm. I doubt not that the vessel came to land at the mouth of the present river Lymoun, where the Lym. and another stream come to a confluence; and that this debatable tract was the strip of land running up the country between those streams, so that the people of Dalm. accounted the Lymoun as the border, but those of Magd. the other stream, having the intermediate strip of land, where our Lord and his Apostles sojourned, debatable. That Magedan is wrongly edited by L. and T. on the authority of a very few MSS., is plain from the name Megdol at this day given to the place.

XVI. 1—4. See Mark viii. 10—12, and Luke xii. 54, and notes.

Φαρισαῖοι καὶ Σαδδουκαῖοι, πειράζοντες, ἐπηρώτησαν αὐτὸν σημεῖον ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἐπιδείξαι αὐτοῖς. ² Ὁ δὲ ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Ὁψίας γενομένης λέγετε· Εὐδία· πυρρᾷζει γὰρ ὁ οὐρανός· ³ καὶ πρῶτ' Σήμερον χειμῶν πυρρᾷζει γὰρ στυγνᾶζων ὁ οὐρανός. Ὑποκριταί! τὸ μὲν πρόσσωπον τοῦ οὐρανοῦ γινώσκετε διακρίνειν, τὰ δὲ σημεῖα τῶν καιρῶν οὐ δύνασθε;

1. πειράζοντες] scil. αὐτὸν (expressed in Mark) for εἰς τὸ πειράζειν αὐτόν, 'in order to try him,' 'put to the proof' his pretensions to be the Christ. The term implies the false pretence which dictated the asking for the sign. They had already resisted the clearest evidence of miracles; and they now demanded a sign from heaven (one coming from thence, visible to all on earth, and thus proving him to be the Christ. See on supra xii. 38), hoping thereby to throw Jesus into a dilemma, by asking what might have been now improper for him to grant, that so his refusal to comply with the request might lower him in the eyes of the people. Sufficient evidence they had already resisted; and they now only asked for more, in order to scoff the more. So the Jews, at his Crucifixion, asked him to come down from the cross, and said that then they would believe on him. 'But, in such a case, to grant the request were as useless as the demand itself was unreasonable; since, thus hardened and impenitent, neither would they have believed though one rose from the dead.'

— ἐπιρρ. σημ. ἰ. τ. ο.] It is not, as it might seem, surprising, that they should have, on this and other occasions, demanded of our Lord a sign from heaven. That was, by the blindness of Jewish superstition, regarded as the main test of Divine authority; for they ignorantly imagined that the false gods of the heathen could give signs, show forth miracles, on earth; while signs from heaven, they allowed, could proceed only from the true God of heaven. See the Apocryphal Epistle of Jerem. v. 67. In favour of such a notion they pleaded several passages of the Old Test., but on the present occasion utterly in vain.

2. The words ὀψίας—δύνασθε have no place in the Vat. MS., 2 other uncial ones, and a few cursive MSS. and Latin codices; but no critical editor has rejected them; and they were doubtless cancelled by the early Biblical Critics, on the same frivolous grounds with not a few other passages.

— εὐδία] sub. ἵσταί. The Jews, and, indeed, the Greeks and Romans, were attentive observers of all prognostics of weather, fair or foul; and many similar sayings are adduced from both the Rabbinical and Classical writers by the Commentators; as Polyb. iv. 21. 1. Plin. H. N. xviii. 35.

3. πυρρῶ. στυγνᾶζων] If it be true, as the Lexicographers affirm, that the proper sense of στυγνός and στυγνᾶζω is when used to express sadness or gloominess in the visage, and thence tropically, as here, of the sky to be dull or dark, that would involve a no inconsiderable anomaly; for the proper sense of a word should be physical, out of which may arise the figurative. I still think that such is in reality the case in the present instance. Why, I would ask, should not στυγνᾶζων signify lowering in the physical sense of becoming low, as the sky seems to do in dark weather? So στυγνότης τοῦ περιέχοντος (caeli) is found used in Polyb. iv. 21. 1, of a lowering sky, with allusion to which we have in Eurip. Alc. 777, στυγνῶ προσώπῳ καὶ ξυμφυρμένῳ, of 'a lowering look and knitted brows.' And well may the word have this sense, for it is rightly derived by Lennep. Etym. from στυγνός, derived from στυγνός (cognate with στύφω), from στυγνός, to stuff up; then στυγνός will be stuffed up, thick (namely, with clouds and vapours), and consequently darksome. And so Wisd. xvii. 5, στυγνὴν νύκτα. This is exactly the case in the instance of our adj. sad, which, after all, is best derived by the undervalued etymological skill of S. Johnson, from an obsolete past participle of to sag, 'to weigh or load down'; sag'd being softened to sad. And this is confirmed by our old, and now vulgar, use of sad for heavy; though Spenser says, 'more sad than lump of lead.' And such seems the sense in Milt. Par. Lost, ix. 1002, 'Sky low'd, and,—muttering thunder—some sad drops wept,' &c.; such heavy drops as are prelude to a coming storm, espec. when preceded, as here, by earthquake.

— ὕποκριταί] Lachm. and Tisch. cancel the word, on the authority of several MSS., three of them very ancient. But the weight of external authority is in its favour; and still more internal evidence, as existing in the circumstance, that, while several reasons may be imagined for its being removed, not one can be imagined for its being introduced. It had place, we find, in the MSS. used by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Transl., and was, I suspect, only put out by certain Critics, whose purpose it was to remove what seemed to them a term too strong for the occasion, but, as Bp. Jebb has shown, from a very erroneous estimate of our Lord's character,—'attenuating his gracious mildness into a tame meekness, quite remote from the Divine reality; un mindful of the indignant severity of reproof, on fit occasions, employed towards presumptuous or hypocritical offenders.' Nevertheless, the same class of Critics have used the same licence on other occasions, as infra xxiii. 11. Luke xi. 44, where there was no parallel passage from which to introduce it. Besides, it occurs in all the copies at xii. 56, sine v. l., and was not likely to have been interpolated from thence in all the copies except 19 (I find it in all the Mus. and all the Lamb. MSS. except 1, and confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Vers.).

— τὰ δὲ σημεῖα] meaning 'the miraculous events which foreshadowed the coming of the Messiah in his kingdom.' Our Lord intends to intimate that the same serious attention, which made them usually good prognosticators of the weather, had they not been blind to the signs of the times, as they had ever been aforetime, might have enabled them to have discerned, by these signs, the truth of his pretensions.

5. ἐπελάβοντο] Mr. Alf. authoritatively pronounces that this is not put for the pluperf., and he renders, 'they forgot to take bread.' But this is running counter to both ancient and modern Versions and Expositors, I believe, universally. Beza and Fritz. have well seen that there is here a popular brevity of expression, avoided in regular composition, for 'they saw (or 'found') that they had forgotten to take bread;' for, as it is added in the passage of Mark, they had but one loaf with them in the vessel,—a good reason why they should soon perceive their neglect to provide for themselves. This trifling irregularity (which would strike no one but a verbal Critic) is far more tolerable than the sense assigned by Mr. Alf. as follows: 'they forgot to take bread [for their land journey further];—a sense somewhat jejune, and yet only extracted by violence; and it would not help the matter if we were to suppose, with Mr. Alf., that these words were said after another voyage across the lake, which is mentioned by Mark viii. 13, in the words ἔμβας πάλιν εἰς τὸ πλοῖον ἀπῆλθα s. τ. π. Mr. Green is of opinion that this 'departure,' as Matth. calls it, or embarkation to cross to the other side, as Mark with more minute accuracy describes it, was to Bethsaida, which he had left when he went to Magdala. But I doubt this. It is not, indeed, specified by either Matth. or Mark at what point of the lake their journey from the vicinity of Sidon to the lake terminated. It was at some distance south of Bethsaida, and probably nearly opposite to the Dalmanutha mentioned by Mark. And there is a point of mountain range two miles from the lake, and six or seven south of Bethsaida, which is probably the very site. This answers very well to the expression in Matth. xv. 29, παρὰ τὴν θάλασσαν, 'near by,' within a near approach to it, as the Pesch. Syr. and Pers. and Vulg. Versions. And to this very well corresponds the πρὸς τὴν θάλα. of Mark vii. 31,—a somewhat rare use (yet found at Acts v. 10, ἔβαντο πρὸς τὸν ἄνδρα αὐτῆς), and, for that reason, altered to εἰς by the ancient critical revisers, and, as usual, caught up by their humble servants Lachm. and Tisch., from only some dozen MSS. Other Critics adopted the παρὰ of Matth. Be that as it may, the point of forgetfulness on the part of the disciples was, that they had, on leaving Magdala, omitted to provide themselves with bread for their use on reaching Bethsaida, but had not become aware of this until they reached the place, or rather some uninhabited spot adjoining to the point of their disembarkation, which was not, as appears from Mark viii. 22, Bethsaida (i. e. the Bethsaida Juliae), to which, we learn from Mark, they subsequently (probably the next morning) went, but some spot in the vicinity. There would be no difficulty in laying in provisions there for their journey to Cæsarea Philippi.

6. ὁράτε καὶ προσέχετε] A strongly significant phrase intensive by the conjunction of two terms (as in Arrian Epict. i. 3, ὁράτε καὶ προσέχετε, and Exod. xxxi. 13, ὁρ. καὶ φυλάσσετε); thus serving the better to introduce the subsequent earnest caution, evidently suggested by the recent circumstance of the Pharisees and Sadducees, whose base endeavour to ensnare him, their infatuated blindness to the times and the seasons, and their incorrigible profligacy under the veil of hypocrisy—which entitled them to no sign but that at his own resurrection—must have greatly affected our Lord's tender spirit (see Luke xix. 31), and made the subject so uppermost in his thoughts as naturally to find vent in words on the first suitable occasion, by leisure and stillness.

—ἀπὸ τῆς ζύμης] Meaning, as appears from the explanation at v. 12, the doctrine of those sects, designating, it should seem, the whole system of instruction pursued by them, both as regards doctrine and ordinance, teaching by examples, and even practices, since it is at Luke xii. 1, applied to their hypocrisy; nay, from the application of the term by St. Paul (probably with that passage in mind) at 1 Cor. v. 6—8, it may extend to corruptness of heart and immorality of life. See note there. In this strong metaphor there is an allusion to the similar properties of the two things,—the one being penetrating, and rapidly, but imperceptibly, diffusive; the other imperceptibly, but surely, pervasive, depraving the mind (what Milton happily expresses by "all corrupt, both mind and will deprav'd"), and corrupting the principles to the very core.

7. διελογίζοντο—ὅτι ἄρτους οὐκ ἔλ.] Render, not 'reasoned among themselves (for a simple matter of fact would have nothing to do with reasoning), but, 'considered among themselves one with another by reflection, saying,' &c. Of this sense examples occur in Xen. Mem. iii. 5, 1, and Dionys. Hal. Ant. x. 12, διελογίζοντο καὶ συνελάλουν ἀλλήλοις. In the present passage, ἐν ἑαυτοῖς stands for ἐν ἀλλήλοις, equiv. to πρὸς ἀλλήλους, found in the parallel passage of Mark. The ὅτι is by Translators and Commentators generally taken to mean, 'it is [i. e. this was said] because we have taken no bread;' it being supposed that the disciples imagined their Master to have intended thereby to caution them against supplying their present want of bread with such leavened bread as had been made by any Pharisee. It might seem, indeed, scarcely credible that the disciples should have fallen into such a dull misconception, were this not shown to have been actually the case by our Lord's words, v. 11. It appears, however, that while turning this in their minds, and so speaking one to another, their care and anxiety was what they should do (being, as we have seen, in a desert place) for want of the bread they had forgotten to bring with them; which care and anxiety argued the extreme weakness of their faith, even in the face of two such astounding miracles as they had a little before witnessed; and hence drew down the well-merited rebuke from their Master which follows: for they had seemingly forgotten both the miracles, and the impressive lessons which accompanied them.

13—20. Comp. Mark viii. 27—30. Luke ix. 13—21. Here commences the second great Division of our Lord's ministry on earth, introductory to his sufferings and death.

13. ἐλθὼν δὲ—ἠρώτα] Render, 'Now as Jesus was going to,' &c. This sense is required by Mark viii. 27, where it is said that the subsequent conversation took place on the road (viz. from Bethsaida) to the part of the country in question whither they were going, called by Matt. τὰ μέρη Καισαρείας, by Mark τὰς κώμας, in which latter we have a more exact designation, though involving no real discrepancy, since τὰ μέρη designates the 'country parts,' in opposition to the city; just as at xv. 21, τὰ μέρη Τύρου καὶ Σιδ., and Mark viii. 10, τὰ μέρη Γαλαμ.

—τίνα με λέγουσι, &c.] τίς, for ποῖον as v. 15. Mark viii. 27. 29. 1 Cor. iii. 5, or ποῖον τίνα, as Hdot. iii. 34. Bp. Middl. has shown that the interpretation of Beza and others, which supposes a double interrogation ('whom do men say that I am? the Son of man?'), would involve an intolerable harshness, not to say solecism. Yet, as the common reading and construction is thought liable to some objection, he thinks the conjecture of Adler probable, that the received reading was made up of two, viz.: τίνα με λέγουσιν οἱ ἄνθρωποι εἶναι (which is the reading of Mark and Luke); and of τίνα λέγουσιν οἱ ἄνθρωποι εἶναι τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου; which Adler thinks is the true reading of St. Matthew. The με is, indeed, not found in the Vatican MS., and several Versions and Fathers. But this authority is quite insufficient. In a single MS. the με might be omitted by accident,—as is often the case with this and other pronouns. That the scribe of the Vat. B (or of its Archetype) did unintentionally omit the με, is not improbable, since in MS. C the με is put after λέγουσι: and variation of position often tends to omission. As to the Vulg. not having the pronoun (though even there the Lamb. copy, of the seventh century, has the pronoun), the authority of that Version is overbalanced by the testimony of the Italic, which has the pronoun. The use of the pron. here seems called for by its use in the next verse and in the parallel passages of Mark and Luke. Nor can the commonly received reading be said to involve any thing really objectionable as regards the sense. We may suppose that the purpose of our Lord in asking his disciples what men thought of Him, was only to hear what they thought of Him; and where wrong, to set them right. On no former occasion did our Lord so directly style Himself the Son of man, an appellation which, it is plain from Luko xxii. 69, sq., was taken by the Jews as equiv. to the Son of God, implying Messiahship. In so doing, our Lord on this, as afterwards on a more solemn occasion (Matt. xxvi. 64), pointed to Himself as being that Son of man spoken of by Daniel, vii. 13, sq. With this reference the question would test the disciples' faith in Him, according as they understood and applied that reference; though he knew that they all stumbled at the doctrine of a suffering, dying Messiah, ignorant then of the great doctrine of the Gospel which it involved; and that our Lord was entitled to be considered the Son of man spoken of by the Prophet; espec. since, though Son of God, he was content for our sakes to become Son of man (as ἐν ὁμοιώματι ἀνθρώπου γενόμενος), and become obedient unto death (Phil. ii. 7, 8) for us men and our salvation. In order to remove these misconceptions, our Lord was pleased to enter into discourse with them on the subject of his death and resurrection, prefacing what he was going to say, on this important topic, by inquiring respecting the opinions commonly entertained regarding himself. Thus he asks: 'What sort of a person do men say that I [who claim to be] the Son of man,' ('take to myself that title'), am?' Now the people at large acknowledged Jesus to be a very extraordinary person; but we find that even those who esteemed him most highly had very inadequate apprehensions of his real character. The highest point (as appears by the

16. In this verse Peter, with his usual promptitude, as the question 'Whom say ye' required, answers in his own name, and in that of his brethren: and his answer is the more remarkable, because every word is emphatic; q. d. Thou, and no other, art the [promised] Christ, the Son of the living God. [Brevis confessio, sed quæ totam summam in se continet: nam sub Christi elogio æternum et Regnum et Sacerdotium comprehenditur, ut Deum nobis reconciliet, ac, expiatis suo sacrificio peccatis, perfectam iustitiam acquirit.] (Calv.)

17. σὰρξ καὶ αἷμ. meaning, according to the sense of the expression in the N. T. and the Rabbinical writers (for it does not occur in the Sept.), Man, as composed of flesh and blood; a designation used with allusion to the grossness and imperfection of mere human nature, whereby it is incapable, without Divine illumination, of understanding sublimely spiritual truths, such as the union in the Godhead of the Father and the Son, and the doctrines thence springing. The full sense is, "Man [in his greatest wisdom], (alluding to the Scribes) hath not taught thee this, but God, 'the Father of lights,' and the Faith by him imparted, whereby thou madest this confession." "Hence," says Calv., "we learn that Faith is to be sought from on high, 'ejusquo laudem gratiæ ejus debere tribui.'" See more in his able note, which is, on this passage, instar omnium.

18, 19. We are now advanced to a passage, of which, as the Church of Rome mainly rests upon its doctrines of the supremacy and infallibility of the Pope, and the power of the Church, we are bound to discuss the sense with especial care. Let us, then, examine the words and clauses in order, as they offer themselves. First, from the very form of expression in Κἀγὼ δὲ σοὶ λέγω, it is plain, that what is now said by Christ is meant to correspond to what had been just said by Peter. As he had declared to Jesus: Σὺ εἶ—ζῶντος, so Jesus says to him: Κἀγὼ δὲ σοὶ λέγω: 'Moreover I also say to thee.' On the next clause ὅτι σὺ εἶ Πέτρος, we are to bear in mind that Peter, or Cephas (for Πέτρος is only Cephas Grecized), was not the original name of this disciple, but a surname, given to him (as was customary with the Jewish Rabbis at the baptism of proselytes) at his conversion (see John i. 43), by anticipative reference to his character, as a Christian professor. And as those names were often given with allusion to some peculiar quality or disposition of the person; so, in the case of Simon, it had reference to that zeal and firmness which he displayed, as well in first making this confession of faith in Christ, as in afterwards building up the Church, and establishing the religion of Christ. So our Lord, in like manner, surnamed James and John Boanerges, sons of thunder, Mark iii. 17. For examples of this kind of Paronomasia in giving names, see Gen. xvii. 5. xxxii. 27, 28, and compare Gen. xxvii. 36; and espec. Isa. xxvi. 4, comp. with Ps. lxxviii. 5, 'Jehovah is the Rock everlasting.' Eurip. Phœn. 645. Æschyl. Prom. 472. Theb. 401. Agam. 670. Πέτρος or Κηφᾶς means, not stone (as some affirm), but Rock, saxum, as πίτρος often does in the best Classical writers, e. gr. Homer, Il. η. 270, γ. 288, π. 411. Pind. Nem. xi. 26, ἀρπάζαντες ἑστὸν πίτρον. Soph. Œd. C. 19, ἐπ' ἀξίστου πίτρον, where the reading of the Florence MS. πάγον ('a rocky cliff') as a gloss. Soph. Œd. C. 1595, τοῦ Θορκίου πίτρον, and espec. Philoct. 272, εὐδοντ' ἐπ' ἀκτῆς ἐν κατηρεφεί πίτρω, said of the cave in the rock, where Philoct. abode. Eurip. Med. 28, ὡς δὲ πίτρος, ἡ θαλάσσιος κλύδων (comp. Androm. 538. Heracl. 1002); also Teleph. frag. i. 2, πίτρον Ἀρκάδων δυαχείμερον, said of the rocky cliff of the N.E. coast of Peloponnesus, et alibi plus semel. And so also in prose writers, e. gr. Diod. Sic. l. i. 32, where, describing the rocky shore of the Nile near the cataracts, he says, *τόπος—ἔχων πίτρον πυκνὸν καὶ μεγάλους *λοκὸτας σκοπέλους. Alciph. Epist. iii. 59, *κουφισαντά με, ἀφ' οὗ—περ ἐκάθηναι *πίτρω. But, to proceed, Commentators, both ancient and modern, are not agreed as to what is meant by *ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ *πίτρω. Now this must mainly depend upon the reference; which some suppose to be Christ himself, as a rock (Is. xxviii. 16. 1 Pet. ii. 6, 7, 8); others, not a few, nor of little note, as Bullinger, the confession of faith just made by Peter (q. d. 'on the truth thus confessed, as the test of piety, will my Church rest'); while most Expositors, from Grotius, Hammond, Camer., and Whitby downwards, refer it to Peter himself. They urge that no other can be supposed, consistently with the rules of correct exegesis; for, not to mention that the confession was not Peter's only; since, in making it, he spoke not for himself alone, but for all the Apostles (and in that quality returned answer to a question which had been addressed to them collectively: 'Whom say ye that I am?' &c.); the connexion subsisting in the reason given for the surname which had been bestowed on Simon, they think confines it to that alone; as also the parallelism between Christ's reply to Peter, and the answer which he had given. It is also, they urge, the only one consistent with the usage of the New Test., in which, not doctrine, nor confession, but persons are represented as the pillars of the spiritual building. See 1 Pet. ii. 4—6. 1 Tim. iii. 5. Gal. ii. 9. Eph. ii. 20. Rev. iii. 12, and

Notes. Certainly, when the Expositors above alluded to in the first place conjecture that, in pronouncing the words, Christ pointed to Himself (as the great foundation), they argue upon a wholly gratuitous supposition. Not to say, that the words following, καὶ δώσω σοι, &c., imply that there had been some previous gift or distinction. Indeed, the first interpretation certainly, and the second probably—however plausible, seem to have been forced upon the passage for the purpose of avoiding the difficulty thought to arise from taking it in its obvious sense, which is: 'Thou art by name Rock (i. e. thy name means Rock) and suitable to that shall be thy work and office; for upon thee, thy unswerving firmness, and unhesitating confession and profession, as upon a rock, shall the foundation of my spiritual house, the Church (see 1 Tim. iii. 15), be laid.' Again, when our Lord adds: 'And I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven,' whatever sense be affixed to those words, it is plain, by the connexion of the words, that our Lord speaks of Peter; and accordingly, when he had said in the foregoing words 'upon this rock,' &c., we can scarcely conceive he speaks of any other person than Peter. We must not omit to bear in mind two things in respect to this memorable confession and profession of Peter, which will serve to show why it drew down so high a commendation on him, namely, that it brought out (doubtless by the teaching from above, before adverted to) both the human and the Divine nature of our Lord, forming his most decided testimony on full conviction of the true humanity and true Divinity of his Lord. This is clear from the full force of the expression, ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ τ. ζ., which means no less than the eternal Son, only-begotten of, and consubstantial with, the Eternal Father, and consequently having in Himself, as God, both the Sonship and the Divine nature in a sense competent to no created being, even of Angelic nature. The idea, however, of eternity, as contained in τοῦ ζώντος, is the more prominent of the two, and there is a marked allusion to those passages of the Old Test., where Jehovah is characterized with allusion to His attributes, of life in himself and consequently eternity (so Jerem. x. 10), and as being the Fountain of life. Ps. xxxv. 10.

To conclude, I am far from wishing to dogmatize, or pronounce with positiveness, on what may justly be regarded as an open question, and on which so great an expositor as Calvin never made up his mind, and on which St. Augustine only made up his mind (adopting the first interpretation) to afterwards change it for the second, but with some hesitation, and concluding with an eligat lector, whose example I desire to follow, in the latter case, but not the former; at the same time acknowledging that the general air of the context would have induced me to adopt the other view (most ably maintained by Bullinger), had not the rules of a severe exegesis seemed to forbid it. Why it should have been adopted, in spite of the grave objections to which it is liable, arose, I imagine, not only from the groundless fear of strengthening the Papal claims to supremacy through St. Peter, but quite as much from a notion that the sense arising from the other interpretation would be contrary to what it elsewhere said in Scripture, that Christ is the only foundation. See 1 Cor. iii. 11. But the sense in which it is applied to CHRIST does not forbid its being applied with due modification to Peter. In St. Peter's case it was very applicable; for, as he was the first Apostle called to the ministry, so he was the first who preached the Gospel to the Jews, and also the first who preached it to the Gentiles. So that,—to use the words of Bp. Pearson on the Creed,—'The promise made here was punctually fulfilled, by Christ's using Peter's ministry in laying the foundation of the Christian Church among both Jews and Gentiles, and in his being the first preacher to them, both of that faith which he here confesses, and making the first proselytes to the Christian faith, both Jews and Gentiles. In fact, the Apostles generally are in other parts of the New Test. called the foundation on which the Church was built (Eph. ii. 20), as being those first employed in erecting the Church by their preaching. And what they all, more or less, did, Peter commenced the doing thereof, and might therefore be said to be the first foundation, as being the first of those foundation courses (Rev. xxi. 14, see note) on which the living Temple of God was built.'

But to proceed to the clause καὶ πύλαι ᾄδου οὐ κατισχύσουσιν αὐτῆς, here there is the same debate as to the reference in αὐτῆς; some referring it to πέτρα, as meaning either Peter's confession of faith, or the rock of the Gospel: both methods alike harsh and gratuitous, and in violation of the laws of exegesis. Almost all Expositors of note are agreed in referring it to ἐκκλησίαν, both as it is the nearer antecedent, and because there thus arises a better sense. And when they urge that the sense yielded by ἐκκλ. is wholly untenable on the ground of historical fact—this proceeds wholly upon a misconception of the force of ἐκκλ., on which see Bp. Pearson on the Creed, Art. IX., where he explains the different modes of using the word. To understand the exact import of this promise, it is especially necessary to attend to the important expression πύλαι ᾄδου. Now this (notwithstanding certain plausible, but far-fetched senses which have been propounded), the constant import of the phrase both in the Greek Classical writers, the Old Testament, and the Rabbinical writers (where it constantly denotes 'the grave, or the entrance to it, the state of the dead') must determine to mean simply death, i. e. the entrance into a new state of being; for the Hebrews, as well as the Greeks and Romans, ascribed gates to Sheol, or Hades. Thus the clause in question contains a promise, either of perpetual stability to the Church Catholic, the Church of Christ (on which see Bp. Horaley, and Vitringa de Synag. p. 86), or, taking ἐκκλ., as some good Commentators direct, to denote the members of it individually,—that 'not even death shall prevail over the [faithful] members of it, but that they shall be raised to a happy resurrection.'

Let us now proceed to examine the true import of the words which contain the second privilege conferred on St. Peter; namely, δώσω σοι τὰς κλείς τῆς βασιλείας τῶν οὐρανῶν. These λείας τῶν οὐρανῶν καὶ ὃ ἐὰν δέσῃς ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, ἔσται δεδε-μένον ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς· καὶ ὃ ἐὰν λύσῃς ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, ἔσται λελυμένον ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς. ²⁰ ἔ Τότε διστείλατο τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ, ἵνα μηδενὶ εἰπωσιν, ὅτι αὐτός ἐστιν [Ἰησοῦς] ὁ Χριστός.

words are a continuation of the image by which the Church was compared to an edifice founded on a rock. And as a key is used for the purpose of locking or unlocking the door of a house; and he who possesses that, has the power of admission to or exclusion from the house, and may be said to have the general care and superintendence of it; so a key was an usual symbol of power and authority for any work (see Is. xxii. 22), and presenting with a key was a form of investing with that authority. Thus the words seem intended to further explain what was meant by founding the Church upon Peter, as a foundation; figuratively denoting that Peter should be the person through whose instrumentality the Gospel edifice,—the kingdom of heaven,—should be first opened to both Jews and Gentiles; which was verified by the event. See Acts x. 44, compared with xv. 7. Now this surely cannot be supposed to give Peter any supremacy over the rest of the Apostles (for see xviii. 18. John xx. 23), much less any paramount authority to the Bishops of Rome in after-ages.

The words ὃ ἐὰν λύσῃς—οὐρανοῖς are explanatory of the former. And some think, that as the Church of Christ is compared to an edifice, of which the Apostles have the keys (comp. Is. xxii. 22, and Rev. iii. 7), and according as they open or shut the door to any one on earth, he shall be admitted to or excluded from heaven. But as we have here, not ὅν, but ὃ, so it should rather seem that, though this clause be explanatory of the former, yet that it contains, not a continuation of the image taken from the keys (i. e. of opening and shutting), but a fuller development of the notions of trust and power, of which keys were a symbol; and that the power meant is of a more general and extensive kind, namely (as the natural force of the words demands) over the things adverted to in the context, i. e. those which respected the Christian Church. And accordingly the verbs δέειν and λύειν must be modified in sense suitably thereto. So Lightfoot, Selden, Hammond, Whitty, Kuinoel, Wahl, Fritz, and most recent Commentators are of opinion that δέειν corresponds to the Heb. צָמַן, which signifies velare, interdicere, not only in the Rabbinical writings, but in Dan. vi. 7, 8, as also in the Chaldee Paraphrase on Numb. xi. 28, and that λύειν (answering to the Heb. פָּתַח וּפָתַח), ex vi oppositi, denotes to pronounce lawful, concede, permit, direct, constitute, &c.: a sense which, though exceedingly rare in the Greek writers, yet is not quite unprecedented. One example is adduced by Selden from Diod. Sic. i. 27, ὅσα γὰρ ἐγὼ δέσω, οὐδεὶς δύναται λύσαι. Yet even this is but the literal Greek version of an Oriental Inscription. The following example, therefore, may be not unacceptable. Soph. Antig. 39, sq., Τί δ', ὦ ταλαίφρον,—εἰ τὰδ' ἐν τούτοις,—ἐγὼ Διόνος ἐν ἡ φάππουσα προσδέμην πλιν; where the Schol. and Brunck well explain λύουσα ἡ φάππουσα by λύουσα τὸν νόμον, ἡ ἐπιβιβαιούσα. And though the ellipsis be somewhat anomalous, yet we have here evidence of the existence of the phrase, as applied to the observing or neglecting any injunction, by a metaphor taken from opening or shutting a door, or rather locking or unlocking a door. For it must be remembered, that the doors of the ancients were fastened with bands (to which there is an allusion in ἐφάππουσα) or chains, to which a padlock was suspended.

The sense, then, of the words in question will be: 'Whatsoever thou shalt forbid to be done, or whatsoever thou shalt declare lawful, and constitute in the Church, shall be ratified, and hold good with God; including all the measures necessary for the establishment and government of the Church.' (See Vitringa de Synag. p. 754, sq.) That the above powers were exercised by Peter, but in conjunction with the other Apostles, is indisputable. We need only advert to the decisions of the Council held at Jerusalem, when nearly the whole of the Mosaic ritual law was loosed, given up, and abrogated, while part of it was bound and still held obligatory. See also Acts x. 28, and xxi. 24.

Whatever may be thought of the dignity thus conferred, it will certainly by no means justify the assertion of any peculiar prerogative to the Roman Pontiff; nor affect the question at issue between Protestants and Romanists upon the power of the Church. Whatever foundation Peter might be to the Church, it is clear that the very image excludes all notion of a succession of persons similarly circumstanced. Nor, if the superiority of Peter had been permanent, could it afford a shadow of reason for deducing from it the supremacy of the first Bishop of Rome in the persons of his successors.

20. I still continue to be of the same opinion as all the other Editors (except Mr. Alford), that Ἰησοῦς is not genuine. Mr. Alford's only reason for this very unusual caution and forbearance is, that 'it is difficult to assign a reason for its insertion here;' as if we were bound always to give reasons for every strange diversity in the MSS. In the present case it seems to have sprung from some misjudging marginal Scholiast; for it is observable, that the Scholiasts and the Critical Revisers not unfrequently bring in Ἰησοῦς (thus in Col. i. 2, bis. Rom. viii. 11 and 35. Acts xix. 10), and sometimes Χριστός, e. gr. Acts iv. 33. xv. 11. 1 Cor. v. 5. vi. 11. In short, internal evidence of every kind is against the word, and external scarcely less so, a very large number of the most ancient and correct MSS. (including all the best Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., Ital., Arab., Pers., and Armen. Versions, and many Greek Fathers, from Origen downwards. The Vulg., indeed, has it; but Scholz testifies that one MS. is without it: he does not say what MS. I can testify that the Lamb. MS. (of the 7th century) has it not, following, perhaps, as in not a few other cases, the Ital. Vers. The reading of the MS. D, Χριστός Ἰησοῦς, was no other than a critical conjecture, devised for the purpose of evading the objection without removing the word. But that cannot be right,

21 Ἄπο τότε ἤρξατο ὁ Ἰησοῦς δεικνύειν τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ, ὅτι δεῖ αὐτὸν ἀπελθεῖν εἰς Ἱερουσόλυμα, καὶ πολλὰ παθεῖν ἀπὸ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων καὶ ἀρχιερέων καὶ γραμματέων, καὶ ἀποκτανθῆναι, καὶ τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ ἐγερθῆναι. 22 Καὶ προσλαβόμενος αὐτὸν ὁ Πέτρος, ἤρξατο ἐπιτιμᾶν αὐτῷ, λέγων· Ὁ Θεὸς σοι, Κύριε! οὐ μὴ ἔσται σοι τοῦτο. 23 Ὁ δὲ στραφεὶς εἶπε τῷ Πέτρῳ· Ὕπαγε ὀπίσω μου, σατανᾶ! σκάνδαλόν μου εἶ· ὅτι οὐ φρονεῖς

21—28. Mark viii. 31—38. Luke ix. 22—27. Having now, by the power of his miracles, convinced his disciples that he was the Christ, the promised Messiah, obtained their declaration of faith in him, and exercised the power of Messiah by committing paramount authority to Peter and the other Apostles, our Lord proceeds to correct the misapprehensions of his followers as to the true nature of his kingdom, and his proper character as Messiah. Well knowing the secular views by which they were not a little swayed, he checks their vain expectations of worldly aggrandizement, by disclosing, not obscurely and to some, but more plainly and before all (so Mark adds παρῆσεν τὸν λόγον ἰλάσκε), the real object of his incarnation; which made it necessary that he should go to Jerusalem, and there encounter πολλὰ, more explicitly specified infra xx. 18, insult, agony, rejection, and death. He, moreover, apprizes all around him of the necessity for their taking up the cross likewise, and sacrificing, if need should be, their lives for the Gospel's sake. At the same time he comforts his disciples with the assurance, that though he must now leave them, yet he would come again in the glory of his Father, and, in the administration of his spiritual kingdom, would amply reward their faithful devotion to him with glory, and honour, and immortality.

22. προσλαβ. αὐτόν] The sense assigned by Commentators, 'taking him by the hand,' requires proof; for that furnished by Schleus. is insufficient, the reference by which he endeavours to confirm it being a false one—whether ἐπιλαβόμενος τῆς χειρὸς, at Acts xxiii. 19, is doubtful. It should seem that the best Version is that of the Vulg. assumens (sibi) = sibi adjungens—a version confirmed by the freer, but not less faithful one, of the Pesch. Syr. and Arab. Versions, 'taking him aside.' So Euthym. explains by παραλαβὼν κατ' ἰδίαν. And so προσλαμβ. is used in the sensu secum ducō by Plato, Epist. vii. and p. 951, Ε. τὸν ἀρίσκοντα αὐτῷ προσλαμβάνων. Polyb. i. 38, 7. And so Aristoph. Lysist. 1128, λαβούσα δὲ ἡμᾶς λοιδορῆσαι βούλομαι, 'wish to take you aside and chide you'; where προσλαβ. could not, it seems, have been got in, for the metre.

— ἤρξατο ἐπιτιμᾶν α.] Tisch. reads λέγει αὐτῷ ἐπιτιμῶν, from MS. B, and a cursive one of late date and little value; while Lach. rightly retains the text. rec., only altering the position of ἐπιτιμᾶν and αὐτῷ; though even for that there is very slender authority. The textus receptus is confirmed by all the ancient Versions except the Persic, and by Origen, as also by all the copies at Mark viii. 32. The first mentioned reading seems merely a critical alteration, probably for the purpose of softening the harshness of the expression, the corrector intending ἐπιτιμῶν to be taken as in Thucyd. iv. 27, 5, and Demosth. 1479. 11, where the Particip. is taken adverbially. However, if any softening were necessary, it might best be attained by taking the term ἐπιτιμ. here with the qualification called for by the context and the circumstances of the narrative. Accordingly, we may render, 'he began to chide him,' (viz. by friendly expostulation, amici consulentis more, as Maldon. and Grot. understand,) for running into this melancholy language. So Shakespeare, Othello, iv. 2, 'He might have chid me so,' i. e. with gentleness and tenderness. Indeed, this qualification is required by the words immediately subjoined, λέγων Θεὸς σοι—τοῦτο, which words are in some measure, as Victor points out, exegetical of the preceding; the words being, as Euthym. (after Chrys.) explains, a customary form of expression to reprove any one for saying something unexpected and revolting. The force of the words Θεὸς, &c. is well expressed by Fritz, thus: 'malum omen Deus annuntiat (equiv. to Class. 'Dī meliora!') abest Domine! non credo hoc tibi accedet!' Of σαταν. the only view that I consider defensible is that by which it is regarded as standing for ἀντικείμενος, adversarius. Comp. Zech. iii. 1, with 2 Thess. ii. 4. And this is most satisfactorily established by Hamm., Grot., Beza, Whitby, Bp. Pearce, and others, who adduce several examples from the Old Test. of this use of σατανᾶς. Grot. is espec. happy in establishing the existence of the term as probably a Syriasm, and an Hellenistic idiom. In fact, the subsequent words σκάνδαλον &c. demand this view of the sense; these being, as Grot. shows, exegetical of σατανᾶς. It is strange that Fritz. should adopt the notion of Origen, Hilary, Jerome, August., T. Aquin., and most of the ancient Expositors, that the words ὑπάγε ὀπίσω μὲν mean, 'Follow my opinion and view in this matter (as being thy Master, and thou my disciple), not thine own'; a view which has been ably refuted by Hamm., Grot., and also Beza, who well points out that ὑπάγε is not equiv. to βαδιζε or ἴθι, but to ἀπὸ, discede; the whole phrase ὑπάγε ὀπ. denoting abscissio, or discessio. See my note on Matt. iv. 10, and supra iv. 8, where I have fully discussed the import of the term. In short, the words contain, as the best Commentators are agreed, a somewhat severe, but merited reprobation of Peter, as, under the guise of charity and good will, showing himself 'an adversary,' 'evil counsellor,' to his Master, and consequently no other than an obstacle to the great work of Atonement to be wrought through his death.

^{27, 28}. The ancient, and the earlier modern Commentators in general, refer the former of these vv. to the final advent of Christ at the day of judgment; the latter, to the second advent of Christ at the destruction of Jerusalem, about forty years afterwards. The more recent Expositors, however, since the time of Whitby, refer the former verse also to the same period. And indeed they make out, as far as regards the connection with the preceding verses, a tolerably good case. Not so, as regards the words and phrases of the verse itself; for though they be not wholly unsuitable to the first advent, yet are they, far more naturally, to be understood (according to their use elsewhere) of the final advent. Nor can it justly be imagined that the course of argument is in any material degree injured; or at any rate may be sufficiently well preserved by supplying mentally a few words of connexion between vv. 27 and 28, suspended on the γάρ. And as this coming ἐν βασιλ. is elsewhere described in terms bearing a strong resemblance to those which designate Christ's final advent, there was so much the greater propriety in introducing them as a just ground to expect and prepare for it. And although it has been urged that it would be harsh to understand the τινές of one person; and St. John alone of the bystanders is known to have lived to see the destruction of Jerusalem, yet that argument is very inconclusive; since it is highly probable that others of the bystanders, as well as St. John, might live until that period. And certainly the air of the words suggests a somewhat distant event, not one close at hand, as would be the case, if we were to take this, with Mackn. and others, of the Transfiguration. But although the words themselves are sufficiently applicable to the advent of Christ at the destruction of Jerusalem, yet that application is forbidden by the parallel passages of Mark viii. 38. ix. 1. Luke ix. 26, 27, which remove the sole difficulty that involves this passage, by enabling us to trace the real connexion of the verse, which is not with the preceding one, but with v. 24;—vv. 25, 26, being in some measure parenthetical, —and v. 27, not contained totidem verbis in Mark and Luke, but included in sense. Thus, then, by the coming of the Son of man seems simply meant the coming of his KINGDOM, prayed for in the Lord's Prayer (see note on Matt. vi. 18), which, it is certain, did come, and in the lifetime of not a few then present. The parenthetical portion intimates the awful consequences of the opposite course,—namely, the final and utter rejection. Comp. Matt. x. 39. John xii. 25, and notes.

²⁸. ἑστηκότων] Many MSS., including some Lamb. and Mus. ones, and some Fathers, have ιστάων, which is edited by Matth., Grieb., Scholz, Tisch., and Lach. Others, with 2 Mus. MSS., and several Lamb. ones, have ιστάτες, which is edited by Fritz., as being the more difficult reading. But it seems to have come from the margin, and to have been a conjecture of those who proposed to read εἰσὶ τινες ὧδε ἑστώτες. As to the first mentioned reading, it may be the true one; but there is no good evidence that it is, and hence I pause.

οἷτινες οὐ μὴ γεύσονται θανάτου, ἕως ἂν ἴδωσι τὸν Τίον τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐρχόμενον ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ αὐτοῦ.

XVII. ¹ Καὶ μεθ' ἡμέρας ἕξ παραλαμβάνει ὁ Ἰησοῦς τὸν Πέτρον καὶ Ἰάκωβον καὶ Ἰωάννην τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἀναφέρει αὐτοὺς εἰς ἄρος ὑψηλὸν κατ' ἰδίαν ² καὶ μετεμορφώθη

— γεύσασθαι θανάτου is a Hebraism (like θαυρίν θάν. John viii. 51; and ἰδαίν θάν. Luke ii. 26), by which verbs of sense are used in the figur. signific. to experience, as oft. in the Classical writers; where γεύεσθαι is joined not, indeed, with θανάτου, but with nouns denoting trouble, &c. as Soph. Trach. 1108, μόχθων μύριαν ἔγευσάμην.

— ἕως ἂν ἴδωσι—βασ. αὐτοῦ] From a comparison of Mark ix. 1, and Luke ix. 27, it is plain that the sense here intended is, 'till they shall have seen the kingdom (or reign) of the Son of Man come in or with power,' as says Mark, viz. so as to be accompanied with power upon earth; so as to be successfully established among both Jews and Gentiles.

XVII. 1. See i. 13. Mark ix. 2—13. Luke ix. 28—36.

— ἕξ] Luke says, ὥσαι ἡμέραι ὀκτώ. But the discrepancy will vanish, if we allow for the latitude involved in ὥσαι, and consider Luke's reckoning as inclusive, Matthew's (and Mark's) exclusive. We are now arrived at the record of a most awful and mysterious transaction—such as draws back for a moment the veil from the invisible world; on the circumstances, manner, and probable purposes, of which a brief notice must here suffice. As to the transaction generally, it may be considered as a figurative representation of Christ's final advent, in glory, to judge the world. To advert to certain of the particulars,—why three disciples, and no more, were admitted, may have been, because that number was the number of witnesses necessary to establish the legal proof of any transaction. But it should seem that those three particular disciples taken were selected, as being the most attached and confidential of the disciples; and hence these were afterwards chosen to be near our Lord in his Agony (xxvi. 37), and were made peculiarly witnesses of his resurrection. As to the Personages introduced, they were peculiarly fitted to be present on this solemn occasion, one as representing the Law, the other the Prophets (also from the latter being the type of the Forerunner of Christ); and, accordingly, they both were proper to minister to Him, in whom the Law and the Prophets were fulfilled; to hold converse with their Lord, doubtless on the great events which were now on the point of taking place (Luke ix. 31)—events which had been the sum and centre of all their teaching, and the result of which was to be the source of all their present and future beatitude; in token of which they now attend on their Lord, transferring all their honour and interest to Him, and consigning to Him their delegated and now expiring power; as is implied in Heb. i. 1, 2 (where see my note), and still more plainly in the words, infra v. 5, αὐτοῦ ἀκούετε (where see note). That the presence of Moses and Elias was a bodily, and not, as some say, a visionary appearance, there is no reason to doubt; espec. as it involves no difficulty, but such as Omnipotence will vanquish at the general Resurrection; though the nature of the change in question is incomprehensible to us, with our present faculties. As to supposing, with some sceptical foreign theologians, the whole to have been a vision, that is utterly indefensible; for though the disciples had been asleep (or rather heavy for sleep),—the transaction, it seems, for many reasons, having taken place in the night (see Luke ix. 32),—they are distinctly said to have been awake when they saw and heard Moses and Elias conversing with Jesus. In short, there can be no reason to doubt the historical reality of the narration as describing actual events. As respects the manner of the recognition of Moses and Elias by the disciples—it may have been almost intuitive, but must chiefly have been occasioned by what they gathered from their discourse, and also from their countenance and apparel, such being like the representations handed down from tradition in pictures. As respects the purposes intended to be answered by this solemn transaction, we may suppose that it was ordained to take place, 1. in order to loosen the prejudices of the Apostles, as to the future performance of the rites of the Mosaic Law, by a figurative and symbolical representation of the expiration of the Jewish, and the commencement of the Christian dispensation: 2. to reconcile their minds to the sufferings and death of Christ: 3. to strengthen their faith, by affording an additional proof, as it were by a sign from heaven, of the Divine mission of Jesus. For it is probable that as the Jews supposed the Messiah would, at his coming, be seen literally descending from the heavens, and arrayed in glory; so our Lord was pleased to give his Apostles this decisive proof of his Messiahship, by showing Himself in some such kind of glory as that with which He would appear at the final Advent. The representation was, no doubt, also intended to comfort and support the Apostles under their present and future trials and tribulations, by a prospect of the glory which should be revealed in their Saviour, and, through Him, in themselves.

— ὄρος] This mountain is, from ancient tradition, supposed to have been Tabor. Lightfoot, however, questions the truth of the tradition; but, as far as respects the distance of the mountain from Cæsarea Philippi, on insufficient grounds. But neither on the other hand, will the words of v. 22, and Mark ix. 30, as is alleged, prove what those who maintain that the mountain was Tabor, aver; namely, that a journey was taken through Galilee just before the Transfiguration. As to the former passage, see the note there; and as to the latter, it only

ἐμπροσθεν αὐτῶν. καὶ ἔλαμψε τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ ὡς ὁ ἥλιος, τὰ δὲ ἱμάτια αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο λευκὰ ὡς τὸ φῶς. ³ Καὶ ἰδοὺ, ὤφθησαν αὐτοῖς Μωϋσῆς καὶ Ἡλίας μετ' αὐτοῦ συλλαλοῦντες. ⁴ Ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ ὁ Πέτρος εἶπε τῷ Ἰησοῦ· Κύριε, καλὸν ἐστίν

proves that a journey to Capernaum was taken after the Transfiguration; and therefore it is highly improbable that there should have been so long a journey taken just before it. And although the expressions used by Matthew and Mark do not specify any particular mountain, yet the context evidently points at a mountain somewhere in the neighbourhood of Cæsarea. And this probability is converted into certainty by the words of St. Luke, ἀνέβη εἰς τὸ ὄρος (as it is found in all the MSS., confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version), where the Article limits the sense to some mountain, which might be called the mountain in respect to Cæsarea, or some part of its vicinity; and that cannot well be any other than some peak of the ridge of Hermion, not, however, that which I formerly supposed, the Panæum, because it is, properly speaking, not a part of the ridge of Hermion, but some other mountain forming part of that ridge which should supply a "secret top" suitable to the purpose in view. It should seem that a situation of that kind offers itself at a promontorial ness issuing from the ridge now called Birket Nefat, 8 or 9 miles from the vicinity of Cæsarea, or the κωμαὶ hard by, i. e. Maacha, &c. There is nothing to hinder this taking place in the six days before mentioned, which Mr. Alf. thinks would be all consumed in travelling. Yet it is not more than 23 miles from Bethsaida to the s. vicinity of Cæsarea, which might be gone over in three or four days. Nor is it true that they went immediately after the Transfiguration. There is, indeed, nothing that exactly fixes their stay in the country east of the Jordan. But the events recorded at Matt. xvii. 10—21, and Mark ix. 11—29, must have occupied some two or three days. The time of departure is not fixed, but only the circumstance itself expressed, in Mark ix. 31, καὶ ἐκείθεν ἰξελθόντων. But the direction they took is, I apprehend, sufficiently pointed out in the next words of Mark, καὶ περιπαροῦντο διὰ τῆς Γαλιλαίας,—by which it would seem 'they passed along by the Jordan through Galilee' (i. e. Upper Galilee), taking their course, I imagine, first to the left bank of the Jordan, and then, after crossing it, they traversed the coast of the Lake, till they reached Capernaum, a distance of about 14 miles, a day's journey (though performed partly by night, for the reason suggested at Mark ix. 30, οὐκ ἤθελεν ἵνα τις γνῶ, scil. αὐτὸν παραπορεύμενον), and during which perambulation our Lord, we learn, apprized his disciples of the approaching events which should terminate his earthly course. Thus by making the most of the little light afforded by the term περιπαροῦντο at Mark ix. 30, we are enabled to trace with sufficient distinctness the course of their route; yet that little light Lachm. has done his best to effectually put out by adopting the reading ἱπορεύοντο, from only two MSS. and the Vulg. Vera! This use of παραπορ. is, indeed, rare; but one indubitable example occurs in

To revert to the tradition of this mountain being Tabor, this seems to have arisen from the confounding (1) of the two Mounts Hermion,—one very near Tabor, the other near Cæsarea; and (2) the confounding of Tabor with Hermion. It should seem, that after it had been handed down by some very ancient tradition, that Mount Hermion was the scene of the Transfiguration, those who lived in later ages supposed the Hermion to be that near Tabor, as was natural, since the two were often associated: so Ps. lxxxix. 12, "Tabor and Hermion shall rejoice in thy name;" and then others afterwards fixed on Tabor itself, on account of its being so near (so very near, indeed, that the two mountains seem one), and also from its being altogether κατ' ἰδίαν, in their mistaken view of the expression, referring it to the mountain; for Maundrell, in his Travels, remarks that it stands quite apart.

2. μεταμορφώθη] 'was transfigured.' The word (which sometimes imports a change of substance) here denotes only a change in external appearance (as in Ælian V. H. i. 1), agreeably to the sense of its primitive μορφή in the Old and New Testament. Thus, in the plainer words of Luke ix. 29, τὸ εἶδος τοῦ προσώπου αὐτοῦ ἔτερον ἰγίνετο. A similar appearance is ascribed to Moses, when he came down from Sinai, after receiving the Tables of the covenant, Exod. xxxiv. 29, sq., where it is said that his face shone, δεδοξασται, namely, with a kind of glory, as it were an ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης τοῦ Θεοῦ.

3. For ὠφθησαν, Lachm. and Tisch. edit ὤφθη, from B, D, 3 MSS. of the Ital. Vera.—authority quite insufficient (I find ὠφθησαν in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, espec. since internal evidence is adverse; for there is every reason to think that the reading arose from certain Critics who chose to adopt ὠφθη from the parallel passage of Mark. The ancient Versions (except the Ital.), including the Pesch. Syr., Sahid., and Coptic, confirm the plural. Yet the most ancient copy of the Vulg., the Cod. Amiat. (to which I add the Lamb.) has the singular, as also has the Scriv. y, which, however, as being an Evangelistarium, is not full evidence. The existence of the sing. in the Cod. Amiat. and Lamb. will not prove that it was in the original of the Vulg., because those copies, espec. the Lamb., have not a few readings of the Italic, which derived this from the passage of Mark. That the MS. D derived the reading χιών for τὸ φῶς from St. Mark through the Ital. and Vulg., is quite clear.

— μετ' αὐτοῦ συλλαλοῦντας] Namely, as we learn from Luke ix. 31, on the subject of the death which he was about to undergo at Jerusalem, and doubtless the redemption thereby effected for the world; things into which, St. Peter says, 'the angels desire to look,' 1 Pet. i. 12. 4. ἀποκριθεὶς] 'addressing himself,' ὡς εἶναι, 'to remain here.'

ἡμᾶς ὧδε εἶναι. εἰ θέλεις, ποιήσωμεν ὧδε τρεῖς σκηνάς· σοὶ μίαν, καὶ Μωϋσῇ μίαν, καὶ μίαν Ἡλῖα. ⁵ Ἐτι αὐτοῦ λαλοῦντος, ἰδοῦ, νεφέλη φωτεινὴ ἐπεσκίασεν αὐτούς· καὶ ἰδοῦ, φωνὴ ἐκ τῆς νεφέλης, λέγουσα· Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ Τίός μου ὁ ἀγαπητός, ἐν ᾧ εὐδόκησα· αὐτοῦ ἀκούετε! ⁶ Καὶ ἀκούσαντες οἱ μαθηταὶ, ἔπεσον ἐπὶ πρόσωπον αὐτῶν, καὶ ἐφοβήθησαν σφόδρα. ⁷ Καὶ προσελθὼν ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἤψατο αὐτῶν, καὶ εἶπεν Ἐγέρθητε, καὶ μὴ φοβεῖσθε. ⁸ Ἐπάραντες δὲ τοὺς ὀφθαλμούς αὐτῶν, οὐδένα εἶδον, εἰ μὴ τὸν Ἰησοῦν μόνον.

— σκηνάς] 'Booths' composed of branches of trees, such as were hastily raised for temporary purposes by travellers, and such as were reared at the feast of tabernacles.

5. ἔτι α. λαλ.] 'while he was yet speaking.'

— νεφ. φωτεινὴ] The bright cloud here spoken of (comp. Ex. xiv. 19, seq., xxiv. 15, seq.), called at 2 Pet. i. 17, "the excellent glory," is supposed to have been the Shechinah, or symbol of the Divine presence, in which the Divine Majesty often appeared to the Jews. Of ἐπεσκίασεν the sense is (by an Hellenistic use found in the Sept.) not, overshadowed, but diffused itself around. Comp. circumsusa, Virg. Æn. i. 585.

— φωνή, &c.] In the present passage we have one of the three instances presented in the Gospels, of God's personally interposing for the purpose of bearing testimony in favour of his beloved Son. In αὐτοῦ ἀκούετε the αὐτοῦ is highly emphatic, q. d. 'HIM heed ye, who is my Son [rather than Moses and the Prophets].' Said in allusion to what is written, Deut. xviii. 15, προφήτην—ἀναστήσει σοι Κύριος ὁ Θεός σου· αὐτοῦ ἀκούσεσθε, and so intended to point at the fulfilment of the prophecy in Christ, in reference to whom it is adduced at Acts iii. 22. vii. 37.

6. ἔπεσον ἐπὶ πρόσωπον] A posture naturally assumed by those to whom visions and Divine revelations were vouchsafed; and to be accounted for, not so much on a principle of fear, as of reverence.

7. ἤψατο αὐτῶν] Here ἤψ. is used as at Dan. viii. 18. ix. 21. x. 18. 2 Kings xii. 17; and in all those passages its meaning is, not touched, but, laid hold of; viz. by the hand, as in raising any one up; a sense of the term frequent in the Class. writers, and found also in the N. T., as supra viii. 15, καὶ ἤψατο τῆς χειρὸς αὐτῆς, καὶ ἠγέρθη, et al. See my Lex.

9. ἐκ τοῦ ὄρους] So, for ἀπὸ τ. δ., Matth., Griesb., Frit., Scholz, Lach., and Tisch. edit., from very many MSS. (to which I add all the Lamb., and nearly all the Mus. copies), besides early Edd. and Fathers. And internal evidence is quite in favour of the reading. Otherwise, since the two words are so frequently confounded by the scribes, there is sometimes a difficulty in fixing the true reading, which must depend on a combination of competent external authority with internal evidence.

— τὸ ὄραμα] i. e. 'what they had seen.' So in Acts vii. 31 ('of the burning bush'), ὁ δὲ Μωϋσῆς ἰδὼν ἰθαύμασε τὸ ὄραμα. Indeed, the notion of its being a mere vision, is precluded by the more precise expression of Mark, ἀ εἶδον.

— For ἀναστῇ, L. and T. edit. ἠγέρθη, from 2 MSS. only. But though ἀναστ. may have been introduced from the parallel passage of Mark ix. 9, yet the utter insufficiency of external authority (I find ἀναστῇ in all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.) forbids any alteration. And yet Lachmann's adoption of it is singularly inconsistent with his critical determination, infra v. 23, where, for ἠγέρθηται, found in all his MSS. except B, and 10 cursive ones, he edits ἀναστήσεται, which ought to have made him reconsider his decision here. He ought also to have borne in mind a passage of Mark vi. 14, where for ἠγέρθη, MS. A, and a few others have ἀνάστη—an evident gloss, and occurring also at Luke ix. 7. The same inconsistency recurs at Luke ix. 22, where for text. rec. ἠγέρθηται, he edits (as also Tisch.) ἀναστήναι, from A, C, D, F, K, and several earlier ones. And so again at 1 Cor. xv. 52, for ἠγέρθησονται, he edits ἀναστήσονται, from only MSS. A, D, E, F, G, and two others. Now surely those critical decisions, if at all well founded, ought to have taught Lachm. to stay his hand here.

10. τί οὖν οἱ Γραμματεῖς—πρῶτον] q. d. 'How, then, if thou be the Christ, can the declaration of the scribes (founded on the prophecy of Mal. iv. 5) hold good, that Elias must precede the Messiah, to announce his coming, and restore all things,' &c. P. 'If thy stay on earth is so soon to come to a termination, and we are to see no more of Elias than we now have done in this secret glimpse, how are we to understand what the scribes say,—that Elias must come to prepare the people for the reception of the Messiah?'

11. Ἡλίας μὲν ἔρχεται—πάντα] i. e. 'Elias is, indeed, first to come,' &c. The future tense is not used, because our Lord here adopts the language which was generally applied to the Messiah; q. d. 'It was true, which the Scribes taught, that Elijah would appear before the coming of the Messiah.'—Καὶ ἀποκαταστήσει πάντα. Ἀποκαθίστασθαι properly means to restore a thing to its original state; and, by implication, to reform and amend it. From the manner, however, in which the term is here brought forward (namely, in repeating the words of others), it is evident that the sense need not be pressed on, but may be explained agreeably to what was to be expected from the nature of John's ministry; which was that of preaching a baptism of repentance, correcting men's carnal and earthly notions of the Messiah, and preparing them for his coming by a moral reformation as extensive as could be expected from so preparatory a ministry (see Matt. iii. 3) as John's was,—in which is to be considered the purpose rather than the effect; though that was not inconsiderable.

12. οὐκ ἐπέγνωσαν αὐτόν] i. e. 'did not recognize him in his real character, as such, not being agreed as to his real character;' in other words, 'John the Baptist has come in the spirit and power of Elias (Luke i. 17), but they did not recognize him in that character, as suitable to that of forerunner to the Messiah.'

—ἐν αὐτῷ] 'In,' or 'by him.' This is not so much a Hebraism, as rather a popular idiom, similar to one in our own language. Ποιεῖν is adapted to denote treatment of every kind, whether good or bad. In ἐποίησαν ὅσα ἠθέλησαν we have a popular idiom, usually implying violence. We may compare the Classical phrase χρῆσθαι ὅτι βούλεται or βούλονται, occurring in Thucyd. vii. 85, and elsewhere.

14—21. See Mark ix. 14—29, and Luke ix. 27—43.

—αὐτόν] So all the Editors from Wets. downwards read, for αὐτῷ, on the strongest evidence both of MSS. (including all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.) and Fathers, and the usage of Scripture, as in Mark i. 40. x. 17.

15. σεληνιάζεται] From the symptoms mentioned here, and at Mark ix. 13, this disorder is supposed to have been epilepsy,—inflicted, however, by an evil spirit, as I have shown, supra iv. 24. Though in this instance the demon had also deprived him of speech, Mark ix. 17; so that this case, so minutely and graphically described by Mark, was perhaps the most severe and obstinate of all recorded in Scripture, and hence the disciples might well despair of being able to cure him, and thus lack the faith necessary to obtain that power.

17. ὦ γενεὰ ἄπιστος κ. δ.] Comp. Deut. xxxii. 5, γενεὰ σκληρὰ καὶ διεστραμμένη, 'crooked, perverse.' Who are the persons to be here understood, has been much debated. Some understand the father and the relations. Others, the Jews, meaning the Scribes who might be present on the occasion. Others, again, the disciples; which last view seems, from the context, to be the most probable. But it is best to suppose the reproof meant for all present, each in the degree that they deserved it. Γενεὰ ἄπιστος may be referred to the disciples, and in some measure the father; διεστρ., to the Scribes; the first ὑμῶν, to the disciples, and the second to the Scribes.

—ἕως πότε—ὑμῶν] 'How long must I be with you?' i. e. how long must my presence be necessary to you? Ἀνέξομαι ὑ., 'bear with you.'

18. καὶ ἐπετίμησεν—δαιμ.] Some refer the αὐτῷ to the sick person; but most Commentators, rightly, to the demon. In fact, the passage is to be taken as if written, καὶ ἐπετίμησεν ὁ Ἰ. τῷ δαίμονι, καὶ ἐξῆλθε, nearly as Luke. From the words of the rebuke, expressed by Mark, σοὶ ἐπιτάσσω, &c., it appears, that the term ἐπετίμησι here is to be taken with the highest significance, as combining the notion of strict injunction with that of severe reproof for what has been amiss. So, too, in Luke ix. 21, et al. After καὶ ἐξῆλ. ἀπ' α. τ. δ., Mark adds the result, καὶ ἠγίνετο ὡς κεκός· ὥστε πολλοὺς λέγειν ὅτι ἀπέθανεν. After ἐθεραπεύθη, &c., and not after v. 21, I would bring in the words of Luke, ix. 43, ἐξεπλήσσοντο δὲ πάντες ἐπὶ τῇ μεγαλειότητι τοῦ Θεοῦ.

παῖς ἀπὸ τῆς ὥρας ἐκεῖνης. ¹⁹ Τότε προσελθόντες οἱ μαθηταὶ τῷ Ἰησοῦ κατ' ἰδίαν, εἶπον Διὰ τί ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἠδυνήθημεν ἐκβαλεῖν αὐτό; ²⁰ Ὁ δὲ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν αὐτοῖς Διὰ τὴν ἀπιστίαν ὑμῶν. ἀμὴν γὰρ λέγω ὑμῖν ὃ ἐὰν ἔχητε πίστιν ὡς κόκκον σιβάπewς, ἐρεῖτε τῷ ὄρει τούτῳ Μετάβηθι ἐντεῦθεν ἐκεῖ, καὶ μεταβήσεται· καὶ οὐδὲν ἀδυνατήσῃ ὑμῖν. ²¹ Τοῦτο δὲ τὸ γένος οὐκ ἐκπορεύεται, εἰ μὴ ἐν προσευχῇ καὶ νηστείᾳ.

19. προσελθόντες—κατ' ἰδίαν] 'To some private place apart,' namely, as Mark says, κατ' οἶκον, meaning at the house where they were sojourning.

20. ὁ δὲ Ἰησ. εἶπεν] Lach. edits, on the authority of B, D, and a few cursive MSS., ὁ δὲ λέγει, which Tisch. adopts in his second ed., while in his first he reads ὁ δὲ εἶπεν. The reading λέγει has internal evidence, and the authority of some Versions in its favour, and may possibly be the true reading. See note, supra xiii. 28, and Mark vi. 31. But Ἰησοῦς was, I doubt not, cancelled by the Critical reviewers, and that for the purpose of preventing what they deemed a tautology.

—διὰ τὴν ἀπιστίαν ὑ.] Lachm. reads ὀλιγοπιστίαν, from MS. B, and 7 cursive ones, with the Copt., Sahid., Ethiop., and Armen. Vers., and Origen—authority very insufficient, espec. since internal evidence is altogether opposed to ὀλιγοστ., which evidently arose either from a marginal gloss, or a too free Version; as proof of which, Expositors in general explain it by a deficiency in faith; 'for,' observes Mr. Gresw., 'it cannot be inferred from the words following, that the Apostles did not possess any degree of the faith in question,' q. d. though they had faith, it was ineffectual. But there is no need to make here such distinctions, as must end in mere metaphysical subtleties. It would be best to render the sense by absence of faith, that full confidence in the power vested in you, which had it existed would have effectually attained the purpose. Accordingly, if they had not that faith (meaning the faith necessary for the working of miracles), they had nothing; and thus the degree of deficiency was nothing to the purpose.

—ὡς κόκκον σιβάπewς] i.e. even in the smallest degree; for this was, as we find from the Rabbinical citations in Wetstein, a proverbial expression to denote any thing exceedingly small,—(the σίναπι being the smallest of all seeds) just as to remove mountains was an adagial hyperbole to denote the accomplishment of any thing apparently impossible.

21. τοῦτο τὸ γένος] Here almost all Commentators supply δαιμονίων. But that would suppose different kinds of demons, which, though a possible fact, yet must not be thus admitted into revelation per ellipsis. Nor is it necessary, since (as Chrys., Euthym., and also some modern Commentators have seen) the sense may be: 'this kind of beings,' namely, demons. However, the sense may be, by a popular brevity of expression, 'this kind of possession,' so fixed, violent, long continued, and complicated.

—ἐν προσευχῇ καὶ νηστείᾳ] viz., says Campbell, as necessary to the attainment of that faith, without which the demons could not be expelled; and, therefore, prayer and fasting might be said to be the cause, as being the cause of the cause.

22, 23. Mark ix. 30—32. Luke ix. 43—45.

—ἀναστρεφόμενων αὐ. ἐν τῇ Γαλ.] Not, 'while they abode in Galilee' (for, from the passage of Mark, it appears that they made no stay); nor, 'while they passed through.' For though this latter sense may seem to be required by Mark ix. 30, παριπορεύοντο διὰ τῆς Γαλ., yet there is no authority for such a sense; nor do the words of Mark, which I have already explained, require it. Render, 'as they were moving about [on travel] in Galilee,' i.e. as we find from Mark, and v. 24, on their way to Capernaum.

24. τὰ διδραχμα] A collective noun, to designate the appointed payment to that amount, namely, a didrachm (or double-drachma), equiv. to half a shekel, collected every year of all Jews from their twentieth year (even those resident out of Judæa), for maintaining the repairs of the Temple, and defraying the expense of its services. This is alluded to in Joseph. Bell. J. vii. c. 6. It was founded, as to its amount, on a contribution for a similar purpose appointed by Moses, Exod. xxx. 11—16. From the air of the inquiry on the part of the collectors, it seems to have been, at least practically, considered voluntary; though, as we may imagine from the purpose of its collection, declined by no religious persons who had the means to pay it.

25. ὅτε εἰσῆλθεν εἰς τὴν οἰκίαν] The person here meant is not clear. Almost all the Commentators suppose Jesus. We may, however, understand it with the Syriac, Euthym., L. Brug., and Kuinöl, of Peter. The sense may be thus εἰς τὴν οἰκίαν, προέφθασεν αὐτὸν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, λέγων Τί σοι δοκεῖ, Σίμων; οἱ βασιλεῖς τῆς γῆς ἀπὸ τίνων λαμβάνουσι τέλη ἢ κῆνσον; ἀπὸ τῶν υἱῶν αὐτῶν, ἢ ἀπὸ τῶν ἀλλοτρίων; ²⁶ Λέγει αὐτῷ ὁ Πέτρος Ἀπὸ τῶν ἀλλοτρίων. expressed; 'When he (i. e. Peter) had entered into the house [whither Jesus had already gone, while the collectors were applying to Peter for the sum], and was just about to ask him whether he would not pay the contribution, Jesus was beforehand with his question, by asking him one, namely, τί σοι, &c.

— τίλη ἢ κῆνσον] By the former term are denoted the customs, or tax on eatables or drinkables: by the latter, a Latinism, the head-money, or poll-tax, laid on the provincials.

²⁶ ἀραγε ἐλεύθεροί εἰσιν οἱ υἱοί] Of these words the simplest and most probable interpretation is that of Chrysost. and Euthym. (approved by Fritz.), namely, 'Then this tribute, paid to God for his temple, I ought not to pay, inasmuch as I am his Son.' There is an argument a fortiori. 'If such be the case with an earthly king's son, how much more the heavenly,' &c.

— τὸν ἀναβάντα π. ἰχθὺν] 'the fish which first rises' ['to meet the baited hook']; seemingly a common piscatory mode of expression, though not, I believe, occurring elsewhere. We need not suppose the piece of money to have been created on purpose; but that it was money that had fallen into the sea, and been swallowed by the fish. Many instances are on record, of jewels, coins, and other valuables, being found in the bellies of fishes. See Hdōt. iii. 92, and the other passages cited by Wets. The Divinity of our Lord is thus made manifest; for if he knew that the first fish that came up would have such a coin in his mouth, nothing could more surely than this prove his omniscience, and proclaim an union of foreknowledge and Divine power, the exercise of which on this occasion seems to have been intended to encourage both Peter and his fellow-Apostles to place a firm dependence on Divine Providence, under the exercise of due means (for Peter must necessarily obtain the fish by the exercise of his calling and industry), which Providence they might justly hope would sustain them under all trials and all adversities.

XVIII. 1-35. Mark ix. 38-50. Luke ix. 46-52. On the transaction now recorded, there is some discrepancy in the accounts of the Evangelists; of which the best solution appears to be that of Mr. Greenwell, who supposes that the transaction took place twice on the same day, and in the same house. The disciples, it seems, had all of them been of late expecting that Jesus (whose fame had been recently fast increasing) would speedily enter on his temporal kingdom; and with minds bent on secular advantage, they had been, no doubt, conversing one with another about the different posts they should respectively hold about his person, or in his court. This had, it seems, formed the subject of especial discussion to Peter, James, and John, on their way back to Capernaum from the Mount of Transfiguration: and no wonder, since the preference which had been thus shown them by Jesus, would naturally excite their expectations of high advancement. On their reaching the house, Jesus inquired of them what they had been disputing about,—for it seems their conversation was aside,—and they were silent from shame. Whereupon our Lord gave them the lesson, they so much needed, on humility, unambitiousness, &c.; and that by action as well as precept. See Mark ix. 33-50. Luke ix. 46-50. Afterwards, however, on the return of Peter from procuring miraculously and paying the Tribute-money, not the Apostles only, but the disciples generally (see Mark ix. 35) (all of whom probably had been intent on the same subject as Peter, James, and John) agreed to refer to Jesus the subject of their mutual disputation τίς μείζων, &c.; whereupon our Lord gave them the same instruction, in the same striking manner, as he had done to the Apostles only; on this occasion, however, entering into more particular explanations. According to the foregoing view, the formula ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ will denote 'about that time,' viz. the payment of the tribute-money.

1. μείζων] for μείγιστος, say the Commentators. But the disciples seem to have desired to know, not who should be the greatest, but who should be great, i. e. fill some one of the more considerable posts in the court of the Messiah. Thus James and John, as we learn from Mark x. 35, went to our Lord and asked, not each of them to be μείγιστος, but μείζων, namely, to occupy his right and left hand, during his regal state.

2. ἔστησεν αὐτὸ ἐν μ. α.] The more forcibly to impress on their minds the truth he wishes to inculcate, our Lord employs the aid of example; adopting a method of instruction always prevalent in the East,—that by emblems and symbolical actions; a mode of conveying any one's meaning, which having first been resorted to from the poverty of early language, was afterwards continued, from the advantage it possessed of forcible and vivid illustration; since none of the conceptions of the mind are so distinct as the direct impressions of the senses. Of these symbolical and significant actions the writings of the Old Test. supply numerous examples; nor are they wanting in the New. Those of the former are generally of a prophetic character; while those of the latter are partly vehicles of prophecy, partly of counsel and instruction. 'Those of our Lord are generally of the latter description; as when he washed his disciples' feet, broke the bread at the institution of the Eucharist, and breathed on them when communicating the Holy Ghost. With respect to the touching so often mentioned in the Gospels, as preludial to the working of miracles, such an action may rather be regarded as a significant than a symbolical one. The present was plainly the latter, and was intended to supply the place of a direct answer at the time, and to impart force to the instruction when directly communicated. See more in Greswell on Parab. vol. ii. p. 276—283.

3. ὡς τὰ παῖδια] i. e. in respect to simple-mindedness, humility, and docility; dispositions the very reverse to those which they were then indulging (comp. infra xix. 14. 1 Cor. xiv. 20), and from which they needed to be turned and changed in their minds. Our Lord proceeds to show, verse 4, that he who evinces the dispositions thus inculcated, shall be distinguished in the spiritual kingdom which he came to establish.

4. ταπεινώσῃ] Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch., edit the reading ταπεινώσει, from many ancient MSS.; to which I add also the Lamb. and nearly all the Mus. copies. Internal evidence is pretty evenly balanced, since -σῃ might be altered to -σει or -σει to -σῃ,—but the former is the more probable, as from the character of the MSS. it would seem to be a correction of the Greek, which, however, if we may believe a competent judge of such a matter, Fritz., does not require it. Be that, however, as it may, this is not a case which calls for any change of reading. To turn from dry words to things, however the harmony of this part be adjusted, which I leave to the curious inquirer, one thing seems clear (though it has escaped all the harmonists), namely, that the true parallel passage to this is the latter part of Luke ix. 48, ὁ γὰρ μικρότερος—μείων, of which the sense is, 'He who is least [in his own estimation] among you all, and most resembles this little child in humility, shall be great (see supra v. 1, note) in my kingdom; where μικρότ. stands for μικρόν, as in the similarly-worded passages and kindred construction, Matt. xi. 11, and Luke vii. 28, ὁ μικρότερος ἐν τῇ βασιλ., &c. By οὗτος ἐστὶν ὁ μ. is meant the character they were inquiring after under the name μείων.

5. The preceding verse is evidently directed to the Apostles; while this and the following were probably addressed to the bystanders. Of δέξ. ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόμ. μου, the full meaning is, receives, aids, serves (see Euthym.), namely, in the character of being my disciple, because he belongs to me, as it is explained Mark ix. 41.

6. σκανδαλίσῃ ἓνα—μείον Render, 'shall cause [even] one of these little ones (meaning ordinary believers), as little children in humility and unambitiousness, to fall away from their faith in me.' In the term σκανδ. (with which comp. the noun σκάνδαλα at v. 7, which in like manner denotes such things as occasion this falling off) there is great complexity of sense, the genus having many species, comprehending whatever may cause any one to swerve from the faith, or hinder him from carrying it out in a truly Christian course, without falling back, or other hindrance. See Calv., who well points out that though this saying may seem subjoined for the consolation of the pious, lest their condition should, under the world's contempt, seem hard to bear, yet that it had another object: and when we consider the contention which had just arisen de honoris primatu, it may justly be inferred that the Apostles were somewhat affected with the desire to rise in rank, "porro fieri non potest quin sit in fratres contumeliosus quisque vel sibi nimium placet, vel omnibus præferri appetit." Hence it would seem that the chief kind of σκανδαλισμός here meant, is that of grieving and discouraging humble Christian brethren by contumelious treatment of them. See Chrys., Euthym., and Grot. That the σκανδαλισμός is not temptation to sin, by evil example, nor to falling away from the faith by sophistry (as Doddr. explains) is plain, inasmuch as there is here (as Chrys. and Theophyl. point out) an argumentum e contrario.

— συμφέρει αὐτῷ, &c.] i. e. rather than that he should commit such a crime as is implied in the context. So in the parallel passage of Luke, ἢ ἵνα σκανδαλίσῃ ἓνα τῶν μικρῶν τούτων. In the words ἵνα κρεμασθῇ—τῆς θαλ. we have a very strong, and perhaps proverbial, form of expression, used to intimate the enormity of any offence. The iva before κρεμ. forms one of the instances in which iva is supposed to stand for ὥστε. Yet such cases are far less frequent than they have been thought; the only certain ones known to me being Gal. v. 17. 1 Thess. v. 4. John

ix. 2. 1 John i. 9. Μύλος ὀνίκος stands, per synecdochen, for λίθος ὀνίκος in St. Mark. The expression is a figurative one to denote an immense stone. Comp. Virg. Æn. viii. 250, 'Omniaque arma Advocat, et ramis vastisque molarius instat.' For ἐπὶ before τὸν τράχηλον a. L. and T. read, from several ancient MSS. (to which I add all the Lamb., and nearly all the Mus. copies), and, of Fathers, Origen and Chrys., ais, which is probably the true reading, and ἐπὶ only a gloss on it, or a Critical correction.

In πελάγει τῆς θαλάσσης we have a somewhat rare phrase (though occurring also in Apoll. Rhod. ii. 608), which preserves the primitive sense of πείλαγος, namely, 'a depth,' for which Pind., as cited in Plut. Symp. vii. 5, has πόντου θαλάσσης.

The punishment here alluded to, though not in use among the Jews themselves, was so among the Romans and Syrians, also the Greeks (see Schol. on Aristoph. Eq. 1373), where it was inflicted on criminals of the worst description, especially parricides, and those guilty of sacrilege.

7. τῶν σκανδ.] Meaning, not those scandals just spoken of, as is plain from Luke xvii. 1, where the Article can have no reference. The sense is: 'Alas for the world from causes of offending;' the term σκανδ. being here taken in its general and comprehensive acceptation, to denote whatever circumstances may obstruct the reception, or occasion, if not the abandonment, the inefficiency of the faith received; whatever, in short, in ᾧ ὁ ἀδελφός σου προσκρίπτει, ἢ σκανδαλίζεται, Rom. xiv. 21. See the admirable note of Calv., which is instar omnium. From what he has remarked, it is plain that the words following ἀνάγκη γάρ, &c., contain a confirmation of the foregoing sentiment, appraising them that the evils, deplorable as they may be, are, however, unavoidable, being necessary to the trial of our faith. See 1 Cor. xi. 19. The necessity here spoken of is what is called a necessity of consequence, one arising from the condition of human nature, a moral necessity (comp. Heb. ix. 23), q. d. 'it cannot but happen from the corruption of human nature (answering to ἀνένδικτον, Luke xvii. 1), that offences (σκάνδαλα) should arise; yet so terrible are the consequences of those offences, that it is better to endure the greatest deprivation or corporeal pain, than occasion them.'

8. See supra v. 30, sq. and notes. As to the connexion, it should seem that, together with cautions against the σκάνδαλα which draw others into sin, our Lord intermixes one (intended for his disciples) against throwing any σκάνδαλον in our own way, by yielding to worldly-mindedness, or sensuality, or inordinate affection. In short, the best comment on these verses is 1 John ii. 15, 16, μὴ ἀγαπᾶτε τὸν κόσμον, &c.

9. See supra v. 29, and note. On αἰώνιον see Bp. Pearson on the Creed, i. 592.

— μονόφθαλμον] 'deprived of an eye,' ἑτερόφθ., as Class. Greek propriety would require: for the Atticists are agreed that μονόφθ. should be confined to denote one 'born blind of one eye,' one-eyed by nature; ἑτερόφθ., 'one deprived of an eye.' This canon is thought to be borne out by the examples adduced from Hdt. iii. 11, 6, and iv. 13, 27. Demosth. p. 744. That ἑτερόφθ. was used to denote 'deprived of an eye,' the authority of Aristid., Aristot., Plutarch, and other later writers fully justifies. But none of the earlier and purer Greek writers use ἑτερόφθ. in this sense. And if they had had occasion to express it, it is a question whether they would not have employed μονόφθαλμος, since we find good writers, like Apollodorus, and Lucian, not to mention Strabo, Pausanias, and Artemid., did not scruple to do so; so too Hesych. explains ἑτερόφθαλμος by μονόφθαλμος; and it is not improbable that those Atticists here, as on other occasions, laid down Canons of composition very inconsiderately, which would never have been confirmed by their idolized models. I doubt not that μονόφθ. was always used in the language of common life to express both the above senses—a use which, as it involved no catechresis, was not likely to be rejected by those who cultivated purity of phraseology.

10. ὁρᾶτε μὴ καταφρονήσητε, &c.] Reverting back to the subject treated of at vv. 6, 7, our Lord, from injury in general, proceeds to warn his hearers against even contumely towards the persons in question, and that on two grounds: 1. from the care with which God, by his angels, watches over his meanest servants; 2. from the love of Christ shown equally unto them, by his laying down his life for their sakes, as well as their more honoured brethren. It is plain that this admonition is intended for such as had become disciples. In the former, we have an argumentum ad hominem, founded on the general belief of the Jews, and of the early Christians, and maintained by the Fathers generally, that every person, or at least the good, had his attendant guardian angel. This angelic attendant was regarded as the representative of the person: nay, even as bearing a personal resemblance to him (see Acts xii. 15), and also as standing in the same favour with God as the person himself.

— λέγω γὰρ ὑμῖν, ὅτι οἱ ἄγγελοι αὐτῶν, &c.] That angels do minister about the children of God, is certain from various passages of the O. T., and some of the New. But Mr. Grew. seems right, in thinking that neither this nor the other texts establish the doctrine of guardian angels in particular, i. e. angels individually appointed to each of the heirs of salvation, though they may furnish a strong evidence for the doctrine of guardian angels in general, that is of the peculiar relation of the good and holy beings who inhabit the heavenly mansions, to the heirs of salvation in common. It is only in this general ministerial relation that they are in Heb. i. 14 represented as λειτουργικά πνεύματα, and agreeably to their name of angels, or ‘messengers sent forth’ to minister to the heirs of salvation. “Yet I doubt not that (as Mr. Grew. says) in a variety of ways, at present inscrutable and unintelligible to ourselves,—but which may appear more fully hereafter—they are actually instrumental in furthering the spiritual welfare of mankind:” and I would add, occasionally of individuals in particular. Though I cannot find in this, or any other passage, proof that each one has his guardian angel, which Mr. Alf. unwarrantably, from the use of ἐνός τῶν μικρ. τ., here infers. I say unwarrantably, since the sense there is ‘any one,’ eq. to ‘not at all.’ As to Acts xii. 15, ἄγγελος ἔστιν αὐτοῦ, the opinion there expressed is no more binding on us than the notion of some fanciful Fathers, as Tertullian, and perhaps Origen, Basil, and others. Nay, Hermes Pastor even supposes every Christian to have both his good and his evil angel. Now this shows, not only that it may have been erroneous, and savouring of superstition, as Mr. Alf. expresses, but that it was superstitious, nay, savoured of something worse; for who can fail to see, that in the case of the persons spoken of in Acts, it might be derived from the wild, and sometimes profane dreams of the Rabbins, nay, as held by Tertull., Orig., and Basil, derived from the still worse source of pagan superstition, which assigned to every man both his good and his evil genius, and hence we may suspect how the notion originated? See more in the able notes of Calv., Marlorati, Hamm., and Whitby, who have given good reasons for thinking that the doctrine in question is, at any rate, neither to be proved, nor refuted, from this passage, nothing being distinctly affirmed; though Calv. and Whitby have, I think, gone far to prove the negative. Nay, Calv. does not hesitate to pronounce that it is at variance with the whole doctrine of Scripture, and, after showing that the passage of Acts, in whichever way taken, as arising from the common notion, or otherwise, will not afford any proof of the doctrine in question, then concludes with the weighty remark: “Facessat ergo commentum illud de bono et malo genio, ac nobis tenere sufficiat, Angelis mandari totius Ecclesie curam, ut singulis membris succurrant, prout feret necessitas et usus.”

— βλέπουνσι τὸ πρόσωπον, &c.] i. e. ‘they enjoy the favour of,’ &c., with an allusion to Oriental custom, by which none were allowed to see the monarch, but those who were in his especial favour. See 1 Kings x. 8.

11. The connexion here is with the former part of the preceding verse; q. d. ‘Despise not any fellow-Christians, however humble; for the Son of man came to save all, without exception or distinction; showing that God willeth not the death of a sinner, but that all should be saved (comp. Luke xix. 10).’ The verse, however, is cancelled by L. and T., but wrongly; for external evidence is decidedly in its favour (only 5 MSS. and 3 inferior Versions being without it), and internal scarcely less so. All the Lamb. and Mus. MSS. have it. I doubt not that the Alexandrian Critics expunged the verse for no better reason than that they could not trace its connexion, and stumbled at the repeated γὰρ. But the very obscurity of the connexion is the best of all reasons why we should not suppose the verse to be an insertion. The purpose of the repeated γὰρ is to introduce a second reason why the greatest should not undervalue, look above, these little ones, humble and simple-minded believers,—which is this, that not only do angels watch over them, but the Son of man came to save them, and all others, from their ruined state,—in short lost and ruined man; for, though τὸ ἀπολωλός is said to be neut. for masc., it may rather be supposed that the gender is here accommodated to the object then in the mind of the speaker, and brought out in the next verse, where we have τὸ πρόβατον τὸ πλανήμενον, q. d. ‘lost and ruined man.’

12, 13. The connexion in the thought seems to be this: ‘[You may figure to yourselves the grief and anger which the Lord feels at one of his faithful being led astray, by the joy he, the good Shepherd, feels at the recovery of one that had gone astray;] which is like that of the shepherd, who,’ &c. (Comp. Ezek. xviii. 23, with 2 Pet. iii. 9.) Τί ὑμῖν δοκεῖ (where the ὑμῖν is emphatic) is a formula, showing that the thing may be illustrated by what takes place among themselves, and in the ordinary transactions of life. With respect to δρῆ, it is by some construed with παρουθεῖς; by others, with ἀφῆς; which is the more natural construction, and, as being confirmed by the parallel passage of Luke xv. 4, καταλείπειν ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ is preferable. The reading of Lachm. and Tisch., founded on a very few MSS. and the Vulg., was, I doubt not, a mere critical alteration, devised for the purpose of removing the inelegant recurrence of two participles; though such is occasionally found in the purest Greek writers. Thus internal evidence here confirms external. To advert to the sense of δρῆ, it seems intended to denote those mountain pastures, which abounded in Judæa, and were chiefly grazed by sheep. So Ezek. xxxiv. 6, 'my sheep wandered through all the mountains,' 2 Chron. xviii. 16, &c. Nor is this to be considered as any discrepancy with the ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ of Luke; since the deserts of Judæa were chiefly mountainous, and were only ἔρημα, as being,—like the mountain districts of Scotland,—abandoned to common pasturage, and accordingly very thinly peopled.

14. θίλημα] purpose, or counsel; as in John vi. 39. Acts xxii. 14, and equiv. to εὐδοκία at xi. 26. Οὐκ ἔστι θίλημα ἔμπροσθεν, &c., is a formula loquendi, like that supra xi. 26, οὕτως ἵγινετο εὐδοκία ἔμπροσθέν σου, in which ἔμπροσθέν σου is a Hebraism (answering to ἔμπροσθεν) for the Classical Greek σοι. For ὑμῶν, Lachm. and Tisch. read μου from 3 MSS. and some late Versions. But overpowering external authority, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions, is not to be opposed; and, though the reading μου be very specious, yet I suspect that it was introduced from v. 19 by certain Critics, who thought that the same formula should be found in both, while there μου is far more appropriate; ἔρε ὑμῶν is quite as much so. And hence may be seen the true reason why the Article is here not used.

15—17. These verses relate to the resentment of injuries, and the methods of procuring their redress; v. 18, to the validity of spiritual censures, when lawfully inflicted; 19 and 20, to the efficacy of common prayer, and the presence of Christ with his Church under particular circumstances. As to the connexion of these several topics, we may account for them by the relation subsisting between special applications and a general case. (Greswell.)

15. ἁμαρτήσῃ] i. e. 'wilfully injure;' a sense of the word frequent in the best writers. Comp. Luke xvii. 3, 4. In μεταξὺ σοῦ καὶ αὐτοῦ there is an allusion to the injunctions of the Mosaic law, Levit. xix. 17. Deut. xix. 15, on which the canons of the primitive Church were founded.

— ἑλεῖξον αὐτόν] 'Convince,' lit. 'convict, him of his fault,' or 'trespass against thee,' by the same use of ἑλεῖγχε as that found at John viii. 46, τίς—ἑλεῖγχει με περὶ ἁμαρτίας; whence it is plain that τῆς ἁμαρτίας is here to be supplied from the preceding ἁμαρτήσῃ.

16. ἐκέρδησας] Meaning, 'hast gained him over to God or Christ, brought him to a right mind.' Comp. 1 Cor. ix. 19, τοὺς πλεῖστον κερδήσω. Simil. Hdut. iii. 74, φίλον προσκτᾶσθαι τινα.

— δύο μαρτύρων ἢ τριῶν] In allusion to the injunction of Deut. xix. 15, also adverted to at John viii. 17, and 2 Cor. xiii. 1; and, as appears from the Talmud, constantly acted upon by the Jews.

17. τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ] i. e. 'to the particular congregation to which you both respectively belong.'

— ἔστω σοι ὥσπερ ὁ ἐθν. καὶ ὁ τελ.] i. e. 'account him as a person whose intercourse is to be avoided, as that of heathens and publicans;' implying, en dernier ressort, excommunication.

18. ὅσα ἐὰν δήσητε, &c.] On the sense of these words see note supra xvi. 19. The general import of vv. 18—20 is: 'Whatever ye determine, as to the regulation of the Church, shall be approved by the Divine will. Whosoever ye shall determine respecting such an offender,—whether as to his removal from the Christian society, if obdurate and incorrigible, or his readmission into it on repentance, I will ratify; and whatever guidance ye ask from heaven in forming these determinations, shall be granted you; so that there be two or three who shall unite in the determination, or in the prayer.'

19. ἐὰν δύο ὑμῶν συμφωνήσωσιν, &c.] q. d. 'There is, however, no need of the whole of you to give validity to what you shall do in such a case; for where even one or two of you shall agree as to such a matter, it shall be enough.'

— δύο ἢ τρεῖς] Meaning very few. A certain for an uncertain, but very small number. So the Rabbinical writers say, that 'wherever two are sitting conversing on the law, there the Shechinah is among them.' Εἰς τὸ ἐμὸν ὄνομα, i. e. 'on my behalf, in my service and in my cause.' Ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῶν, viz. spiritually, by my assistance to speed their petitions.

The whole of this verse affords a manifest proof of our Lord's omniscience, and consequently of his Divine nature; inasmuch as if, wherever true believers meet to worship God, in his name, though in many different places at the same time, he is present with them all,—hence he must possess a power which none can have but God.

21. On the connexion here see Greswell, Parab. vol. ii. 367, seqq.

— ἐπτάκις] The number seven was selected by Peter for the limit; and it is plain that he thought there was a point at which the duty of forbearance should have a limit, and ought to cease.

22. ἑβδομηκοντάκις ἐπτά] A high certain, for an uncertain and unlimited number. The meaning is, 'as often as he offend,' and, as is implied, (indeed, expressed in Luke,) 'is repentant.' Comp. supra vi. 12, and note.

23. διὰ τοῦτο] This is not (as Kuin. considers it) a mere formula transitionis; but is put elliptically: q. d. 'Wherefore, or 'accordingly' [because pardon of injuries is to be unlimitedly granted to the repentant offender], the Gospel dispensation,' i. e. 'the conduct of God therein may be compared with that of a king in the following parable. God will deal with the members of his Church, as a certain king did with his servants. He will call all to a strict account, and to the unmerciful he will show no mercy.'

— ἀνθρ. βασιλεῖ] This is not a mere Jewish Greek idiom (though occurring often in the Sept.), since it is found in the Class. Greek writers, though only the earlier ones, as Homer, Pind., and Hdtot., and even in this is confined to certain expressions, such as μάντις ἀνθρ.

— δούλων] Not slaves, but ministers, or officers in the receipt or disbursement of money, as stewards, governors of provinces, or otherwise.

24. προσηνέχθη] For this L. and T. read προσέχθη, found in MSS. B, D, and Origen. A specious reading, which might seem countenanced by Acts xvi. 20. But, considering that all the MSS. but two, confirmed by the ancient Vers., support the text. rec., I doubt not that the reading in question was one of the numberless false corrections found in those MSS.; and in this instance arose from the Critica (like Origen) scrupling at this very rare use of προσφέρειν, adduco (scil. ad iudicium) in the passive (occurring elsewhere only infra xix. 13); and it is probable that, calling to mind the above passage of Acts, they concocted this emendation. But an expression is not to be expunged or altered because it is rare, but is rather to be carefully left untouched.

— μυρίων ταλάντων] Namely, of silver,—for in all numbers occurring in ancient authors, gold is never to be supposed, unless mentioned,—yet a vast sum in comparison with 100 pence, and therefore well intimating the immense difference between our sins against God and those of ourselves one against another.

25. ἔχοντος] scil. τι, 'wherewithal,' for δυναμίσου, as often both in the New Test. and the Classics.

— πραθῆναι, &c.] According to the custom of all the nations of early antiquity. At ἀποδοθῆναι supply τὸ ὀφειλόμενον from the subject-matter.

26. Κύρις] This is absent from MSS. B, D, and 2 cursive ones (to which I add Mss. 11,838, and Scriv. y.), with the Vulg. and Armen. Versions, and Origen; and it is cancelled by L., T., and Alf., but on insufficient authority. As respects the Vulg., I find dominus in the Lamb. MS. (of the 7th century); and I doubt not that it exists in others. So Jackson testifies that it is in the Cod. Forojul. of great antiquity. Internal evidence may seem rather against the word; but such overwhelming external authority, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Vers., is irresistible. I doubt not that the word was lost in a few ancient MSS. by the carelessness of scribes, who not unfrequently overlook the abbreviation (Ϟ) for Κύρις. This has happened in D and some other copies, infra xx. 30. Mark ix. 24. Matt. xiii. 51.

θύμησον ἐπ' ἐμοί, καὶ πάντα σοι ἀποδώσω. ²⁷ Σπλαγχνισθεὶς δὲ ὁ κύριος τοῦ δούλου ἐκείνου, ἀπέλυσεν αὐτὸν, καὶ τὸ δάνειον ἀφήκεν αὐτῷ. ²⁸ Ἐξελθὼν δὲ ὁ δούλος ἐκείνος εὗρεν ἕνα τῶν συνδούλων αὐτοῦ, ὃς ὤφειλεν αὐτῷ ἑκατὸν δηνάρια· καὶ κρατήσας αὐτὸν ἔπνιγε, λέγων· Ἀπόδος μοι * εἴ τι ὀφείλεις. ²⁹ Πιεσὼν οὖν ὁ σύνδουλος αὐτοῦ [εἰς τοὺς πόδας αὐτοῦ], παρεκάλει αὐτὸν, λέγων· Μακροθύμησον ἐπ' ἐμοί, καὶ [πάντα] ἀποδώσω σοι. ³⁰ Ὁ δὲ οὐκ ἤθελεν, ἀλλὰ ἀπελθὼν ἔβαλεν αὐτὸν εἰς φυλακὴν, ἕως οὗ ἀποδῶ τὸ ὀφειλόμενον. ³¹ Ἰδόντες δὲ οἱ σύνδουλοι αὐτοῦ τὰ γενόμενα, ἐλπήθησαν σφόδρα· καὶ ἐλθόντες διεσάφησαν τῷ κυρίῳ αὐτῶν πάντα τὰ γενόμενα. ³² Τότε προσκαλεσάμενος αὐτὸν ὁ κύριος αὐτοῦ, λέγει αὐτῷ· Δούλε πονηρέ! πᾶσαν τὴν ὀφειλὴν ἐκείνην ἀφήκᾰ σοι, ἐπεὶ παρεκάλεσάς με· ³³ οὐκ ἔδει καὶ σὲ ἐλεῆσαι τὸν σύνδουλόν σου, ὥς καὶ ἐγὼ σε ἤλεσα; ³⁴ καὶ ὀργισθεὶς ὁ κύριος αὐτοῦ παρέδωκεν αὐτὸν τοῖς βασανισταῖς, ἕως οὗ ἀποδῶ πᾶν τὸ ὀφειλόμενον αὐτῷ. ³⁵ Οὕτω καὶ ὁ Πατὴρ μου ὁ † ἐπουράνιος ποιήσει ὑμῖν, Luke xliii. 42. Rev. xvi. 3, though in all the passages except the first L. and T. think they make sure work by removing the word; and yet it would be safer work to retain it, at least within brackets.

— μακροθύμησον ἐπ' ἐμοί] 'have patience with me'; as the Latin indulge, expecta; lit., 'wait a little longer for me,' i. e. for payment from me. So Artemid. iv. 11, μακροθυμῆν κελεύει (to wait longer for the debt).

— For σοι ἀποδώσω Lachm. edits ἀποδώσω σοι, from B, L, and 3 cursive MSS. (to which I add Mus. 16, 183, and the Leic. MS. teste Jacks.), with the Vulg. Vers. and Orig.—very insufficient authority for the reading, which probably arose from the carelessness of scribes. The variation of position led, however, as often, to omission in 1 MS. (D), and 2 or 3 copies of the Ital. Vers., which Tisch., in his second Ed., catches up as a prize,—not heeding the united authority of all the other MSS., confirmed by v. 29. The cancelling of ἐκείνου at v. 27 by Lachm., on the authority of 1 MS. (B), and in the face of internal evidence (forgetful that in his favourite Cod. B there is a perpetual bellum internecinum against pronouns seeming to the Critics unnecessary), is rash in the extreme.

²⁸ κρατήσας ἐπνίγει] 'he seized him by the throat.' Both πνίγειν and ἀγγχειν often occur in the Classical writers, of the seizing of debtors by creditors, to drag them before a magistrate, and compel them to pay a debt. So Pollux iii. 116, ἀποπνίγειν τοὺς ὀφειλόντας.

— For the reading εἴ τι there exists the Vol. I.

strongest evidence, both external and internal (including all the Lamb. and Mus. copies),—a reading which has been preferred by every Editor of note. The common one, ὅ τι, is doubtless a gloss. The sense, however, is the same according to either; for the εἴ is not conditional either here or in the passages adduced by Wets., as examples in the Class. writers, espec. Diog. Laert., εἴ τι μοι ὀφείλεις ἀφίημι αὐτῷ.

²⁹ The words εἰς τοὺς πόδας α., cancelled by L. and T., are probably, though not certainly, spurious.

— πάντα] This word is, from strong evidence [including all the Lamb. and many Mus. copies], cancelled by L. and T.

³¹ ἐλπήθησαν] The word imports a mixture of grief and indignation.

³² πᾶσαν τ. ὀφ.] 'The whole of that great debt.'

— ἕως οὗ ἀποδῶ π. τ. ὀφ.] Which, from its great amount, it never could be. Consequently, as Greswell observes, the punishment was eternal, so far as that which can never cease to be inflicted while it is capable of being endured, may be said to be so.

ἐὰν μὴ ἀφήτε ἕκαστος τῷ ἀδελφῷ αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ τῶν καρδιῶν ὑμῶν [τὰ παραπτώματα αὐτῶν].

XIX. 1^a Καὶ ἐγένετο, ὅτε ἐτέλεσεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τοὺς λόγους τούτους, μετῆρεν ἀπὸ τῆς Γαλιλαίας, καὶ ἦλθεν εἰς τὰ ὄρια τῆς Ἰουδαίας πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου. 2 Καὶ ἠκολούθησαν αὐτῷ ὄχλοι πολλοί· καὶ ἐθεράπευσεν αὐτοὺς ἐκεῖ. 3 Καὶ προσῆλθον αὐτῷ well as οὐράνιος, since the expressions ἰπουράνιος θεὸς and ἰπουράνιοι θεοὶ occur in Homer, Pindar, and other Class. writers, poets, and also prose writers, as Lucian, Dionys. Hal. iv. 3. Alex. 9 and 35. Philopatri 18. And considering that ἰπουρ. is often used by St. Paul chiefly in the sense heavenly, equiv. to in heaven, and is found in 2 Macc. iii. 39, and in the Sept. at Dan. iv. 23, and Ps. lxxvii. 14, ὁ ἰπουράνιος is used of Jehovah (equiv. to ὁ ἐν οὐρανῷ, which is applied to Christ, John iii. 13); hence I see not why St. Matthew should not once have written ἰπουράνιος.

— The words τὰ παραπτώματα αὐτῶν have been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., on the authority of MSS. B, D, L, and 5 others, besides the Vulg., and some other later Versions; but wrongly, for they seem absolutely required by the preceding ἀφήτε, and are almost indispensably necessary to the understanding of the scope of the parable, and the full development of the sense, which is, that 'whatever excuse men may make for being inexorable, God, the Judge of all, will deliver them to the tormentor to be punished for their sins with severe justice, if they do not from their hearts forgive their brethren their trespasses against them.'

XIX. 1-12. Mark x. 1-12. μετῆρεν ἀπὸ τ. Γ.] After crossing the Jordan out of Judæa, prob. at the ford at Gamala, our Lord did not, it seems, make any sojourn there, but passed along the river side to Bethabara, or Bethania. Nothing is precisely said about stopping, but mention is made of proceeding. Yet it seems that our Lord did stop long enough for the people of the adjacent country to come together, who, it seems, followed him in great numbers on his way to Bethabara; for that we may collect from the ἠκολούθησαν of Matthew. Mark does not precisely say that they followed him; but such seems meant to be implied in συμπορεύονται, in which is possibly a pregnancy of sense, whereby both the meanings, viz. "to come together," and "to go together," "accompany any one," are united. The former is the only one found in the pure Greek writers. But the latter is not unfrequent in Polyb. What is to be understood by καὶ is not clear. Probably it means at some place along the banks of the Jordan, where he made some short stay for refreshment; whereupon the multitude who came together brought to him some sick folk, whom he healed before he went forward on his journey.

The journey here narrated would seem (notwithstanding the long interval which must thus have intervened since the foregoing discourse) to be the journey of our Lord into the region beyond Jordan, John x. 40, there prefaced with the words ἀπῆλθε πάλιν πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, and consequently his last journey from Galilee for Jerusalem previous to his crucifixion. As respects the difficulty here occurring from the words εἰς τὰ ὄρια τῆς Ἰουδ. πέραν τ. Ἰορ., which would make the country beyond Jordan a part of Judæa, which it never was,—the only satisfactory mode of obviating it is, to take πέραν τοῦ Ἰορ. as standing for διὰ τοῦ π. τ. Ἰ., supposing a brevity of expression for ἦλθ. πέραν τοῦ Ἰορ. εἰς τὰ ὄρια τῆς Ἰουδαίας. And this is strongly confirmed by the words of Mark x. 1, which though not free from some flaw or other, can only mean 'after passing through the country beyond Jordan.' See my note. Accordingly, we are to understand that our Lord, having gone from Galilee into the country situated on the further (i. e. East) side of the Jordan, traversed its bank until he came to a part favourable for crossing unto the other side, namely, to Bethabara, situated indeed on the further side of Jordan, but in the confines of Judæa, as Matt. and Mark term it, but strictly speaking Samaria, which, however, was popularly considered as part of Judæa. Why our Lord took the longer course through Peræa, and then across Samaria and part of Judæa and Jerusalem, in preference to a shorter one across Lower Galilee, and the central parts of Samaria and Judæa, prob. was again to evangelize those benighted tracts of country.

2. ἠκολούθησαν—πολλοί] John x. 41, says ἦλθον πρὸς αὐτόν, comprehending both those who went to our Lord for instruction (alluded to in Mark), and those who resorted to him in order to be healed of divers diseases otherwise incurable, adverted to by Matt. here. The words in John, Ἰωάννης μὲν σημαιοῦν—ἀληθῆ ἦν, attest the now confirmed persuasion of many who might have been before wavering, but who were now decided both by his teaching (comp. John vii. 46) and still more by his miracles of healing, which they contrasted with the non-working of miracles by John (though a true Prophet), and thence justly inferred the Messiahship of Jesus. The result of this evidence and discussion was, that many believed on him there. It was this signal success in the work of conversion, which brought, we find, as usual, the Pharisees into the field, πειράζοντες, as Matt. says, "trying to ensnare him" into giving some such decision on a very intricate question (disputed between the two great Jewish Schools, and involving offence to one or the other), as should either bring him into some dilemma in respect to the Law of Moses, or lose him part of the affections of the people by what they might think over strictness in forbidding what was at least tolerated.

3. προσῆλθον α. οἱ Φαρ.] L. and T. cancel the οἱ, from MSS. B, L, M, and 9 cursive ones (to which I add Br. Mus. 14,774, 17,470, 5540, 11,838, and Scriv. y); but that external authority is quite insufficient; and internal evidence is adverse, since the οἱ might easily be absorbed in the εἰ preceding; and, what is more, Φαρι- σαῖοι without the Article, no where else occurs in the Gospel of St. Matt., nor, perhaps, in that of Mark—I mean so as to denote the Pharisees; for as to the parallel passage of Mark x. 1, there is no certainty, since very considerable evidence exists against the Article, which may have been introduced from Matth. At all events, the οἱ here is doubtless genuine; and the meaning is, 'the Pharisees of the neighbourhood.' If Mark meant to express that sense, the Art. would be indispensable; but if "some Pharisees," I think he would have written Φαρ. τινες, equiv. to τινὲς τῶν Φαρ., at least, I am not aware of any other example of that idiom. But I doubt not that he meant to express the same sense as Matth., exactly as in Mark viii. 11, comp. with Matth. xvi. 11, where the sense is, 'the Pharisees of the neighbourhood have,' &c., which passage, I apprehend, determines the reading and interpretation here to be as I have laid down.

— εἰ ἔξεστιν, &c.] The insidious motive of this question is apparent by a comparison of this with the parallel passage in Luke xvi. 18, where the judgment of Christ respecting the unlawfulness of divorce is given in illustration of his assurance, that the law should endure for ever. The interrogators hoped, by inducing Jesus to again deliver his judgment on this point, to embroil him with the school of Hillel, which taught that divorces were allowable even on trivial grounds. But Christ's wisdom frustrated their cunning, and he effectually thwarted their aims by an appeal to their great Lawgiver.

— πᾶσαν] Meaning of any kind whatever, the singular being used collectively to denote every species comprehended under any genus. See Hermann. on Vig. p. 727. Of αἰτίαν the sense is 'cause,' 'ground.'

4. Here ἐποίησεν and ἔπαιον are to be closely connected; for the inference against divorce is founded on what God said by and through (divino afflatus) Adam. Thus the sense is, 'Have ye not read what the Creator, after having at the first made them a male and a female, said,' &c. (see Gen. i. 27.) The argument is strengthened by ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, and ἀρσέν καὶ θῆλυ (sub. γίνοντο κατὰ); the latter of which,—meaning man and woman,—implying that only two persons, one male and one female, were created, plainly intimates the intention of God, that marriage should be in pairs, and indissoluble except by death or adultery.

5. προσκολληθήσεται] Render, 'shall closely connect,' or 'attach himself to;' for in this tense, as in the Aor. 1 Pass., there is a Reflex. middle sense. We have here a forcible metaphor often occurring in the New Test., and sometimes in the Class., and also found in the Hebr. רצו, and the Lat. agglutinare, to denote the closest connexion. For προσκ., very many MSS., including some of the most ancient (but no Lamb. or Mus. ones), have κολλ., which is received by L. and T.—whether rightly or not, is doubtful. Προσκ. may have been altered by certain Critics, who wished to introduce a more Classical term, for the simple verb κολλάσθαι is of very rare occurrence in the Class. writers; whereas in the Sept. and in the Vers. of Aquila it is freq., though προσκολλ. still more. And, considering that internal evidence is in favour of προσκ., and external authority is, at least, equal (for it has place in all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), it ought to be retained, esp. since it is found in the Sept., from which the citation is made, and in another citation at Ephes. v. 31.

— εἰς σάρκα μίαν] Εἶναι εἰς is pronounced by Meyer and Alf. not Greek, but a Hebraism. They might as well pronounce in legem, occurring in Senec. de Benef. vi. (cited here by Jacks.) (where we have, "sua illis in legem eterna est voluptas"), to be not Latin. Jacks., on the other hand, pronounces this of the Evangelist an imitation of an elegant Grecism. Sua trahit quæque voluptas!

With σὰρξ μία, 'one and the same person,' comp. Plato: ἔστι δύο ὄντας ἕνα γινόμεναι. It has been thought remarkable, that there is nothing corresponding to οἱ δύο in the Hebrew. But the truth is, that the Septuagint Translators supplied, from the context, οἱ δύο, to strengthen the sense by the aid of antithesis.

7. τί οὖν Μ. ἐπέτρεξε] Some eminent Expositors assign to ἐπετ. the sense permitted, which they justify by the ἐπέτρεψε of Mark x. 4. But, considering the essential difference between the two ideas of command and permission, it seems better to suppose that the Pharisees here give the strongest sense to the words of Moses, or that they strain the sense, which is only, "he must give her," &c., and that our Lord, v. 8, corrects them, by using, in repeating their expression, the term ἐπέτρεψε. Nevertheless, from a comparison of this with Mark iii. 5, it should seem that the two terms, ἐπετρ. and ἐντέλλ., were by the Pharisees and by our Lord understood as nearly equivalent as to this matter. The stress of the argument by which our Lord puts down the Pharisees is, that the direction given by Moses was only in the way of permission, on account of the hardness of their hearts, as being the lesser of two evils.

— αὐτήν] Lachm. and Tisch. cancel the word on the authority of 4 MSS., two later Versions, and two Fathers, quite insufficient evidence for the omission of a word which can scarcely be dispensed with, and which may have been left out by accident.

8. Μωϋσῆς] i. e. not God; so that it is, as Jerome says, a consilium hominis, not imperium Dei. 'Moses (observes Grotius) is named as the promulgator, not of a common, primeval, and perpetual law, but of one only Jewish, and given in reference to the times.'

— σκληροκ.] Not well rendered 'harshness,' 'brutality'; but meaning, as the Hebr. words in the passage of Deut. require, 'obstinacy,' 'refractoriness,' a disposition which made them incapable of receiving and obeying a purer law. Comp. Prov. xviii. 20, where a firoward heart has answering to it in the Sept. σκληροκαρδία; and so the adjective σκληροκαρδῖος is often used by the Sept. to signify contumacious. However, at Deut. x. 10, the Sept. uses σκληροκαρδίαν, where the propriety of the Hebrew would rather require πονηρίαν τῆς καρδίας, and is used in the parallel passage of Jerem. iv. 4, denoting depravity, a sense which may here be included, espec. since it will point at the principle on which such a permission as the one in question may have been given, namely, as expressed in the Horatian dictum, 'Quid Leges, sine moribus vanae, proficiunt?' Be that as it may, from one cause or the other they were in general unfit to receive the purer law; and it is evident, that even the disciples were unwilling to give up that liberty of divorce to which the Jews had become accustomed.

— ἀπ' ἀρχῆς] 'of old time,' from the beginning downwards. So Hldot. ii. 104, ἀλύπττοι περιτάμνονται ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, i. e. 'from the beginning of the nation.' And so Thucyd. vi. 20, Συρακοσίοις ἀπὸ Βαρβάρων ἀπ' ἀρχῆς φέρεται, 'tribute is paid as of the earliest custom.' Aristoph. Ran. 1031, σκέψαι γὰρ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς 'ὅτε ὠφελίμοι τῶν ποιητῶν οἱ γυναῖκες γεγί-νηται, where ἀπ' ἀρχῆς means from the beginning of their being poets downwards. The expression denotes, indeed, from the beginning of any period in question down to some other period; as here, from the beginning of the human race down to the time of Moses. Comp. John viii. 44, ἀνθρωποκτόνος ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς.

9. Λέγω δὲ—μοιχᾷται] Mr. Alf. remarks, that "Mark gives this verse as spoken to the disciples in the house; and that his accuracy, in such matters of detail, is unquestionable." Be it so: but in what matters, not of detail, is it to be questioned? Since, however, this scant measure of praise to one Evangelist glances a stricture on the other for failure in accuracy, it may be proper to remark, that such imputations (so common to the supporters of a certain school in theology) usually proceed from a failure in attention and candour on the part of the remarkers. The only imputation that can here be cast on the Evangelists is, that want of perspicuity and fullness so common even in the greatest Class. writers in narration. As to the present case, it is evident that two answers came from our Lord's lips; one, in reply to the question of the Pharisees, the other to the disciples in the house, for further (πάλιν) information on so important a matter. Such must be the import of πάλιν, for the disciples had not inquired before. The answer to the disciples' inquiry is somewhat fuller, but substantially the same. The cause of St. Matthew's want of perspicuity is a want of fullness. He does not say, what nevertheless must have been the case, that the remark of the disciples on our Lord's final determination of the question εἰ οὕτως ἐστίν—γαμήσαι was made in the house, and in reply to our Lord's second answer. It was, indeed, unlikely that the disciples would have made the remark before the Pharisees. In short, St. Matthew omits to notice the second inquiry in the house; and St. Mark omits the disciples' remarks on our Lord's second answer. There is, moreover, a seeming perturbation of the context, and a confusion of verses (such as is found occasionally elsewhere in Scripture, and all ancient writings), since the portion τί ὑμῖν ἐνετείλατο M.; οἱ δὲ εἶπον οὐ γέγονεν οὕτω, forming vv. 4, 5, 6, should have come in after ἀνθρωπος μὴ χωρίζεται, the place assigned to the parallel portion in v. 7, 8, of Matthew. This, I now find, has not escaped a recent able Harmonist, Anger, who ventures (uarranto minus idoneo) so to place the words. At any rate, in a harmony like Mr. Greswell's, the words ought to be placed in juxta-position with vv. 7, 8, of Matthew. Thus, by properly harmonizing the matter of both Evangelists, disentangling what is perplexed, not to say perturbed, and correctly interpreting what is obscure, we arrive at a full and clear statement of the transaction here recorded as it really took place.

— εἰ μὴ] The εἰ is not found in very many ancient MSS. (including the Lamb, and nearly all the Mus. copies), together with several early Versions, and it is with some reason cancelled by almost every Editor.

11. χωροῦσι] χωρεῖν is properly said of capacity, i. e. TO HOLD; but it is sometimes used of capability, whether of mind, to grasp (as Plut.

γὰρ εὐνοῦχοι, οἵτινες ἐκ κοιλίας μητρὸς ἐγεννήθησαν οὗτοι· καὶ εἰσιν εὐνοῦχοι, οἵτινες εὐνουχίσθησαν ὑπὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων· καὶ εἰσιν εὐνοῦχοι, οἵτινες εὐνούχισαν ἑαυτοὺς διὰ τὴν βασιλείαν τῶν οὐρανῶν. Ὁ δυνάμενος χωρεῖν χωρεῖτω.

13 Τότε προσηνέχθη αὐτῷ παῖδια, ἵνα τὰς χεῖρας ἐπιθῇ αὐτοῖς καὶ προσεύξηται· οἱ δὲ μαθηταὶ ἐπετίμησαν αὐτοῖς. 14 Ὁ δὲ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν· Ἀφετε τὰ παῖδια, καὶ μὴ κωλύετε αὐτὰ ἐλθεῖν πρὸς με· τῶν γὰρ τοιούτων ἐστὶν ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν.

15 Καὶ ἐπιθεὶς αὐτοῖς τὰς χεῖρας, ἐπορεύθη ἐκεῖθεν.

16 Καὶ ἰδού, εἰς προσελθὼν εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Διδάσκαλε ἀγαθὲ, τί ἀγαθὸν ποιήσω, ἵνα ἔχω ζωὴν αἰώνιον; 17 Ὁ δὲ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Τί με λέγεις ἀγαθόν; οὐδεὶς ἀγαθός, εἰ μὴ εἰς, ὁ Θεός. Εἰ

Cat. οὐδὲ τὸ Κάτωτος φρόνημα χωροῦσι), or, as here, purpose; q. d. 'all are not capable of acting on this maxim,' or, as it may be rendered, 'this thing,' namely, οὐ γαμήσαι. Simil. Phot. l. 184, οὐ χωρεῖ μεγάλην διδασχὴν ἀδιδασκτος. Jos. Ant. xviii. 5, χωρεῖν τὴν τύχην.

— οἱς δέδοται] scil. ἐκ Θεοῦ, as in 1 Cor. vii. 7. Yet not without the co-operation of man, as appears from the words following.

12. εὐνούχισαν ἰ.] A strongly figurative expression (akin to that of ἐκκόπτειν τὴν δεξιάν, vv. 23, 20. xviii. 8, 9), found also in the Rabbinical writers, and meant of the suppression of the desire, said with reference to those who, from a desire to further the interests of religion, live in celibacy; probably with allusion to the Essenes, who did not marry.

— ὁ δυν. χωρ. χωρεῖτω] On the force of χωρεῖν, see supra v. 11. The Imper. χωρεῖτω is evidently, as Euthym. shows, one, not of injunction, but permission (namely, to do a thing, if one is so minded)—an idiom which is found in the New Test., though the exx. adduced by the Grammarians are, some of them, not to the purpose here, and in scarcely any of them is it simply permissive, except in 1 Cor. vii. 15, χωρεῖσθε, and xiv. 38, ἀγνοεῖτω. Eph. iv. 26, ὀργίζεσθε. 1 Cor. xi. 6, κειράσθε. In others there is an union of permission with some other feeling. I am not sure that this is not the case here, by an union of the permissive and the hortative (which oft. occurs simply in the Sermon on the Mount). This view is confirmed by a passage of Rev. xxiii. 17 (omitted by Winer and Alt.), ὁ διψῶν ἐρχέσθω, καὶ ὁ θέλων λαμβανέτω, where we have an union of permissive and exhortative, by which the ὁ θέλων is pressed to take the permitted boon.

13. ἵνα τὰς χεῖρας ἐπιθῇ] Imposition of hands was a rite which from the earliest ages, see Gen. xlviii. 14, had been in use among the Jews on imploring God's blessing upon any person, and was espec. employed by the Prophets (Numb. xxvii. 18. 2 Kings v. 11), but sometimes by Elders, or men noted for piety. These children, therefore, were brought to Christ for his blessing; and, it should seem, to be admitted into his discipleship; though not by baptism: for the rite was not yet introduced; and if it had, our Lord did not himself perform it. Yet there may be, as some suppose, an anticipated reference thereto. That they were not brought to be healed of any disorder, but to obtain spiritual benefit, is plain; and that they were not only considered capable of receiving them by the people, but also by our Lord himself, is equally clear. And as they had already entered into covenant with God by circumcision, they might justly be considered capable of participating in the spiritual blessings of the Christian covenant. They were surely as fit to be admitted into the Christian Church as the Jewish. How strongly this confirms the lawfulness of Infant Baptism, is obvious; inasmuch that the ancient Divines regarded this passage as a sufficient authority for it. So Tertull. de Baptismo, c. 18. Const. Ap. vi. 15, βαπτίζατε υἱὸν καὶ νύπια. Ἀφετε γὰρ, φησί, τὰ παῖδια ἐρχέσθαι πρὸς με.

14. τῶν τοιούτων] namely, such as have these dispositions; i. e. humility, docility, and simplicity. For Christ meant what he said for his disciples—namely, to inculcate the same lesson as he had done a little before (supra xviii. 3), when, in answer to their inquiry, which of them should be greatest in the kingdom of heaven, he placed a young child in the midst. See also the note on Luke xviii. 15. In the passages of Mark and Luke it is added; ὅτι ἵνα μὴ δέξηται τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ ὡς παιδίου, οὐ μὴ εἰσελθῇ εἰς αὐτήν.

15. καὶ ἐπιθεὶς α. τὰς χεῖρας] Implying, what is added in Mark, ὑψόγει αὐτά.

— ἐκείθεν] i. e. from that village of Peræa, where he had been stopping on his road to Jerusalem. See Mark x. 17, and supra v. 1.

16. εἰς] for τὴν. This was (as we find from v. 22) a young man; and, as we learn from Luke viii. 18, a ruler; by which is probably meant a ruler of the Synagogue. His conduct seems to have been dictated by a real desire to be put into the way of salvation, and a sincere intention of following Christ's injunctions; which, however, proved too severe for a disposition in which avarice prevailed over piety.

— τί ἀγαθόν—αἰώνιον] This question is thought to have reference to the Pharisees' division of the precepts of the law into the weighty and the light. The young man, it seems, was puzzled by the nice distinctions which were made in classing those precepts; and wished to have some clear information as to what was pre-eminently promotive of salvation.

17. τί με λέγεις ἀγαθόν] 'why styled thou me good?' as Mark xv. 12, ὃν λέγεις βασιλέα

τῶν Ἰουδαίων. In this and the preceding verse there are some remarkable varr. lectt. In 6 MSS., some later Versions, and some Fathers, the ἀγαθὸν at v. 16, and the ὁ Θεός at v. 17, are not found; and for τί με λήγεις ἀγαθόν; we have in the same MSS., and one other, τί με ἐρωτᾷς περὶ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ; these readings were preferred by Grot., Mill, and Beng., and were adopted into the text by Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch.; but without reason. The external evidence for them is very slender (I find no accession from the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.); and, though the internal may draw two ways, yet ultimately the balance turns in favour of the text. rec. According to these MSS., the address of the young man would be like one to a Greek Philosopher, and the answer of our Lord (also much resembling the saying of a Greek Philosopher) would be deprived of all its simplicity, and nearly all its propriety. It would, in fact, be no answer to the inquiry; for the young man did not (as appears from the words following, εἰ δὲ θέλεις—ἐντολάς) inquire what was naturally, or essentially, good, but what peculiarly good and virtuous work should be done by him that he might, of merit, win eternal life. And should the words be, as Griesb. directs, referred to what follows, there will be, as Fritz. proves, quite as great an inconsistency. Thus it plainly appears that the readings in question are spurious. How they originated, is not so obvious. They may, as Matthai thinks, have arisen from the conjecture of Origen: and certain it is, the text. rec. is as ancient as the Pesch. Syr. Vers., Clem. Rom., and Just. Mart. But more important is it to inquire, what should have induced him or others to make the alterations in question. Matth. ascribes it to a groundless fear lest the words should be brought forward against the divinity of Christ. Such charges, however, ought not rashly to be made, nor lightly to be credited. If the alterations were introduced designedly, it is more probable that, as Wetstein suggests, they arose from those who thought that the answer would be more suitably made to the QUESTION itself ('what good thing shall I do?') than to the title 'good master.' Yet how could any persons, affecting to be Critics, fail to see that the answer to the question itself is given in the words following? On the whole, I am inclined to think, with Fritz., that no intention existed originally to alter the passage, on any doctrinal grounds; but that the alterations arose at first from accident; namely, as he thinks, in the omission of ἀγαθὸν propter homeoteleuton [rather, I should say, to remove a fancied tautology]; whereupon, he remarks, the words of the next verse, τί με λήγεις, having become quite unsuitable, would be altered to τί με ἐρωτᾷς περὶ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ; I am, however, of opinion that the alteration was not made all at once; but that, at first, a suitable sense was endeavoured to be elicited, by taking λήγεις for ἐρωτᾷς (as in the Sept., and sometimes in the New Test.), and then by the slight alteration ἀγαθοῦ, with ellipsis of περὶ. Comp. Mark i. 30. with Luke iv. 38. And, indeed, ἀγαθοῦ without the Article is cited by Origen himself, at p. 664, C. Thus would arise

a gloss, or marginal scholium, τί με ἐρωτᾷς περὶ ἀγ., or τοῦ ἀγ., which, it seems, was admitted into the text in 6 MSS., possibly of the same class as those which were used by the framers of the Ital. and Vulg. Versions, though the MSS. Brix. of the sixth century has the text. rec. Thus the genuineness of the received reading is, I think, fully established. The suitability of the answer, according to that reading, is capable of the fullest proof, but will partly depend on the exact force of the expression of address which introduces the inquiry. Now one thing is certain, that it is not, as many suppose, a form of mere complimentary address to propitiate favour. Nor if we consider the august dignity of the Person addressed (even supposing as low an estimate as probability will warrant, of our Lord's character by the Jewish Ruler), can it designate moral excellence? The general opinion of Expositors is, that the young man accosts Jesus by a title usually employed by the Jews to their most eminent Rabbis. But of this, I can find no proof. I know of no evidence that the epithet ἀγαθός was applied to the Rabbis at all. It was applied to each of the seven seniors of a Jewish synagogue; but that could only mean vir spectabilis, 'worthy of respect.' The epithet must here bear some reference to διδάσκαλος. And some deeper sense than respect, even in the highest degree, seems to have been that felt by the Ruler. Under the peculiar circumstances of the case, I cannot but regard the force of διδάσκαλος ἀγαθός as all but tantamount to that used by Nicodemus (who came to our Lord for a purpose similar to this Ruler's), in the words Ῥαββὶ and ἀπὸ Θεοῦ διδάσκαλος. The force of διδ. ἀγ. (which may have been, though we cannot prove it, applied to distinguished Rabbis) was nearly the same as Ῥαββὶ: and the young man's inquiry shows his belief in our Lord's being a teacher sent from God, or at least, θεοδιδάκτος. Nevertheless, that did not, strictly speaking, warrant, according to the Ruler's view of Jesus, the application of a title to him which, truly speaking, could be applicable to God alone. Accordingly this title our Lord, proceeding on the estimate of him by the Ruler, markedly declines, q. d. 'Why dost thou apply to me a title which, according to thine own view, can apply not to me, but to God alone?' There is great weight in the next words, which are intended to supply a proof of what has been just said, and their full sense has been thus expressed by Bps. Pearson and Bull, 'there is no being originally, essentially, and independently good, but God'; consequently, say they, the Father, being the fountain of the whole Deity must, in some sense, be the fountain of the goodness of the Son. And they further carry out this view by showing that the Ante-Nicene Fathers thought ἀγαθός applicable essentially and strictly to the Father only: and to Christ only by reason of the goodness derived to him as being very God of very God. Yet this is venturing out of our depth, in endeavouring to be wise above what is written. On such a question as this, and that involved in the words of Mark xiii. 32, περὶ ἡμετέρας ἡμετέρας—οὐδεὶς οἶδεν—οὐδὲ ὁ υἱός, εἰ μὴ ὁ πατήρ, I would say, with a great ancient Father, οὐ δεῖ πάντ' ἀκριβολογεῖν οὐδὲ πάντ' πολυπραγματεῖν περὶ τοιούτων, "in such cases, it is our wisdom, no less than our duty, to let the secret things belong unto the Lord." The foregoing discussion will enable us to settle the disputed question, as to the punctuation in the last clause of this verse. It has been usual to place a comma after εἰς, according to a use of εἰς not infrequent, e. gr. Matt. xxiii. 8, εἰς—ἰστίον ἡμῶν ὁ καθηγητής, ὁ Χριστός, q. d. namely, as to who is Christ; a sense here not unsuitable, but which has, nevertheless, I apprehend, not so much force and gravity as that arising from the removal of the comma, namely, unless God alone! This use of εἰς is found in several passages of the New Test., not only in the parallel passage of Mark x. 18. Luke xviii. 19, but also in a kindred passage at Mark ii. 7, εἰ μὴ εἰς, ὁ Θεός, where the parallel passage of Luke v. 21, εἰ μὴ μόνος (for εἰς) ὁ Θεός, fixes the sense of εἰς in the other three passages. To these may be added a passage of Mark xii. 29, ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν Κύριος εἰς ἰστίον, and 32, εἰς ἰστίον Θεός, καὶ οὐκ ἰστίον ἄλλος, where the emphatic sense One, one only, is established beyond question by the words of explanation, καὶ οὐκ ἰστίον ἄλλος following εἰς i. 6. at v. 32. This idiom might be thought by the Lexicographers of the New Test. a Hebraism (and certainly I cannot find it in the Greek Class. writers; for the ex. adduced by Robins., Xen. Cyr. iv. 1. 17, is not at all to the purpose); but the difficulty is to prove it so; for of the long list of passages adduced by Bretschneider, one only is apposite, viz., to show that the Hebr. יְהוָה was used in that sense, namely, Zech. xiv. 9, where the Sept. renders by καὶ ἰσται Κύριος εἰς, καὶ τὸ ὄνομα ἑν, though that does not do justice to the sense of the passage (prob. in the mind of the scribe), where (as Dr. Henderson has well seen) the term יְהוָה is to be rendered, not one, but alone, q. d. 'Jehovah is one God, Jehovah alone!' The only other ex. of εἰς in this sense that I know of, is Ecclus. i. 8, εἰς ἰστίον σοφός—Κύριος. As to the example I have in former edd. adduced from Phocylides, εἰς Θεός ἰστίον σοφός, &c., it was plainly formed by the Pseudo-Phocylides, on the passage of Ecclus., and some passages of the New Test.

—εἰ δὲ θέλεις εἰσελθ. ε. τ. ζωὴν, &c. Compare the saying of a Rabbin. writer, cited by Wets. on Acts xiv. 22, where, in answer to the question of David, "Quænam est porta ad vitam futuri sæculi?" the answer is, "Si debes in vitam ingredi, debes etiam afflictiones tolerare."

For τήρῃσον, Lachm. and Tisch. edit, from two MSS., τήρει, which, however, I suspect to have been a mere correction, proceeding from Critics, whose purpose it was to improve the Græcism, though, indeed, the form τήρῃσον, however unusual in the Class. writers, is a Græcism sufficiently good to have proceeded from a writer so little Classical as the Evangelist. Τή-ρῃσον, too, occurs twice in St. John, xvii. 11, and xxiv. 15; while τήρει is found in the purer Greek of St. Paul, 1 Tim. v. 23. Besides, the aorist seems entitled to the preference on the score of greater suitability, since it carries with it a sense of continued action (see Mr. Green's Gram. N. T. p. 14), q. d. 'keep, or observe, continually.'

By τὰς ἐντολάς are meant those of God, in the Decalogue; and though our Lord, at v. 18, adduces his instances from those of the second table only, more was unnecessary, those of the first being included in his foregoing explanation of ἀγαθός. Besides, there are other passages of the N. T. (as Rom. xiii. 8, and James ii. 3) where, though the whole Law be meant, yet the Commandments of the second table are alone adduced in exemplification; not that they are of greater importance than those of the first table, but because there is a necessary connexion implied between the duties towards God and those towards our neighbour, inasmuch that the mention of one may imply the other. I agree with De Wette, that our Lord adduced his exemplification from the second table, in order to bring out, what He well knew, the self-righteous spirit of the young man.

20. ἐφύλαξάμην] B, D, L, and several ancient cursive MSS. have ἐφύλαξα. The same variation occurs in the parallel passages of Mark and Luke; and internal evidence is somewhat in its favour; but external is so adverse (I find ἐφύλαξάμην in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), that it cannot safely be adopted. As to the ἐκ νεότητος cancelled by L. and T., from B, L, and 2 cursive MSS., the same may be said. The words may have been introduced from Mark and Luke; but they were more prob. omitted by accident in those few MSS. They are recognized in the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions; and though a few copies of the Vulg. have them not, they have place in the Lamb. MS. of the seventh century. The ταῦτα πάντα, adopted by the same Editors, was, I suspect, derived from the parallel passage of Mark and Luke, though in the former Lachm. inconsiderately edits πάντα ταῦτα, from D above.

—τί ἔτι ὑστερῶ] At τί sub. κατὰ, 'In what am I yet behindhand, or wanting?' This readiness to undertake more than he had yet done, showed at least that he was well disposed,—and caused our Lord, as we learn from Mark, to be pleased with him. So a Rabbinical writer, cited by Wets.: 'There is a Pharisee who says, "What ought I to do? and I will do it." That is good. But there is also a Pharisee who says, "What ought I to do besides? and I will do it." That is better.'

21. ἐφη αὐτῷ] Lachm. edits, from MS. B, and 2 others, and the Vulg. and Ital. Versions, λέγει; while Tisch. retains ἐφη, which Lachm. might have been expected to do, since supra v. 18, he edits ἐφη for λέγει, and ἐφη for εἶπα —solely on the authority of MS. B. The reading here, λέγει, is entitled to attention (as appears from v. 18, and what is said in my note, supra xiii. 28, and Mark vi. 31), not, however, to adoption, since such vast weight of external authority is scarcely balanced by any internal evidence. The Critics seem to have thought that propriety of language would require the same verb in both clauses, as is the case in Mark and Luke. But to Matth. it might justly seem that the august dignity of the Speaker, and the weightiness of the address from such a quarter, required the more dignified term εἶπεν.

—εἰ θέλεις τέλειος εἶ. 'If thou wiltest, art desirous to be perfect,' lit. 'complete' (said with reference to the expression, τί ὕστερόν, of the foregoing question), 'if thou aimest at going on unto perfection, by continually carrying out towards completion the principle of the love of God, as shown in keeping his commandments.'
Comp. 1 John ii. 5, ἐν τούτῳ (ὅς τῇ αὐτοῦ τὸν λόγον) ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ Θεοῦ τετελείωται.
Answering to this is the injunction, supra v. 48
(comp. with Luke vi. 36), and espec. Col. iv. 12, τέλειον καὶ παπληρωμένοι. Nor is the expression unexampled in Class. writers. Thus Isocr.

πάσας ἔχειν τὰς ἀρετάς, and Plato, p. 643, τέλειος ἀνὴρ.

In the next words, our Lord proceeds to test the reality and completeness of the young man's professed love and obedience to God by a requisition of the most heart-searching kind, and such as would practically show him how far he was from what he professed to aim at. A similar severe test of the sincerity of religious possession, in demanding its being carried out in practice, occurs in Joseph. Ant. xiii. 10, 5, where a celebrated Rabbi says to king Hyrcanus, Εἰ θέλεις εἶναι δίκαιος, τὴν ἀρχιεροσύνην ἀπόδου, καὶ μόνον ἀρχίστω τὸ ἄρχειν τοῦ λαοῦ, which had the same success with the king, as here with the ruler. Notwithstanding what Expositors say, this young man was probably a Pharisee. Such, certainly, was Hyrcanus, of whom Jos. speaks as οὐ βουλούμενον εἶναι δίκαιον, καὶ πάντα ποιοῦντα ἔξ ἂν ἀρίστων ἐν τῷ Θίῳ, and then adds, καὶ αὐτὸ δὲ (scil. τὸ ποιῆσαι ἔξ ἂν ἀρ.
τ. Θ.) οἱ Φαρισαῖοι φιλοσοφοῦσιν, 'study,'
'aim at.' This exactly corresponds to the τί ἀγαθόν (= δίκαιον) ποιῆσαι ἵνα κ.τ.λ. It can hardly be said, as it is by Whitby, Mackn., and others, that the requisition here has no reference to Christians in general, of the present or any other age. Since we find the same given to Christ's disciples in general, Luke xii. 33; and accordingly we find the injunction in various parts of the Acts of the Apostles put in practice, —we cannot fail to see, that it is so far applicable to Christians of all ages, that they must be prepared to carry out the principle here contained if it should be required, to evince the reality of their religious profession. The expression, ὑπαγε, 'away,' so far from being pleonastic, imparts no little force to the requisition.

The τοῖς added to πτωχοῖς in B, D, and some Edd., and adopted by L. and T., is merely an alteration of Critics, who thought the Article necessary; which is not the case, since the absence of the Article is more usual.

²³ δ. πλούσιος εἰσελθ. That is, as appears from the limitation in Mark x. 24, if he place his trust in his riches, and make them his summum bonum. Nevertheless, considering how many impediments to good, and how many incitements to evil, attend riches; how much the cares of the world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word (see 1 Tim. vi. 9), this limitation scarcely lessens the difficulty; since it is the very nature and effect of riches to cause men to trust in them, and to seek their happiness in them. So that, although the words of this and the next verse be primarily referred to the extreme difficulty (represented by a proverbial mode of expressing what is next to impossible) with which the rich would be converted to Christianity; yet they are applicable to, and were doubtless intended to supply an awful warning of, the danger of trusting in uncertain riches, and the necessity of a true conversion: without which men do not really belong to the kingdom of Christ on earth, and therefore will not be admitted to his kingdom in heaven.

²⁴ For κάμηλον, some ancient and modern Commentators would read κάμινον, 'a cable, rope,' or take κάμηλον in that sense. But for the former there is very slender authority from MSS.; and for the latter no support from the usus loquendi. The greater suitability of κάμηλ.
to the purpose in view,—the magnifying of Divine grace,—is evident from the examples adduced by Lightf. from the Talmud.

—εἰσελθεῖν] Matthæi, Griesb., Scholz, and Tisch., edit. from very many MSS., Versions, and Fathers, for the text. rec., διελθ., which is retained by Fritz. and Lachm. But, though the question is one not easily settled, I now acquiesce in the former reading, which is supported by perhaps superior external authority (I find it in all the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), and internal evidence is rather in its favour.
The very objection started by Campb. to [αὐτοῦ,] ἐξεπλήσσοντο σφόδρα, λέγοντες· Τίς ἄρα δύναται σωθῆναι; ²⁶ Ὁ Ἐμβλέψας δὲ ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Παρὰ ^{o Jer. 32. 17. Zech. 8. 6. εἰσελθεῖν διὰ, and the 'oddness' he complains of, was likely to occur to the ancient Critics, and would be likely to occasion the alteration διαθ., which would be the more likely to be adopted, since thus a seeming tautology would be removed. As to Campbell's preferring διαλθ. on the ground of its yielding a better sense, that is no more than may be said of critical alterations in general, which have for their very purpose to substitute another, and what is thought preferable, sense. And, as to his remark, that 'passing through the eye of a needle is the particular in which the impossibility lies,'—surely the impossibility would be as great for a camel to enter the eye of a needle. Though, in fact, the expression εἰσερχομαι διὰ τρυκ. is really quite equiv. to διαλθεῖν τρυκ., but seems to have been one formed with the inexactness of ordinary language, there being a pregnancy of expression for 'enter into and pass through' the eye, &c. The Critics above mentioned scrupled, too, I suspect, at διέρχ. followed by διὰ (espec. as involving the oddness excepted to by Campb.); and, indeed, it is so exceedingly rare, that it is not easy to find a parallel. Yet two other examples exist, at John x. 1, ὁ μὴ εἰσερχόμενος διὰ τῆς θύρας, and supra vii. 13, εἰσέλθετε διὰ τῆς στενῆς πύλης, where there is a similar pregnancy of sense. On the whole, as εἰσελθ. is the most ancient reading (which is plain from its being found in the Pesch. Syr., Sahid., and Coptic Versions, and recognized by Hermas Pastor, Celsus ap. Orig., and Origen himself), so I doubt not that it is the true reading in all three Gospels. The reading τρυμαλιὰς was doubtless derived from the parallel Gospels; and as to τρήματος, found in MS. B, and τρύπη, found in Origen, they were but critical alterations, introduced for the sake of bringing in a more Class. Greek term.

²⁵ αὐτοῦ] This is not found in many MSS. (including nearly all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), and is cancelled by almost every Editor; yet internal evidence is not against it. It is probably not genuine.

— τίς ἄρα δύναται σωθῆναι] The full sense intended to be conveyed by the interrogation is not, as has been by some supposed, 'what rich man,' but, as understood generally, 'what man;' intimating, however, by implication, the especial difficulty for a rich man not only to enter the kingdom of God, but to continue in it as a living member of the Church of God and Christ (see Euthym. and Chrys.), q. d. 'If the difficulty of entering this kingdom be so exceedingly great, who can hope to come there and ultimately be saved?'

and elsewhere; though the Present tense would have been purer Greek than the Aorist. The action was expressive of a deep earnestness, calculated to impress more forcibly the important lesson, pertaining to the more recondite doctrines of the Gospel, upon the minds of the hearers. By τοῦτο is meant the matter in question,—salvation. The full sense of παρὰ is 'as respects,' 'by the power of.' Ἀδύνατον is not to be qualified, or explained away, but taken in its full sense, as denoting the utter insufficiency of human power in working out our salvation (see Phil. ii. 12, 13, and note), without the in-working, co-working, of God's Spirit of grace. The ἐστὶ at the end of the verse is absent from many MSS. (I add nearly all the Lamb. and Mus. ones), and is cancelled by Lach. and Tisch. I have been content to place it within brackets, because internal evidence is rather in its favour.

²⁷ ἀφῆκ. πάντα—ἔσται ἡμῖν] This inquiry, suggested by the foregoing words of our Lord to the ruler, ἔξεις θησαυρὸν ἐν οὐρανῷ, did not arise from a disappointed feeling, as if they would be in a worse position than they should be, though they had done all as far as they could that was required of the ruler. They had not, indeed, sold all and given to the poor; but they had given up simply their all, and followed Christ. The kind of reward, though evidently of a high kind, is not intimated; but it must have meant a reward in heaven, q. d. 'What shall our portion of the treasure in heaven be, which was held out by thee to the ruler?'

²⁸ ἐν τῇ παλιγγενεσίᾳ] The sense contained in these words depends very much upon the construction. Some, as the early modern Commentators in general, construe the words with the preceding ὁ ἀκολουθ. μοι. This, however, is harsh and forced. Indeed, it is now generally admitted, that the words must be referred to what follows; also to time not past, but future; though Expositors are not agreed either as to the nature of the promise, or the time of its fulfilment. Whitby fixes the time at the close of the world, and after the fall of Antichrist; and he understands, by παλιγγ., not a resurrection of their persons, but a revival of their spirit, by admitting the Gospel to govern their faith and practice. Agreeably to which view, others consider the time in question to be the Millennium. Others, again, understand παλιγγ. to refer either to the renovation, or new state of things, which took place at the promulgation of Christianity, after the ascension and resurrection of Christ; or to the regeneration which was then effected by the Gospel. And they understand 'the throne of his glory' to apply to his mediatorial kingdom. And the sitting on thrones, and judging, &c. they interpret of the ministerial authority, with which the Apostles had been invested by our Lord. Thus they take the general sense to be, that 'the Apostles were to rule the Christian Church by the laws of the Gospel, which they were authorized and inspired to preach, and by the infallible decisions respecting faith and practice which he enabled them to give.' But this interpretation, however specious, will no more bear examination than the foregoing one. For though we may grant that καλῶς, admits of either of these senses, yet the words following cannot, without great violence, be made to yield any sense at all suitable thereto. Not to say, that what is thus assigned as the sense would not at all agree with the purpose for which the words were pronounced, namely, to hold out to the disciples an ample compensation for all their sacrifices and sufferings in the cause of the Gospel. Under these circumstances I cannot but adopt the sense assigned to the passage by the ancient Expositors in general, confirmed by the Syriac, Persian, Arab., Æthiop., and Ital. Versions, and the best modern ones, by which καλῶς, is understood to denote the new state of things in the next world; viewed as the accomplishment, at the resurrection to judgment, of that Regeneration which Christ came to introduce on earth. See Matt. xxvi. 19, compared with Acts iii. 21, and Rev. xxi. 4 and 5. However, it may be best to unite the two senses that have been assigned to the word (with reference to the two significations inherent in it, viz. physical reproduction, by passing to a new state of being, and moral renovation and restoration), and thus to take it to mean both resurrection to another life and moral renovation by the final accomplishment, ἀποκατάστασις, of that regeneration which our Lord came in the flesh to introduce. See Acts iii. 21, compared with Rev. xxi. 5, καὶ πάντα ποιῶ. 2 Pet. iii. 13. This regeneration and renovation commenced after the resurrection of Christ and the throne of glory, and will be terminated only at the period of the termination of Christ's Mediatorial kingdom, ὅταν παραδῇ τὴν βασιλείαν τῷ Θεῷ καὶ Πατρὶ, 1 Cor. xv. 24. Of course, the sense resurrection bears only a subordinate part, as designating little more than the august event which is to usher in this entirely new state of things.

29. καὶ πᾶς ὃς ἀφήκεν, &c.] Here our Lord frankly apprizes the disciples, who addressed to him the inquiry, that this reward, which he now prophetically presents to their view, would not, in several respects of moment, be theirs alone, but be alike assigned to all, of whatever place on earth, who should practise the duty of self-denial and readiness to give up what is dearest to each on earth for the sake of Christ and his Gospel (that kingdom spoken of Luke xviii. 29), and who should be recompensed with blessings an hundred-fold greater than those given up in this present world, and in the world to come shall inherit life everlasting.—The ὅστις for ὃς, adopted by Lachm. and Tisch., and supported by many ancient MSS., including some Lamb. and Mus. ones, is entitled to attention, but not to adoption; in fact, it was probably no other than a correction of style by the Alexandrian Critics.

—The words ἢ γυναῖκα are not found in 2 of the most ancient MSS., nor have they place in certain passages of Origen, Hilary, and Ambrose. The same MSS., and 2 or 3 others, are without this particular in the parallel passage of Mark, where it is likewise cancelled by the same Critics. But in the passage of Luke all the MSS. have it.

None of the Mus. MSS. are without the words, nor any of the Lamb. except No. 528; yet there the words ἢ πατέρα ἢ μητέρα are likewise absent, and accordingly that omission would prove too much. I doubt not that the omission arose, as in so many other cases, from the carelessness of the Scribes, occasioned by the frequent recurrence of ἢ, which will serve to account for both the omissions just mentioned, and also for others noted by the Collators. It is a strong proof of the authenticity of the words, that they are supported by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions, and 8 out of 12 of the MSS. of the Italic Version; and in those the omission may have arisen from the recurrence of aut in the Latin, just as of ἢ in the Greek. As to the transpositions of words occurring in a few MSS., and adopted by Lachm. and Tisch., they probably arose from the same cause as the above omissions.

For ἑκατονταπλασίονα, the reading πολλὰ πλάσιον, adopted by Lachm. and Tisch., from B, D, 2 Versions, and 2 Fathers, was evidently a mere correction, proceeding from fastidious Critics, who stumbled at the great uncommonness of the term (which occurs only in the Classical writers, namely, Xen. Æcon. ii. 2, and once in the Sept.). It seems to have been a term of common life; but such Xenoph. himself does not altogether reject (espec. in his Οἰκονομικῶς), and hence it might have been thought by the Critics Greek sufficiently good for Jewish Greek writers.

To pass from words to things; by ἑκατ. λήψεται most Commentators understand to be denoted a temporal recompense.—as that suggested in the parallel passage of Mark,—namely, in the support and comfort they would receive at the hands of their richer brethren. But there is no reason here so to limit the term ἑκατ., which is only a strong mode of expressing that they shall, upon the whole, receive back very far more in value than they parted with. And although it is not expressly said whether that remuneration is to be temporal or spiritual,—yet, notwithstanding that what follows in the next verse seems to fix it to temporal blessings, still we are justified in including spiritual ones; even the inward satisfactions of a good conscience, and the inexpressible consolations of the Gospel (far exceeding in value all that is most precious of earthly goods, however great), which would be their support under all persecutions and troubles. Compare 2 Cor. vi. 8, seqq., which passage affords both a comment upon our Lord's declaration, and a fulfilment of the prediction contained in it.

30. πολλοὶ δὲ—πρῶτοι.] A sort of proverbial mode of expression, not unfrequently employed by our Lord to check the presumption of his disciples, and instil caution and diffidence; the sense of which is, that 'many who, in the order of time, were last (brought in last) in the kingdom, shall be first in the rewards; and those who claim to be, and now appear to be, first, shall be last;' i. e. that many of the Jews, to whom the blessings of Christ's kingdom were first offered, would be the last to partake of them; and that many of the Gentiles, to whom they were to be offered after the Jews, would be the first to enjoy them. The truth of this saying is evinced in the subsequent parable; accordingly, the more to fix its application here, the saying is repeated at the close of the parable at the beginning of the next chapter; in which, however, as I have shown in Recens. Synop., the application is not to be limited to the Jews, but left general; being meant for the instruction of all Christians of all ages. [Comp. infra xx. 16. Luke xiii. 30.]

XX. 1—16. The important parable (peculiar to St. Matthew) contained in this portion was probably called forth by the question of Peter, supra xix. 27, τί ἅπα ἵσταί ἡμῖν; where he claims for himself and his fellow-disciples a larger portion of rewards in the kingdom of Christ, as having been the first to follow him. Its main purpose was to convey a deep truth (suggested by the last clause of v. 26, παρὰ ἀνθρώποις ἀδύνατόν ἐστι, παρὰ δὲ Θεοῦ, &c.), namely, that the kingdom of God and its salvation is of grace, not of debt; that those who were called first, and consequently have laboured longest, have no more claim of right on God, than those who were called last; that God is not bound to give those rewards with reference to the time at which he may have called (i. e. by the outward call to the means of grace) any person to labour at his work in his Vineyard,—the ἔκκλησι as existing in all ages, first the Jewish, then the Christian; yet, according to his own good pleasure,—and that to all persons without exception,—will God's covenants be fulfilled to the uttermost. The Application is, of course, primarily to the questioners, the Apostles; but secondarily to all, whether nations or individuals, to whom the comparison of first and last called may, in any wise, apply. As respects the latter, the application lies open to all persons to whom the comparison, whether as regards time of calling, or any advantages subsequent to calling (whether as respects talents, or the characteristics which influence their exercise, or the advantages, natural or acquired, which facilitate their successful exercise), may in any wise admit of comparison.

With respect to the μισθόν,—on the subject of which there has been no little dispute among professing Christians,—it has been best explained to be the promise through the covenant of eternal life, uniformly represented by our Lord and his Apostles as a reward (Matt. v. 12. Luke vi. 65. xiv. 14. John iv. 36. 1 Cor. iii. 14. 2 John 8. Heb. x. 35. xi. 6, al.) reckoned, indeed, as it uniformly is by St. Paul, as of free grace, and here at v. 14, 15, pointedly designated as God's free and sovereign gift of grace in the emphatic words θέλω δοῦναι: ἡ οὐκ ἐξεστὶ μοι ποιῆσαι ὃ θέλω ἐν τοῖς ἡμέτεροις; yet, nevertheless, forensically considered, corresponding to, and represented by, wages, as if claimed under God's covenant with man in Christ.

The main point of similarity between the parable and the illustration, in reference to God's dealings with men, is the final rejection of those who seemed to be first, and the gracious admission, through God's sovereign will and pleasure, of those who seemed last.

1. ὁμοία γάρ, &c.] The sense is: 'Thus for example, the same thing will take place in the Christian dispensation as that which occurred in the management of a certain master of a family;' meaning, that God's dealings with mankind in conferring the blessings of the Gospel, afford a point of comparison to the conduct of a house-master.

—ἅμα πρῶτ'] This use of ἅμα, with nouns of time of day, such as ἕως ἡμέρας, &c., is freq. in the Class. writers; but I know of no other example with πρῶτ (except, where we should little expect to find it, in Thucyd. iv. 6, ἅμα δὲ πρῶ ἰσχυρόντες, and with an ellip. of ἅμα at vii. 78, 4, πρῶ ἰσχυροῦντο, and 79, 1, πρῶ ἄρπυιαι), though it occurs with ἔν, ἔν, and other prepositions often, and very frequently carries the Article. Consequently, since it is perpetually treated as a noun (day, used as a nominal at John xviii. 28, and oft. in the Sept.), we cannot doubt that it never was considered as an adverb, but as a noun substantive undeclined, equiv. to ἄρπυιαι, 'the early dawn,' that early period of dawn while it is yet dusk, as is plain from Mark i. 35, πρῶ ἡνυκίου λίαν ἀναστάντες, and John xx. 1, πρῶ, σκοτίας ἐνι οὐρανῷ. Thus it lit. signifies, 'the period when the day is just dawning.' This is placed beyond doubt by Judg. xvi. 2, Sept. ἕως διαφύσης ὁ ἄρπυιαι, where the Alex. and many other MSS. have ἕως φωτός πρῶ, lit. 'while it is dawn of light,' though not yet day. That expression is not so peculiar, but that it recurs at 2 Kings vii. 9, in all the copies. In short, the word was, I am persuaded, first an adjective corresponding to our Eng. adj. prime, and performing the office of an adjective, espec. in reference to time, and then, like our adj. prime, became a subst. Comp. Milton's line, "While day arises, that sweet hour of prime."

2. ἐκ δηναρίου] 'at,' or 'for,' a denarius; which was equiv. to the Greek drachma, then the usual wages of a labourer, and the pay of a soldier.

— ἐστῶτας ἐν τῇ ἀγορᾷ] The very place where (from its being used for buying and selling, and all public business) the greatest number of persons assembled, especially the idle or the unemployed. So Ælian, V. H. xix. 25 (cited by Grotius), μετεπίμπαιτο τοὺς ἐν ταῖς ἀγοραῖς ἀποσχολάζοντας. The time here mentioned was equivalent to what was called the πλήθουσα ἀγορά.

4. δίκαιον] i.e. what, according to all circumstances, and in proportion to the degree of exertion called forth, was equitable or reasonable.

5. ἐνάτην] Lachm. and Tisch. tacitly adopt ἐνάτην for ἐνάτην, without specifying the grounds for so doing; and, on the other hand, Alf. quietly retains the text. rec., without noticing the evidence either way. The spelling ἐνάτ. is found in 5 ancient uncial MSS. (not A, B), and many cursive ones (to which I add Lamb. 1175, 1778, and 1192; 523, 1187, 1188), besides the earlier Edd. In fact, Lachm. and Tisch. invariably edit ἐνάτ., though they do not state the grounds for thus departing from the text. rec. In all the passages (11 in number) where the word occurs in the New Test. the MSS. vary. Sometimes, as in Luke xxiii. 44, add Acts x. 30, all the most ancient uncials have ἐν.; at other times only the later uncials, and occasionally only the cursive ones, have it. In all the above passages, I find it in nearly all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS. Internal evidence is decidedly in favour of ἐνάτ., from its less usual occurrence; though it is as ancient as the time of Homer and Hesiod, who never use ἐνάτος, but only εἶνατος. Again, εἶνατος is found in all the best MSS. of Thucyd., Æschyl., Æseus, Plato, and Soph.; so that it may justly be considered very pure Greek. It occurs very often in the ancient Greek inscriptions, edited by Boeckh, never ἐνν. Ἐννάτ. is, I believe, seldom found but in the later prose writers; and on this ground I should be ready to adopt it as the reading of the New Test. writers; but I am prevented from thus deciding by the circumstance, that, though the words often occur in the Sept., and ἐνν. is generally found in the common texts, yet ἐν. is, I think, invariably found in the Alex. MS., and often in the Vatican (B), and all the other ancient MSS.; and internal evidence is every where in its favour, from the circumstance that, in the later Greek, εἶνατος was doubtless alone in use, and for that reason the Scribes would be likely to introduce it; not to say that even in the Vatican MS. of the Sept. the reading ἐνν. will, I doubt not, be found, on careful collation, to be (as I have very oft. observed in the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.) from alteration, or on rasure, while εἶνατος, when existing, has oft. been overlooked by Collators. Hence, I do not disapprove of the course taken by Lachm. and Tisch., except that they ought to have stated their reasons for adopting it, as I have thought proper to do here once for all.

6. ὥραν] This has been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., from a few ancient MSS., perhaps rightly, for external evidence is quite against the word. The above MSS. are also without ἀργούς, which has been cancelled by Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch., but not on good grounds; for the external authority in its favour is so slender, that we may suspect the word to have been accidentally omitted, probably in copying from MSS., which had (as some are yet found to have) ἄλλους ἀργούς ἐστῶτας, where ἀργούς might be omitted ὁ ἡμετέριον.

7. καὶ ὁ ἐὰν—λήψεσθε] Lachm. and Tisch. cancel these words, on the authority of 4 ancient MSS. and some Versions. Yet here again the fewness of MSS. occasions a suspicion that the words were omitted by the carelessness of scribes. They are strongly supported by the authority of the Pesch. Syr. Version.

8. ὁψίας δὲ γενομένης] The law of Moses strictly required the day's wages of a labourer to be paid on the day itself. See Deut. xxiv. 15.

— τῷ ἐπιτρόπῳ] A servant generally answering to the Roman procurator; but, as said here of agriculture, corresponding to the Latin villicus, and our baillif.

— ἀρξάμενος ἀπὸ τῶν ἐσχ., &c.] A phrase to denote the terminus a quo, the point of departure in a narrative; as in Luke xxiii. 5. xxiv. 27. John viii. 9. Acts i. 22. The construction is well laid down by Fritz thus: ἀπὸ τῶν αὐτοῖς τὸν μισθὸν ἕως τῶν πρώτων, ἀρξάμενος ἀπὸ τῶν ἐσχάτων. It is observable that the order of payment is here introduced, to give opportunity for the remarks which follow.

τῶν ἐσχάτων ἕως τῶν πρώτων. ⁹ Καὶ ἐλθόντες οἱ περὶ τὴν ἐνδεκάτην ὥραν, ἔλαβον ἀνὰ δηνάριον. ¹⁰ Ἐλθόντες δὲ οἱ πρῶτοι, ἐνόμισαν ὅτι † πλεῖονα λήψονται. καὶ ἔλαβον καὶ αὐτοὶ ἀνὰ δηνάριον. ¹¹ Λαβόντες δὲ ἐγόγγυζον κατὰ τοῦ οἰκοδεσπότης, ¹² λέγοντες· "Ὅτι οὗτοι οἱ ἔσχατοι μίαν ὥραν ἐποίησαν, καὶ ἴσους ἡμῖν αὐτοὺς ἐποίησας τοῖς βασιτάσασι τὸ βάρος τῆς ἡμέρας καὶ τὸν καύσωνα. ¹³ Ὁ δὲ ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν ἐνὶ αὐτῶν· Ἐταῖρε, οὐκ ἀδικῶ σε· οὐχὶ δηναρίου συνεφώνησάς μοι; ¹⁴ Ἄρον τὸ σὸν καὶ ὑπάγε. θέλω τοῦτῃ τῷ ἐσχάτῳ δοῦναι ὡς καὶ σοί. ¹⁵ * Ἡ οὐκ ἔξεστί μοι ποιῆσαι ὃ θέλω ἐν τοῖς ἐμοῖς; ^b ἢ ὃ ὀφθαλμός σου ποιηρὸς ἐστίν, ὅτι ἐγὼ ἀγαθὸς εἰμι; ¹⁶ ^c Οὐ- τως ἔσονται οἱ ἔσχατοι πρῶτοι, καὶ οἱ πρῶτοι ἔσχατοι· πολλοὶ γὰρ εἰσι κλητοὶ, ὀλίγοι δὲ ἐκλεκτοί.

10. ἐνόμισαν ὅτι πλεῖονα λήψ.] Render, 'they expected they should receive'; imagining that he would pay them, not according to contract, but in proportion to the time they had worked. For πλεῖονα several very ancient MSS., Origen, and some ancient Versions have πλεῖον; which is edited by Fritz., Lachm., and Tisch., perhaps rightly; the text. rec. might easily arise from A of the word following being conjoined with this, and taken for A.

— ἀνὰ Sup. ἑκάστου, 'a-piece,' on which use see my Lex. Tisch. prefixes τὸ, from 4 of the most ancient MSS.—a reading very specious, but prob. false, the idiom being not at all in character with the simplicity of parabolic narration: and the incompetency of the evidence to establish its truth (for I find it in not one of the Lamb. and Mus. copies) deprives it of all claim to adoption. I suspect that it arose from the emendatorial school, and would have been very suitable to Xenophon or Lucian, but not to St. Matthew.

12. ἐποίησαν] Some render confecerunt, spent. But although examples are adduced proving the sense of ποιεῖν and the Latin facere with nouns of time, yet it is better, with most Commentators, to take it for εἰργάσαντο, by a Hebraism formed on עָבַד, as in Ruth ii. 19. Matt. xxi. 28. And so facere agrum in Columella.

— ἴσους] for ἰσομοίρους, of which examples are given by Wetstein. A similar expression occurs in Plin. Paneg. 25, 'æquati sunt cæteris illis quibus non erat promissum.'

— βασιτάσασι τὸ βάρος τ. ἡ.] 'who have borne the burden of the day, and [endured] the scorching heat.' Καύσων (which is of the same adjectival form with φάσων, σεῖσων, ἄζων, &c.) lit. signifies pr., by the ellip. of ἀνεμος, expressed in the Sept., where the term is freq., 'the burning & s. wind.' Here its sense is simply 'heat,' as in Gen. xxxi. 40, Alex., ἐγενόμην τῆς ἡμέρας συγκαίόμενος τῷ καύσωνι, where in the Hebrew it is שָׁרַח, i. e. the shriller, the drier. In the East, though the air be cool by night and in the early part of the day, yet during the remainder of the day the heat of the sun is exceedingly scorching.

• 13. Ἐταῖρε] An idiom found in the Heb. שָׂר, the Greek ὦ ἀγαθὲ, or φίλε, the Latin bone vir, and Eng. my friend! It was a familiar form of address, and consequently often used to inferiors, and sometimes to strangers or indifferent persons, nay, even to evil persons, infra. xxii. 12.

— οὐκ ἀδικῶ σε] Much ingenuity has been exerted to discover a reason why all the labourers should have had the same wages. It is sufficient to say, that the circumstance was not so improbable but that it may have happened; nay, as appears from the Rabbinical writers, did. And we may suppose it to have been introduced into the story by way of illustrating the unfettered will and pleasure of the Almighty Ruler to distribute his benefits as he thinks proper, and well expressed by the emphatic θέλω δοῦναι, I choose to give.

14. Ἄρον τὸ σὸν] Literally, 'take up.' Probably the foremost grumbler had thrown down his denarius; so it is said Matt. xxvii. 5, ρίψας τὰ ἀργύρια.

15. ἢ οὐκ] The ἢ, not found in 4 ancient MSS., has been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., but unjudiciously; for, considering the small number of MSS. that are without it, it was more likely to have been left out by accident in those few than inserted in all the rest.

— ποιηρὸς] I still am of opinion that the term has here the sense envious (as supra vii. 11 and 22, and Mark vii. 22; and espec. like γῆ γῆ in Prov. xxviii. 22. xxiii. 6, and Eccles. xiv. 10; and the Hebrews called an envious man one of evil eye); though it would seem that there is an implied sense of grudging and vexation, which latter is found as the leading sense in the Sept. Vers. of 1 Sam. xviii. 8. Neh. iv. 7.

16. πολλοὶ—ὀλίγοι δὲ ἐκλ.] These words, not found in 3 ancient MSS., and two late Versions, have been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch.; but wrongly, for they were, I doubt not, thrown out by certain sciolists, who, though seeing (as Euthym. did) that the words have no direct reference to the Parable itself, yet failed to perceive that there is a reference to its concluding words, οὗτως ἔσονται—ἔσχατοι, forming a sort of moral Application thereto, and (as in the Fables of Æsop) introduced by an οὕτως, serving to account for the thing being so or so. But to advert to the important terms κλητοὶ and ἐκλεκτοί. These are supposed to have been originally Jewish forms of expression, applied (like many others) by Christ to similar distinctions in the Gospel Dispensation. In the Sept. κλητοὶ often denotes those chosen to receive especial favours, or called to execute peculiar trusts. Hence it is often in the Old, and sometimes in the New Test., applied to the Jews; who had been chosen from the nations, and called to peculiar privileges. Thus at Pa. civ. 6, they are called ἐκλεκτοί, and in the New Test. κλησις is often used to denote the peculiar favour first vouchsafed to the Jews; more frequently, however, both κλητοὶ and κλησις are used of that shown to Christians. As to ἐκλεκτοί, it may be questioned whether it ever be (as some say) synonymous with κλητοί, at least in the New Test. The terms are properly distinct, and have reference to two different stages in the Christian course. Thus, in the present passage, and infra xxii. 14, they are put in opposition; and in the former, by κλητοί are denoted those who have been invited into, and have entered into, the service of Christ; by ἐκλ., those who have approved themselves therein. In the latter, κλ. means those who are invited to the blessings and privileges of the Gospel; and ἐκλ. those who, having accepted the invitation, approve themselves worthy of their high calling in Christ. It is true, that in both these parables, by the κλητοί are especially designated the Jews, who were invited to the marriage feast of the Gospel, but who almost wholly rejected the invitation (see Luke xiv. 18); by the ἐκλ., those of them who accepted it; and who are termed by St. Paul, Rom. xi. 5, 'the remnant κατ' ἐκλογήν.' However, the saying admits of, and was doubtless intended for, a general application; by which κλ. will denote those who have through grace accepted the invitation, and are professedly members of the Christian Church; ἐκλ., those who have approved themselves not unworthy of the blessing, and have not 'received the grace of God in vain.'

17. ἀναβ. εἰς Ἱ.] The ἀνα is used with reference to the elevated situation of Jerusalem, by a mode of speaking frequent in Jos. and the Sept., and also found in Homer, as applied to Troy. This was our Lord's last journey thither at the fourth Passover.

— τοὺς δ. μαθ.] Μαθ. is cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. on the slender authority of 4 MSS., 3 inferior Versions, and Orig., quite against internal evidence, which is in favour of the word, from the greater probability of the word's being removed, because not in Mark and Luke, than inserted. Its presence in the Pesch. Syr., Vulg., and Sahid. Versions, as well as in all the MSS. except 4, sufficiently establishes its authenticity.

— εἶπεν αὐτοῖς, &c.] Meaning, it should seem, that he spoke out (as we say); though from the time when he made a distinct intimisation of his Messiahship, at Peter's confession, he had, as we find from xvi. 22, begun to disclose it.

18. Our Lord now gives his disciples to understand, that what they had heretofore feared, and what he had already intimated, as that which should come to pass, was now immediately about to take place; for which event, however, and the state of suffering it would entail, he had before prepared their minds by the promises he had recently made to them. See xix. 27—30. xx. 1—16.

— κατακρινούσιν αὐτὸν θανάτῳ] This is to be taken improprie (for the Jews had no power of life and death), and is more definitely expressed by Mark xiv. 64, κατίκριναν αὐτὸν εἶναι ἰσχυρὸν θανάτου: which words have reference to the sentences ἰσχυροῦ θανάτου ἐστὶ. Or the expression rather signifies, by a blending of two senses, 'to condemn any one, so that he shall be delivered to death.' By ἰδύσαι the Romans are plainly meant; for crucifixion was a Roman punishment. The minute particularity of our Lord's sufferings already drawing nigh, and therefore now to be more enlarged on than heretofore,—here predictively announced,—is worthy of deep remark; inasmuch as both in the predictions themselves (all fulfilled to the letter), and in his deliberately going up to Jerusalem in order to their fulfilment, we have a proof that He had a complete foreknowledge of all that he was about to suffer. Humanly speaking, it was far more probable that he should have been stoned to death by the orders of the Sanhedrim,—to whom Pilate had given permission to condemn him, if found guilty to any punishment adjudged by their Law, as was stoning,—than crucified. But all this was done that the Scriptures might be fulfilled.

20. ἡ μήτηρ, &c.] Namely, Salome, mother of James and John, Mark xv. 40. xvi. 1, who had followed our Lord from Galilee, with other pious women who attended on him in his journeys. The request she made seems to have originated in the promise just before given to the Apostles, of sitting on twelve thrones, &c.

— μετὰ τῶν υἱῶν α.] This shows that they participated in the petition; and, indeed, though they preferred it through the medium of their mother, yet they were evidently the principal movers of the affair. Thus Mark is justified in representing them as asking it. And, indeed, that Jesus regarded them as the principals, is clear from his addressing the answer to them. From a comparison of the account in Mark as compared with Matth., it appears that our Lord was entreated to grant beforehand the request about to be made. See l Kings ii. 16, 20.

21. εἰς ἐκ δ.—[ἐξ ἐκωνύμων] Said in allusion to the Eastern custom, by which sitting next to the throne denotes the next degree of dignity; and, consequently, the first situations on the right and left denote the highest dignities. See 1 Kings ii. 19. Ps. xlv. 9. Jos. Ant. vi. 11, 9; and comp. Hdor. ii. 30, οἱ ἐξ ἀριστερῆς χειρὸς παριστάμενοι βασιλεῖ.

—After ἐκωνύμων, most of the uncial MSS. and many others, with the Syr. and some other Versions, insert σου, which has been admitted by Matth., Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch.; rightly, since internal evidence coincides with external authority in its support.

22. οὐκ οἴδατε τί αἰτέισθε, i. e. 'ye do not comprehend the nature of my kingdom;' which will rather call you to suffer with me than to enjoy honour or temporal advantage under me. See infra xxvi. 39, 42. John xviii. 11. Our Lord graciously overlooks the *faul*t implied in their presumptuous request; and is pleased to take their words in such an acceptation as, though capable of it, they were not intended to convey; and then founds on them such instructions as were calculated to remove the grievous misconception, and counteract the ambitious spirit which had suggested their request. Suitably thereto, he speaks to them of the kingdom he was really come to establish in the world, and also of spiritual as opposed to worldly advancement; showing the mode in which it is to be attained, and to what persons it would ultimately be given.

—Δύνασθε πίνειν] The full sense is: 'are ye prepared, have ye the resolution, to drink?' as in Matt. ix. 15. As respects the force of πίνειν and βαπτίζ, thus figuratively used in the phraseology of Scripture, the former is often used to denote partaking of a portion, whether of joy or sorrow, espec. the latter. See Pa. xi. 6. xvi. 5. lxxv. 8. Isa. li. 22. Ez. xxiii. 31. Nor is this unexampled in the Class. writers. (See Hom. li. xxiv. 527, seq., and the note of Heyne there.) But when we take into view the use of the same figurative expression to denote our Lord's last bitter sufferings, Matt. xxvi. 39, 42. Mark xiv. 36. Luke xxii. 42, we shall recognize here an intensity of sense, as denoting a deep-seated, heart-felt bitterness of soul, nearly resembling that of our Lord's ἀγῶνια at Gethsemane, Luke xxii. 41, where see note. The other metaphor involved 'ἡ βάπτ. βαπτισθ., expressing the being utterly overwhelmed by affliction, is one frequent in the Classical writers (e. gr. Plut. de Educ. c. 13, ἡ ψυχὴ—βαπτίζεται. Synes. Epist. 57, τὴν ψυχὴν ἐμβαπτ. μερῖναι), and not less so in the Scriptural ones. See Ps. xlii. 7. lxi. 2. lxxxviii. 7. And when we consider, that in those passages the Messiah's sufferings are foretold, we shall see that something more is meant than the external assaults of calamity and tribulation, even that whereby the iron entereth into the very soul.

The prediction contained in this verse was signally fulfilled; for, of the two, James was the first of the Apostles to drink of the cup of suffering, and share the baptism of blood, only eleven years after his Master's crucifixion. The other, if he did not partake in the latter, yet he had, during an unusually long life, to drink to the dregs of the former.

23. ἀλλ' οἷς ἡτοίμασται] The early Commentators and Translators (misled by some of the ancient Versions) here supposed an ellipsis of δοθήσεται; which would afford some colour to the Arian and Socinian doctrines; since (as Whitby and Campbell observe) 'in the distribution of future rewards, Christ might seem to acknowledge his inferiority to the Father, inasmuch as there would be some power reserved by the Father to himself, and not committed to the Son.' Others of the ancients supposed an ellipsis of ἐκείνων ἐστιν, interpreting the clause οὐκ ἐμὸν δοῦναι, not with relation to our Lord's power, but with respect to his justice and equity; or referring the phrase only to his human nature. But all these ellipses, and others that have been devised, are very irregular, and quite inadmissible. It is better to suppose no ellipsis at all; but only to take ἀλλὰ, with all the best Expositors, in the somewhat unusual, but far from unprecedented, sense of et μή, as in Mark ix. 8, where ἀλλὰ corresponds to et μή in Matt. xvii. 8. 'Ἀλλὰ comes to have this sense from its being thus put for ἀλλ' ἢ, otherwise than. And so the Sept. renders Heb. עַל מָה by ἀλλὰ. Thus the expression, as Whitby observes, argues no defect in the power of Christ, but merely a perfect conformity to the will of his Father, the sense being: 'It belongs not to me to give the highest places in my heavenly kingdom to any except those for whom it is prepared.'

25. οἱ ἄρχοντες—αὐτῶν] Erasmus, Grotius, Wetstein, Rosenm., and Fritz, take κατακ. and κατεξ. to denote tyrannical and arbitrary power (of course hinting a censure thereon); in which sense the words do occur in the Sept. But as it is scarcely to be supposed that the governors in question were always tyrants; and as the simple verbs are used in Luke xxii. 25, it is better, with many good Commentators, to suppose the sense to be, 'exercise authority over.' Thus the κατά is not so much intensive, as it is definitive. The Commentators first adverted to, with even less reason, suppose the first αὐτῶν to refer to the people, the second to the kings; which is harsh, and inconsistent with the parallel passage in Luke. There is, in fact, a repetition of the same sentiment in different words (as also at ver. 27) for greater emphasis.

26. οὐχ οὕτως δέ] The δέ has been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., from many MSS., some very ancient, and a few Versions. But, although internal evidence is rather against the word, yet the opposition inherent in the context is too strong to be left to implication; and is, I doubt not, genuine.

—διάκονος—δούλος] There is properly a difference between these terms; the former signifying a servant, like our footman, or valet, and usually a free man; the latter, a servant of all work, and also a slave. The terms were, however, sometimes interchanged. So Aristid. vol. iii. 360, οὕτω φαῦλος ἦν τοὺς τρέπουσι, καὶ αὐτόχρομα διάκονος.

28. οὐκ ἦλθε διακ., ἀλλὰ διακονῆσαι] As διακονηθῆναι and διακονῆσαι are here opposed, so in Xenoph. de Rep. Att. i. 13, there is a similar opposition, χορηγοῦσι μὲν οἱ πλούσιοι, χορηγεῖται δὲ ὁ δῆμος. To turn from words to things,—as Christ here says he came διακονῆσαι, so at Luke xxii. 27, he says to his disciples ἰνὰ εἰμι ἐν μίσῳ ὑμῶν ὡς ὁ διακονῶν, and at Phil. ii. 7, he is described as μορφὴν δούλου λαβών.

—δοῦναι—ἀντὶ πολλῶν] In order to determine the sense of this passage (so important, by its connexion with the distinguishing doctrine of the Gospel, the ATONEMENT), it is proper carefully to attend to its scope,—and then to ascertain the force of its principal terms, λύτρον, ἀντὶ, and πολλῶν. The scope of the passage evidently is, to point out the purpose of Christ's coming into the world. It was δοῦναι—πολλῶν. On the sense of ψυχὴ here there has never been any doubt. It plainly signifies (as often in the Scriptures, and even the Class. writers) life. Christ came to give up his life as a λύτρον. Now λύτρον properly denotes the ransom paid, in order to deliver any one from death, or its equivalent, captivity, or from punishment in general. More frequently it denotes the piacular victim, ἑξίλασμα, sometimes expressed by ἐξίλασμα; which Hesych. explains ἀντίλυτρον. It has been satisfactorily proved that, among both the Jews and the Gentiles, piacular victims were accepted as a ransom for the life of an offender, and to atone for his offence. The heathens believed that no atonement was so complete or effectual as that whereby the piacular victim should be a human being; whose life was thus given ἀντὶ, instead of the life of the other. Hence such victims were called ἀντίψυχοι, and the atonement made by them an ἀντίλυτρον. And Aristides, Sacr. v., has an oracular response, where, with allusion to this belief, there is demanded ψυχὴ ἀντὶ ψυχῆς. Indeed, on this very notion, that the life of one person was, in some cases, to be given and accepted for the life of another, the whole of the Alcestis of Eurip. is founded. And though the true idea of atonement was unknown to the heathens, yet they felt the necessity for it.

The sense, then, of this passage can be no other than that 'our Lord was to give up his life as a piacular victim, a ransom, for mankind, that they might not suffer spiritual death.' And thus it harmonizes with the doctrine of Scripture elsewhere. So in Dan. ix. 24, it is predicted, that the Messiah 'shall make reconciliation for iniquity'; whence he is called by the Jewish Rabbins עֲדֻנָּה, אֲדֻנָּה λύτρον. Comp. Matt. xxvi. 28. John xi. 52. Eph. v. 2. 1 Tim. ii. 6. Heb. ix. 14. 28 (and the notes on those passages), all declaring the same doctrine, that Christ's death was a sacrifice for the sins of mankind; even that true and substantial Sacrifice,—which those of the law but faintly shadowed forth in types, symbols, and figures,—which should purchase for men eternal life. Such is, as the best Commentators, both modern and ancient (including Chrys. and the principal Greek Fathers), are agreed, the general sense. But others, as Euthym. and Theophyl. of the ancient, and not a few modern Expositors, as Bp. Pearson and Dr. Whitby, and many downwards, fearing it would seem lest the use of πολλῶν, not πάντων, might be thought to run counter to the doctrine of salvation universal, at least in the offer, thought fit to counteract this, by contending that πολλῶν is put for πάντων. Of this use they adduce numerous examples, only a few however of which are apposite, and none quite decisive. But even were the idiom proved to exist, it would only be valid so far as to evince that it might, not that it must, be brought in here. The latter is, I apprehend, scarcely permitted by the scope of the passage, which only respects salvation generally, and not bearing on the question whether that salvation is universal, at least in the offer, or particular. Accordingly, Origen and Jerome of the ancients, and of the moderns Grotius and others down to T. Scott, take the word to mean multitudes, even all that should believe in the name of Christ; but they do not show how this sense arises. The following remarks, coming from two very powerful minds, may tend to remove much of the difficulty which embarrasses the matter. "Multis dicitur (Christus) potius quam omnibus, quia Christus hic non spectat voluntatem suam quæ omnes spectabat, sed mortis fructum, qui non ad omnes pervenit, sed ad multos, quia non omnes percipere voluerunt" (Maldon.). That even Calvin did not regard the passage as fit to be brought in, in arguing the question as to mōde of salvation, whether general or particular, is quite plain from his brief but able remark, "Multos ponit non definitè pro certo numero, sed pro pluribus, quia seorsum aliis omnibus opponit: atque hoc sensu capitur ad Romanos v. 15, ubi Paulus non de aliqua hominum parte agit, sed totum humanum genus complectitur." This remark, which has only just come under my observation, confirms the view which I have all along taken, from the earliest to the later editions of the present work,—where, after remarking, that "it may be doubted whether πολλοὶ can be said ever to be put, strictly speaking, for πάντες," I proceed to develop the principle on which this idiom proceeds (which had, it seems, already occurred to the mind of Calv.) as follows. It should seem that, in such cases, an idiom subsists, where there is a comparison, by implication, of πολλοὶ, with some other very small number (usually one), which remains after deducting it from a total. In such a case, πολλοὶ may be said to be almost equal to πάντες; being, in a manner, the whole of the number in question; though it cannot strictly be said to signify that; the literal sense being 'the remainder of a large number,' after a very small one has been subtracted. This principle will apply to all the passages alleged in proof that πολλοὶ is used for πάντες. I mean to all that are justly alleged; for Matt. xx. 16, has quite another bearing (see the note there); and in places like 1 Cor. x. 33, where the Article is used, the principle cannot be admitted. There the meaning is, either 'the majority,' or 'the rest.' And such is the case in almost all the passages adduced from the Class. writers; where the sense is, either 'very many,' or 'ever so many.' As examples of the facti comparison above adverted to, we may adduce Rom. viii. 29, εἰς τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸν πρωτότοκον ἐν πολλοῖς ἀδελφοῖς (where the εἶς is implied in πρωτ.). Matt. xxvi. 28, and Mark xiv. 24, τοῦτο γὰρ ἐστὶ τὸ αἵμά μου, τὸ τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης, τὸ περὶ πολλῶν ἐκχυνόμενον εἰς ἀφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν (where τὸ περὶ πολλῶν is for τὸ ἐνὸς περὶ πολλῶν, with allusion to the μου just before). Heb. ix. 28, οὕτως ὁ Χριστὸς ἅπαξ προσενεχθεὶς εἰς τὸ πολλῶν ἀνελεῖν ἁμαρτίας, &c. In Rom. v. 15, 18, 19, the Article is used both to εἰς and πολλοὶ, the Articles there coming under the head of 'Insertions in reference (see Middleton in loc.) and renewed mention;' the reference being to v. 12, where ὡς περ δι' ἐνὸς ἀνθρώπου is opposed to εἰς πάντας ἀνθρώπους. And thus it is the same as if neither had the Article, and in such a case we may render 'all the rest.' And this may be done in the only Classical passage, not having the Article, that is here apposite, namely, Eurip. Hec. 284, "Ἢδ' ἀντὶ πολλῶν ἐστὶ μὲν παραψυχῆ, and so in Virgil, Æn. v. 815, 'UNUM PRO MULTIS DABITUR CAPUT.'

29—34.] Mark x. 46. 52. Luke xviii. 35—43. xix. 1.

30. δύο τυφλοὶ, &c.] There is a considerable variation in the accounts of this miracle by the three Evangelists. Mark and Luke notice only one blind man, Matthew two; Luke represents the miracle as performed 'when Jesus was drawing nigh to Jericho,' before he entered it; Matthew and Mark after he had left Jericho. The joint testimony, however, of Matthew and Mark as to the time, seems to outweigh that of Luke, who is not so observant of chronological order; and as all agree that Christ was then attended by a 'multitude,' who 'led the way,' and who 'followed him' towards Jerusalem, it is more probable that the incident took place after he left Jericho, where this multitude seems to have been collected. (Hales.) The minute discrepancies in this narrative, compared with those of Mark and Luke, involve no real contradiction; since, though those Evangelists mention one blind man as healed, yet they do not say that only one was healed; and Mark and Luke, in mentioning one, might mean to point out that one who was the more known. Again, the apparent difference between Matthew and Mark, as compared with Luke, with regard to the place where the miracle was performed, may, it is thought, be removed by rendering in Luke, 'when' or 'while Jesus was near Jericho.' But this would require an absolute straining of the sense; and hence it is better to leave the discrepancy as we find it, espec. since such minute discrepancies cannot impair the credit of any trustworthy narrators of facts, being such as are found in the most authentic histories, in which case they are admitted to strengthen our confidence in the general truth of the facts narrated, and by no means to weaken the credit of the narrators respectively, as independent witnesses. See Olshausen.

31. ἐπετίμησεν—ἵνα σιωπῇ.] Render, not, 'rebuked them because,' as E. V.; since that would be to assign a sense to ἵνα quite unprecedented, and would bring in what cannot be meant, since it could not be the intent of the Evangelist to blame the poor men for their impertinence, espec. considering that our Lord rather commended such impertinence. So Campb., who renders, with Wakef., 'charged them to be silent.' But there is no need to deviate from the usual sense of ἐπιτιμᾶν, nor ought we to do so here, since it would be slurring over, by a freedom of version, an expression altogether peculiar to the Gospels of Matth., Mark, and Luke (peculiar,

Thus it occurs thrice in Matth., thrice in Mark, and once in Luke. It never, I believe, occurs in the Sept., nor in the Classical writers. I still continue to regard this as a note-worthy brevity of expression, involving a pregnancy of sense by the blending of two significations, of each of which the verb is capable; and I would render, 'rebuked them, charging them to hold their peace.' I find this view confirmed by the suffrage of Henry Steph. in his Thes. in v.: for, while testifying that he 'remembers no such use as this of ἐπιτιμ. in the ancient writers,' he proposes to render, 'Multi eos increpantes jubebant tacere,' rather, 'ut tacerent;' for the iva denotes full purpose, and this peculiar idiom with ἵνα is employed to intimate, that the multitude rebuked them not for the manner of their exclamation, nor for their importunity, except on the score of its being an unseasonable interruption.

— ἔκραζον] L. and T. edit ἔκραξαν, from B, D, L, Z, and I cursive MS.; to which I add Lamb. 1193,—a MS. probably of the 9th century. The reading is evidently very ancient, but seems merely an alteration of certain Critics, who thought that the same form should be brought in here as at v. 29 (while other Critics, we find, at v. 29, altered the Aor. 1 to Aor. 2). But although the Aor. 1 occurs elsewhere repeatedly in this Gospel, and very often in the other books of the New Test., yet there is no reason why St. Matthew should have chosen to use the other form here, as he certainly did infra xxi. 9, also according to these same MSS. (except Z) supra xv. 22, and I could add some ancient Lamb. and Mus. MSS.; but the critical Reviser of Z brings in this same ἔκραξε evidently from an unreasonable predilection for the term. Mark, too, uses the Imperf. once, Luke once, John twice, xii. 13. xix. 12; and so in Acts xix. 28, ἔκραζον, where one MS. had ἔκραξαν, xix. 32. Rev. xviii. 18 and 19, where a few MSS. have ἔκραξαν, which Lachm. adopted; but Tisch., on good grounds, rejected. I have taken some trouble to little purpose, if I have not evinced that L. and T. have done wrong in editing ἔκραξαν.

33. ἀνοιχθῶσιν] L. and T. adopt, from B, D, L, Z, and a few ancient cursive MSS. of the Alex. recension, ἀνοιγῶσιν, which may probably be the genuine reading, and is confirmed by ἀνοιγίσσεται, supra vii. 7, 8; ἠνοίγησαν in B, D, &c., at Mark vii. 35. Luke xi. 9, ἠνοίγη, B, &c. Acts xii. 10, ἠνοίγη. Rev. xi. 19. v. 5. The form here was probably a later Greek form, like the others I have adduced, and consequently more likely to be used by the Evangelist; and certainly I cannot find a vestige of it in the Class. writers. However, it is worthy of observation, that in the only two passages of the Sept. where the form could occur, we have ἠνοίχθη in all the copies. Nevertheless, Lachm. and Tisch. were not justified, without more authority of curtise MSS., which may possibly be found, in editing ἀνοιγῶσιν. The adopting of a change of position in ἡμῶν οἱ ὀφθ., on such slender, and, in such a case, questionable authority, was unjustifiable. The same may be said of changing ὀφθαλμῶν, at v. 34, into ὀμμάτων, on the authority of nearly the same MSS. and Origen; though it is manifestly no other than an alteration introduced for the purpose of getting rid of a word so often repeated, though it brings in a term never used by St. Matth., nor any writer of the N. T., except Mark once, and very rarely found in the Sept. But that is trifling compared with the singular want of judgment shown in cancelling οἱ ὀφθαλμοί αὐτῶν, on the authority of those same MSS. (to which I add Lamb. 1175), and the Vulg., Ital., and some other Versions, and Origen, though evidently a mere critical alteration, devised for the purpose of getting rid of unlicensed Greek by the removal of what seemed unnecessary, and not in the other Gospels; forgetting that the genuineness of the words is attested by their strong Hebraistic character, and by similar expressions elsewhere in Scripture, as at Mark vii. 35. John ix. 10, 17, 21, 26, 30, xi. 37. Acts ix. 8. As to Versions, they have, in a case like this, little or no weight against a reading, though much for it, as here the Peach. Syr. Version, which probably had the text rec., though they render ἀνέβλεψαν freely, as if it were ἀνέωχθησαν, which, indeed, I find in Br. Mus. MS. 17,982, but evidently by a gloss. Moreover, though the expression be so very rare, yet it is not unprecedented, being found in the Sept., 1 Sam. xiv. 27, καὶ ἐπιστρεψεν τὴν χεῖρα αὐτοῦ εἰς τὸ στόμα αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἀνέβλεψεν οἱ ὀφθαλμοὶ αὐτοῦ. Comp. v. 29, εἶδον οἱ ὀφθαλμοί μου, ὅτι ἠγυσάμην, &c., lit. 'mine eyes looked up,' 'beamed up,' as the Targum explains; which sense the Arab. Version confirms by rendering, 'his eyes received light' (or 'sight'), for 'darkness had enveloped them.' More were unnecessary to vindicate and illustrate this peculiar expression, which may be regarded as one of those Hebraistic forms that we may expect in St. Matthew's Gospel. Nor is it true that there is a superfluity of wording, since this may be regarded as one of those graphic expressions in the Scriptures, which require not only erudition to understand, but taste to appreciate.

XXI. 1—17. Mark xi. 1—11. Luke xix. 29—44. John xii. 12—36. Several events intervened between that which terminated the last chap. and the one recorded in this, namely, the visit to Zacchæus, and that at Bethany, in the house of

Βηθφαγή πρὸς τὸ ὄρος τῶν ἐλαιῶν, τότε ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἀπέστειλε δύο μαθητάς, ² λέγων αὐτοῖς· Πορεύθητε εἰς τὴν κώμην τὴν ἀπέναντι ὑμῶν καὶ εὐθέως εὐρήσετε ὄνον δεδεμένον, καὶ πῶλον μετ' αὐτῆς· λύσαντες ἀγάγετέ μοι. ³ Καὶ ἐάν τις ὑμῖν εἴπη τι, ἐρεῖτε· Ὅτι ὁ Κύριος αὐτῶν χρεῖαν ἔχει· εὐθέως δὲ † ἀποστελεῖ αὐτούς. ⁴ Τοῦτο δὲ [ὄλον] γέγονεν, ἵνα πληρωθῇ τὸ

Simon the leper and Mary, which our Lord made his abode.

— εἰς Βηθφαγή] Mark xi. 1, and Luke xix. 29, add καὶ Βηθανίαν. Hence we may suppose, that though the territories of the two villages were contiguous, nay, conterminous, yet that Bethphage came first in travelling from Jericho to Jerusalem, at least according to one route. And Epiphanius, adv. Hæres. p. 340, testifies that there was an old road to Jerusalem from Jericho through Bethphage and Bethany, and the Mount of Olives; and this probably was the very one travelled on by our Lord and his disciples, and selected, perhaps, as being the more private. Nay, Calmet himself describes Bethany as situated at the foot of the Mount of Olives (and so all accounts represent it—see Roland); but from the words πρὸς τὸ ὄρος τ. ἐλ. being here conjoined with Βηθφ., it is probable that Bethphage was situated on some part of the upper ridge, or ἀκρόρεια, of the mountain, and Bethany just below it, at the foot of it; and, consequently, Bethphage could not be, as Calmet and Alf. suppose, between Bethany and Jerusalem. This is supported by the testimony of Jerome and Origen, the former of whom describes Bethphage as 'sacerdotum viculus, situs in monte Oliveti.' And the latter, in his Annot. on Matt., says it was situated on Mount Olivet.

But if Bethphage was, as we see, undoubtedly on Mount Olivet, and Bethany at the foot of, or on the lower ridge of, the mount, it could not be between Bethany and Jerusalem. Though it does not follow that Bethany should have been on the nearest route from Bethphage to Jerusalem: probably it was a little circuitous, and the route that way is probably the old road spoken of by Epiphanius; and our Lord had doubtless a reason, which we cannot know, for going to Jerusalem by Bethany. Thus all, as to the topography of the route, is pretty clear, notwithstanding that Lachm. has here, as on some other occasions, done his best to put out what little light we have, by cancelling, at Mark xi. 1, εἰς Βηθφαγή, from only 1 MS. and 1 copy of the Italic Version, and also by altering πρὸς to εἰς, from 1 MS. (B); so that if we had not the πρὸς of St. Luke, we should be quite unable to understand the thing.

2. πορεύθητε] Lachm. edits πορεύεσθε, from 4 uncials and 7 cursive MSS., Orig., Euseb., and Chrys.—a reading somewhat confirmed by Jerem. iii. 12, πορεύου καὶ ἀνάγνωθι; but there the Alex. MS. has πορεύητι, and in Acts xxviii. 26, and 1s. vi. 9, all the copies have πορεύητι καὶ ἴπῳ τῷ, &c. For ἀγάγετέ μοι, Lachm. and Tisch. edit ἀγάγε, from MSS. B, D, and 2 others,—authority very insufficient; and the less entitled to attention, considering that internal evidence is against the alteration.

— πῶλον] 'a colt.' Mark and Luke add, 'on which no man had ever sat.' Animals which had never borne the yoke, or been employed for ordinary purposes, were (by a custom common to all the ancients, whether Jews or Gentiles) employed for sacred uses. See Deut. xxi. 3. 1 Sam. vi. 7. Horat. Epod. ix. 22. Ovid. Met. iii. 11. Virg. Georg. iv. 440, 551. Mark and Luke mention the sending for the colt only, as being that whereon alone our Lord rode; not mentioning the ass, though also brought (agreeably to the prophecy of Zechariah), because they do not mention that prophecy. There is plainly in the latter assertion no negation of the former. Whitby notices the minuteness of the matters predicted, and rightly infers from thence Christ's supernatural prescience.

3. εἴρη τι] A popular mode of expressing 'if he shall make any objection,' which is expressed in Mark and Luke.

— ὁ Κύριος] Almost all the more recent Expositors explain this to mean 'the master,' as supra vii. 21. viii. 25. xiv. 30. John xi. 12. xiii. 13, 14. But those passages, were they even entirely to the point, would only prove that such might be the sense, not that it is so here. I am now inclined to think that the true rendering is, 'the Lord,' meaning the Lord Jehovah. So L. Brug. remarks: "It is not said our Lord, or yours, but the Lord of the universe, both of animals and their masters; in short, of all things." The air of the context, too, seems to claim this higher sense of the word. Thus it argues a claim of authority for the animals, from the Lord or Owner of all things, of authority over them and theirs. It is not improbable that the persons to whom the disciples were sent, were not only well acquainted with our Lord's person, and the miracles he had worked, but also with his just claims to be the Messiah, and were favourably disposed to him. The directions so minutely given by our Lord to his disciples, and his positive assertion of what would take place in things so contingent as these, are a remarkable proof of his foreknowledge. And this shows that the text. rec. ἀποστρέλει, has been rightly retained by Fritz., Lachm., and Tisch., to the rejection of ἀποστρέλλει, supported by very strong external authority (to which I add all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), and adopted by Matthæi, Griesb., and Scholz. And though external authority be slender for ἀποστρέλει, namely B, D, Lamb. 528. Compl. Steph. 1, confirmed by the ancient Versions and Origen, yet that is fully made up by internal evidence, inasmuch as ἀποστρέλλει might easily arise by error of Scribes from ἀποστρέλει, wrongly accented for ἀποστρέλει. As to taking ἀποστρέλλει, as Pres. for Fut., with Kuin. and others, that cannot be admitted in a context so pointedly predictive as this.

4. ὄλον] This is cancelled by Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch., from C, D, L, Z, and many cursives, with the Ital., Copt., and Æthiop. Vers., Orig., and Hil. But, although external authority is so do-

cidedly in favour of the word (which I find in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), internal evidence is rather against it; and it was more likely to have been introduced from supra i. 2, and infra xxvi. 56, where it occurs in all the copies, than to have been omitted here by accident. It must, however, have been very early introduced, considering that it is recognized in the Pesch. Syr., Sahid., and Vulg. Versions, and one copy of the Italic. It is true that it has no place in the Cod. Amiat. of the Vulg., but it is found in the Lamb. copy, probably of the seventh century. On the whole, its authenticity is an open question.

— διὰ τοῦ προφήτου] The prophet here meant is Zechariah, ix. 9, and the prophecy has been, by the most eminent Jewish Expositors, applied to the Messiah. As respects the discrepancies existing between the Evangelists Matthew and John, and the Sept. Vers. and Hebr. original, the introductory words in Matth., εἰπατε τῇ θυγ. Σιών, seem derived from another passage of Is. lxiii. 11, altogether a kindred one, though Is. xl. 9 may also have been in the mind of St. Matt., and consequently αὐτὸς included in διὰ κ. σωζ. by Matth. The bringing in of this minute portion from a passage of exactly the same character is, in reality, not at variance with the singular τοῦ προφήτου, since, as has been shown by Surenhus. and Hoffmann, it was customary with the Hebrew Theologians to bring together several passages of Scripture into one, and so to quote it as if one passage. The introductory words of the Sept. (from the Hebr.), χαῖρε σφόδρα, are in St. John expressed, as Hoffm. remarks, per figuram λέγέτης, in SS. Scrip. frequentem (so John vi. 37, οὐ μὴ ἔκβαλῶ), by μὴ φοβού, and so equiv. to χαῖρε σφ., though by Matth. it is dropped as not essential to his purpose; espec. as he adopted another prophetic form of introduction. That the Hebr. ὑψ. admitted of the version πρᾶς, though its more usual sense is passer, is plain, espec. since the Sept. renders the word by ταπεινός in Ps. xviii. 28, where Symm. has πρᾶς, and in Zeph. iii. 12, it is rendered by the Sept. πρᾶς. As respects the force of the term πρ. here, it may be thought to be that found in Pindar, Pyth. iii. 124, βασιλίδε πρᾶς ἄντοϊς. But considering that the passages of Isa. and Zech. are, by even the ablest Jewish Expositors, allowed to have reference to the Messiah, there is probably not so much an implied opposition to the harshness of most earthly monarchs, as a direct allusion to the mildness of Christ our Saviour, who says of himself, supra xi. 11, πρᾶς εἰμι, or by a pastoral image such as that in Is. xl. 11, where the infinite tenderness and care of the good Shepherd are finely expressed as attributes of the character and work of Christ. The minute, but not un-significant circumstance, ἐπιβεβηκὼς ἐπὶ ὄνου, &c., is meant to intimate another and kindred attribute of the peaceableness of our blessed

Lord, an emblem of which is conveyed in the animal selected to carry Him on this occasion, the ass being one of peace, as the horse one of war. See supra xi. 29, comp. with 2 Cor. x. 1. So Hoffmann well observes: "Asino, imo asello, vectus est Jesus, in complementum Prophetie: et hoc prædictum erat, ut ad vim insolentiam magis attenderent Judæi." Not only, I would observe, unaccustomed, but altogether unexpected. They would, doubtless, expect a mighty warrior "going forth conquering and to conquer" (Rev. vi. 2), and would be amazed at his entry with the symbol of peace; thus inspiring the conviction that the King of whom the prophet spoke, was no other than the Prince of Peace predicted by Isa. ix. 2. I must not omit to observe, that the introductory formula, τοῦτο γέγονεν ἵνα πληρωθῇ, cannot be meant with reference to the intentions of the persons performing the act in question, but to the Divine counsels, whereby the coincidence took place. This is quite certain from the words joined in John xii. 16, ταῦτα δὲ οὐκ ἔγνωσαν—ἐποίησαν αὐτῶν. See also note, supra i. 22.

6. What is found in this verse contains the sum of what is circumstantially detailed in Mark xi. 4-6. Luke xix. 32-34. For προσέταξεν, the reading συνέταξεν, edited by L. and T., from B, C, D, and 2 cursive MSS., evidently arose from fastidious Critics, who deemed προσέτ. too strong a term to suit the context, and substituted the milder one συνέτ., espec. from its being used infra xxvi. 19. xxvii. 10. But they ought to have borne in mind Matt. viii. 4. Mark i. 44, and Luke v. 14; though here there was 'One greater than the Temple.'

7. ἐπεκάθισεν] The reading here is not a little disputed. Ἐπεκάθισεν is found in all the early Edd., which was altered by the Elzevir Editor to ἐπεκάθισαν. But ἐπεκάθισεν was restored by Weta., Matth., Griesb., Fritz., Scholz., Lach., and Tisch. Ἐπεκάθισαν may, indeed, seem supported by the term used in Luke, ἐπεβίβασαν, and it is preferred by Beza, Camerar., Pisc., Wakef., and Schleus.; and, should we follow the proprietas linguae, it ought to be adopted. Yet considering that ἐπεκάθισεν is often in the Sept., and some later Greek writers, used in the sense 'to sit,' or 'ride,' so ἐπεκάθισεν has internal evidence in its favour, and it is supported by the expression used in Mark, ἐκάθισεν ἐπ'. It has also external authority rather in its favour, being found in many uncial MSS., and the greater part of the ancient cursive ones, including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, as also the Syr. and Sahid. Versions. Finally, the reading ἐκάθισεν found in many ancient MSS., including several Lamb. and Mus. copies (though more a critical alteration, introduced from the passage of Mark for the purpose of getting rid of a seeming pleonasm) confirms the reading, which involves no discrepancy with Luke.

the garments placed as trappings on the animals, or the ass and colt, which latter is the more natural sense. If the former be adopted, we may say that the people would put the trappings on both the ass and colt, in order to do the more honour to Jesus, and not knowing on which he would ride; and the expression ἔπαι αὐτῶν is justifiable as said of the animals, in like manner as we say 'the postilion rode the horse.' For the ἐπάνω in the former part of the sentence, L. and T. read ἐπ', from B, D, L, Z,—a manifest critical alteration, of which the purpose was to get rid of a tautology. The MS. D ought not to be alleged in support of the ἐπ', since that MS. has αὐτόν, which rendered ἐπ' indispensable.

⁸ ὁ πλείστος ὄχλος] 'the bulk of the people,' the multitude at large, consisting both of those who were going to keep the Passover, and of those who, after Lazarus' resurrection, had come out of the city to meet Christ. See John xii. 9.

— ἔστρωσαν ἑαυτῶν τὰ ἱμάτια] An Oriental custom employed on the public entry of kings (so 2 Kings ix. 13, and Jos. Ant. ix. 6. 2, ἔκυστο ἱστῶντιν αὐτῷ τὸ ἱμάτιον. Philo, Leg. ad C. 1), also in use among the Greeks. See Æschyl. Ag. 881. Plut. Cat. Min. p. 764.

— ἔκοπτον κλάδους] Meant as a symbol of joy, and employed at the Feast of Tabernacles and other public rejoicings among the Jews; though in use also among the Greeks and Romans. See Hdt. vii. 54. Liv. x. 47.

⁹ Ὡσαννὰ] A Hebr. form, שׁוּשַׁן, signifying 'Save us now (be propitious), we beseech thee,' derived from Ps. cxviii. 25, used by the Jews when praying for the coming of the Messiah, as also were the subsequent words εὐλογημένος ὁ ἐρχόμενος ἐν ὀν. Κυρ., taken from the same Psalm; and in that case it was a form of supplication that his kingdom might come, see Schoettg. But it was also one of acclamation; and, when foll. by dat. of pers., one of gratulation. In the form of acclamation it was used at the Feast of Tabernacles. As the cxviii Psalm has been by the Jewish Rabbins admitted to be prophetic of their Messiah, so, by applying these words in gratulation to our Lord, in quality of Son of David, and as coming in the name of the Lord,—both of these titles of the Messiah,—the multitudes here plainly recognize in Him their promised Messiah.

The expression ἐν τοῖς ὑψίστοις is equiv. to

ἐν τοῖς ὑψηλοῖς, Heb. i. 3. viii. 1, where it is interchanged with ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς as synonymous; and, taken with the ἔστω understood, it implies a wish that the gratulatory homage may be ratified by the heavenly host. In the passage of Luke xix. 38, there is added εἰρήνῃ ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ δόξῃ ἐν ὑψίστοις, where see note.

— ἐξέβαλε—ἱερῷ] It appears from Mark xi. 11, that Jesus did not perform this on the day of his entry into Jerusalem (though it is there said that he entered into the temple, and looked round the whole of it), but the day after; spending the night at Bethany, and returning to Jerusalem in the morning; and in the way thither working the miracle of the fig-tree. As Mark is so positive and particular in his account, and as Matth. does not expressly connect our Lord's driving out the traders with the events of the day,—we are warranted in adopting Mark's account. To do which, there cannot be a greater inducement than the consideration, that those who adopt the other hypothesis are compelled to suppose that the circumstances in question happened twice on two successive days. Indeed our Lord had done much the same thing in the first year of his ministry (John ii. 14). The reason why he did not then do it at his first entry, was (as we learn from Mark), because, it being evening, the buyers and sellers had most of them retired. Mark adds another circumstance, καὶ οὐκ ἤφιεν ἵνα τις διενέγκῃ σκαῖος διὰ τοῦ ἱεροῦ, which simply means that he forbade the action in question.

coin, denotes those who exchanged foreign coin into Jewish, or the larger into the smaller coin, for the convenience of the purchasers of the commodities sold in the temple. The reason why such persons should be found in the outer court of the temple is shown by Mr. Greswell ubi supra.

— τὰς περιστεράς] Render here and at Mk., 'the doves,' meaning (as the Art. is meant to intimate) the doves, well known to the readers of those Gospels, since the temple and its services were still remaining; whereas St. John, in the parallel passage, writing after the destruction of the temple and the cessation of its rites and sacrifices, and writing for the use of Gentile readers, omits the Article.

13. γέγραπται, &c.] This quotation is from Isa. lvi. 7, where it exactly agrees with the Sept. and Hebrew; except that after κληθήσεται follows πᾶσι τοῖς ἔθνεσι, which is added in the passage of Mark, though not in that of Luke. In the latter clause of the sentence there is not, as the Commentators consider it, a quotation, but only what is said was formed on a similar one at Jerem. vii. 11, μὴ σπήλ. ληστῶν ὁ οἶκος μου; where the interrogation with negation implies assertion. In σπήλ. ληστῶν there is an allusion to the custom common to all countries, but espec. Judæa, for robbers to make their abode in caves. See Jos. Ant. xv. 10. 1.

— ληστῶν] Not literally thieves, robbers, but extortioners and cheats, at least persons devoted to base lucre. An interpretation which seems required by the expression of John, οἶκος ἐμπορίου. Otherwise the assertion might be justified, in its full sense, by what is found in Jos. B. J. vii. 11, et al. ἐκδοχείων κλεπτῶν, φορέων ἀρπάγων τὸ ἱερὸν γέγονε.

For ἐποιήσατε, two MSS. with Origen and Euseb., have ποιῆτε, which reading has been adopted by Friz., Lachm., and Tisch., but on insecure grounds; for why reject what has the support of all the MSS. except two, when it yields a sense suitable and good in itself, namely, facere solent? For such is the true sense, which, expressed more at large, is, 'ye have made and do still make,' equiv. to 'cause it to be so esteemed.' Moreover, internal as well as external evidence is in favour of ἐποιήσατε, from the greater likelihood that ποιῆτε should have arisen from a mere gloss, than that ἐποιήσατε should have displaced ποιῆτε, in every MS. except two, merely because it is found in the parallel passages of Mark and Luke.

14—16. There is something not a little perplexing in the Harmony of the Gospels as respects this portion. Mr. Grosw. brings the verses in with the portion of the other Gospels, and earlier. But they are best considered as a separate and independent portion, and placed between Matt. xxi. 12, 13. Mark xi. 15, 17. Luke xix. 45, 46, and Mark xi. 18. Luke xix. 47, the matter of which latter portion should be moulded thus (Luke's matter being placed first, and then Mark's): καὶ ἦν διδάσκων τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ· καὶ ἤκουσαν οἱ γραμμ. καὶ οἱ ἀρχ. καὶ ἰσχύοντες πᾶσι αὐτὸν ἀπολίσσωσιν. καὶ οὐχ ὑμῖν. τό τι ποιήσωσιν; ἐφοβ. γὰρ αὐτὸν, ὅτι, &c. Thus we are enabled to furnish the ἤκουσαν in Mark with a correct reference, as follows: 'they heard of what was taking place, of his teaching daily in the temple, and authoritatively taking in hand the reforming of abuses, confirming also his Divine authority by the working of miracles.'

15. τὰ θαυμάσια] scil. ἔργα. Not merely miranda et inaudita, as the Commentators explain, adducing Ecclus. xliiii. 25, θαυμ. καὶ παράδοξα; for here the foregoing context requires the sense miracles, a sense which, though I am not able to prove from the New Test., because it occurs no where else there, is, however, not unfrequently found in the Sept. Suffice it to adduce Ps. lxxviii. 13, Sept., ἐποίησε θαυμάσια. Numb. xiv. 11, Alex., and some other copies have θαυμάσια, while the rest σημεία, and in Ecclus. xlviii. 14 (of Elijah), ἐν ζῳῇ ἐποίησε τέρατα, καὶ ἐν τελευτῇ θαυμάσια τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ, where the common Vera 'wonders' is inadequate to what the context requires.

16. ἐκ στόματος αἰνῶν] On mature consideration, I am now of opinion that this can hardly be (what it is generally supposed) an application or accommodation of the words of David to the present case; because, as Calvin and Hoffmann have shown, this would destroy the arguments drawn from the Psalm quoted. Indeed, that the words are not adduced merely by way of application, may be argued from the same Psalm, whence they are taken, being in another part explained with reference to Christ by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 27. Eph. i. 22. Heb. ii. 6 sq. That our Lord intended by this reference to intimate that he was Messiah, and consequently Deiue, has been fully proved by Calvin. Moreover, as Hegelmeier ap. Hoffm. has shown, it is plain that the Jews must themselves have regarded the words as having reference to the Messiah, otherwise our Lord would have left his argument open to be utterly upset. From what took place in the temple,—it is clear as Musc. and Bulling. have shown,—that the words were also intended as a sort of prophecy, which was fulfilled on this occasion.

To advert to the alleged verbal discrepancy between the Hebr. and the Sept. (from which the words are cited), καταρτίσθαι is not (where some have supposed it) an inaccurate paraphrase, but a free rendering of the Hebrew, since, as Surinhus, has shown, the Hebr. קָטַרְטִים signifies confirmasti, 'haast established'; and, as respects αἰών, the ideas of praise and glory are cognate, and the terms glory and power are associated in Pa. xxix. 1, 2 and xvi. 7, so that the Sept. Version, though free, is not unfaithful. In sentiment there is no discrepancy; the idea, common to both the Heb. and Sept., being: 'Thou hast accomplished a grand effect by altogether puny means.'

17. ἡλίσθη ἐκεῖ 'lodged or spent the night there.' A sense found in 3 Eadr. ix. 2. Eccl. xxiv. 7. Jesus left the city, and returned to Bethany for the night; not so much to avoid the snares that might be laid for his life, as to avoid all suspicion of affecting temporal power; the night being a season favourable for popular commotion, when the multitude might go and seize him, to make him a King, as John vi. 15 says: for which reason our Lord took the same precaution during the rest of these last days of his earthly course.

19. This action was not only emblematical, — and typical according to the usual custom of the Eastern ages to express things by symbolical actions, but also prophetic. Our Lord intended to prove that his power to punish the disobedient was as great as that to confer benefits. It was, moreover, to prefigure the destruction of the perverse Jews, — because in the time of fruits they had borne none (see vv. 33, 41), to suggest the sure fate of hypocrites in every age.

21. καὶ μὴ διακριθῆτε] This negative expression is the very same with the positive one, εἰν ἔχετε πίστιν, the two being united for the sake of emphasis, as at xiii. 34. and elsewhere.

— τῷ ὄρει τούτῳ] Spoken δεστικῶς, with reference, it is supposed, to the Mount of Olives. For mountain, Luke says sycamore tree. But that was on another occasion; and our Lord might well make use of both examples. On the force of these adagial sayings, see note on Matt. xvii. 20, comp. with 1 Cor. xiii. 2. In the foregoing promise it is implied that they shall pray for the power; and it is by implication enjoined, supra xvii. 21. Finally, to make it more binding, there is subjoined an encouragement to prayer, by the assurance that whatever they ask in faith they shall receive.

23. ἰδοὺντες αὐτῶν] Datives of consequence for genitives absolute, which are, indeed, found in B, C, D, L, 4 cursive MSS. of the same class, and Origen. And the reading is adopted by Lachm., though not by Tisch.; rightly, since it is evidently a mere critical alteration of construction, such as is very often found in the Alexandrian MSS. The γραμματεῖς are not mentioned by Matth., as they are by Mark and Luke; though they would be necessary to make up a regular deputation from the Sanhedrim delivering an official message, demanding τις ἐξουσία, 'in virtue of what authority' he acted as he did. They had done the same thing in John's case. See John i. 19.

The taûta before πολλοῖς must not, as it is by Grot. and most Commentators, be confined to the public teaching of Jesus in the Temple, and the preaching of the Gospel there; for no reason can be imagined why ταῦτο, rather than ταῦτα, should not have been read. We may suppose, with L. Brug., Fritz., and others, that the plural is used because there is reference not only to the teaching and evangelizing, but to what had so lately taken place,—the public entry into Jerusalem and healing in the Temple, the authoritatively casting out of the Temple of the money-changers and the hucksters,—transactions which must have been not a little galling to them. See note on John ii. 18.

This question the Scribes were authorized to put, because they had the power of inquiring into the pretensions of a prophet; and the permission of preaching in the temple was derived from them. The interrogators expected, no doubt, that he would answer, 'By virtue of my right as Messiah,' and thus enable them to fix upon him at once the charge of blasphemy. But our Lord forbore any direct reply to his malevolent interrogators; not through fear (as appears from the boldness evinced in the parables immediately following), but from deliberation; and according to a method familiar to Hebrew, nay, to Grecian disputants, he answers by interrogation, replying to question by question, and that propounded with consummate wisdom; for while the Pharisees were not disposed, nay, were even afraid, to dispute John's claim to be a prophet, they would thereby, on their own principles, admit the claims of Jesus, to whose Divine mission John had borne repeated and unequivocal testimony.

^{25.} τὸ βάπτισμα—ἦν] The sense is, 'whence had John authority to baptize?' Βάπτισμα is put, by synecdoche, for the whole ministry of John to preach repentance, and the doctrines he taught; because baptism was its most prominent feature, being a symbol of the purity which he enjoined.

—For παρὰ before ἑαυτοῖς L. and T. read ἐν, with B, L, Z, and 5 cursive MSS.—very slender authority, and which is not confirmed by internal evidence. Schulz, indeed, remarks: "cum παρὰ non solet componi διὰ λόγῳ." Granted;—but that is no reason why an idiom should be expelled because unusual; though it shows how it came to be removed by Critics, who ought to have considered that there is no reason why it should not have been used, as well as its synonymous πρός, found in the best writers, and which has place in the 6 parallel passages of Mark and Luke, and also in one of the most ancient cursive MSS. here. It is plain that the Pesch. Syr. read παρὰ.

^{26.} φοβούμεθα] This is not (as Kuinoel and other Philologists suppose) of the middle voice, signifying to terrify oneself; but a deponent formed from what had originally been of the passive voice; just as our neuter or deponent verb, to be afraid, was formed from the old passive to be afraid, 'to be struck with fear.' Fritz. ably remarks on that brevity of expression in the present passage, by which a clause is omitted per apostrophe after ἐξ ἀνθρώπων (equiv. to 'that will not be for our good'), to which the γάρ following refers, and which γάρ is put for two γάρ's. I have edited as the sense seems to require, ἐξ ἀνθρώπων, to intimate the apostrophe.

ὡς προφ. ἔχουσι τ. 'I., from B, C, D, Z, and some 3 or 4 cursive MSS. of the same class; but wrongly, since against vastly superior external authority (I find the text rec. in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies) there is not internal evidence to oppose, but the reverse, considering that the natural order of the words has in its simplicity an attestation of its truth; whereas the artificial order was more to the taste of the Critics, who, as they seem to have introduced it elsewhere times innumerable, were likely to bring it in here. Perhaps, too, they wished to make the Evangelist express as strong a sense as Mark and Luke, forgetting that in Matth. the persons speaking are the Deputation from the Sanhedrim; in Mark and Luke, the Evangelists themselves; and, consequently, the less positive assertion is in Matth. more suitable. Vain were it to allege the similar passage of Matth. xiv. 5, ὡς προφήτην αὐτῶν (John) εἶχον, since the words there are from the Evangelist, not the Priests. The difference between the two is this,—that as the ὡς denotes the quality ascribed to the noun to be either real or supposed, so in the Evangelists the quality is to be taken for real, in the Priests as supposed. But ὡς προφ. εἶχ is capable of the stronger sense, ἔχουσι ὡς προφ. of the weaker; q. d. 'the people take him for a prophet [though we do not recognize him as such].'

^{28.} τί δὲ ὑμῖν δοκεῖ] To suppose this to be (as Mr. Alf. explains) a formula of connexion, is, I would say, a true German mode of slurring over a difficulty, by avoiding all explanation. It would have been better to have regarded it as a rhetorical formula in use by Rabbinical disputants, as perhaps was that which we have a little before, v. 16, οὐδὲν ἡμῖν ἀνίσταται; but I find no proof, in either case, in the Rabbinical Collections of Lightf., Schoëttg., Meuschen, Wets., and others. The best clue to removing the difficulty will be found by considering the character of the parable which these words serve to introduce. Now this parable is what we may term with Matth. Henry, and long before him Chrysostom, in his 66th Homily, a reproving parable. And of reproving parables, it is well said by the former, that they are appeals to the offenders themselves, and are meant to judge them out of their own mouths. This, I agree with him, was the design of our Lord in the present instance, and not, what Mr. Alford supposes, "to help the questioners to the true answer of their difficulty about John's baptism." It is worthy of observation, that Henry, in his

καὶ προσελθὼν τῷ πρώτῳ, εἶπε· Τέκνον, ὕπαγε σήμερον ἐργάζου ἐν τῷ ἀμπελῶνί μου. ²⁹ Ὁ δὲ ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν· Οὐ θέλω ὕστερον δὲ μεταμελθεῖς, ἀπήλθε. ³⁰ Καὶ προσελθὼν τῷ † δευτέρῳ εἶπεν ὡσαύτως. Ὁ δὲ ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν· Ὁ Ἐγὼ, κύριε· ^{ο Luke 7. 20.} καὶ οὐκ ἀπήλθε. ³¹ Τίς ἐκ τῶν δύο ἐποίησε τὸ θέλημα τοῦ πατρὸς; Λέγουσιν αὐτῷ· Ὁ πρῶτος. Λέγει αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς· view of the force of the formula, stands alone, perhaps, among modern Commentators; but that it did not escape the ancient Expositors, appears from the annotation of Euthym. (doubtless compiled from some ancient Father), who, after supplying after δοκεῖ the words περὶ ὧν ἔρω, subjoins βούλεται διὰ παραβολῆς αὐτοὺς ἱμβαλεῖν, εἰς τὸ αὐτοὺς καταψήφισασθαι ἰαντῶν ὡς ἀπειθῶν.

— ἄνθρωποι εἶχε τέκνα δύο, &c.] Here a certain confusion has been found between the order given to, and the answers returned by, these two sons, which was matter of no little perplexity even in the time of Jerome, as appears from his Commentary. Mr. Alford attempts to remove this difficulty by supposing that no stress is to be laid on the order of calling, and it is that, he thinks, which has given rise to such confusion in the readings. But this rather masks the difficulty than removes it, and takes for granted what requires to be proved, and is very improbable. I am more inclined to agree with a Critic in the Edinburgh Review, No. 191, who, after remarking that while the greater number of MSS. represent the master of the vineyard as applying first to the son, who refused to obey his order to work, but afterwards repented and went, other MSS., including the Vatican B and the Syr. and Coptic Versions, invert the narrative, and make the son first ordered to reply, 'I go, Sir,' and to fall from his purpose. Now (continues the Reviewer) it is obvious that the reply to the question, "whether of the twain did the will of his father?" (ver. 31,) must be either the first or the second, according as the one or the other order in the narrative is observed. But, singularly enough, some of the MSS. and Versions which relate the story so as to require the answer ὁ πρῶτος, really give ὁ ὕστερος, or its equivalents in sense, ὁ δεύτερος, or ὁ ἑσχατός. If we go to Origen's Comment. to help us out of the difficulty, we find no clue to indicate which of the two readings spoken of by Jerome in his Comment. (where he acknowledges the embarrassment) he had possession of. On the contrary, there is no allusion to either one or the other. And here perhaps is the key to the mystery. Did Origen find our Lord's words spoken continuously? (See Matt. xvi. 9—11, compared with Mark viii. 18—21)—thus: 'Whether of the twain did the will of his father? Verily, I say unto you, &c. &c. This certainly is the impression his Commentary produces; and if it was the case, nothing is easier than to account for the strange variations. The Reviewer proceeds to account for them with his accustomed ingenuity, inasmuch that I should be ready to adopt so opportune a solution, did it not lie under the same objection as that proposed by the same able writer, in the course of his article, on Mark i. 41. Rev. xxii. 11, and other passages; namely, as resting mainly on hypothesis, and taking too much for granted to be safely received. The parable may, however, admit of an Application to the case of the Jews and Gentiles, espec. since the respective circumstances tally. By the two sons are evidently designated two different classes of the Jewish nation, and (as appears from the Application which follows at vv. 31, 32) by the first of the two are meant the non-professing, nay refusing, evil-living part of the community, many of whom, however, were brought to repentance by John, and some of them to reformation by our Lord: by the second, the professing part of the nation, the Scribes and Pharisees, who, notwithstanding they professed to obey God, observing only the external forms of religion, to the neglect of its spirit; and although some had even received John's baptism, yet had obstinately refused to receive the Baptist's message, and believe his testimony to the Messiahship of Jesus,—in short, who were the bitterest adversaries to the Gospel.

29. μεταμελθεῖς] Passive form with middle Reflex. signif., 'having changed his mind,' lit. 'repented himself.' On the use of this word, and of μετάνοια, see Bp. J. Taylor, Works, vol. viii. 307, or my Lex. in vv.

30. On more mature consideration, I am inclined to think that ἰτιρῶ, edited by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch., instead of δευτέρῳ, is the true reading. External authority for it is very strong (including almost all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies), and internal evidence rather in its favour, from the greater probability of its being an alteration for the sake of plainness, than a correction of style. However, the two words are so often confounded by the scribes (on which see my note on Thucyd. iii. 49), that I have not thought this a case for alteration.

— ἐγὼ, κύριε] This is generally considered as involving an ellip. of some verb of motion, as often after ἐγὼ in the Class. writers, espec., as here, in answer to a question, as Gen. xxii. 1. 1 Sam. iii. 4. xxii. 2. It is not, however, to be regarded as a Hebraism, since if, as some Expositors say, the Hebrews answered by pronouns, not verbs, as the Greeks and Latins, it must be remembered that the Greeks likewise sometimes answered by pronouns as an affirmative. Suffice it to allege Aristoph. Nub. 725, οὗτος τί ποιεῖ; οὐχὶ φροντίζει; (Στρ.) ἐγὼ νῆ τὸν Ποσειδῶν, and Equit. 32. Plut. Mor. p. 511, and so accompanied by γὰρ not unfrequently. But the idiom extends further than the Hebrew and Greek, being found in our English ay, which word is not, as Horne Tooke thought it, a fragment of an old verb in the Imper. (have it), but like the Gothic ya and the German ja, came from the Sanscrit aha (aya), whence the Greek ἐγὼ, and the old English ay, meaning I, and anciently so spelt in English, in many of our old writers, both in prose and in verse.

Ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι οἱ τελῶναι καὶ αἱ πόρναι προάγουσιν ὑμᾶς εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ. ³² Ἦλθε γὰρ πρὸς ὑμᾶς Ἰωάννης ἐν ὁδῷ δικαιοσύνης, καὶ οὐκ ἐπιστεύσατε αὐτῷ· οἱ δὲ τελῶναι καὶ αἱ πόρναι ἐπίστευσαν αὐτῷ. ὑμεῖς δὲ ἰδόντες οὐ μετεμελήθητε ὕστερον, τοῦ πιστεῦσαι αὐτῷ.

31. προάγουσιν ὑμᾶς. 'They precede you,' viz. by entering into the kingdom of grace, i. e. the Gospel, before you; and thus, as it were, show you the way ye ought to go; implying that that way was still open to them, though they continued obstinately to refuse to enter it. This view of the sense is confirmed by the words following, where, though in ἡλθιν πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἐν ὁδῷ δικαιοσύνης—words of some undeterminedness of sense—the principal meaning intended is, 'he came to you in the way of righteousness, pointing out that course both by precept and by example'; yet it seems implied that he set them the example of entering into the kingdom of Grace, both by having prepared the way for that kingdom, and himself entered it by accepting Jesus as the Son of God. Δικαιοσύνη here cannot, as Mr. Alf. supposes, denote either 'aesthetic purity' or 'repentance' generally; but must be taken in the simplest sense, that of internal righteousness (where the heart is right with God), including piety towards God (vital religion), and the performance of the relative duties from man to man, as very often in the New Test. (c. gr. Luke i. 79, κατεθύνην εἰς δὸν δικαιοσύνην. 2 Pet. ii. 21, τὴν ὁδὸν δικαιοσύνης), and sometimes in Joseph., espec. Antiq. xviii. 5, 2, where he characterizes John the Baptist as καλεῖοντα τοὺς Ἰουδαίους ἀρετὴν ἰσχυροῦντα καὶ τὴν πόρνην ἀλλήλους δικαιοσύνην καὶ πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν εὐσεβίαν χρυσίζοντες, βαπτισμῷ συνίναί, and so on, ending with the words ἅτα δὴ καὶ τῆς ψυχῆς δικαιοσύνην προκαθαρίζοντες. The subsequent words, which draw the contrast between the conduct of the publicans and sinners and that of themselves, are marked by a pregnant brevity, wherein the words μετεμελήθητε ὕστερον are derived from the preceding parable by way of pointing the application to the bystanders, q. d. 'But ye even when ye had seen [what effects his preaching had produced in bringing the most dissolute persons into the way of righteousness], did not even subsequently come to a change of mind, so as to believe on him.' It may seem strange that harlots should have been found, as it seems they were, in the foreground of repentance and faith; but the wonder is lessened by what we find in a passage of Athen. p. 577 (cited by Elsner), that when harlots once come to a right mind, μεταβάλλουσαι εἰς τὸ σώφρων, τῶν ἐπὶ τούτω σιμωνομένων εἰσι βελτίους. A similar sentiment is found in Epict. Enchir. L. ii. 20.

33—39. Of this parable—seemingly formed on Ia. v. 1, seqq., where the leading circumstances and expressions tally so exactly with those here, that Christ probably intended to refer his hearers (called the people in the passage of Luke) to it—the design is to show, 1) how God cherished the Church he had planted in Judæa, v. 33. 2) how the rulers had cast off his authority, 34—39, and 3) how God would judge, and severely punish them for their rebellion, 40, 41. The leading points of correspondence are too plain to need indication. To advert to its general scope, this parable has for its purpose conviction to the Jews, shadowing forth their constant rejection, and often persecution, sometimes even to death, of God's prophets sent to demand from them the fruits of obedience; terminating with the rejection and slaying even of the Son of God.

The term δούλους is happily selected, since while denoting the servant-messengers sent to receive the fruits, it is even more suitable to God's ministers, the prophets; and accordingly it is often so used in the Sept., and occasionally in the N. T., as Rev. x. 7, ὡς ἐγγηγάρισεν (Θεὸς) τοῖς ἑαυτοῦ δούλοις τοῖς προφήταις, and xi. 18. By the repeated sendings to no purpose, are meant to be intimated the long-suffering of the Proprietor, and the persevering and obdurate rebelliousness of the husbandmen. Thus the parable sets forth the public sin, and foreshows the total ruin of the Jewish nation, as fulfilled in that miserable destruction brought upon them by the Romans about forty years after, and, in its circumstances, unparalleled in the history of the world; thus fully carrying out the strong expression, used by the Priests themselves at v. 41, or rather, as it would seem from the passages of Mark and Luke, by both Priests and people: κακοὺς κακῶς ἀπολίσσει, 'he will bring these wretches to a wretched end.' There is the more reason to conjoin both classes, since what was said may be regarded, as it is by Nitch, in the light of a virtual self-condemnation, similar to that infra xxvii. 25, τὸ αἷμα αὐτοῦ—τέκνα ἡμῶν (where πᾶς ὁ λαὸς may mean the whole of the multitude present, including both the lower and the higher classes), which self-condemnation constitutes, as Nitch remarks, the last form of the Divine warnings to men, when they themselves speak of the deeds they are about to do, and pronounce judgment upon them—a judgment ratified by Divine Providence, and verified by the event.

33. The τις after ἄνθρωπος is not found in very many of the best MSS. (including many of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and some Versions and Fathers, and is cancelled by Griesb., Fritz., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch. Certainly internal evidence is against it.

—ὥρυξεν—ληνόν] Ἀπὸς properly denoted the large vat (called the wine-press) into which the grapes were thrown, to be expressed; in which sense it often occurs in the Sept. But as ἐξέδοτο αὐτὸν γεωργοῖς, καὶ ἀπεδήμησεν. ³⁴ Ὅτε δὲ ἤγγισεν ὁ καιρὸς τῶν καρπῶν, ἀπέστειλε τοὺς δούλους αὐτοῦ πρὸς τοὺς γεωργοὺς, λαβεῖν τοὺς καρποὺς αὐτοῦ. ³⁵ Καὶ λαβόντες οἱ γεωργοὶ τοὺς δούλους αὐτοῦ, ὃν μὲν ἔδειραν, ὃν δὲ ἀπέκτειναν, ὃν δὲ ἐλιθοβόλησαν. ³⁶ Πάλιν ἀπέστειλεν ἄλλους δούλους πλείονας τῶν πρώτων· καὶ ἐποίησαν αὐτοῖς ὡσαύτως. ³⁷ Ὑστερον δὲ ἀπέστειλε πρὸς αὐτοὺς τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ, λέγων· Ἐντραπήσονται τὸν υἱὸν μου. ³⁸ Ὅι δὲ γεωργοὶ, ἰδόντες τὸν υἱὸν, εἶπον ἔν ἑαυτοῖς· Οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ κληρονόμος· δεῦτε, ἀποκτείνωμεν αὐτὸν, καὶ κατὰσχωμεν τὴν κληρονομίαν αὐτοῦ. ³⁹ Καὶ λαβόντες αὐτὸν ἐξέβαλον ἔξω τοῦ ἀμπελῶνος, καὶ ἀπέκτειναν. ⁴⁰ Ὅταν οὖν ἔλθῃ ὁ κύριος τοῦ ἀμπελῶνος, τί ποιήσει τοῖς γεωργοῖς ἐκείνοις; ⁴¹ Λέγουσιν αὐτῷ· Κακοὺς κακῶς ἀπολέσει αὐτούς·

this vessel had connected with it on the side, or under it (to check, by the coolness of the situation, too great fermentation) a cistern, into which the expressed juice flowed; so, by synecdoche, ληνὸς came to denote (as here) that cistern itself; which, as it was necessarily subterranean, and generally under the vat, so it was often called ὕποληνιον, as in the parallel passages at Mark xii. 1, and Is. xvi. 10. Now every vineyard had its ληνός, or torcular, and its ὕποληνιον, or lacus, which received the must; and which St. Mark states to have been dug beneath the press. These cisterns (which are even yet in use in the East), bore some resemblance to the λάκκοι of the Greeks, on which see the Scholiast on Aristoph. Eccl. 154. In this parable, according to a common practice in Judæa, it is presumed that the owner did not himself cultivate his vineyard, but entrusted its cultivation to others. Accordingly, the owner expected, by covenant, to receive the fruits (i. e. a covenanted portion of them) by way of rent for his vineyard; and so καρπός and the Latin fructus are continually used.

— πύργον] This was built partly as a place of temporary abode for the occupier, while the produce was collecting; and partly for security to the servants stationed there as guards over the place. In the application, however, of the parable, such circumstances as these are to be considered as only serving to intimate that every thing was provided both for comfort and security.

— ἐξέδοτο] for ἐξέμισθασα, as in Polyb. vi. 17, 2, and Hdtian. i. 6, 8, cited by the Commentators. The word may here be rendered 'let it out,'—understanding, however, the rent to be not in money, but (agreeably to the most ancient usage, yet retained in the East, and even in some parts of the West) in a certain portion of the produce. See my note on v. 41, in Rec. Syn., and espec. the passage of Plato there cited. Thus τοὺς καρποὺς, v. 41, should be rendered, 'his fruits, or produce,' meaning the portion which fell to him. Mr. Alf., indeed, takes it to denote the value of the fruits in money. But that view is forbidden by the αὐτοῦ at v. 34, which is emphatic, and the expression ἐν τοῖς καιροῖς αὐτῶν, meaning the times when the various crops should be gathered.

The expression ἐξέδοτο implies agreement; and, in the moral of the parable, has correspondent to it the covenant entered into by God with the Jews (comp. Is. v. 1. Pa. lxxx. 8), on which see Gresswell, vol. v. 56, 58.

⁴¹ λέγουσιν αὐτῷ· Κακοὺς, &c.] It would seem that by the persons here spoken of are meant the Chief Priests, Scribes, and Elders, of whom we read v. 23. Mark xi. 28. Luke xx. 1. Yet the words κακοὺς—ἀπολέσει are, in the parallel passages of Mark and Luke, ascribed to our Lord himself; to which words the bystanders reply by μὴ γίνωτο! Of the several modes of removing this discrepancy proposed by Commentators, not one appears to me quite satisfactory. Mr. Alf. is of opinion, that although Mark and Luke have not the words λέγουσιν αὐτῷ, Luke has given us the key to them, in telling us that the parable was spoken in the hearing of the people, who made the answer, μὴ γίνωτο. But I see not how Luke can be supposed to have given us in his words, v. 9, ἤρξατο πρὸς τὸν λαὸν λέγειν, the key to Matthew's words, λέγουσιν,—inasmuch as in Matthew the antecedent must, as is evident from his words, 'Another parable hear ye,' be the Priests; while in Luke, ἀκούσαντες δὲ (or οἱ δὲ ἄκ., as Lachm. reads) cannot but be the bystanding people at large. Thus this key becomes nought by unlocking nothing, the difficulty remaining just as it was before. We may suppose, that as the parable was (as appears from the combined testimony of Matthew and Luke) addressed to the two distinct classes, the Priests and Rulers, and the people at large, so we have in these Evangelists the answers of each class respectively, and that in Luke is found the very answer we should expect from the less hardened and better inclined people. Yet even thus the difficulty remains nearly as it was. It is plain, that the purpose of Luke in narrating the thing was different from that of Matthew; and that of Mark different from both. Matthew intended to consider the parable in respect to the effect produced by it on the Priests and Rulers; Luke, that on the people at large. In the former case the words of the answer were uttered under a misconception, real or pretended, of the drift of the parable; in the latter, it came from a sincere mind and a sufficiently correct view thereof, and hence their highly-suitable answer. If any difficulty should still be thought remaining, it may be removed by supposing, with several eminent Expositors, that our Lord in the former case, after drawing the matter of their self-condemnation from the Priests, then repeated their words (q. d. 'Aye indeed,' καὶ οὕτως, &c.), as if in confirmation of their decision; whereupon the People, now fully perceiving the scope of the parable, exclaimed, μὴ γίνετο! Thus all difficulty vanishes. It is observable, that the Priests did not say μὴ γίνετο, but immediately (ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ ᾠρᾷ, as it is said in St. Luke) sought to apprehend him.

— ἐκδόσεται] A more exact and definite term than the δώσει of Mark and Luke.

42. Λίθον-γωνίας] Taken from Pa. cxviii. 22, Sept., to which there is also a reference in other passages of Scripture (see Isaiah xxviii. 16). All of them show that the words, though very applicable to David, are, in their highest sense, to be referred to the Messiah; as indeed the Jews themselves acknowledge. The persons here addressed must, according to Matthew's statement, be the Priests and Rulers; but what was said was doubtless meant for the other class; and accordingly, in the passage of Luke, as also in Mark, they are here supposed to be addressed. However, the former class must have been principally addressed, inasmuch as to them the interrogation οὐδέποτε ἀνέγνωτε, &c.—pointed by a fixed earnestness of look (as is said supra xix. 26), indicating earnest and regretful remonstrance—would be peculiarly suitable, since, as being the authorized Expounders of Scripture, they must be supposed to have read it (see Malachi ii. 7),—though, as is implied, they had not so read it as to have become familiar with its contents. The same interrogation was on a former occasion (recorded in Matt. xii. 3. Mark ii. 26. Luke vi. 3) addressed to the same class of persons. It is, however, observable, that in Luke the words of the interrogation are without the sarcasm here conveyed (being merely τί ἐστι τὸ γέγραπ. τοῦτο;), and why? because, according to Luke's mode of viewing the thing, addressed simply to the comparatively ill-informed people at large; and the full sense is, 'How then [supposing your wish, that this destruction should not fall on you] would Scripture have any force in its fulfilment?' This passage of Scripture (taken from Pa. cxviii. 22 and 23, Sept.) strongly illustrates the foregoing parable, espec. that part of it which refers to Christ. At v. 43 our Lord reverts to the parable, and, with reference both to Priests and People, announces their utter rejection by God.

As respects the force of κεφαλὴ γωνίας, what that was in the Oriental buildings, though often alluded to in Scripture (Job xxxviii. 6. Jer. li. 26), we have not, in these times, the means of determining with any certainty. It cannot, however, have been what Bp. Middleton supposes; since no builder would have thought of placing such a huge upright stone at the corner of a building, as would be very likely to fall upon a passer-by. It might protect the corner against injury from the wheels of a heavy carriage, but it could not tend to strengthen the building, though the context here absolutely requires such a sense. We may, I think, best regard this peculiar expression as synonymous with ἀκρογωνιαίος, scil. λίθος, in Eph. ii. 20, and 1 Pet. ii. 6 (occurring also in Barnab. Epist. c. vi.), there quoted from Isa. xxviii. 16, where the Hebr. is נֶסֶד יָסַד, to which the Hebr. נֶסֶד זָוִי, corresponding to κεφ. γωνίας here is tantamount, since זָוִי there refers to the head-point, or angle, where two walls meet. Now a stone so placed may, by a suitable shape, serve materially to bind the two walls, with which it is united, together; and hence the metaphor is here highly suitable, since Christ is here represented as uniting Jews and Gentiles in Himself, so as to form one Body,—the Church of the faithful,—ἐν ᾧ πᾶσα ἡ οἰκοδομὴ συναρμολογουμένη αὐτῷ εἰς ἑνὸς ἄγιον ἐν Κυρίῳ, Eph. ii. 21. This view I find much confirmed by Euthym., who (after Chrys. and other ancient Fathers) explains: καθάπερ ἑκάινος (ὁ λίθος) ἐφ' ἑαυτῷ συνδέει τοίχους δύο, τὸν αὐτὸν τῶπον καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς ἐφ' ἑαυτῷ συνδέσκει τοὺς δύο λαοὺς (Jews and Gentiles) καὶ συνιστοῖ διὰ τῆς εἰς αὐτὸν πίστεως. The very same view is taken, and expressed in nearly the same words, by Theophyl. and Euthym. So also Origen ap. Catenam in Matt., Oxon., p. 176 (ed. Cramer): γωνία ἐστὶ συγκρότησις δύο τοίχων τὸ ἐξ Ἰσραὴλ λῆμμα (read λείμμα, and comp. Rom. xi. 5) καὶ τῶν ἔθνῶν πλήρωμα, εἰς ἐν συγκροτῶν ὁ λίθος Χριστὸς τὴν γωνίαν ποιῶν.

The next clause, παρὰ Κυρίου—ἡμῶν (conjoined with the former in the Psalm) is introduced, though not essential to the argument, by way of removing the wonder which the people at large might feel at the strangeness of the thing, by apprising them that the hand of the Lord was in all this,—namely, the συνάφεια τῶν λαῶν, as Euthym. says; so that even the rejecting of this corner-stone by the Jewish Builders was by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, who permitted, and yet overruled it; so that the whole thing, this Divine dispensation (αὕτη, for αὐτό, by Hebraism), is an object of wonder and admiration to the view, doubtless among the principal matters αἱ ἐπιθυμοῦσιν ἀγγελοὶ παρακύβαι, 1 Pet. i. 12.

43. Our Lord here reverts to the matter of the parable, and in the way of distinct application apprises his hearers of their rejection by God, so as to be no longer his chosen and peculiar people, telling them, their privileges shall be given to "a holy nation" composed of believers out of the whole world, who shall bring forth the fruits of righteousness as opposed to those of empty pretence and vain hypocrisy. The words are not found in Mark and Luke; and being in Matthew only, we must suppose them addressed to the Priests and Rulers,—though intended to be noted by the other class. It would be to the former peculiarly grating to be told that the Jews should be unchurchd, and the kingdom of God taken away, inasmuch as that involved to those Jewish High-Churchmen a deprivation of all that power over the people which (as we learn from Josephus, confirmed by sundry passages of the N. T.) they had been accustomed to exercise as a tyranny.

44. I am still of opinion that there is no ground for thinking, as does Lachm., that this verse is interpolated from St. Luke. It has been thought that vv. 43 and 44 ought to change places, which would seem to make the application to the foregoing more suitable; but there exists no authority that I know of from MSS. for even a transposition; and the present position will be sufficiently appropriate, not, however, by considering, with Mr. Alf., vv. 43 and 44 as answering to the two foregoing parables, as their application; for that would be most chimerical, and taking for granted what would require proof; but by considering the words as meant for the People as well as the Priests; and to the former they are solely ascribed by Luke. Whereas the matter of v. 43, διὰ τοῦτο λέγω ὑμῖν, being meant especially for the Priests, such an arrangement of the verses as the Critics propose would be, according to St. Matthew's mode of representing the thing, a disarrangement. From the present verse being found in both Matthew and Luke, it is clear that it was addressed to both the above classes, both being equally concerned in the awful warning conveyed in it.

With respect to the words themselves, there is an allusion to Is. viii. 14, 15, and the verbs συνθλ. and λικμ. are terms denoting lesser and greater degrees of injury; the first being to 'bruise and crush'; the second 'to beat to pieces, and destroy utterly'; q. d. 'will crush him to pieces, and scatter him abroad as chaff.' Wets. and others suppose in ἐφ' ὃν ἂν πέσῃ an allusion to the different ways of stoning among the Jews, whereby, a scaffold being erected, twice the height of the person to suffer the punishment, the criminal was violently pushed from it. If, then, he died by coming in contact with some stone, nothing further was done; if not, a heavy stone was hurled upon him, which despatched him at once. But the real allusion seems rather, I doubt not, to that stone spoken of by the Prophet Dan. ii. 34, 35, 'Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces. Then were the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors,' similar to what is here said, λικμήσει αὐτόν. See also Dan. ii. 44, λεπτυνεῖ καὶ λικμήσει, &c. Our Lord, then, having, v. 42, made an allusion to himself as a hewn stone, proceeds to intimate the consequences of coming in contact with such a heavy mass. He that falls upon it shall be bruised; he that runs against it—a vast hewn stone—shall be broken in his limbs, or miserably bruised in his body; q. d. 'He that is offended with my being the foundation, stumbling at my lowly and mean estate on earth (see supra xi. 6, and note, and Luke ii. 34, compared with Is. viii. 14, 15), shall, by the act, suffer great spiritual injury, even were there nothing worse. But there is something farther; for he on whom this stone falls, it will grind him to powder, i. e. will reduce him to dust, so that it may be scattered by the winds.' The difference here intimated is between those who decline to receive Jesus as the Messiah, and those who oppose him, or who continue obstinately impenitent and unbelieving. On these the rock at which they at first stumbled, to their great spiritual injury, will eventually fall and crush them in ruin irretrievable,—a type of utter perdition.

46. ὡς προφ. εἶχον] Lachm. edits αἱ προφ., from MSS. B, L, 1. 22, notwithstanding the concurrent testimony of all the other MSS., all the Versions, confirmed by internal evidence, considering that there is not a shadow of proof, that such a phrase as εἶχον τινα αἱ προφ. ever existed; and certainly it would be most harsh. In fact, the reading evidently arose from an error of the scribes, who confounded ὡς with αἱ, as they have often done in other cases. Moreover, ὡς προφ. εἶχον is strongly confirmed by what I have said supra v. 26, and, as I have there made it sufficiently appear, the expression is quite capable of conveying the idea of real and full belief. Still more must I blame Tisch. for editing ἐπειδὴ instead of ἐπειδὴ, on the authority of MS. L only; for B has ἐπειδὴ, and it is ob-

XXII. 1—14. We have here another parable, very similar in purpose to the one just preceding; and which, though seemingly addressed to those gathered around our Lord while teaching in the Temple, yet may have been directed at the same persons,—namely, the chief Priests,—and was pronounced, as seems implied in ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν αὐτοῖς, a very short time after the other. It is said to be peculiar to St. Matthew; and, taken as a whole, it is so; yet there is another which bears much resemblance to it in Luke xiv. 15—25, as far as regards general design, though with not a few points of difference both as to locality and circumstances, arising out of the difference of the occasion, and the earlier period of its delivery. One essential point of difference is, the rabid feeling, amounting even unto murder, manifested towards the messengers sent to invite and summon them, and, which, of course, leads not, as in the other case, merely to exclusion, but to destruction; and it is in this malignant feature that it peculiarly coincides with the last parable,—inasmuch that it seems meant to carry out the same common design,—of solemn warning for the benefit of the better disposed bystanders. The parable naturally distributes itself into two parts,—I. 2—10, II. 11—14. Of the former, the purpose is nearly the same as that of the preceding parable; and it represents the Invitation given to the Jews to embrace the Gospel; the Rejection even to the destruction of the Messengers, the condign Punishment to be inflicted on them, and the Admission of the Gentiles in their stead to the privileges of the Gospel. Thus far the matter coincides with that of the foregoing parable, and is mainly historical, as treating on what took place in the earliest stage of the kingdom of God (or the Christian Dispensation) up to the Passion, and the putting to death of our Lord. The latter portion, v. 11—14, has mainly a prophetic character, as representing what was to take place after the crucifixion and ascension; though in some measure of a doctrinal character, as meant to represent the grand distinguishing character of the Gospel, as a Dispensation altogether of Grace, through Faith,—and thus calculated to afford instruction for the Church of God in every age,—when multitudes, who were bidden to the marriage-feast of life and immortality, would refuse to come; while others, who accepted the invitation, would come irreverently, or profanely,—and, so far from complying with the terms of the invitation, both expressed and implied, would affix terms of their own, and thus be self-excluded from the benefits of the Covenant of Grace. By the circumstance of the King's coming in to see (i. e. inspect) the assembled guests, and reject the unworthy, is designated the scrutinizing view which God will take when he shall come,—namely, at both of the Advents of Christ represented infra ch. xxiv., espec. at his last Advent to final and separating judgment, to take a strict account of all who have been admitted to the Church of Christ by baptism; thus, it would seem, intimating how it should come to pass, that though many should be called, yet comparatively few would be chosen.

2. ὁμοιώθη] Meaning, 'the same thing will take place as that represented in the parable of a king, &c.

—γάμους] This is by most Commentators taken to signify a marriage-feast; though, as the word (correspondently to the Hebr. חַתּוּלָה) often signifies a feast in general, some Expositors assign that sense here, agreeably, as they think, to the moral purport of the parable; while others understand by it an inauguration feast, when the Oriental kings were considered on their enthronization as it were affianced to their country. See Luke xii. 36. xiv. 8. Esth. ii. 18. ix. 22. 1 Kings i. 5—9. But there is no reason to abandon the usual interpretation. In the comparison to a marriage-feast there is a peculiar propriety; since in Scripture the Jewish Covenant, as well as the Christian, is represented under the figure of a marriage-contract between God and his people. See Ia. liv. 5. Jerem. iii. 8. Matt. xxv. 5. John iii. 29. 2 Cor. xi. 2. Rev. xix. 7—9. Moreover, the nature of the story, and its scope in the application (namely, to the mystical union between Christ and his Church), require us to suppose a festival of the most magnificent kind, at which the greatest numbers would be expected to attend. Now certain it is, that the most remarkable instances on record of magnificent entertainments among the ancients are matrimonial festivities, and espec. those of monarchs.

3. καλέσαι] 'to summon;' it being the custom of ancient times to summon guests, who had been some time before invited to a feast, within a short time of the feast, that they might be ready. So Jos. Ant. xi. 6.

—οὐκ ἤθελον ἔλθειν] 'were unwilling to come;' not that they had absolutely refused, but half accepted the original invitation; otherwise the summons to each would not have been sent.

4. ἄλλους δούλους] As by the servant-messengers mentioned in the preceding verse are denoted John the Baptist, the 12 Apostles, and the 70 Disciples, who announced the kingdom of heaven to be at hand; so these others, sent with the second summons, must be Apostles, Evangelists, and preachers of the Gospel, after Christ's ascension into heaven, who showed to the Jews first the nature of the Gospel, and indicated the preparation for it.

— τὸ ἄριστον] This was, in early times, the name given to breakfast: afterwards it denoted the moonday meal; and at length it was applied to the chief meal (dinner), taken at the close of the day. It may here denote the second of the three with which, it seems, kings' marriage-festivities began.

— For ἡτοίμασα Lachm. and Tisch. edit ἡτοίμακα, from 4 uncial and 3 cursive MSS.; while Fritz. adopts ἡτοίμασται, from a few inferior MSS. But I have chosen, with Griesb. and Scholz, to retain the text. rec., for which there is vastly superior external authority, confirmed by internal evidence, considering that both those readings are only two ways of correcting the Grecism (as consisting in the incorrect use of the Aorist for the Perfect), which is stigmatized by Fritz. Yet he declines receiving ἡτοίμακα, and prefers ἡτοίμασται, and steering clear of the difficulty in μου. Probably the ancient Critics were of the same opinion. But how little such hyper-criticism, when applied to the phraseology of common life, is to be praised, I need not say.

— τεθυμένα] θύω properly signified suffio (whence θύος and θύωμα), and at first denoted to make those offerings of incense, with fruits and flowers, for which sacrifices of animals were afterwards substituted. But as θύειν still continued to be used, it then denoted to slay for sacrifice; and at length generally to slaughter for eating.

5. ἴδιον ἀγρὸν] The Commentators recognize here the use of ἴδιον for αὐτοῦ; and so, they say, the Hebrew affix י is rendered in Job vii. 2, and Prov. xxvii. 8, Sept. Accordingly, it would seem to be Hebraic; and thus I find in Jos. Ant. xix. 4, 3, τοῖς δὲ ἐπὶ τῶν ἰδίων ἀγρῶν ἐργάσιν εἰσεν ἔξοδοι. The singular ἀγροῦ is for the plural ἀγρῶν ('estate'), which Classical propriety would require.

— For εἰς τὴν ἑμπορίαν, Lachm. and Tisch. edit ἐπὶ τὴν ἑμπορίαν, from B, C, D, and a few curious MSS., and Origen,—authority quite insufficient, espec. considering that internal evidence is adverse, the reading having very much the appearance of a grammatical correction. It is, indeed, more agreeable to strict propriety of language,—for, as Fritz. remarks, εἰς would make ἑμπορία something topical (of place), and ἐπὶ derives confirmation from a passage of Luke xv. 4, κοιμᾶται ἐπὶ τῷ ἀπολωλῶς, and xxiii. 48, παραγινόμενοι ἐπὶ τὴν θειραν ταύτην. But the Greek of Luke is not that of Matth., and the very circumstance of ἐπὶ being rather required by propriety, only confirms the suspicion of correction. And considering the overwhelming superiority of authority for εἰς, and the character of the MS. texts which present ἐπὶ, there can be little doubt of the genuineness of εἰς, which is retained even by Fritz.

6. οἱ λοιποὶ] Meaning not, as Grew. supposes, a third class in the body of guests, but the rest of the persons invited and summoned, viz. those who had not the pretext of going to look after their worldly business, as would be the case with the great body of the people, the worldly-minded and careless of religious duties,—nay, persons who deigned not to make any excuse at all, but boldly avowed their refusal to attend; and probably when remonstrated with and rebuked by the messengers on the impropriety and criminality of their conduct, grew enraged, and showed their deep enmity to the king by insult and personal injury of the worst kind to his messengers. And whom can these denote but the chief Priests both of that time and afterwards, as long as the Jewish state continued? The best proof and illustration of which is the narrative of the sufferings of the Apostles recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, and often adverted to by St. Paul in his Epistles,—whom they persecuted throughout his life, and probably contributed to bring to his death (see 2 Cor. xi. 24, 25); for in all those persecutions the Jewish Ecclesiastical Rulers were ever, directly or indirectly, the agents or instigators, and through them Stephen, James the Just, James the brother of John, and others, perished.

7. καὶ ἀκούσας—ὠργίσθη] Several MSS., Versions, and Fathers, for καὶ ἀκούσας, have ἀκούσας δέ; and very many after βασιλεὺς add ἐκείνος. And so Matthæi, Griesb., and Scholz edit. But although there is considerable external evidence for the readings in question, espec. the latter, yet internal evidence is quite against them: and Fritz. has shown how they and three other readings originated. Yet, notwithstanding that so plain a case had been long ago made out by Fritz., and subsequently by myself, as to the true origin and real nature of the various readings here found, Tisch. edits ὁ βασιλεὺς ὠργ., from only 6 MSS. (B, L, et 4 al.), which, though recommended by simplicity and pure Grecism, yet involves a sacrifice of the Scriptural character; thus betraying the hand of the Critic. Still more injudicious is the course pursued by Lachm., who edits ὁ δὲ βασιλεὺς ἀκούσας, from only 8 cursive MSS., without any uncial MS. (for ἀκούσας is not found in B), contrary to his rule. The authority of Fathers is, in a case like this, very slender. As to ἐκείνος, internal evidence is equally balanced, considering that it might be put in, and might be put out. But the testimony of the Pesch. Syr. and the Vulg. for its authenticity is very strong.

— πέμψας—ἐνέπρησε] Plainly referring to the utter destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, who might properly be termed the armies of God, as being appointed by his Providence to the work of destruction. See Ia. xiii. 4, 5, comp. with infra xxiv. 28.

9. πορεύεσθε ο. ἐπὶ τὰς διεξόδους τ. ὁ.] The sense assigned to διεξ. τῶν ὁδῶν, compita viarum, was long ago refuted by Kypke; and that which I have propounded and supported from Thucyd. iii. 98, oulets into the country by the principal city gates, is liable to too many objections (stated by Fischer and Fritz.) to be safely adopted. Fischer has fully shown that the ὁδοὶ here spoken of must be country-roads, corresponding to the τὰς ὁδοὺς καὶ φραγμοὺς in Luke xiv. 23 (where see note); and the expression διεξ. τῶν ὁδ. (so peculiar as not to occur elsewhere) seems to denote such roads as, being the only practicable ones to a given point, are necessarily to be taken, and may hence be called (which is the best rendering here) thoroughfares, which term implies a considerable number of passengers traversing them—a sense of ‘thoroughfare’ which seems to have been in the mind of Dryden when he wrote (most descriptively), “The courts are fill’d with a tumultuous din Of crowds, or issuing forth or entering in, A thoroughfare of news.”

10. πονηρ. τε καὶ ἀγ.] Meaning persons of evil life and conversation, as well as persons morally good: thus representing that persons of all sorts, and of every description, would be admitted into the Church of Christ; though at the same time intimating, that those only would be ultimately saved, under the covenant of grace, who had used aright the privileges which they had enjoyed under that covenant.

11. εἰσελθὼν—θεάσασθαι τοὺς ἀνακειμένους.] By this circumstance ancient manners are accurately depicted; for, as Grot. shows, monarchs, grandees, and those who gave magnificent banquets, used, when their guests were seated, to enter the dining-hall to view the scene. Thus Aristen. Ep. 1. 5, πάντων εἰς ταῦτόν ἀνδροχόμῳ τῶν δαιτυμένων—ὁ ἰστιάτορ εἰσῆμι. And so in Esdr. ii. 38, 39.

12. ἔνδυμα γάμου.] Meaning ‘the appropriate vestment’ with which those who accepted the invitation, and attended at the festal board, were expected to be clothed; in order to which the requisite Robe was provided from the royal vestry, and offered to such as needed it by coming, unavoidably, unprovided therewith. The custom alluded to was common alike to the Hebrews, and to the Greeks and Romans. In this, therefore, consisted the inexcusable offence of the delinquent here mentioned, that he had deliberately neglected to provide himself with the suitable vestment, having either declined to receive it when offered, or neglected to take it when placed ready for him. Such clearly was his offence; but in order to see its peculiar guilt (by the despising of so great salvation) it is necessary to ascertain, difficult as that may be, what it is that is here designated by the ἔνδυμα γάμου. On this point Commentators and Theologians have widely differed in opinion, and in venturing to fix the import, have, naturally enough, been biased by the theological system which they have adopted. The most ancient interpretation is that of St. Clement, Homil. vii. 22, who explains it of baptism (and so Mr. Alf. brings in baptism, at least as referred to symbolically): but I cannot find that any subsequent Father adopted that view. They almost all (espec. the Greek ones) take it to denote the adorning of our Christian profession by a suitable conduct. So Chrys., Orig., Theophyl., and some other ancient Commentators in the Catena Oxon., and, of the Latin Fathers, Jerome. Euthym., however, with more judgment than some other of the Fathers, remarks, that the entering into the guest-chamber is by faith in Christ: but that after that entrance, by the laver of regeneration in baptism, there is need to be clothed with the wedding-garment by a βίος καθαρὸς καὶ λαμπρὸς. This view is adopted by many modern, and most recent Commentators, though with some modification and improvement. This, however, seems taking too confined a view, nay, defective, as not pointing at something that shall regulate and govern, transform and rectify the conduct by purifying the heart. Hence it is better to adopt the view of a few ancient, and several modern Expositors, who understand by it sanctification by the Holy Spirit, both by the gifts and by the graces of the Spirit. Thus, too, St. Hilary (Canon 22, in Matth.) says: “Vestis nuptialis est gratia Spiritus Sancti et candor habitus celestis, qui bonæ interrogationis confessione susceptus, usque in cælum regni cælorum immaculatus (see Jude 23) et integer est reservandus.” Hereby, then, it is implied, that the person in question (of course forming the representative of a class, and that, alas! awfully large) who was excluded for non-compliance with the requirement, had not the requisite adornment of faith and grace with which he might have been clothed, by the influence of God’s Holy Spirit. Other Expositors, however, as Mr. Greswell, explain the ἔνδυμα γάμου to mean a lively faith in Christ, a sacred badge of our Christian profession, peculiarly characteristic of the Gospel, and the grand criterion between the nominal and the real Christian. But it would be more correct to call it one great criterion—not to say that we may pause at its being represented that faith is to be assumed! as Mr. Gresw. says. And when he speaks of it as in its imputed efficacy necessary to salvation, and singly sufficient for that purpose, it would seem that this is cou-founding two things which are altogether distinct. In short, if it denote faith at all, it must be that faith which worketh by love and obedience; evinces its reality by its fruits; and Calvin here remarks, that the one [of course, if real] implies the other. However, I am inclined to think, that in this marriage garment there is reference to the imputed righteousness of Christ Jesus, as indispensably necessary to be put on, and without which none can appear at the final judgment. Though, how can it be put on, but by a true and lively Faith, under the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit, whereby the believer is clothed upon with the robe of Christ's righteousness? and thus are connected at once his justification and his sanctification. This view is strikingly confirmed and illustrated by a passage of Rev. xix. 8, τὸ γὰρ βύσσινον (καθαρὸν καὶ λευκὸν) τὰ δικαιώματά ἐστι τῶν ἁγίων, namely, as regards both their justification and sanctification, where the fine linen robe, given at the marriage of the Lamb to his Bride, the true Church, invisible and universal, to put on at the marriage-feast, cannot but designate both the righteousness of Christ imputed to the saints, and the image of Christ renewed in them, by the sanctifying influences of the Spirit, through which the righteous acts mentioned in the context have been produced. Compare, too, what follows: καὶ λέγει μοι (namely, the speaker who uttered the voice from the throne, supra v. 8. God, who sitteth on the throne, supra v. 13. vi. 16. viii. 10—15). Μακάριοι οἱ εἰς τὸ δεῖπνον τοῦ γάμου τοῦ Ἀρνίου κεκλημένοι, implying that such have put on the above robe of justification and sanctification. Can we doubt that St. John, in writing this whole passage, must have had his mind filled with the doctrine inculcated in the present parable, which he heard pronounced, as here, the words by the voice from the throne? And could he fail to feel the deep contrast between the μακάριοι who have put on the wedding-garment, and the class of persons (represented by the miserable delinquent here spoken of) who presumptuously seek to be saved in some other way than that pointed out by their Redeemer, and ratified by the voice from the throne; and who thus exclude themselves from the only mode of salvation provided in the Gospel?

13. The words ἀρατε αὐτὸν καὶ are absent from B, L, the Syr., Sahid., Copt., and Arm. Versions, with Orig. and Hilary; and they are cancelled by L. and T., but on insufficient authority, for internal evidence is at least equally balanced. Nay, it would seem that they were less likely to be put in than put out, by Critics (who deemed the wording overloaded, and thought that ἀρατε αὐτὸν might very well be dispensed with, as in the similar passages, supra viii. 12, and infra xxv. 30), and accordingly it is not to be supposed that they would have been brought in, being, as would seem, so little essential to the sense. Though so far from there being here any pleonasm, there is in this idiom something of intensity and spirit, by a touch of the graphic, as in 1 Cor. vi. 15, ἀρας οὖν τὰ μέλη—ποιήσω, where see note. And so oft. in O. T., e. gr. Gen. xxx. 9. That there has been some tampering with the words is plain from another mode of effecting the same purpose, by the removal of δίψαντες, found in MS. D. and Iren., Hilar., and some copies of the Ital. Vers., ἀρατε αὐτὸν πόδας καὶ χεῖρας, καὶ βάλλ. As to Versions and Fathers, they are not in such a case of much weight. But, at any rate, we have the evidence of Iren., Hilar., and the Ital. Vers., and the MS. D, for the antiquity of the reading ἀρατε καὶ, and the external authority of MSS. is overwhelming, including all the Lamb. and Mus. copies. As to the reading χεῖρας καὶ πόδας, there is great external evidence for it, including many of the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies, and almost all the ancient Versions: but internal evidence is rather against it, from the probability of its being a correction for greater facility, and to make it more agreeable to the usual mode of expression, one occurring several times in the O. T., though never, I think, in the Class. writers. The same may have taken place in Acts xxi. 11, where the position δίπας—τοὺς πόδας καὶ τὰς χεῖρας is supported by strong authority, nor is it likely that the reading there would be brought in by scribes.

14. πολλοὶ—ἐκλεκτοί] In this saying (which also concludes the parable of the labourers in the vineyard, supra xx. 16) we have an inference (as in the other parable) to be deduced from the matter of the foregoing parable, apprising the hearers that though many were those that were being called, by having the offer of salvation made to them, few there would be who would accept that call to the marriage-feast, and fewer still who, after accepting the invitation, would come provided with the indispensable requisite.

16. τοὺς μαθ. α.] In the passage of Luke we have: ἐγκαθίστουσιν ὑποκρινόμενοι δικαίους εἶναι, &c.; and in Mark the insidious purpose is adverted to by the term ἀργεῖν ὡσεως.

—τῶν Ἑρωδιανῶν] From the slight mention of these persons in the New Test., and the silence of Josephus, nothing certain with respect to them can be determined; but the prevailing and best-founded opinion seems to be, that they did not form any distinct religious Sect (though probably Sadducees in doctrine, as was Herod), but were rather a political Party, composed of the courtiers and ministers, partisans and adherents generally, of Herod; who maintained, with him, that the dominion of the Romans over the Jews was lawful, and ought to be submitted to; and that, under present circumstances, the Jews might, allowably, resort to Gentile customs.

— λέγοντες] Lach. edits -τας, from B, L, and one or two cursive MSS.; while Tisch. retains -τες; rightly, since internal evidence as well as external is in its favour. -τας may have been an error of scribes, who would naturally expect it after μαθητῆς; or of sciolists, who stumbled at -τας, since the Pharisees were not the speakers. But the Critics ought to have known that it was the custom of antiquity to regard persons who were sent with messages as being virtually the speakers; and accordingly the phraseology is accommodated to that view. See my note on Thucyd. vii. 8 and 10, and on Acts xv. 27. From sheer ignorance of this point of Classical antiquity, Lach. has here, and in numerous other passages, introduced a manifest corruption of the text.

— οὐ μέλει σοι π. ο.] Meaning, 'art impartial,' 'without partiality.' This and the expression following, οὐ βλέπεις εἰς πρόσωπον ἀνθ. (of which the latter is a Hebraism, for which Luke has οὐ λαμβάνεις πρόσωπον), are nearly synonymous; except that πρόσωπον adverts to the external condition of men, with allusion to its being no more a part of the man than the πρόσωπον, or actor's mask. Fritz., indeed, thinks that πρόσωπον ἀνθρώπων is placed, by a not unusual periphrasis, for men; and he renders by 'neque homines curas.' This might be admitted in a Classical writer, but in one like Matthew, (also Mark, in the parallel passage, xii. 14) it is otherwise; not to mention that the parallel passage in Luke xx. 21 (and a comparison with Gal. ii. 16) fixes the meaning of the present expression to what I have laid down as the sense of the words: 'non respiciat ad externam hominum speciem, ad justitiam causae nihil pertinentem.' Of βλέπειν εἰς τινα, in this sense, I know no example.

²⁰ τίς—ἐπιγραφή] The inscription was ΚΑΙΣΑΡ ΑΥΤΟΥΣΤ: ΙΟΥΔΑΙΑΣ ΕΒΛΑΟΥΚΥΙΑΣ. 'Our Lord here baffles the malignant proposers of the question, by taking advantage of their own concession, that the denarius bore the emperor's image and superscription; and also of the determination of their own Schools, that wherever any king's coin was current, it was a proof of that country's subjection to that government.'

— οἱ λέγοντες] Four uncial, and many cursive MSS. are without the Article, which has been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., but, as Fritz. shows at large, injudiciously. Bp. Middleton, too, says that the omission cannot be right, since the meaning intended is not that, as they came, they made this assertion, but only that the dogma subjoined was notoriously maintained by them. Accordingly, the Article is found in the parallel passages of Mark and Luke. From Acts xxiii. 8, and Joa. B. J. ii. 18, 14, and elsewhere, it is plain that they denied the immortality of the soul as well as the resurrection of the body; and our Lord's answer is directed against both of the errors. Strange is it that Mr. Alf., while in his note maintaining the authenticity of the αἱ, should in his text virtually expunge it.

 25 Ἦσαν δὲ παρ' ἡμῖν ἑπτὰ ἀδελφοί· καὶ ὁ πρῶτος γαμήσας ἐτελεύτησε· καὶ μὴ ἔχων σπέρμα, ἀφήκε τὴν γυναικα αὐτοῦ τῷ ἀδελφῷ αὐτοῦ. 26 ὁμοίως καὶ ὁ δεύτερος, καὶ ὁ τρίτος, ἕως τῶν ἑπτὰ. 27 Ὅτερον δὲ πάντων ἀπέθανε καὶ ἡ γυνή. 28 Ἐν τῇ οὖν ἀναστάσει τίνος τῶν ἑπτὰ ἔσται γυνή; πάντες γὰρ ἔσχον αὐτήν. 29 Ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Πλαγῶσθε μὴ εἰδότες τὰς γραφὰς, μηδὲ τὴν δύναμιν τοῦ Θεοῦ. 30 Ἐν γὰρ τῇ ἀναστάσει οὔτε γαμοῦσιν, οὔτε ἐκγαμίζονται· ἀλλ' ὡς ἄγγελοι [τοῦ] Θεοῦ ἐν οὐρανῷ εἰσι. 31 Περὶ δὲ τῆς ἀναστάσεως

24. ἀναστήσει σπέρμα τῷ ἀδελφῷ α.] Said in reference to what Moses directs, Deut. xxv. 5, though it only gives the substance of the direction, and (what is worthy of remark) the phraseology is formed closely on the words of Judah to Onan: Εἰσελθε πρὸς τὴν γυναῖκα τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ καὶ ἐπιγαμβρεύσαι αὐτήν, καὶ ἀνάστησον σπέρμα τῷ ἀδελφῷ, where Judah's injunction probably only carried out a patriarchal ordinance suited to a period when the world required more fully peopling than in after-times. The τῷ ἀδελφῷ is emphatic, the first-born son of such a marriage being even under the patriarchal rule, and more precisely under the Mosaic Law, reckoned as the son and heir of the deceased brother. For ἴαν τις ἀποθ. Mark and Luke more explicitly have ἴαν τινος ἀδελφός ἀποθ. Also for ἀναστήσει, Mark and Luke ἔξαν., as also some very ancient MSS. here.

The term σπέρμα here, though it must refer chiefly to this one child, yet may comprehend such other progeny as might spring from the marriage; and in Scripture the term is almost always used plurally; though in the Class. writers used as of one; and accordingly though the plural form is occasionally found, yet only in poetry. However, it is used by St. Paul, Gal. iii. 16.

The intent of this injunction was, to keep the families of Israel separate, and to perpetuate them.

29. πλανᾶσθε—Θεοῦ] i. e. 'ye deceive yourselves by assuming a false hypothesis'—namely, that if there be a future state it must be like the present, and by your ignorance of the true sense of the Scriptures; and espec. by not considering the omnipotence of God,—to whom renewal of existence can require no more exertion of power than original creation—nor reflecting that God is as able to raise up the dead without their former passions, as originally to create them with those passions.

30. ἐκγαμίζοντας] MSS. B, D, L, and a few others, have γαμ., which is adopted by Lachm. and Tisch.; but without sufficient reason. See Fritz. The reading at Mark will not settle the reading here, for there the copies vary; though Lachm. and Tisch. adopt γαμ., as also in the passage of Luke. But it is very improbable that the simple form should have been in all three Gospels altered to the compound. The contrary is what usually takes place. And, considering that ἐκγαμ. is exclusively Hellenistic, and γαμ. exclusively Classical, I doubt not that ἐκγαμ.

was written by Matt. and Luke, though not, perhaps, by Mark. To turn from words to things; on this point there has been considerable difference of opinion among the Jewish Rabbins some,—as the earlier ones—maintaining that there is marrying in heaven; others, as the later, that there is not. The general opinion, however, was, in the time of Christ, that the dead would be raised either in their former or with other bodies. And it was the common notion, that the offices of the new bodies would be precisely the same with those of the former ones. The wisest few, however, were of quite another opinion. But of these some (as Maimonides afterwards) went into the other extreme—and maintained that the raised would have no bodies in a future state. To avoid the difficulty involved in the belief of a resurrection, the Sadducees rejected it altogether,—misunderstanding Scripture,—which does not say that men in a future life will live as they do, and quite misconceiving the power of God. The purpose here of the Sadducees was, by this sort of puzzle, to intimate the absurdity of a resurrection by showing the uselessness of it; for if the future world was not to differ from this, why should there be a resurrection at all? But our Lord answers them by showing the groundlessness of this hypothesis, which was quite unsupported by Scripture, and by assuring them that the future life will be quite different from the present, and that therefore there will be no marrying, &c.

—ὡς ἄγγελοι] Luke says ἰσάγγελοι. Though even that expression imports not equality, but only similarity. This similarity must chiefly, by the context, be referred to the point in question; i. e. the not being subject to the appetites of the body; although, upon the whole, εἰσιν ὡς may denote condition generally. At all events, it does not follow, because angels are, as is supposed, composed of spirit only, that the righteous shall, at the resurrection, have spirits only. That they will also have bodies of some sort or other is certain,—especially from 1 Cor. xvi. 42, seq.

The words τοῦ Θεοῦ after ἄγγελοι are cancelled by Lach., Tisch., and Alf., from B, D, and two cursive MSS.;—authority, however, quite insufficient, espec. considering that internal evidence is in their favour, from the far less likelihood that the words should have been introduced from Luke xii. 8—10, than that Matt. and Luke should have chosen to use the fuller expression, οἱ ἄγγελοι τοῦ Θεοῦ, so oft. found in the Old Test. Probably the Critics here expunged the words for no better reason than that it is absent from the parallel passages of Mark and Luke; though it ought to have occurred to them, that the prefix of ὡς in the passage of Mark rendered the τοῦ Θεοῦ unnecessary, as after the prefix ἴσα in Luke it would have been improper. There would be less objection to cancelling the τοῦ, with one uncial and not a few cursive MSS., to which I add two Lamb. and five Mus. copies; and since ἀγγελοι has not the Article, propriety would require its absence here, which, as might be expected, Bp. Middl. approves. For my own part, I suspect that it arose from no better source than the ol before ἀγγελοι, found (as I learn from Jackson) repeatedly in Origen; and which also has place in Cod. 22, also the ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ adopted by Lach. and Tisch. from B, L, and a few ancient cursive MSS.; to which I add Lamb. 1187. Both of the above emendations arose from the fertile brain of the Prince of Biblical criticism. Hence it is evident that for the most certain of all Canons of criticism, the reading ἀγγελοι τοῦ Θεοῦ is entitled to be considered the genuine one. To turn from words to things;—our Lord adduces against his adversaries the existence of angels, because, as we find from Acts xxiii. 8, the Sadducees denied the existence of angels, and, indeed, of immaterial spirits generally; as a necessary consequence of denying the resurrection of the dead.

32. Ἐγὼ εἰμι ὁ Θεός—ἀλλὰ ζώντων] The argumentation is peculiarly Jewish; and accordingly a great multitude of passages have been adduced by Wets. from the Rabbinical writers, in which the resurrection of the dead and the immortality of the soul are proved from this very passage here quoted, and that in nearly the same words. The implied relationship between the patriarchs and God is well put, and must denote not only the relationship of souls and Father mutually (alluded to in the parallel passage of Luke xx. 36, ὁ πατήρ τοῦ Θεοῦ), but also, as has been well defined, the relationship of being parties of the same covenant, which implies the continuance of the patriarchs as the other parties to that covenant. Yet the argument, I would suggest, might be placed on a broader basis by taking into account the not unimportant additional words in Luke, πάντες γὰρ αὐτῷ ζῶσι. In fact, this remark clenchs the argument, recognizing an existence of all, whether living or dead, in the sight of God, so that none are in a state of annihilation, but the being of all is a living being, of persons existing in another condition of being. So Justin Mart. Apol. i. 63, p. 96, regards the saying as one σηματοῦν τοῦ καὶ ἀποθανόντας κινεῖν μένει. It is almost needless to remark how weighty an argument the above passage, taken in conjunction with the subjoined words of Luke, supplies against the so

33. ἐξεπλ. ἐπὶ τῇ διδαχῇ α.] Comp. Luke xx. 26, θαυμάσαντες ἐπὶ τῇ ἀποκρίσει αὐτοῦ. In each case they felt admiration at the wisdom of the answer, by which, in the former case, the tempters were frustrated, and in both the by-standing people were instructed; in the former case, as being taught the true foundation of civil obedience, as resting in obedience to God, from whom is all power, thus binding together the politic and the religious duties of all who name the name of Christ; in the latter case, by being taught the existence, and, by implication, the offices of angels, as ministering spirits; and also the similarity of our future glorified state to their present beatific state. This fully shows the high significance of the terms employed by Matthew, ἐξεπλ. ἐπὶ τῇ διδαχῇ α.—meaning that they were struck with admiration at the depth of instruction which came from our Lord's lips,—a strong proof of which appears in the fact recorded by Luke, that it extorted the high commendation of even certain of the Scribes.

34—40. Mark xii. 28—34. By the phrase συνήχθησαν ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ, recurring at Acts iv. 26, is denoted the being assembled together, by a sort of convocation, at some common place of meeting, for some common purpose, which place was that of our Lord's usual resort in the Temple. Here it must be understood of combinations against Christ at least for a sinister purpose, to try to puzzle One who had foiled the Sadducees in argument; the Pharisees being more jealous of Christ's accession of credit by that defeat, than pleased by the defeat of a common enemy. In effecting their purpose, they, it seems, put forward one of their number (comp. Acts xix. 33), probably the most eminent for talent, to try the skill of Jesus in Scripture by some puzzling question. The person, however, turned out (as we find from the more detailed account in Mark) to be better inclined to our Lord than they supposed; and accordingly he addresses Jesus by the respectful title of Διδάσκαλε, and put to him a serious but fair question,—though, as we shall see, one not very easy to be settled; and the individual in question might think that the famed διδάσκαλος was the right person to solve the difficulty. As respects the person, called by Matth. νομικός, it must not be supposed that, because Mark calls him εἰς τῶν γραμματέων, νομικός and γραμματεὺς were synonymous terms. That there was a difference cannot be doubted; but in what that difference exactly consisted, we are too much in the dark to warrant any such positive decision as Mr. Alford ventures to make, by affirming that γραμματεὺς is a wider term than νομικός, though including it. Could this be proved, it would go far to remove the discrepancy between the accounts of Matthew and Mark. It would seem that the difference between the two was, that the νομικός was a public Teacher of the Mosaic Law, and the γραμματεὺς a private Interpreter of the Scripture, and likewise one skilled in the traditions of the Elders: hence the order of the γραμματεῖς had the charge, not of transcribing the sacred books, as we are told by Lexicographers, but of superintending their transcription, and ascertaining their accuracy. Yet there is nothing improbable in the supposition that the same person might be both one and the other (as well as a person, in our times, may be both a D.D. and an LL.D.); and this seems confirmed by the term νομοδιδάσκαλος being used as equiv. to both νομικός and γραμματεὺς; such, at least, seems to have been the case with Gamaliel, Acts v. 34, comp. with Luke v. 17, and 1 Tim. i. 7.

³⁶ ποία ἐντολὴ μεγάλη ἐν τ. ν.] The exact sense is, 'which, i.e. what kind of (answering to qualis) commandment is great in the Law?'—meaning pre-eminently so, equiv. to πρώτη in the passage of Mark. And so at v. 38, πρώτη and μεγάλη are interchanged. The interrogation as stated in Mark is, though somewhat different, yet essentially the same. Be that as it may, the question was one involving a matter of no little controversy among the Jewish Doctors, because involving the comparative importance of different precepts; some maintaining the pre-eminence of one, some of another. Only while they distinguished the Divine precepts (of which they numbered 613) into great and small, they constantly gave the preference to the ceremonial ones. Christ, however, decided in favour of the moral law, yet not to the neglect of the ceremonial.

³⁷ ἔφη] This reading (instead of the text. rec. εἶπεν), which is found in the greater part of the best MSS. (including the Lamb. and Mus. copies), is edited by Matth., Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch.

Before the words following we have added in Mark πρώτη πασῶν τῶν ἐντολῶν. 'Ἀκούε, Ἰσραὴλ, Κύριος ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν, Κύριος εἰς ἰστί, on which see note.

— ἐν ὅλῃ τῇ καρδίᾳ—διανοίᾳ σου] These are forms of expression nearly equiv., yet involving no redundancy, and united for intensity of sense (as in a passage of Philo cited by Wetz.); importing, not that perfection in degree, or exaltation in kind, contended for by some; but only denoting, that 'we must assign to God the first place in our affections, and consecrate to him the united powers and faculties, both of body and mind,' with which he hath endued us, so as to exert them most effectually.

— ὡς σεαυτόν] We are not here commanded to love (i. e. benefit) our fellow-creatures as much as ourselves (which were inconsistent with the strong principle of self-love which the Almighty has implanted in us for our preservation); for ὡς (like the Heb. כִּי) imports, not equality in degree, but similarity in kind. Thus the precept corresponds to that of our Lord at Matt. vii. 12. And we are commanded not only to avoid injuring our neighbour, as we avoid injuring ourselves; but to treat him in the same manner as we might, if exchanging situations with him, fairly claim to be treated by him.

⁴⁰ ἐν ταύταις—κρέμονται] This is generally thought to be a Hebrew metaphor, taken from the Jewish custom of suspending the tables of the laws from a nail, or peg. But the metaphor is common to almost all languages, as used of things closely connected, so as to form links of one common chain, and springing from the same origin. The only Hebraism is in the use of ἐν for the Class. ἐκ in Plato, p. 831, ἐξ ὧν κριμαίνῃ πᾶσα πόλις; and Plut. T. ii. 116, γνώθι σεαυτὸν, καὶ τὸ Μηδὲν ἄγαν. ἐκ τούτων γὰρ ἤρτηται τὰ λοιπὰ πάντα. Of the expression κρέμ. ἐν, I know no other examples but the following: Esth. vi. 4, in come copies confirmed by the Syr. Vera, κρέμ. ἐν τῷ ἔθλῳ, and Lam. v. 12, ἐν χειρὶν αὐτῶν ἐκρίμασθησαν. The best rendering would be, 'by these two,' &c. Had a Class. writer retained ἐν, he would have chosen some other verb, e. gr. ἀνακεφαλαιούνηται, as in a similar expression Rom. xiii. 9. Indeed, as it would, the general sense is, that those two commandments form the sum and substance of the Two Tables of the Law, and which, taken in conjunction, comprehend the entire duty of man, as contained in that Law and enforced in the Prophets.

⁴¹ συνηγμένων] 'collected together,' viz. in order, as we learn from Mark, to attend on Christ's teaching in the Temple. Having answered the three questions successively proposed to him by the two great sects of the Jews, our Lord took the opportunity, of the Pharisees' being now gathered together, to put to them, in his turn, a question for their solution; the object of which was to show them how little they knew of what was contained in the prophecies, and how ignorant they were of the august dignity of the Messiah, as being David's Lord, though He was his descendant; and still more the true nature of the Messiah's person, as one with the God-head. Although, as observes Bp. Bull, the Prophets had not obscurely intimated that the Messiah would be God as well as man; and though the wiser few of the Jews were aware of that, yet the multitude embraced the abject notion that he would be a mighty conqueror, who would subdue all the nations of the earth, and make Jerusalem the metropolis of the world. Had these Pharisees held the proper Divinity of the Messiah, they might easily have solved the proposed enigma by replying, that Christ would, indeed, be the Son of David, as regards the flesh; but his Lord, as to his Divine nature. Yet that the persons present did not, is clear from their being unable to solve the enigma;—and no wonder, since the solution rested on the doctrine of the incarnate Godhead of the Messiah, whereon they were stone-blind. Observe, that our Lord speaks of what David saith ἐν πνεύματι, scil. dyōw (which word is expressed in Mark)—meaning, 'under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit.' Peter (Acts i. 16. ii. 30—34) uses the same words, and to the same class of persons; and at 2 Pet. i. 21, we have *φερόμενοι ὑπὸ πνεύματος *dyōu. So, too, does Paul 1 Cor. xv. 25. Heb. i. 13, et al. But to revert to our Lord, the Fountain of Divine knowledge as well as life, we find him always, in his arguments with the Jews, taking for granted that the sacred writers of the Old Test. were under such a full inspiration of the Holy Spirit, as to express themselves on all occasions with unerring truth.

44. Of εἶπεν ὁ Κύριος—μου, the true reading is, 'Jehovah said unto my Lord,' for in these words (quoted from Ps. cx. 1) God the Father is represented as speaking to the Lord Christ—an evident prediction this respecting the exaltation of Christ our Saviour. Now, considering how august is the saying, of which the high theme is JEHOVAH, one cannot but wonder at the rashness of Lach. and Tisch., who remove the ὁ before Κύριος, though on the authority of only two MSS. (D and Z), for Tisch. excludes B mentioned by Griesb.—against all the rest, and, I believe, all the copies of the Sept. The case is exactly the same in the parallel passages of Mark xii. 36, and Luke xx. 42, where the reading Κύριος rests on no other authority than B, D, without L, and has, so far consistently, been adopted by L and T.; though Griesb. did not think the reading worthy of any notice. Had the reading occurred in one passage, I should have been inclined to ascribe it to a mere error of scribes; but as it is, I must lay it to the door of certain Critics who, I suspect, removed the Article for no better reason than that it has no place in the next verse before Κύριον, unaware, it seems, that the lingua proprietatis there (as in 1 Pet. iii. 6) rejects the Article. I need not say internal evidence is quite in favour of the ὁ, from the greater probability of its having been left out in two, than inserted in upward of 700, for I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies. But to turn from words to things;—it is clear that David, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, uses language which ascribes no less than Deity to the Messiah.

—κάθου ἐκ δεξιῶν) A comparison taken from kings, on whose right hand sat the heir, or the person who was next in dignity to the monarch, and on the left hand he who was immediately below him in rank. But sitting on the right implied also a participation in the regal power and authority. Hence συμβασιλεύειν is interpreted by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 25, as equiv. to βασιλεύειν.

—ἕως ἂν θῶ) 'whilst I make.' The image is derived from the custom of conquerors putting their foot on the neck of a vanquished enemy, as a mark of subjugation. So Virg. Æn. x. 731, 'Tum super abjectum posito pede.' Comp. Josh. x. 24. 2 Sam. xxii. 41.

For ὑποπόδιον τ. π., L. and T. read ὑποκάτω, from five uncial and fifteen cursive MSS. But the received reading is found in all the MSS. of the Sept.; and ὑποκάτω is evidently a mere correction of diction by the Alexandrian Critics; and, perhaps, made with a view to Heb. ii. 8, πάντα ὑπέταξας ὑποκάτω τῶν ποδῶν α., and perhaps Rev. xii. 1. But I cannot think that the Evangelist would choose to depart from the Heb. and Sept., only to introduce a weaker, and far less dignified image in the place of one of unequalled grandeur, and that in a case where strength of imagery was especially called for. The reading ὑποκάτω may, indeed, seem confirmed by 1 Cor. xv. 25; but that support is rather apparent than real; for there we have no citation, but only a use of words suggested by, and having reference to, those of the Psalm; and, of course, the image might allowably be modified.

46. The words καὶ οὐδεὶς—λόγον are to be referred to the immediately preceding portion from v. 41—45 inclusive; while the next words, οὐδὲ ἐτόλμησε—οὐκέτι, belong not to that portion, but to the foregoing one, v. 34—40, and Mark xii. 28—34, for which reason, I apprehend, Mark chose to place them just after it; though the arrangement adopted by Matthew is preferable.

XXIII. 1—39. This discourse was, it would seem from the parallel passage of Luke xx. 45, addressed by our Lord to his disciples, but in the hearing of the multitude (παντός τοῦ λαοῦ); and though Matt. places the disciples before the multitude, that is a circumstance which is not to be pressed on, since our Lord plainly intended what he said to be laid to heart by both classes, espec. by the multitude, in order to rectify their misconceptions of the true nature of their religion, to lessen their partiality for the Pharisaical teachers, and to loosen their prejudices against the Gospel. But it was addressed also to the disciples, inasmuch as even these would need the cautions, and benefit by the instructions now given. Thus to the former class it was highly necessary, and to the latter highly beneficial:—by the disciples is meant not the less instructed of them, to the exclusion of the Apostles, as Origen and Maldon. suppose, as though they would not need the lesson here read; for, alas! the most instructed and the best inclined of men need such cautions and admonitions, that their eyes may not be dazzled by worldly pomp. Accordingly, to the disciples in general our Lord here addresses himself, since the period was fast approaching which would try them in the furnace of temptation, when one would fall away, and many waver. It was prob. from viewing the matter in this light, that Matt. here places the multitude first, and that Mark confines it to the multitude: though Tisch., by cancelling the αὐτοῖς, from four MSS. only, goes far to destroy the reference. And yet the ὁ transitive in Luke, and the τότε, which serve to fix the time of the address as just after the above discomfiture of the Pharisees thereupon, ought to have shown him that a direct reference was indispensable, since a new section commences. Although much of the matter of this discourse is to be found in the eleventh chapter of Luke and other portions of that Gospel, yet there is no reason to suppose but that it was delivered all at once, as Luke narrates it, and at the very period here assigned, towards the closing scenes of our Lord's ministry; though there is no reason why we should not suppose that parts of this discourse may have been brought forward on other and earlier occasions.

2. ἐπὶ τῆς Μ. καθ. ἐκάθισαν] 'they have seated themselves, do sit (Aorist of custom) in Moses' seat,' viz. by being the authorized expounders of the Law delivered to them by him as Lawgiver. See Exod. ii. 13—26. Deut. xvii. 9—13.

3. τηρεῖν—ποιεῖτε] The reading here is disputed. Very many MSS., both uncial and cursive, including nearly the whole of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, have ἴαν: while MSS. B, D,

L, Z, and three or four cursive ones, with the Vulg. and other Versions, and some early Fathers, as Iren. and Euseb., omit the τηρεῖν, which is cancelled by Fritz., L., and T., who also, for τηρεῖτε καὶ ποιεῖτε, read ποιήσατε καὶ τηρεῖτε—authority quite insufficient, espec. considering that internal evidence draws two ways. Τηρεῖν may have arisen from a marginal or interlineary scholium; but it was more probably removed by certain critical revisers, who either stumbled at the construction with the Infinitive (which, however, is quite authorized), or who thought it involved pleonasm. Besides, the weighty authority of the Pesch. Syr. and Sahid. Versions, with Ephr. Syr. and Isid. (who retain the Infinitive, though they carelessly read ποιεῖν) confirms the genuineness of the word, espec. considering that my suspicion as to the origin of the alteration is strengthened by the fact, that Chrys., Ephr. Syr., and Hilary, thought fit to remove the fancied plethora in another way, viz. by putting out the words τηρεῖτε καὶ, as did others (we may infer from a few ancient MSS.) by removing καὶ ποιεῖτε. As respects the reading ποιήσατε καὶ τηρ., that rests solely on B, L, Z, and three or four cursives, and arose, I suspect, from the same cause as the former, namely, from critical alteration. Ποιήσατε was introduced from their supposing that the Aor. form was more suitable, q. d. 'Get it done,' as in John ii. 5, ὁ θεὸς λέγει ὑμῖν ποιήσατε. But that was no sufficient reason, for the phraseology of John is no rule for that of Matt. Besides, the occurrence of ποιεῖτε in the same sentence excludes it here. As to the change of position in τηρ. and π., the quarter from which it proceeds leaves little reason to doubt that it also arose from critical alteration, though one involving no improvement, for thus the words καὶ τηρ. would be useless; whereas, according to the usual position, the second term is intensive, q. d. 'mind and observe them,' so mind as to observe. Comp. John xiv. 21, ὁ ἔχων τὰς ἐντολάς μου καὶ τηρῶν, where we have another combination of τηρεῖν with another term, and both so rare, as elsewhere not easy to be found. The πάντα here must be taken with the limitation suggested by the context (as in Col. iii. 20. 22. Ephes. v. 24); i. e. all things which they read from the Law and the Prophets, and whatever they taught agreeably thereunto. Bp. Warburton, in an able Sermon on this text, points out the magnanimity of this conduct of our Lord, and shows how different it was from what would have been pursued by an impostor, who had a new system to introduce upon one established, but shaken by the immorality of its teachers; who would have improved so favourable a circumstance to his own advantage. Our Lord, on the contrary, reproves the popular prejudice, and, endeavouring to reconcile the people to their teachers, his inveterate enemies—instructs them to distinguish between the public and private character of the teacher: showing them that though men who 'say, and do not,' should not be followed for examples, yet that as ministers of religion, who are invested with authority to teach the Law, they are to be attended to as instructors, when officially enforcing the ordinances of God.

4. δεσμεύουσι γὰρ] Lachm. and Tisch. read δ. δὲ, from several MSS. (four of them very ancient) and some Versions and Fathers. But I agree with Fritz. that it was a vain alteration, proceeding from those who were dissatisfied with the repetition of γὰρ so soon, and who introduced δὲ instead, from their not perceiving the close connexion of thought with the preceding, which may be thus traced: 'Do not imitate them, (1) because they say one thing, and do another; in other words, do not perform themselves what they enjoin on others; (2) because the heavy burdens they bind on others they themselves shrink from.' I have pointed accordingly. By these φορτία we are to understand the heavy burdens of the Law (comp. v. 23), which they strictly enjoined on others, but did not themselves undertake to observe. Comp. Rom. ii. 21—23.

—τῷ δὲ δακτύλῳ—κινήσαι] i. e. so far from taking upon their own shoulders the burdens which they lay on those of others, they will not even stir them with their own finger-ends,—a proverbial expression alike simple and forcible, of which the literal sense is, 'will not stir them with the finger of theirs,' i. e. with the fore-finger, as in moving a light package. The forced contrast, unauthorized emphasis, and the pressing on the sense of certain terms, here adopted by several later Commentators, as Maldon. and Bp. Jebb, are fanciful and injudicious. The only real contrast existing in the words is, as in the verse preceding, between saying to others, and not themselves doing; the being severe in enforcing duties on others, and mild in requiring them of themselves. Whether αὐτῶν be here read, or αὐτῶν (for which there exists strong authority), the whole turn of expression conveys a strong reprobation of their own non-observance, as though they had not even made a beginning at practising what they so magisterially enjoin on others. I entirely agree with Calvin in thinking, that our Lord does not here accuse the Pharisees of tyrannically oppressing the souls of priest-ridden devotees by unjust laws; nor, although, as we find from other passages, they had introduced many vain rites and ceremonies, does our Lord touch on that offence here, because he is on this occasion only comparing right doctrine with life and conversation unsuitable to high profession. Consequently, the burdens here spoken of cannot be human traditions or observances, but the severe requisitions of the Law (called 'a heavy burden,' in reference to human infirmity as to the bearing of it), which they rigidly exacted from others, but did not themselves observe even in the mildest form. In short, what is here said is merely a carrying out of what was said on the verse preceding (see Rom. ii. 21—23). In the use of the expression here δυσβ. φορτία, with which comp. Diog. Laert. vii. 5, 4, αὐτὸς μόνος δύναται βαστάσαι Ζήνωνος φορτίον, there is reference to the rigour of rituality to be expected from men who, as we find from v. 23, observed the letter, to the neglect of the spirit, of the Law. Though even of itself it was, as Peter says, Acts xv. 10, 'a yoke which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear.' However, the words καὶ δυσβ. are absent from 1 uncial and 2 cursive MSS., with the Syr. and Ital. Versions, also Iren. and Ambr., and are cancelled by Tisch.; but wrongly. They were, I suspect, merely omitted by the negligence of scribes in those 3 MSS., and I find them in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies. Their absence from those Versions probably arose from their seeming to be superfluous. Hence in Luke xi. 46, the term βαρία is dropped, as also in 1 or 2 MSS. here. In a case like this, respecting the omission of words, neither Versions nor Fathers have much weight. We can hardly suppose the words introduced from Luke, because there would be no reason for such being done. It is true that the words βαρία καὶ are introduced in the passage of Luke; but it is only in a few MSS., and no Vers. or Father. Most improbable is it that they should here have been introduced into all the MSS. except three. Their antiquity is strongly attested by their presence in the Ital. Vers. in one copy, the Sahid., and the Vulg. Version, in, I believe, all its copies, certainly in the Lamb. one, of the seventh century. Lachm., I find, with a prudence unusual to him, retains it.

5. Calv. well draws the connexion, by showing that what is here said is a carrying out of what was just before said as to the doctrine and the life not corresponding, q. d. 'Whatsoever they do perform which has a semblance of good, it has but one end and aim,—to ingratiate themselves with men.' Accordingly, our Lord does not here speak to the disparagement of the rites of the Law. He does not even censure the wearing of the phylacteries, or the fringes, but the doing it ostentatiously, by making them very large. These phylacteries, or prayer-fillets (strips of parchment inscribed with texts from the Old Test. which the Jews bound around the forehead and left wrist or arm, while at prayers, see Josephus, Ant. iv. 8, 13), took their rise from a literal instead of a spiritual interpretation of Deut. vi. 8. Num. xv. 38. That these were, as the Commentators inform us, also regarded as amulets, or charms to preserve from evil, may be very true; but when they, including Mr. Alford, would hence deduce the name itself, we may hesitate; for that may better imply that they were thereby reminded to keep the Law; the word literally signifying preservatives. So Plutarch gives this name to the Roman bulla around the necks of youths, and accounts for their use on the same principle. Moreover, as the κράσπεδα just after mentioned are, in Numb. xv. 38, enjoined to be worn for a memorial, who can doubt that the φυλακτ. were considered in the same light? The cancelling by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., of τῶν ἱματίων, on the authority of only four MSS. (to which I can only add Mus. 17,470), with the Vulg., Ital., and Sahid. Vers., argues great want of judgment. The words were more likely to be omitted by accident in so few MSS., than to have been introduced into all the rest from Matt. ix. 20. xiv. 36. xxiii. 5. Mark vi. 56. Luke viii. 41. Besides, if thought necessary there, why not here?

6. φιλοῦσι τε τὴν πρωτ. Lachm. and Tisch. read φιλ. διὰ τ. πρωτ., from B, D, K, L, Δ, and 11 cursive MSS. (I add 3 Lamb. and 5 Mus. copies, all of ancient text), which may be the true reading, for this use of the τε as a conjunction no where occurs in the Evangelists. But it may be an alteration introduced for the purpose of bringing in the usual particle διὰ, as in the case of three or four others occurring in the MSS., as καὶ φιλ.—φιλ. γὰρ, which must discountenance this. Why should we not suppose that the τε conjunctive is once used in the Gospels? The overwhelming preponderance of external authority (in a case where MSS. are peculiarly strong), confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Vers., proves that the word is not, as Mr. Alf. pronounces, corrupt.

By πρωτοκ. is meant the chief place at table during meals, i. e. with the Jews the middle place on each couch of the triclinium; and by πρωτοκαθεδρίας a little after, the chief seats, namely, those appropriated to the seniors and the Rabbis, or literati, who sat immediately under the desk of the reader, and consequently facing the congregation.

8—10. In these three verses there is essentially the same sentiment, but with some variation of terms,—resorted to in order to favour the repetition; which is meant to give energy to an earnest warning against the assumption, on the one hand, or the admission, on the other, of such a sort of absolute domination as that assumed by the Scribes over men, without authority from God. It is only meant, therefore, to warn them against that unlimited veneration for the decisions of men, or implicit reliance on any human teacher, which was so common among the Jewish devotees. Such being the purport, this passage cannot be supposed to forbid Christian teachers bearing such accustomed appellations as appertain to superiority of office, of station, or of talent; but only supplies an admonition not to use them as the Scribes did, for the purposes of pride and ostentation, and to exercise a spiritual tyranny over the faith and consciences of their Christian brethren, or pretend to such infallibility and supreme authority as is due to Christ alone. See more in a masterly Sermon of Bp. Warburton, vol. ix. pp. 190—206.

The three terms here employed, ῥαββί, πατήρ, and καθηγ. were appellations ordinarily assumed by, and given, to their principal Teachers; and not only all three were sometimes employed, but each twice; which is alluded to in the preceding verse.

8. μὴ κληθῶ.] i. e. 'do not affect to be called,' seek to bear the title. As respects the next word, for καθηγητής, Fritzsch, Tisch., and Alf. read διδάσκαλοι (from MS. B and many cursives, to which I add Lamb. 1178, and 3 Scriv. MSS., but no Mus. copies collated by myself): while Matth., Giesb., and Lachm. retain καθηγ., which I still continue to do, for internal evidence is quite against διδάσκαλος, inasmuch as, if we suppose it to have been the original one, how are we to account for καθηγ. having found its way into all the copies except a comparatively few? Whereas, supposing καθηγ. to have been the original reading, we may easily account for the introduction of διδάσκ. from a marginal gloss. This, indeed, is placed beyond doubt by Zonar. Lex. in v., where καθηγητής is explained by διδάσκαλος. The term occurs, I believe, only in Plutarch, p. 667, B. 327. E. Sext. Empir. adv. Phys. i. 360. Numen. ap. Athen. p. 313 D., all of them writers later than the time of St. Matthew. Hence its explanation, and διδ. would form its appropriate gloss. How the word καθ. came to be used in the present passage, it is difficult to say, for it never occurs in the Sept., nor in the Apocryphal writings, and consequently it was not Alexandrian Greek. It seems to have been a term of the Provincial Greek of Syria and Asia Minor, such as Plutarch elsewhere occasionally employs. At any rate, there is here no case for change. The words just after, ὁ Χριστός, have internal evidence rather against than for them. They are not superfluous, as Jackson says, but they may be dispensed with; and whether they were originally there, or introduced from v. 10, is doubtful. But, considering that the authority for their exclusion is but slender, and that almost all the MSS. supplying that evidence are of one class, I do not feel warranted in doing more than bracketing them.

9. καὶ πατέρα—[ἐν τῇ γῇ] Supp. τινὰ so that ὑμ. may belong to πατέρα. Render: 'Style no one on earth your Father (i. e. spiritual Father); for One [only] is your Father, even he [who] is in heaven.' The οὐράνιος, instead of ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, adopted by Tisch. (not Lachm.), from B, L, and four ancient cursives, is evidently a critical alteration, and that suggested by Matt. vi. 14. 26. 32. xv. 13. xviii. 35. The very same tampering took place, and has been received by the same Editors, supra v. 48, though there on much stronger authority; in which case the critical sagacity of Fritzsch preserved him from this lapse; while Griesb. there places on a footing of equality, what he here omits even to notice—though added in the next Ed. by Schulz. In both passages the Pesch. Syr. Vers. establishes beyond doubt the high antiquity, at least, of the text. rec. The other reading may have sprung from the licence of translators, as well as from the cacothēs emendandi of Critics. Here, however, all the Versions (including the Sahid.) except the ignoble Æthiopic, defend the text. rec. The reading ἡμῶν ὁ πατήρ, edited by Lachm. (not Tisch.), from B and 5 cursives (to which I add Lamb. 1192, 1193, of the 8th century), and Scriv. x, is a very ancient reading; but, I suspect, fabricated for the sake of matching the position of the pronoun at the verse preceding.

¹⁰ καθηγηταί] In the use of this term there seems a peculiar force, denoting a spiritual guide. One may best see why the term was here used by turning to Rom. ii. 19—21, where the Apostle touches on the very same class of persons who are here had in view by our Lord, as ὁδῆγ. τυφλῶν, παιδευτ. ἀφρόνων, διδάσκ. νηπίων, thus presenting specimens of the high-flown appellations which the Rabbis affected, and of which ὁδῆγος is placed first as being the highest title. Instead of the former καθῆγ. here, one would have expected a Hebrew term to correspond to ראבב, at v. 8. But there is none at v. 9 to correspond to πατέρα. And yet that in the former verse our Lord used the term נאמן can scarcely be doubted; and that he used some Syro-Chald. term correspondent to καθηγητής is very probable. It might be the ܡܪܝܡ, said, by Dr. Bland, to be used by the Babylonian Jews, just as ܡܪܝܡ by those of Judæa; but I cannot find any authority for this, or for the existence of the word. The best clue to the term is the Syriac term used in the Pesch. Syr. Vers., namely, ܡܪܝܡܐ, a subst. formed from the Partic. past Aphel, and used to express ὁδῆγος at Acts i. 16. Rom. ii. 19, διδάσκαλος at 1 Cor. xii. 28, and ἡγούμενος at Heb. xiii. 7. 14. 24. Whatever the term was, it was prob. a stronger one than ܡܪܝܡ, just as καθῆγ. is a stronger term than διδάσκ. for I agree with Wyttenb. on Steph. Thea. Ed. Par. in v., that καθῆγ. was a more honourable appellation than διδάσκ. He establishes this on Plut. Moral. p. 70, B, and 327, B (where Aristotle is called the καθηγητής of Alexander the Great), and 71, C, where I wonder that the Editor of Plutarch should have missed a more decisive proof in his own author, Præc. Conjuc. T. vi. 548, Reisk., ἄνθρωπος, ἀπὸρ σύ μοι ἰσὶ καθηγητής καὶ φιλόσοφος καὶ διδάσκαλος τῶν καλλίστων καὶ θεοσιγῶν.

In the next words there is no little variation of reading, though only as to position of words. B, D, C, L, and one other MS. have ὅτι καθ. ἡμ. ἐστὶν εἰς, which is adopted by Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch. The other variations are six or seven. Accordingly, this is no case to warrant change. Mr. Alford, indeed, asks, 'what authority there is for the text?' But the answer is ready, namely, all the MSS. except about fourteen, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Sahid. Versions: besides, the reading has internal evidence of genuineness, which, added to the overwhelming external authority, makes its genuineness indubitable. Accordingly, I cannot affix any mark of doubt to it.

¹¹ ἔσται.] By Hebr. for ἔστω, which, indeed, has place in several ancient MSS., but is a manifest gloss. ἔσται ἡμῶν διάκονος, Euthym. explains as standing for ταπεινούσθω. Our Lord then points out the reward of this humility, and expresses it in a form of speaking employed by him on two other occasions, namely, Luke xiv. 11. xviii. 14, and which appears to have been a proverbial one as respects matters of this world (thus something like it is frequent in the Jewish Rabbinical writers, and not rare in the Classical): but it is here applied to the great concern of salvation. It was so used repeatedly by our Lord, as inculcating one of the leading doctrines of the Gospel, and because it was, from the infirmity of human nature, necessary to be freq. inculcated: and, considering what had recently occurred in the case of some of the principal Apostles, it was highly seasonable. Hence it is, that, in expressing the blessing that attends on humility, our Lord prefixes the converse by way of warning.

¹³ 14. These verses are transposed in the common text and most of the MSS.; but are placed in the present order in the best MSS. (including nearly all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), with the further support of several Versions, Fathers, and early Editions;—which order has been approved, with reason (considering that the series of denunciations commences better with v. 14), by all the most eminent Commentators, and has been restored by Wets., Matth., Griesb., Fritz., and Scholz. Ver. 13 is not found in some dozen MSS. of the Alexandrian recension (not, however, including any of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), with some Versions and Latin Fathers, and is cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. But there is no sufficient reason for rejecting it. It should seem that the text above adopted presents the true order, which may probably have been accidentally changed, by the eyes of the transcribers being carried from the first οὐαὶ δὲ—ὑποκριταί! to the second, whereby the words ὅτι κατασθίετε—κριμα were omitted,—and afterwards inserted, either by the scribes (on perceiving their mistake), or by the revisers, but in the wrong place. To turn from words to things; the portion thus introduced presents a most impressive apostrophe (in force and energy unsurpassed by any elsewhere to be found), in which

ευχόμενοι διὰ τοῦτο λήψεσθε περισσότερον κρίμα. ¹⁴ Οὐαὶ ^{Luke 11. 52.}

βασιλείαν τῶν οὐρανῶν ἔμπροσθεν τῶν ἀνθρώπων. ὑμεῖς γὰρ οὐκ εἰσέρχεσθε, οὐδὲ τοὺς εἰσερχομένους ἀφίετε εἰσελθεῖν.

our Lord addresses the Pharisees as if present (though, as appears from v. 1, they had now withdrawn), against whom he, as it were wearied out with their attempts against him, whether to take him by force or by guile, sums up all that he had already said, or had yet to say, of that generation of vipers; denouncing on them an accumulation of woes for their complicated vices (their hypocrisy, pride, extortion, rapacity, and persevering persecution of all the prophets sent to them), and concludes with a solemn prediction (awfully fulfilled within that very generation) of the destruction of their Temple, and the withdrawing of his presence until their final conversion.

13. κατεσθίετε] Of this figurative use of the word examples occur frequently in the Greek Classical writers, as also in the instances of the corresponding term in Latin. By oikias understand goods, property (equiv. to ὕπαρχοντα, as Hebr. חַיִּים in Gen. xix. 4), which sense oikos often bears in the Classical writers. Both the above metaphors are found in Hom. Od. β. 237, κατίδουσι βίαιος Οἶκον Ὀδυσσεύς. This eating up was effected by various subtle artifices, well opened out by Lightf. By pretensions to extraordinary integrity and piety, they induced persons to commit to them the disposal of their property, as executors and guardians; or "creeping into widows' houses, devised various means of enriching themselves, either by laying under contribution widows, whom they had made devotees (so Jos. Ant. xvii. 2. 6, it is said ἡγήκτο ἢ γυναῖκων), or by manœuvring with the children to deprive the widow of part of her dowry, for some return either in hand, or in expectation." See Lightf.

— προφάσει] 'by a pretext [of religion],' but in reality as a mask to conceal avarice. Comp. Phil. i. 18, εἶτε προφ. εἶτε ἀληθεία. This absolute construction of προφάσει (in which the purest Class. writers use πρόφασις) is so rare, that, besides the parallel passage of Luke, I know of no other example, except in Thucyd. vii. 13, ἐν αὐτομολίᾳ προφάσει, ἀπέρχονται,—where, from ignorance of the idiom, Arnold and Poppo have construed προφάσει with αὐτομ.; and others, to avoid the absurdity of sense resulting, propose various conjectures baseless and uncalled-for (see my note there). To prevent misconception, I have there pointed off the word, and should have done so here, but that I have great doubts as to the genuineness of the καὶ before προφ., which involves what Mr. Alf. calls a harsh construction; though, in reality, it is no construction at all. The word is absent from MS. D and almost all the ancient Versions. Mr. Alf. seems inclined to think the words καὶ προφάσει μακρὰ προσευχόμενοι inserted without alteration from the passage of Mark. But for that there is only the authority of one cursive MS. Hence I should rather suspect that it is the καὶ only that is not genuine; and I doubt not that it was inserted from the parallel passages of Mark and Luke, where it is in place, though the corrupt MS. D rejects it there, but retains it here!

By περισσότερον κρίμα is meant 'an extraordinary, peculiarly severe judgment.'

14. κλείετε—ἐμπρ. τ. ἀνθρ.] A less pure Greek, though a stronger expression than the Class. ἀποκλείετε τοὺς ἀνθρ. would have been, the sense being, 'ye shut the door in the face of the persons entering.' In the corresponding words of the passage of Luke, a different, but not less forcible, metaphor is used, there being in ἔραται τὴν κλεῖδα τῆς γνώσεως an allusion to the action of locking a door against persons, and effectually preventing their entering a place by taking away the key, so that no others shall give them entrance. The sense (casting off the figure) of the conjoint metaphor is, that, by taking away the means of attaining to the true knowledge of the Scriptures (locking them from the people) by their false interpretation, they have cut off all access to the kingdom of heaven, by hiding the knowledge of Christ in God. Such is the sense assigned by the most judicious Expositors; though there are not a few false interpretations from others, among which may be reckoned that of certain ancient Fathers, who take 'the key of knowledge' to mean Christian faith; as if that were ever in their keeping and charge, which surely was not the case. Mr. Alf. pronounces that it does not mean the key of knowledge (the admitting to know), but knowledge itself, the simple interpretation of Scripture,—thus rendering the important term key nugatory, and making the sense too feeble to match with the strong metaphor conjoined with it. But why should there not be a Genitive of reference (signifying 'as to') or purpose, q. d. 'the key for obtaining and imparting knowledge,' as in the case of βάπτισμα μετανοίας in Mark i. 4. Of course, the key itself is the Scripture properly interpreted, especially as it pointed at the Messiah, and not made of none effect by their traditions. Yet, instead of using this key for themselves and the people, they did all they could to take it away, make it as if non-existent, as to the people; which amounts to what is expressed in this passage of Matthew. This use of the Genit. is not unknown in our own language. Thus Mr. Locke observes most truly, "Those who are accustomed to reason have got the true key of books;" of course meaning the key for obtaining the knowledge contained in books: Reason there corresponding to Revelation in the passage of the Evangelist. Nor is this use quite unprecedented in the Classical writers, e. gr. Pindar, Pyth. viii. 1, 3, φιλόφρον' Ἀσυχία—βουλὰν τε καὶ πολέμῳν ἔγχεα κλεῖδας, i. e. 'having the keys for opening out counsels and war,' developing the things both of peace and war.

15. περιάγετε—ξηρὰν] A proverbial and hyperbolic mode of expression, denoting the greatest activity to bring about any object. The zeal of the Jews for proselyting is attested by various parts of the Class. writers (see Hor. Sat. i. 4),—insomuch that it required to be at length forbidden by legislation. The ἓνα, which is emphatic, signifying 'even one,' confirms what we find from various passages of Jos. and Philo, that such a proselyte as is here characterized (meaning a proselyte not 'of the gate,' but 'of righteousness')—so called—who undertook the performance of the whole Jewish Law with all its observances) was a rare acquisition.

—υἱὸν γέεννης] Meaning, by Hebraism, one who by his character belongs to Gehenna as his part or portion, i. e. is reserved for hell (see v. 33). A use of υἱός like that of the Hebr. בן, by which persons are called the sons of that which marks their condition. So 1 Sam. xx. 31. 2 Sam. xii. 5, υἱὸς θανάτου, תינו בן 'devoted to death.' In διπλότερον ὑμῶν we have a very unusual idiom, by which (besides the extreme rarity of διπλ. in the Comparat.) the Genit. stands for ἢ and a Nomin., as in Appian, Praef. § 10, σκευή διπλότερα τούτων, and Just. Mart. C. Tryph. p. 21. 5, διπλότερον ὑμῶν βλασφημοῦσιν εἰς τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ.

17. μωροὶ καί] The words are not found in five MSS. and the Vulg. Vers., and are cancelled by L. and Tisch.,—most unjustifiably, since to overwhelming external authority for them, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Vers., is added the strongest internal evidence, considering that no reason can be imagined why they should have been introduced, but a ready one why they should have been excluded, namely, to prevent what might be thought a needless repetition of a very harsh term. As to the use of the term itself, its force need not be pressed on, any more than that of the ἄφρων, in 1 Cor. xv. 36, since it might only be meant to signify misjudging, as in Matt. vii. 26, and oft. in Class. writers, where it is hardly ever used as a term of severe reproach. The nearest approach to it is in Eurip. Med. 61, ὦ μῶρος, Aristoph. Nub. 398, ὦ μωρὸν σὺ καὶ βακκισίλην, very similar in the turn of the expression to this of the Evangelist, where, however, must be meant something not intellectually weak, but morally wrong, as in Ælian de Provid. p. 1052, of the Var. Hist., Σὺ δὲ λίγεις αὐτοὺς (scil. Θεοὺς) μὴ ἡμῖν προσέχειν, ὦ μῶρε. As respects the accumulation involved in τυφλοὶ added to μωροὶ, that tends to make the expression the more pointed, as in Soph. Oed. T. 371, τυφλὸς γὰρ εἰ, τὸν τε νοῦν τὰ τε ὄμματα. But in the present case the moral blindness was self-induced, and the reproach had been more severe, as being well merited; and when we consider from whose lips it proceeded, even those of unerring Wisdom, fully competent to discern wickedness, and supreme authority empowered to reprove it, we shall see that such language by no means runs counter to the injunction laid down by our Lord, Matt. v. 22.

21. If κατοίκησ. be, as it undoubtedly is, on the strongest evidence, including almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, the true reading (the ordinary one being, we may suppose, either a gloss thereon, or an alteration for the purpose of better matching the participle καθημένων in the next verse), it will not follow that the common rendering and that of all the English Versions, 'Him who dwelleth,' is to be disapproved. Bp. Jebb, indeed, renders, 'hath dwelt;' which would seem confirmed by the circumstance, that God had not dwelt in the Temple since the time of the captivity. But it may be doubted whether that was admitted (as the gist of the argument would require it to be) by the Rabbis, who perhaps maintained a figurative and spiritual inhabitancy, by his gracious present aid and protection, espec. as the Temple was Jehovah's house. But the question of time may be waved by taking this as an Aorist of custom (with Fritz.); or rather, as put for the Present. So ἔγνωσαν in John vii. 26; ἡ βασιλεύσατε, 1 Cor. iv. 8, &c. Accordingly, the full sense will be, 'hath dwelt and doth dwell,' equiv. to 'dwelleth.' Thus it will match with καθημένων in the next clause. Comp. Ps. ix. 11, ψάλατε τῷ Κυρίῳ τῷ κατοικοῦντι ἐν Σιών, where a few copies read κατοικήσαντι, and others καθημένῳ.

23. ἀποδεκατοῦτε—κύμινον] I would render, 'ye tithe off (i. e. pay tithes of) the mint, and the aniseed, and the cummin'; for I agree with Mr. Green, Gram. N. T. p. 214, that the force of the words would be impaired by the loss of the pointed enumeration and prominence of the petty articles in question, produced by the repeated article. As respects the thing itself, it is well known from the Rabbinical writers that the Pharisees were scrupulously exact in paying tithes, even of such insignificant herbs as those here specified, as ἡδύοσμον, the garden mint, ἄνηθον, dill (on which see Dioscor. iii. 461), and κύμινον, cummin, a disagreeably pungent herb, and so little esteemed, that it was proverbially employed to express 'worthlessness.' That the above are only meant as examples of insignificant herbs, is plain from Luke having 'mint and rue,' with the addition of καὶ πικρὸν λυχνόν. Our Lord, it must be observed, does not censure them for paying tithes of these herbs; but, after performing these minute observances, for omitting the weightier matters of the Law. This remark applies to all the subjects of the woes in this chapter, as is plain from the words ταῦτα ἔδει ποιῆσαι, κάκεινα μὴ ἀφίεναι.

To revert to a philological point, it may be further observed, that the Article is used with the three Nouns following, κρίσιν, ἔλεον, and πίστιν, by way of carrying on the force already conveyed by the Nouns which preceded,—and imparting additional energy, by treating these three Nouns as strictly used in their most abstract sense. Otherwise ἔλεον would not have had the Article, for I know of no other example of this use of ἔλεον either in the N. T., the Sept., or the Class. writers. Nay, in James ii. 13, ἔλεον and κρίσιν are used in the same way as here, yet are both without the Article. The enumeration of these several particulars, forming the weightier matters of the Law, may bring to mind the words of the Prophet Micah (vi. 8), "And what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justice (κρίμα), to love mercy (ἔλεον), and to walk humbly (i. e. obediently) with thy God [viz. by a faithful performance of all his injunctions]?" Parallel to which is an admirable passage of Pind. Olymp. xiii. 6, 11, ἐν τῷ γὰρ Εὐνομία ναιεῖ, κασίγνη· | ταῖ τε, βάθρον πολίων, Ἀσφαλὴς Δίκαι, καὶ ὁμό· | τροπὸς Εἰρήνας, ταμίαι· Ἀνδράσι πλοῦτον, χρύσειαι Παιδεὶς εὐβούλον Θέμιστος.

— For τὸν ἔλεον, Lachm. and Tisch. read τὸ ἔλεον, from B, D, L, and 4 cursive MSS., with Cyr., Epiph., and Chrys. And internal evidence would seem to be in its favour, considering that the Neuter form was likely to be altered by the Scribes into the pure Greek and more usual masc. form. The neuter form occurs perpetually in the Sept.; and it is always used by St. Peter and St. Jude, and perhaps always by St. Paul. As respects St. Matthew, he only uses the word thrice, and, as in ix. 23. xii. 7, he is quoting from the Sept., and hence would be likely to use the neuter, which is far more frequent in the MSS. than the Masc. But that is not certain, since the Masc. does occasionally occur in the Sept., even in the most ancient MSS. Hence, since there is here no quotation, we cannot say whether St. Matthew would use the Neut., or whether the Masc. form,—more probably the former; though, as external authority is here so slender, I have not ventured to receive it. The question, however, is, what is the nature of the form? It may seem to be Hebrew-Greek, or what is called Alexandrian; yet it does not, I believe, occur in Joseph. nor in Philo. I suspect, however, that it was not so much Hebraistic and Alexandrian Greek as Provincial, or the Greek of common life. And this is confirmed by the testimony of Dindorf on Steph. Thea. ed. Par. in v., who says he has in his note on Diod. Sic. l. iii. 18, proved that it has often been introduced by the scribes into ancient and pure Greek writers [in place of the Masc. form]. Now were the Evangelist a pure Greek writer, this would go far to exclude the reading of L. and T.

After ταῦτα five uncial, and fifteen cursive MSS. (also a few of the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies), insert δὲ, which is adopted by Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch. I still continue, with Scholz, to exclude it, since internal evidence is against it. It was more likely to be put in by those who, from not perceiving the force of the Asyndeton (so suitable to such a context as this), and fancying that some particle of connexion and otherwise (namely, to point the reproof) was wanted. But so weighty a sentiment needed no point, and the dignity of the Speaker was better consulted by dispensing with it.

24. διωλίζοντες τὸν κώνωπα] 'straining out.' There is here an allusion to the custom of the Jews (and also of the Greeks and Romans) of passing their wines (which in the southern countries might easily receive gnats, and, indeed, breed insects) through a strainer. See Amos vi. 6. The Jews did it from religious scruples (see Lev. xi. 20, seqq.)—the κώνωψ, or culex vinarius, being unclean—the Gentiles, from cleanliness. On the ratio signif. in διωλ. see my Lex. To make the antithesis as strong as may be, two things are selected as opposite as possible, the smallest insect and the largest animal. Whether there be any allusion, as Mr. Alf. supposes, to the uncleanness of the camel, may be greatly doubted. That there is a direct reference to the comparative size of the two creatures, is evident from the context and the course of argument. But though both creatures were considered unclean, to bring in the allusion together with the reference, would occasion the figure to become overcharged. Moreover, as what is said is admitted to be formed on a proverbial form of expression, common to both Jews and Greeks, where size is alone considered, we cannot suppose it to be otherwise here. This use of καταπίνω, as employed of food, is not unusual in the best Class. writers, though only in the sense by which we say to bolt down. See more in my Lex. in v. A striking instance of what our Lord ascribes to the Pharisees, occurs in John xviii. 28.

25. If we adopt here the reading of the text. rec., ἀκρασίας, retained by L. and T., for which, however, the far greater part of the MSS. (including almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies) have ἀδικίας, which I have received, with Griesh., Fritz., and Scholz, we may best, by a consideration of the context (vv. 27 and 28) explain it to mean, what Wickliff assigns as the sense, uncleanliness, i. e. lewdness. And so in some MSS. and Versions we have ἀκαθαρσίας, from a gloss, though one pointing at what has been thought the true interpretation. And, indeed, of the word so used examples are found in Xen. Cyr. viii. 32, and Symp. viii. 27. But, though the Pharisees are often accused of injustice, yet it is observable that they are no where accused of intemperance, or even luxury: neither, as we learn from Jos. Ant. xviii. 1. 3, did they indulge even in the latter. After all, however, it may well be thought an open question, as to which of those two readings be the genuine one. And when we consider that besides ἀκρασίας there are no less than three other readings, ἀκαθαρσίας, πονηρίας, and πλεονεξίας, which have place in some copies more or less ancient, there is room for suspicion that these have, together with ἀκρασίας, arisen from a desire on the part of the revisers to introduce some term more definite than ἀδικίας. Accordingly, I have thought fit still to retain ἀδικίας, which may be understood to denote, by a Hebraism, iniquity, or wickedness generally, as in Luke xiii. 27, οἱ ἐργάται τῆς ἀδικίας. 2 Theas. ii. 12. Heb. viii. 23. James iii. 6, ὁ κόσμος τῆς ἀδικίας. Heb. viii. 12. 2 Pet. ii. 13. And this is confirmed by the πονηρίας of Luke.

In ἔσωθεν δὲ γέμουσι we have a blending of the comparison with the thing compared, as in Rom. xix. 33, and 1 Pet. ii. 6, the sense, withdrawing the figure, being, that their living is gained by rapine and injustice. In the former clause there is an allusion to the washing of corpse, mentioned in Mark vii. 4, in which, as well as in all such washings and oblations as were enjoined in their traditions, the Pharisees evinced a most zealous observance. The application at v. 27 is obvious.

27. παρομοιάζετε τάφοις κεκονιαμένοις] To discern properly the force of the comparison, we must mark the scope of the allusion, which is to the Jewish custom of annually whitewashing the tombs of relatives, both by way of beautifying them, and in order that their situation might be known to the fullest extent above ground, and thus the uncleanness incurred by touching the dead, or even any part of their graves or tombs (see Numb. xix. 16), might be avoided. When recently whitewashed, the sepulchres appeared beautiful outside, but within were noisome, as containing nought but bones and corruption of every kind, as the next words represent, where ἀκαθαρσία is used as in the Schol. on Soph. Phil., who explains the words ράκη βαρίας νοηλίας πλῆα by παπληρωμένα—τῆς ἐκ νόσου ἀκαθαρσίας, i. e. pus and bloody matter, which was thought to communicate a defilement to any place. See 2 Kings xxiii. 14, comp. with Joseph. Ant. xvii. 2. The scope of the comparison is pointed by its application at v. 28, so that, upon the whole, what has been said is meant as a comment on, and justification of, the severe term just before employed, ὑποκριται. In using the expression τοῖς κεκονιαμένοις, as said of a Pharisee in the highest place, St. Paul, though using what was perhaps a proverbial expression to denote a hypocrite, had probably in mind this saying of our Lord.

Finally, there is no real discrepancy in the parallel passage of St. Luke; but only such a dissimilarity as arises from difference of purpose. The Pharisees there are represented as being like τὰ μνημεῖα τὰ ἀδηλα, in reference to the moral contagion they spread around them, inasmuch that persons were unsuspectingly polluted by their wickedness, what is in the present passage expressed by ἀνομία. In the expression τ. μνημ. τ. ἀδηλ. there is an allusion to those tombs, which, for want of whitewashing, had become undistinguishable as tombs, in opposition to those which Maimonides, touching on the above custom, calls manifest, δηλα.

29. οἰκοδομεῖτε—κοσμεῖτε] Both the Jews and the Heathens alike showed their respect for the illustrious dead, by repairing and beautifying, and, when necessary, rebuilding their tombs, and also by decorating them with garlands, or other ornaments; which is called in the Classical writers σταφανῶσαι τὸν τάφον. See the proofs and illustrations in my Rec. Syn. This our Lord did not mean to censure, but to expose the hypocrisy of the Pharisees in pretending a respect for the Prophets which did they not, could not feel; inasmuch as, while pretending that they would not have joined with their forefathers in putting them to death, yet they were all the time in reality bent on perpetrating the same enormities on Him of whom the Prophets spake. See Heb. i. 1.

30. ἡμεθα] This reading (for the common one ἡμεῖς) is found in most of the best MSS. (including the Lamb. and Mus. copies), in some Fathers, and in the Ed. Princ.; and was, with reason, edited by Matthæi, Griesbach, and others down to Tisch.

31. Ὡστε μαρτυρεῖτε ἑ., &c.] Meaning, 'ye have the same bloodthirsty disposition as, and thus show approbation of, your forefathers' crimes, by pursuing the same course'; as it is said in the parallel passage of Luke xi. 48, ἀρα μαρτυρεῖτε καὶ συνιδούετε τοῖς ἔργοις τῶν πατέρων ὑμῶν, where the ὅτι must not be rendered although (as some translate), but has the sense quatenus.

Thus we see the inferential force of ὥστε, which is as follows: So then [by this conduct, so similar to that of your fathers], ye bear testimony respecting yourselves, that ye are true sons of your fathers, who murdered the prophets, as it is said Matt. xxiii. 37, Ἱερουσαλὴμ, ἡ ἀποκτείνουσα τοὺς προφῆτας. On the force of the expression ὅτι υἱοὶ ἴστα, &c., see notes on Matt. v. 45, and John viii. 44. So the Jews, Joseph. Ant. xvii. 11, 2, complaining of the conduct of Archelaus, son of Herod I., say, οὐχ Ἡρώδου γνήσιοι πιστεύουσιν υἱοί.

32. πληρώσατε τὸ μέτρον τῶν πατέρων ὑμῶν] This is justly regarded as an example of ironical permission (not unfrequent in Scripture, and occasionally found in the Class. writers), by which the persons apostrophized are bid to go on in the course they have determined to pursue, thus leaving them to experience the consequences of their own wilfulness. So Virg. Æn. iv. 381, 'I, sequeere Italian ventis secundia.' Comp. infra xxvi. 45. John xiii. 27, ὁ ποιῇ, ποιήσων τάχιστα, and especially Eccles. xi. 9, "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart," &c. It is not a simply permissive sense that is ascribed to the words, but ironically permissive, nearly equiv. to prohibition (such as Servius recognizes in the passage of Virg.), whereby the persons are left, and even bid, to do such or such a thing at their peril; the warning, however, being implied, though in the passage of Eccles. expressed. Thus in the passages of Eccles. the words are followed up with this warning sentence, 'but know, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.' Now, certainly, there we have prediction, only, however, denunciative, which is not the case here. On this measure unfulfilled, see Grot. and Wets., who show that the language here, as in Gen. xv. 16. Eccles. xi. 9. Wisd. xix. 9. 2 Macc. vi. 4. 1 Thess. ii. 16, seems to imply that there is a certain height to which the iniquity of nations and individuals is permitted by God to rise; and that when that measure is full, the punishment is inflicted: also that, though the vengeance of the Almighty be slow, it is always sure,—compensating for long-delayed vengeance by the severity of the stroke. See Plutarch de serâ Numinis vindictâ; and comp. Jos. Ant. xvii. 9. 5, who, after mentioning a great enormity of Archelaus in the massacre of 3000 persons in the Temple, says it was done ὅπως δυνήσθην πληρῶσαι τῆς φύσεως τυραννίδος—τὴν ἀδικίαν.

33. ὄφειτε—ἐχιδνῶν] See iii. 7; and on τῇ γενέτει, see note on ver. 15. Φύγητε for φεύγεσθε; the later writers imitating the Poetic idiom of using the Subjunct. for the Fut., generally thought a solecism, though defended by Fritz. in loc.

34. διὰ τοῦτο] 'on which account,' namely, because your state is what I have set forth, since ye are bent upon filling up the measure of the iniquities of your fathers, and will go on, as heretofore, spurning his messengers; ye shall not want messengers, nor have any excuse for your sin in rejecting them. In ἀποστόλλω we have the use of present for future prophetic, as Matt. iii. 10. xxvi. 2, and often. Worthy of notice is the evident assumption here by our Lord of Divine authority, as contained in the intimation that the prophets, &c., who should be sent to the unbelieving Jews would be sent by him; whereas, in the parallel passage of Luke xi. 49, our Lord's words are: Διὰ τοῦτο ἡ σοφία τοῦ Θεοῦ εἶπεν· Ἀποστείλω εἰς αὐτοὺς, &c., i. e. 'God in his wisdom said and now saith by me,' viz. as Head of his Church, and especially of those legates, the under-messengers of the covenant (Malachi iii. 1), to whom are then applied those titles that were bestowed by the Jews on their prophets and doctors of the law, in order to intimate the authority from on high, with which his messengers, ἀπόστολοι (so called at Luke xi. 49), would be invested to preach the Gospel. The term προφῆται seems meant peculiarly of the Apostles, and espec. John, Peter, and Paul; and by the σοφοί are to be understood those who are in the passage of Luke called ἀπόστολοι, namely, men full of the Holy Ghost, or Divine wisdom, such as Apollos, Stephen, and others, who had pre-eminently the λόγος σοφίας and λόγος γνώσεως. By γραμματεῖς are meant the διδάσκαλοι (equiv. to the εὐαγγελισταί spoken of Eph. iv. 11, and 2 Tim — σταυρώσετε] Though there is no evidence of the crucifixion of any Christian teacher much before the destruction of Jerusalem, yet the silence of history (so exceedingly brief as it has come down to us) is no proof that there were none such.

35. ὅπως ἔλθῃ ἐφ' ὑμ. 'so that upon you should come,' for ὅπως here, as oft. elsewhere, denotes not intent, but event. Αἷμ. δίκ., for αἷμ. πᾶν δίκαιον, as in Lamb. iv. 13, and oft. in O. T. The πᾶν is intensive, pointing at every instance of blood, 'the blood of the saints so shed,' viz. in the cause of righteousness. In ἐκχυν. we have the use of Pres. tense to denote all time past, present, and future, what has been, is, and shall be. As respects the Zacharias here mentioned, who he is has been the subject of much needless discussion: nor can the matter be determined with certainty. There is, however, great reason to think that he was the Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, the particulars of whose death are recorded in 2 Chron. xxiv. 20—22 (and of whose blood the Jews had a tradition, that the stains were never washed away till after the Babylonish captivity), espec. considering that the circumstances there stated are so consonant with the words here used. Thus the place of the murder agrees substantially with that here spoken of, for the Court of the House of the Lord there mentioned well designates the place in a general way—the one here mentioned, in a particular way, since the θυσιαστήριον, or 'altar for holocausts,' stood in the Court of the Priests, and opposite to the entrance to the ναός. When Zach. died, he exclaimed: "The Lord look upon [this blood] and require it," meaning punishment at your hands. And similarly it is here said, ἔλθῃ ἐφ' ὑμ., of which the sense is figur., 'come against you,' i. e. convict you of being its cause, in the same way as the blood of Abel, murderously shed, cried unto God from the ground. And, although the Zechariah there spoken of is called son of Jehoiada, yet it was not unfrequent among the Jews for the same person to be called by two names, as in the case of the Apostle Jude, who is called by three different names. And, considering that this is a surname, there is the less difficulty in the above supposition, which, indeed, has the support of antiquity, since it is found in the scholia of several ancient MSS. After all, however, I am inclined to suspect that the words viz Βαραχ. were not originally in the Gospel of St. Matt., any more than in that of St. Luke; but that some Scholiast, having in mind Zechariah the prophet, the son of Barachiah, and supposing this to be (as some modern Expositors have done) the same person, added the words in the margin, whence they crept into the text: a case which has occurred not very rarely in the Old Test. I cannot, indeed, confirm this from any direct authority, except this, that Moses Choronensis, Hist. L. ii. in fin. p. 230, testifies that the ancient Armenian Version of Mesrob, formed in the early part of the 5th century, had not the words, which were not, it seems, in the copies used by Mesrob. Moreover, since we learn from Jerome in loc. that the Gospel used by the Nazarenes had not Βαραχ., but Jehoiada, it is evident, either that Bar. had been altered to Jehoiadah (which, however, is scarcely probable, since none of our copies have the alteration), or that the words were not in their original copies, but had been added by a Scholiast.

— ὃν ἐφονεύσατε] Meaning, 'ye of this nation,' though not of this generation, implying a communion of heavy responsibility. Here the act of their ancestors is imputed to the Jews of the then period, because the same blood of the righteous was still being shed (ἐκχυνόμενον), indeed, the blood of no less than ὁ δίκαιος himself, the Just One, CHRIST, as is said in 1 John ii. 1. 1 Pet. iii. 18, et al.

36. ὅτι] This has been inserted, from very many MSS., together with some Versions and Fathers, by Matth., Griesb., and Scholz; but not by Lachm. and Tisch. I have admitted it, though in smaller character, because internal evidence is rather against it, and I do not find it in the Lamb. MSS., nor in the best of the Mus. copies. By ταῦτα πάντα (or πάντα ταῦτα, as L. and Tisch. read, on strong authority, confirmed by the best of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), is meant the judgment for the shedding of that righteous blood, which would so soon come upon the nation, even before that generation passed away. See xxiv. 34.

37. Our Lord may here have turned from the Scribes and Pharisees to the people at large, the better inclined οἱ ὄχλοι, mentioned at xxiii. 1, and this apostrophe—unequalled for beauty and force—is the more touching from the infinite love and commiseration, mixed with upbraidings, it expresses for the Jewish nation (ungrateful as it was), now devoted to destruction. A day or two before our Lord had weep over Jerusalem: now he groaned over it. By the forcible term πανάκις, our Lord points out himself to his hearers as the same Saviour who had for so many ages borne with their wanderings from him, and their deafness to all the messages of mercy sent to them by the prophets; and who still invited them, though in vain, by repeated calls, to return unto the Shepherd of their souls (1 Pet. ii. 25), implying an assurance that he is yet willing, as he is able, to save unto the uttermost those who come unto him by faith. Thus was it the purpose of Christ to gather the whole body of the Jewish nation unto the Church of God. In fact, Christ would, but they would not; he was willing to save them, but they were not willing to be saved by him!

To advert to certain points as respects the phraseology; in ἀποκτείνουσα, as in ἐκχυν., supra v. 35, we have the use of the Present to denote what is done at all times and habitually. In ἐπισυναγαγεῖν—πτέρυγας, there is a interesting domestic metaphor, derived from the habits of birds (espec. the hen, or the partridge), and affording a strong image of affection and protection, such as is found in the tenderness of Greek Poets, Eurip., in his Her. Fur. 71, οἱ θ' Ἡράκλειοι παῖδες οὐτ' ὑπὸ πτεροῖς Σώζω νοσσοῦς, ὄρνις ὡς (not ὡς) ὑφαιμῖν, where ὑφ. is not Passive, but Midd. Reflex., equiv. to Neut., the sense being covering; a passage, we may suppose, in the mind of Milton when he wrote (Par. L. viii. 350), "these (the beasts) covering low With blandishment, each bird stoop'd on his wing." So also Eurip. Heracl. 10, τὰ κτείνου (read τὰ κτείνου) τέκν' ἔχων ὑπὸ πτεροῖς Σώζω τάδε. The same image, less developed, is found in several passages of the O. Test., as Deut. xxxii. 1. Ruth ii. 12. Ps. xvii. 8. xxxvi. 7. lxxiii. 7. This passage of the Evang. was, I doubt not, in the mind of the writer, whoever he was, of the Apocryphal book called 2 Eodr. i. 31: "I gathered you together as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings:—but now I will cast you out from my face." The writer follows the ancient Versions, all except the Arabic and all our English translations, except that of Wakef., in rendering ὄρνις by hen; but why not bird, since other birds are as careful of their young as the hen? Moreover, the hen is no where mentioned in the O. Test.; and in the New only in this passage, and its parallel one in Luke. I would, therefore, render bird. So in a passage where there is a similar metaphor, and the same verb, Jer. xvii. 11, ἐφάψατο πτέρδιξ (the partridge has cluck'd her brood). συγγάγε (congregat), here the ἐντὶ means to her. The word oft. occurs in the Sept., but very rarely in the Class. writers.

espec. as not found in the passage of Luke. They might also stumble at an inelegant position, and at the absolute construction of ἔρημος, which, however, is not unfrequent elsewhere, e. gr. Ia. vi. 11, ἡ γῆ καταλειφθήσεται ἔρημος. Hagg. i. 9, ὁ οἶκός μου ἔστιν ἔρημος. Test. XII. Patr. Lev. 15, διὰ ταῦτα ὁ ναός—ἔρημος ἔσται. Add, too, that the word cannot be dispensed with without great detriment, if we suppose, as most Commentators are agreed, a double reference,—not, however, as Mr. Alf. thinks, to the Temple primarily, and then to the city secondarily; but, as the best Expositors are of opinion, to the country itself (including its metropolis) principally, but also, as included in the city, its great boast, its Temple, which must, from the circumstances of the case, be here mainly intended. The double reference will well serve to account for the use of ὑμῶν, which is, I believe, no where else applied to the Temple; when designated by οἶκος, then 'it is God's house, in which it pleaseth him to dwell.' Under these circumstances, I have retained ἔρημος here, and also at Luke xiii. 34, though there in brackets.

³⁹ οὐ μὴ με ἴδῃτε—ἴως, &c.] I am still of opinion that this passage cannot, consistently with sound exegesis, or the facts of the case, be supposed to intimate a prediction of Christ's removal from them until the destruction of their city; though that is considered as his 'coming' very freq. in the next chap. Accordingly, I continue, as before, to refer the period of seeing him, and his coming, until that which shall precede his second coming in triumph to judgment, at the end of the world; previous to which, as we learn from the sure word of Holy Writ (Rom. xi. 26), there will take place a conversion of the Jews, and a restoration to their own land. So Chrys., Grot., and Kuin.—who, however, strain the sense of ἀπ' ἄρτι to make it mean after a while; but the common rendering henceforth is unexceptionable, if taken to mean, as it may, henceforward, 'from this time forward.' Thus the general sense is, 'You will by no means henceforward see me any longer, either as a Teacher, or a Saviour offering you redemption, until the time shall come (after a long intervening period of sore calamities and judicial infictions) when ye shall be ready and willing to turn to the Lord (Hos. iii. 4, 5), to look on him whom ye have pierced (Zech. xii. 10),—when ye shall recognize me as Christ your Saviour, and hail my coming in the words uttered by the multitudes whom ye lately reproved (see supra xxi. 9, and note),—even their very words, Blessed be he who cometh as Messiah to bring deliverance.'

XXIV. 1—51. Mark xiii. 1—3. Luke xxi. 5—36. Our Lord having thus closed his public

καὶ προσήλθον οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ ἐπιδεῖξαι αὐτῷ τὰς οἰκοδομὰς τοῦ ἱεροῦ. ² Ὁ δὲ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Οὐ βλέπετε † πάντα ταῦτα ; ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, οὐ μὴ ἀφεθῇ ὧδε λίθος ἐπὶ λίθον, ὃς οὐ [μὴ] καταλυθήσεται. ³ Καθήμενου δὲ αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τοῦ ὄρους τῶν ἐλαιῶν, προσήλθον αὐτῷ οἱ μαθηταὶ κατ' ἰδίαν, λέγοντες· Εἰπέ ἡμῖν, πότε ταῦτα ἔσται ; καὶ τί τὸ σημεῖον τῆς σῆς παρουσίας, ministry on earth with the above awful reproofs and impressive predictions, his disciples, as he was retiring from the Temple, pointed—it seems with reference to his words ἀφίεται ὁ οἶκος ὑμῶν ἔρημος—to the magnificent buildings of that edifice, which was one of the wonders of the world. This in the present passage is expressed in a general way ; while in those of Mark and Luke there is a reference to the particular points of magnificence, which were espec. thought objects of admiration, namely, the stones, spoken of in Mark and Luke, and the ἀναθήματα of which we read in the passage of Luke (where see note). As respects the former, the ποταπαὶ in the passage of Mark adverts to their vast size ; and the καλοῖς, used by Luke, to their beauty. I have on the passage of Mark considered the matter as regards size ; as regards beauty, the particular adverted to in the passage of Luke, the reference there is not, I suspect, to the same stones, those at the lower part of the fabric, which were in some measure foundations to the upper courses, and consequently could have no beauty, except that of high polish and very close jointings. Hence I am inclined to think, that the reference was, at least in the words of the passage of Luke, to the pillars of the cloisters, which are in Jos. Bell. Jud. v. 5, 2, described as 25 cubits in height, each of a single stone of white marble. Now these would be objects above all others prominent and attracting admiration (ἐκπληξίη, the term used by Jos.) ; and it is not improbable that by ποταπαὶ λίθ. Mark also had reference thereto. But the intention of the disciples was not to express simply admiration of the edifice, but rather to intimate that they were quite aghast at the very idea of so noble an edifice being ἐρημος. Indeed, the destruction of the Temple was, in the minds of the Jews, viewed as coeval only with the end of the world, or at least that modification in its constitution, which they supposed would take place at the coming of the Messiah.

2. For Ἰησοῦς, Lachm. and Tisch. insert ἀποκριθεῖς, from B, D, L, several cursive MSS., and the Ital. and Vulg. Versions (unsupported, however, by any of the Mus. and Lamb. copies).—authority quite insufficient, espec. since internal evidence is adverse. The Ἰησ. was probably cancelled by the Critics for the purpose of removing what they thought tautology ; and then, as something was wanting, ἀποκριθεῖς was introduced from the passage of Mark. The οὐ just after is absent from D, L, and several cursive MSS. (to which I add 7 ancient Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), together with the Ital. and Vulg. Versions.—authority scarcely sufficient, espec. as not confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Vers., nor by internal evidence, from its being far less likely to have been inserted than removed.—namely, on account of its not being pure Greek when used with βλέπω interrogatively. Indeed, the οὐ used interrogatively rarely occurs in pure Greek writers ; but it is found occasionally in the N. T., e. gr. John vi. 70. Hence it is clear that Griesb., Schulz, and Tisch. (1 Ed.), did wrong in removing it from the text ; to which, however, it was by Tisch., in his 2nd Ed., restored. The word was probably removed because not having place in the passage of Mark. As respects the ταῦτα πάντα, edited by Lachm. and Tisch., from many uncial and cursive MSS., together with almost all the Lamb. and several of the most ancient Mus. copies, somewhat confirmed by internal evidence,—so very frequent is the variation of position existing in the instance of those words, that one cannot pronounce with certainty, and there seems no case for alteration. The μὴ before καταλ. is cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch., on the authority of nearly all the uncial and very many cursive MSS. (to which I add all the Lamb., except 2, all the Scriv., and the best Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence, from the probability of its having arisen by error of scribes from the μὴ just before.

In οὐ μὴ there is a proverbial, and usually hyperbolic expression, to denote utter destruction,—though here almost literally fulfilled, as we learn from Jos. Bell. vii. i. 1, Euseb., and the Rabbinical writers. The words ὅς οὐ καταλυθήσεται are added for the sake of strengthening the affirmation ; and in καταλ. there is reference to the dissolution of the cement of the stones, and the disruption of the iron fastenings, soldered with lead, on which see my note on Thucyd. i. 93. I have said almost literally fulfilled ; for Titus did allow three towers and a part of the city wall to stand. In like manner, though in Hdut. ix. 13, there is use language nearly as strong respecting the destruction of Athens by the Persians ; yet from Thucyd. i. 89, it appears that a few portions of the city wall were left standing, and a few houses undestroyed.

3. πότε ταῦτα—αἰῶνος ;] Meaning, 'when shall the events thou hast just foretold come to pass, and what shall be the sign of thy coming in power to accomplish these things, and, consequently, bring to an end this present world ?' The things in question are manifestly the destruction of the Temple, and the devastation of Jerusalem. From the disciples asking our Lord both respecting his coming and the end of the world, we are warranted in inferring, that, the disciples' views of these matters being very indistinct, Christ's coming and the end of the world were events, in their minds, closely connected with the overthrow of the Jewish state. Now our Lord, in his answer at large, while he foretells the signs which would precede the destruction of the Jewish state, was pleased so to speak, as to make that event a type of the Day of Judgment ; and adverts to his coming to take vengeance on the obstinately unbelieving Jews, in such terms as would seem more applicable to his last coming to judge the world. Such is the simplest general view of a somewhat dark subject. But owing to the events being not noticed distinctly, but intermingled together, there is occasionally no little difficulty in ascertaining to which event a particular subject is to be referred. Under these circumstances, the principle which I long since pointed out of supposing that here, as often in the Prophecies of the Old Test., two subjects, a primary and a secondary, are carried on together, will be the best clue to guide us in the interpretation of this obscure portion of Scripture. Amidst much that is perplexed, and matter of difficulty to determine, one thing may safely be laid down as pretty certain—and of some importance, as showing how it came to pass that subjects which seem to stand not a little apart, should be thus intermingled together—and this is, that as the prediction concerning the destruction of the Temple arose naturally out of the train of passing circumstances, so, it should seem, did the awful predictions, in this and the next chapter, arise out of the limited interrogatories of the Apostles. But, in the mode in which they are delivered, there is not a little which (as occasionally in the Prophecies of the Old Test.), from being without any marked plan, would seem confused and necessarily dark. It is true, that the information as to the last advent and general judgment, being superadded to the information in reply to the disciples' question, is, as might be expected, in a great measure given last (xxv. 31—46), and accordingly is so delivered as to be sufficiently clear; yet the circumstance of there being many allusions to it, in the foregoing matter, which chiefly concern the event of the second advent to judgment, has occasioned no little obscurity. Nay, in some passages the predictions which regard the two advents are so closely interwoven together, and the expressions and imagery are so applicable to the day of judgment, that a secondary sense must necessarily be admitted; as is not unfrequently to be observed in the prophetic writings, where two subjects, a principal and a subordinate one, are carried on together. On attentively reconsidering this subject, I am still more of opinion, that two cognate subjects (each requiring its peculiar mode of interpretation) are carried forward in a sort of parallel juxtaposition through the greater part of ch. xxiv.—namely, the first advent of Christ at the destruction of Jerusalem, and his final advent at the last day, to judgment; the two subjects being as it were interwoven so as to form one web.—though, as might be expected, even there the former event is the prominent subject; while in the remainder of the chap. (v. 28—ult.) the contrary is found to take place; our Lord's second advent obtaining gradually the ascendant, the lesser subject becoming absorbed in the greater: until towards the close of the chap., and throughout the next, the second advent of our Lord at the last day, and the final judgment immediately subsequent to the general resurrection, become the sole theme. Accordingly, the answer of our Lord to his disciples, carried forward throughout chap. xxiv. and xxv., is, as far as regards the latter portion, xxiv. 28—fin. xxv., to be regarded as meant not only as an instruction in the way of admonitory warning for their use, but for the benefit of all succeeding generations of true believers, till the grand scene, the subject of these prophetic declarations, shall take place. I need scarcely add that, as to any obscurity respecting the exact time of Christ's second coming, that ought ever to be ascribed to the only true cause,—our Lord's Divine wisdom, both in imparting, and in withholding information. He was pleased to give his hearers, and his disciples of every age, information sufficient to guard them from the error of supposing the day of the Lord to be near at hand, and the peril of not looking forward and expecting it by due preparation, as near at hand. See 2 Tim. ii. 13. 2 Pet. iii. 12. In addressing ourselves to the interpretation of this necessarily obscure, because darkly prophetic discourse, it is of essential importance to bear continually in mind, besides the pregnancy of sense (so peculiar to Scripture, espec. in the Gospels, and which is naturally to be expected in the language of prophecy), the variety of fulfilment involved in predictions having a reference to events and subjects which, though cognate, stand apart, and although parallel (or rather because parallel), cannot absolutely join.

5. ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματί μου | i. e. assuming the name and character of Messiah. Between these and the false prophets at ver. 11, a distinction must be made. Of the former were Simon Magus, Dositheus, and Menander, and perhaps those adverted to by Joseph. B. J. i. 2. Of the latter are supposed to be Theudas, and Barchenebas the Egyptian. But these scarcely answer to what is implied in the phrase, ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματί μου: and we are left much in the dark as to the events which took place before the destruction of Jerusalem; though that there were such persons we cannot doubt. That there have been such in comparatively modern times, there is reason to think; and that there will be such in times to come is probable.

6. μελλήσετε ἀκούειν πολέμους | That wars were not wanting at the time in question, appears from Jos. Ant. xviii. 9. 1. By ἀκοῆς πολέμων seem denoted 'wars bruited of, and seemingly impending,' thus well nigh overwhelming with fear the terrified Jewish Christians, but which did not actually take place (comp. Jerem. l. 46, where is foretold 'a rumour of war, and that one year upon another,' equiv. to the ἀκ. πολ. here). Of this kind were the three imminent perils of war which arose from the menaces of war, issued out against the Jews by the three imperial tyrants, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, so admirably narrated by Jos. Ant. L. xix. It is true, that in the passage of St. Luke is subjoined to πολέμους, not, as here, ἀκοῆς πολέμων, but ἀκαταστασίας. Yet the expressions employed by the two Evangelists are very reconcilable; the latter as resulting from the former. For ἀκοή, tumour, naturally has for its results commotion, tumult, and ultimately civil broils (so Virg. Æn. vii. 549, 'Finitimas in bella feram tumoris urbes'). And by the next term, ἀκαταστ., used in the above passage, may very well be denoted such commotions as produce civil tumults—a view confirmed by the words ἰδνός πρὸς ἰδνός. We may rather, however, refer it to something more nearly and directly affecting the Jewish people; and accordingly the two terms may be supposed to have especial reference to the dire alarms, on those three occasions, which would naturally produce popular tumults, which is the sense that ἀκαταστ. bears in Dionys. Hal. Ant. vi. 31, ἐν ἀκαταστασίαις τῆς πόλεως οὐδης. Artemid. Onir. iv. 38, ἀκαταστασίας καὶ θορύβους; and 68, ἀκαταστασίας καὶ παραχαῖς, whence it is probable that the παραχαῖ in Mark is meant of the same subject, denoting those civil tumults occasioned by the threat of war from the Romans; which threat would naturally rouse into dissension and altercation the Roman and the anti-Roman parties. Thus, when war with the Romans did at length actually arrive, there occurred what is recorded in Jos. Bell. ii. 17, 10; and what is no other than the very state of things here set forth by our Lord. The historian's words are, Δεινὴ δὲ ἄλην τὴν Συρίαν (meaning the province of Syria, including Palestine) ἐπέσχε παραχῇ, καὶ πᾶσα πόλις εἰς δύο διήρητο στρατοῦσι.

—δεῖ γενέσθαι] This is referred by the earlier Commentators to the counsel of God, who permits evil, in order to educe good therefrom. But it is better, with most recent Interpreters, to take the expression as only denoting the certainly of the events predicted, the final catastrophe of Jerusalem. Comp. Soph. Phil. 1338, λέγει σαφές, ὡς δεῖ γενέσθαι ταῦτα. Here πάντα is cancelled by Lach., from B, D, L, and three cursive MSS., with some Versions,—authority quite insufficient, espec. since the words seem indispensable. However, the true reading may be ταῦτα, the word used in the passage of Luke, and often confounded in MSS. It has place in a few ancient MSS., including three Mus. ones. This, I doubt not, is the genuine reading. With οὐπω ἐστὶ τὸ τέλος we may, with Wets., compare the Homeric τίλος δ' οὐπω τι πέφανται, and the 'Nec dum finis erat' of Manilius; though rather Jer. iv. 27, "Yet will I not make a full end," συντίλειαν δὲ οὐ μὴ ποιήσω. However, the sense of τίλος will be either the end of the Jewish state, or the end of the world, according as we adopt the primary, or the secondary reference.

7. λιμοὶ καὶ λοιμοί] The words are often found conjoined; and no wonder,—pestilence usually succeeding famine (see Thucyd. i. 23)—inasmuch that μετὰ λιμὸν λοιμός grew into a proverb. See Thucyd. ii. 54. That famines were frequent and violent has been shown.

—σεισμοί] Some understand the expression figur. of civil commotions. And so we find added in the passage of Mark καὶ παραχαῖ. But though such there doubtless would be, the term is, I rather think, to be understood literally; for, from the passages adduced by Wets. and Kuin., it appears that earthquakes were then very prevalent; and such were ever regarded as portents, presaging public calamity and distress. Thus, Herod. vi. 98, Ἀπὸς ἐκινήθη—μεχρὶ ἑμοῦ οὐ σεισθεῖσα,—καὶ τοῦτο μὲν κύν τερας ἀνθρώποις τῶν μελλόντων εἶσθαι κακῶν ἔφηρεν ὁ Θεός. See Joseph. Bell. Proem. 9. 11, he says he has not omitted to notice τὴν τῆς πόλεως ἄλωσιν, καὶ τὰ περὶ ταύτης σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα: and espec. Bell. iv. 4, 5, where, after mentioning violent storms, terrible earthquakes, and thunderings and lightnings, he remarks, πρόσθλον ἦν ἐν' ἀνθρώπων ὀλέθρου τὸ κατὰστημα τῶν ὅλων συγκιχυμένων· καὶ οὐχὶ μικροῦ τις ἀν' εἰκάσαι συμπτώματος τὰ τέρατα. And so in the passage of Luke (xxi. 11), φόβητρά τι καὶ σημεῖα ἀπ' οὐρανῶν μεγάλα ἔσται.

—κατὰ τόπους] 'in various places,' 'place by place' (not, however, necessarily in Judæa). So Polyb. iii. 53, κατὰ τόπους. The words are to be referred, not to seismo only, but also to limo and loimo.

8. πάντα δεῖ—ὧδινων] q. d. 'these are to be only the prelude of sorrows.' So Eurip. Med. 60, ἐν ἀρχῇ πῆμα, καὶ οὐδέπω μεσοί. ὧδιν is here (as oft. in the Sept. and Class. writers) used of agony extreme, lit. death-throes. In the passage of Mark is added the impressive caution, βλέπετε δὲ ὑμεῖς ἑαυτοὺς, meaning that they should give good heed not to be drawn away from Christ, and their duty to him, by the sufferings, then imminent, which they must expect to meet with on account of their Christian profession.

9. τότε] Meaning, as we may make out, for the indefinite period here denoted, the definite one spoken of in the passage of Luke xxi. 12, i. e. 'a little before,' but not after the time spoken of.

—ἔσεσθε μισούμενοι ὑπὸ πάντων τῶν ἐθνῶν] i. e. 'ye shall be objects of hatred to all nations.' The hostile feeling of the Gentiles to Christians is plain from various passages of the Classical writers. The true reason for this Bp. Warburton (Div. Leg. vol. ii. lib. ii. § 6) has shown to be this,—that 'while the different Pagan religions sociably agreed with each other, the Gospel taught Christians not only, like the Jews, to bear their testimony to the falsehood of them all,—but also zealously and earnestly to urge on men the renunciation of them, as a matter of absolute necessity, and requiring them, under the most tremendous penalties, to embrace the Christian religion.' In short, it was the proselyting spirit of the Christians, which occasioned the deep enmity of the heathens.

10. Of the expressions in this verse, σκανδ. must be understood of apostasy, to the existence of which the repeated admonitions against it in the Epistle to the Hebrews form a strong attestation. The cases of Phygellus, Hermogenes, and Demas, do not come within this category. See on 1 Tim. i. 15. iv. 10. But there is no difficulty in supposing the not unfrequency, if not of apostasy, yet of falling off from Christian profession: and no wonder, since, as Matth. Henry observes, 'persecuting times and suffering times are shaking times, occasioning many first to fall out with, and then to fall off from their profession, to sit loose to it, grow weary of it (as was the case with Demas, Phygellus, and Hermogenes), and at length to revolt from it.' The particular μισήσουσιν ἀλλήλους seems to have reference to that hatred which would be, as is usually the case, borne by the apostates, or semi-apostates, those who fell off, to their former companions, even when they did not betray them.

11. ψευδοπροφ.] Denoting both Judaizing teachers, and those false, heretical teachers, so prevalent in that age, and so often mentioned by St. Paul and St. John, against the former of whom, we have evidence in some Apocryphal writings yet extant, they bore a deadly hatred.

12. διὰ τὸ πληθυνθῆναι τὴν ἀνομίαν] Mr. Alf. wrongly renders, 'because the iniquity is filled up;' which version involves great harshness, and is philologically indefensible. The Art. τὴν is here used with ἀνομ., because it is used in the most abstract sense (as said of virtues and vices). So also in Matt. vii. 23. xiii. 41. Rom. vi. 9. 2 Thesa. ii. 7. 1 John iii. 4, though sometimes, for particular reasons, dispensed with. As respects the term πληθ., proof is required that it may admit of the sense assigned by Mr. Alf.; and I cannot find a particle of such proof. The Pass. form is almost always used in a Neuter sense, to increase, as is the case here. Thus in the MS. D we have πληθυνῆναι, a gloss, indeed, but a correct explanation. Accordingly, I do not feel justified in supposing, with Mr. Alf., 'a horrible state of morality parallel to that described in Thucyd. iii. 82—84, as then prevailing in Greece, which had destroyed all mutual confidence.' Besides, it will appear, from my note on that portion, that what is there described formed a most peculiar state of things, such as had never before existed in the world, nor prob. will again until the latter times, which may prob. supply the principal fulfilment of the prediction here; though a subordinate one might well occur during the period of the forty eventful years up to the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish state. But turn we to the actual force of the words before us; to ἀνομία is, I think, to be assigned not those remote and far-fetched senses ascribed by some Expositors, nor any special one, but, in a general way, 'the not walking worthy of our Christian profession,' by a life unsuitable to that profession, occasioning that incongruity between profession and practice, so strongly represented in the Epistles of St. James and St. Jude, and not unfrequently adverted to by St. Paul. Thus it may be well explained, not lawlessness, by a violation of human law, but disobedience to Divine law, by sin and iniquity. Comp. Heb. viii. 12, and Eadr. ix. 6 (cited by Schleus.), αἱ ἀνομίαι ἡμῶν ἐπληθύνησαν. The result of this is indicated in the next words, ψυγῆσεται ἡ ἀγάπη τῶν πολλῶν (meaning, 'the many,' 'the majority'), where this coldness is to be referred to both God the Father, or Christ the Son, and their fellow-Christians; for the former is manifestly inconsistent with piety, and equally so with love to the brethren. Thus it is meant that all philanthropy will be absorbed in selfishness. See 1 John iv. 20. The former, however, is the principal sense to be assigned to ἀγάπη, and if taken, as St. John often uses the term in his Epistles, and in Rev. (see 2 John 6, comp. with Rev. ii. 2—4), of that love of God which shows itself in obedience, and in love to man, for God's sake, it will be equiv. to the πίστις δι' ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη spoken of by Paul, Gal. v. 6. Now when iniquity prevails, then, as observes Henry, "this grace waxes cold; Christians become shy of each other, affections cool off, distances are enlarged, and love comes to exist only in name and profession." It should seem, however, that the fulfilment of this prediction is chiefly to be sought in the circumstances which shall precede the second advent of our Lord to judgment. Nay, there is little reason to doubt that it has been fulfilling for the last century in various ways, as evinced in various signs of the times indicative of the latter days, to point out which belongs to the province of the Preacher rather than of the Expositor.

13. ὁ δὲ ὑπομείνας—σωθήσεται] I am now of opinion that here, as in a great part of the present chapter, a twofold sense of τίλος and of σωθῆσεται is intended. This I have, I think, proved in my note on Luke xxi. 18, 19; and I will only observe that, here vv. 10—12 are an interposed portion, just as v. 18 is there. The purpose of the insertion there I have made pretty clear; that of the one here can hardly be made so obvious. Perhaps it is meant to advert to other parts of the fiery trial, which they would have to surmount in addition to the persecution and bitter hatred of the adversaries of the Gospel (many of them those nearest and dearest to them, comp. Mark xiii. 12. Luke xxi. 16),—namely, the trial arising from the hatred and persecutions of backsliding believers, and the coldness of Christian love even in the faithful,—arising from the prevalence of ἀνομία, a sitting loose to the obligations of Christian duty,—resulting from the trial of the purity of their faith by the rising up of false prophets, who should deceive many. One of these particulars is brought forward at Luke xxi. 16, and Mark xiii. 12, and also supra x. 21; though there as uttered on another occasion. It is difficult to trace the thread of connexion between v. 12 and 13; and even Calvin has here been little successful, from not perceiving that the connexion of v. 13 is not so much with v. 12 only as with the whole of the interposed portion, v. 9—12. The scope of v. 13 seems to be, to administer comfort to the Lord's faithful people at this sad prospect of the future, when the offence of the cross of Christ should, in one or other of its forms, both as to unbelievers, misbelievers, and backsliders, be incessant. (See note on 1 Cor. i. 17, compared with Gal. v. 11, and vi. 12. 14.) The full meaning, with reference both to the primary and the secondary (but more important) application is, 'He who perseveres unto the end of his trials in the ordeal of persecution shall escape as well the destruction of the Jewish people here, as of God's wrathful judgment hereafter.' The secondary sense is, however, the predominant one, and συνθίσσ. refers to salvation in the day of the Lord.

14. καὶ κηρυχθ. τούτο—ἔθνεσι] Here again there exists the same twofold reference, so as to announce, 1. that the Gospel should, before the τέλος of the Jewish state, be preached, in a manner, to the whole known, at least civilized, world; and that the prophecy was fulfilled we know both by the incidental notices in St. Paul's Epistles, and from the testimony of early Ecclesiastical writers. The words εἰς μαρτύριον πᾶσι τ. ἔθν. intimate why this announcement should be made,—namely, as a testimony that the Jewish economy was at an end, and the Gospel dispensation established in its stead; and thus the wall of partition between Jews and Gentiles was broken down,—also as a testimony in reference to all nations, Jews and Gentiles, that the opportunity of receiving, or of rejecting, the Gospel had been offered them. But the words are more applicable in the secondary, though more extensive sense, as expressing that the Gospel would be preached in the whole world, literally taken, before the great Day of the Lord at his second Advent, when the full τὸ τέλος should arrive. I need scarcely say, that the wide-spread dispersion of missions, and the not less wide dissemination of heterodox and infidel opinions, are the two great signs of the Times which announce the coming on of the latter days, and that the End here mentioned seems to be not very far off.

15—28. This portion relates more immediately to the siege and final destruction of Jerusalem, though occasionally there is an allusion to the other point of view.

15. τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρμώσεως] Here βδέλ. has, by Hebraism, the force of an adjective qualifying the following subst. in the genit.; the sense being, 'the abominating desolation,' equiv. to 'the abomination causing desolation' or 'destruction,'—an expression derived from Dan. ix. 27. xi. 31. xii. 11 (where the Chaldee is צוֹר גָּדוֹל, literally, 'the abomination of the Desolator,' the desolating force); applied by our Lord to the Roman besieging army under Titus, who would be considered abominable, as being heathens and idolaters; since the very standards they carried were worshipped and sacrificed to by the soldiery (see Jos. Ant. x. 11), who were regarded by the Jews as not only worthy of abomination, but at the same time as desolators and destroyers. Of the above three passages it would seem that the reference here is directly to only one (ix. 27), but indirectly to the other two. Here there exists considerable variation of reading, and confusion in the copies of the Sept. and Theodotion; though nothing to impair the genuineness of ἐρμώσεως. The true reading in Theod. (well nigh obliterated by the errors of scribes) seems to be ἀφανισμοῦ: and Theod. might well so render, since he has rendered the Hebr. גָּדוֹל by the same word at ix. 18, though there, too, the Sept. has ἰρήμωσι. The terms are nearly synonymous; but ἀφαν. is rather the stronger, as denoting such utter destruction as brings a thing to nought. So Diod. Sic. T. vi. 382, ἀφ. πόλιν αὐτάνδραν. As respects the reference of the prophecy in Daniel, the author of 1 Macc. (in common probably with the Alex. Jews) so writes (i. 54) as to refer the fulfilment of the prophecy to the destruction of the Temple by Antiochus Epiphanes, and the setting up of a statue of Jupiter Olympius (called by him βδέλυγμα ἐρμώσεως) on the altar of burnt-offering. But as the writer was a bigoted Jew, we may easily imagine why he should choose to refer the fulfilment to Antiochus Epiphanes. A candid and far more enlightened Jew (the illustrious historian of his nation) refers it, Ant. x. 11, 7, to the desolation by the Romans.

—ἐν τόπῳ ἁγίῳ] Not, 'on holy ground;' for in the only other passages where the expression occurs in the N. T. (Acts vi. 13. xxi. 28) it can mean no other than the Temple; and this is confirmed by the expression used in the passage of Mark, ὅπου οὐ δει, of which the sense is, 'at some part of the Temple,' except, of course, the Sanctum Sanctorum. Nor is this, as Bp. Middleton shows, forbidden by the absence of the Article. Moreover, Jos., in his Bell. vi. 61, is adduced to prove, that the Roman standards were placed εἰς τὸ ἱερόν, and were sacrificed to. But that took place after the burning of the Temple and the desolation of the city, and consequently could be no warning to the faithful to flee out of Judea. In point of fact, it is not quite clear exactly what is alluded to in the strong term βδέλυγμα. I am now not indisposed to admit that the common interpretation, which refers it to the Roman eagle-standard, is scarcely to be substantiated. That the Roman standards had been fixed up at some point within the sacred precincts, and were actually so at the time when our Lord's words were spoken, is so probable, as scarcely to need proof; consequently, that allusion cannot hold good. Mr. Alf. refers the βδέλυγμα to an ἀτίβημα of the Zelotes,

which is in Jos. Bell. iv. 6, 8, related to have been perpetrated by them, without any restraint on the part of an ignorant, profane person, one Phanas, whom they had chosen High Priest. And he refers to a rumour among the people of Jerusalem, that a defilement of the holy place would take place in time of war and sedition, which should be the prelude to the burning of the Temple and the capture of the city. And he regards this, or some similar impiety committed about or a little before this time, as the sign spoken of by our Lord, and which may have given the signal to the Christians to depart. He further thinks that some internal desecration of the holy place by the Zelotæ coincided with the approach of Cestius; and that thus the Christians both within and without the city were warned to escape. But the period fixed by Mr. Alf. for the approach of Cestius is one far too early to suit the period of the enormity perpetrated. The period mentioned by Josephus when that took place will very well suit the circumstances. For it was about that time (a year after the investment) when Cestius made his unaccountable retreat from Jerusalem, after having already become master of the upper city. See Jos. Bell. ii. 19, 6 and 7. This event, which happened most providentially, would afford the Christians an opportunity—the only one they ever had before or after (during the siege)—of making their escape. And the abomination was more likely to occur a year after the investment than before, since the conduct of the Zelotæ grew worse and worse. Besides this, the period before the investment is forbidden by the words of Luke xxi. 20, 21, where those within Jerusalem are warned to depart from it when they shall have seen Jerusalem κυκλουμένην ὑπὸ στρατοπέδων, i. e. closely encircled by the line of circumvallation, and, I suppose, contravallation. This warning, then, the Christians would be ready to take at any favourable opportunity, though they did not, it seems, find one till the retreat above mentioned—not to be accounted for on any but the principle, so often applicable on similar occasions, of infatuation—gave them that opportunity of doing, what it seems they were the more inclined to do, from the occurrence of the δοκίμια, as Jos. terms it, or βόλυνμα, having weighed strongly on the mind of the pious Christians, and disgusted all reputable persons, whether Christians or Jews. This is placed beyond doubt by a passage of Jos. Bell. ii. 20, 1, in which it is related that after the retreat of Cestius, and his complete defeat by the Jews in effecting it, πολλοὶ τῶν ἐπιφανῶν Ἰουδαίων, ὥσπερ βασιλευμένης νύξ, ἀνέστηχοντο τῆς πόλεως.

The clause ὁ ἀναγινώσκων νοεῖτω Mr. Alf. believes to have been an ecclesiastical note, which, like the Doxology, supra vi. 13, found its way into the text. But that it should have found its way into every hitherto collated MS. and every ancient Version of both St. Matt. and Mark, is incredible. The words cannot, he maintains, be from the Evangelist to solicit attention, as this in the three first Gospels is wholly without example. Be it so; but no good reason can be imagined why one Evangelist should not have done so once; and that St. Matt. did so seems attested by the concurrent testimony of all MSS., including the Lamb. and Mus. copies. It were surely a most rash critical procedure, virtually to cut out, on so groundless a suspicion, words whose genuineness is attested by the strongest authority imaginable. As to the passage, supra vi. 13, here alleged by Mr. Alf. in confirmation of his opinion, it has no bearing on the present case; not to say that I have, I trust, in my note on that passage evinced that it is very probably, if not certainly, genuine. And as there internal evidence is, upon the whole, in favour of the words, so is it here, nay, even to a greater degree. To suppose it an ecclesiastical note involves a great improbability, since such a note was not called for. Why, we may ask, should not the Evangelist, who must have seen the reference to Dan. ix. 27, have had brought to his mind the words a little before, γνώση καὶ διανοήσῃ, and have thereon founded the admonition ὁ ἀναγινώσκων νοεῖτω, which, however, to be appreciated, needs to be understood? Now its true sense is not, 'Let him understand,' i. e. 'endeavour to understand,' as if the thing were very obscure. The sense intended must have been that of the Prophet, in the words which suggested these, which is, 'Let him who readeth know and mind that,' &c., in other words, 'know for certain and bear in mind;' for I agree with Dr. Lightf., that what is here said is spoken not for the obscurity, but for the certainty of prophecy. The same form of expression occurs in Jer. xxvi. 15, "Know ye for certain that," &c., and oft. in the Old Test. And so γινώρε ὅτι, with the same reference, in Luke xxi. 20. 31. In short, there is no reason why they should not be ascribed to the Evangelist; while there is every reason why they should be from the Evangelist, and not from a mere anonymous note-taker. I find the view which I have taken further supported by the suffrage of Dr. Campb. in one of his ablest notes, and, indeed, by that of every judicious recent Expositor. To the question that may be put, why should we not rather think the admonition came from our Lord? Dr. Campb. well replies: "because our Lord did not write, but speak. Those instructed by him were not readers, but hearers." If the words should be our Lord's, we may suppose he intended to call on his hearers to read heedfully and lay to heart what Daniel says.

somewhat hyperbolical) forms of expression, denoting the imminency of the danger, and the necessity of the speediest flight. To understand these words ὁ ἐν τοῦ δόματος μὴ κατ., we must remember that it has ever been customary in the East to build the houses with flat roofs, provided with a staircase, as well inside as outside, i. e. at the street. By the latter way (and not, as some have supposed, over the roofs of the neighbouring houses, and so to the city wall) their flight is here recommended to be taken.

For καταβαίνειτω, Lachm. and Tisch. (1 Ed.) read καταβάτω, from 4 uncial and a few cursive MSS. Though Tisch. (2) rightly restores the text, rec. καταβάτω prob. came from Mark xiii. 15, and Luke xvii. 31, and was, it seems, preferred by the revisers of MSS. B, D, L, as being the more Class. form. For τὶ before ἐκ τῆς οικίας, many MSS., including most of the uncial and very many cursive ones (besides all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), have τὰ, which is prob. the true reading, and has been edited by Matth., Griesb., Fritz., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch.,—with reason; the other probably having crept in from the passage of Mark.

18. For τὰ ἱμάτια, the reading τὰ ἱμάτιον, edited by Lachm. and Tisch., on strong external authority, is prob. derived from the passage of Mark, whence it was introduced by certain Critics who were not aware that the expression τὰ ἱμάτια is used, as in our language clothes for raiment, meaning outer raiment, what we express by 'coat and waistcoat.'

19. οὐαὶ δὲ—ἡμέραις] Meaning that, that class of persons will, from their peculiar helplessness obstructing their endeavours to escape, be exposed more particularly to danger and misery. The next verse represents the imminency of the danger, and the difficulty of effecting so sudden a flight under hindrances entirely unavoidable, and the many positive impediments that would be likely to occur, by intimating that they would have reason to pray that their flight might not be in winter, because then, from the inclemency of the weather and the bad state of the roads, travelling would be exceedingly difficult; and the observance of the Jewish Sabbath, kept up at least until the destruction of Jerusalem, would retard their progress.

20. The ἐν before σαββ., is, on good grounds, cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch.

21. The θλίψις mentioned here and v. 29, and in Mark xiii. 19 and 24 (as in Rev. ii. 22, et al.), has its parallel in the ἀνάγκη μεγάλῃ of Luke, to which ὀργὴ is subjoined, as adverting to the wrath of God; and in both v. 19 and 21 there is an allusion to the dreadful scenes of the siege of Jerusalem. As respects the expression θλίψις, οἷα οὐ γέγονεν—νῦν, the best Commentators agree in considering this as an Oriental, and somewhat hyperbolical, mode of denoting what is exceedingly great, as in Exod. x. 14. xi. 6. Dan. xii. 1. Joel ii. 2. But in comparing these they confound passages very different in character. The passages of Exod. are like many in the Class. writers, in which there is something of rhetorical amplification. But surely the language of inspired prophecy ought to be kept apart from any thing artificial, espec. when, as in the case of Dan. xii. 1, of which the words ἔσται καιρὸς θλίψεως, θλίψις οἷα οὐ γέγονεν ἀπ' οὐ γένηται (Ald. γέγονεν) ἔθνος ἐν τῇ γῇ, ἕως τοῦ καιροῦ ἱκεῖνον seem to have been meant by the Divine speaker to be brought to the minds of his hearers; nay, the expression καιροῦ ἱκεῖνον is by eminent Expositors referred to the destruction of Jerusalem; though there may, I apprehend, be a conjoint reference to the τέλος of the Evangelist, namely, the end of all things. Inasmuch, that we may regard the prophecy of Daniel, and the prophetic declarations of our Lord here, as pointing at (to use the words of Mr. Alf.) "the intermediate fulfilment, by the destruction of Jerusalem, of that which is yet future in its final fulfilment; when alone will these words be accomplished in their full sense." I cannot, however, agree with him in regarding the language of Jos. Bell. i. l. 1, and in several other places, as only expressed in a figure of rhetoric. Had Mr. Alf. studied the great Jewish historian as closely as I have done, he would have known how to separate what is rhetorical, and ad ornatum, from what is real. In all the passages to which I allude there is stamped the character of deep reality and genuine pathos, espec. in describing horrors during the siege of Jerusalem unparalleled by any recorded in the annals of history, so as fully to justify a literal acceptance of whatever language has been used by the illustrious historian.

22. εἰ μὴ ἐκολοβ. αἱ ἡμέρ., &c.] 'And unless the days (meaning the days of punitive vengeance, ἐκδικήσις, as they are termed in Luke) had been shortened (lit. curtailed), no flesh (a Hebr. for no one) could have been preserved.' How literally this was fulfilled, we learn from Josephus, from whom it appears that if the siege had lasted a little longer, the whole nation must have been destroyed. He says it was a proverbial expression in the mouths of all who escaped: αἱ μὴ ταχέως ἀπωλόμαθα, οὐκ ἂν ἐσώθημεν.

— διὰ τοὺς ἐλεκτούς] Grot., Kuin., Fritz., and other Expositors, think that there is here an allusion to the very ancient opinion that in certain cases of national calamity public destruction is averted by Providence, lest the righteous should suffer with the wicked. See Gen. xviii. 23. But, without denying this merciful Providence generally in other cases, we are here bound to limit the reference, and maintain that the shortening was brought about for the sake of the elect, οἱς ἐξελίξαστο, as it is added in the passage of Mark, designating the same class of persons with those, supra xx. 16, characterized as ὅλοι in opposition to πολλοί. Thus by τοὺς ἐκλ. will be denoted that very small portion of Jewish Christians who had embraced and continued to hold the faith of the Gospel in purity of doctrine and of life. But even in these words there may be an indirect combined reference to the latter times; for I agree with Mr. Alf., that 'some such providential shortening of the great days of tribulation, and hastening of God's kingdom, is here promised for the latter days.' But besides the cutting short, in the Divine counsels, various causes contributed, under Divine Providence, to abridge the period of severe suffering. These are fully set forth by Mr. Grew. Suffice it here to point to four causes: 1) That the vast strengthening of the walls of Jerusalem, which had been begun by Herod Agrippa, and which, if completed, would have made the city impregnable, was stopped by order of the Emperor Claudius (A. D. 43). Jos. Ant. xix. 7. 2. 2) That the Jews, from being divided into factions among themselves, had quite neglected all warlike preparations for a siege. 3) That the magazines of stores and provisions laid up for use, and which might have lasted for years, were consumed both by waste and by fire. Jos. Bell. v. 1. 5. 4) That the sudden arrival of Titus, and his strong desire to reduce the city at all hazards, as speedily as possible, mainly contributed, together with the voluntary abandonment of many strong points of defence by the infatuated Jews, to bring the war to a close much earlier than could have been expected.

23—26. There is here undoubtedly a reference to the state of things during the siege of Jerusalem, as described by Jos. Bell. ii. 13. 4, where he speaks of πλάνοι καὶ ἀπατεῶνες who, under the mask of piety, promoted innovations and political changes; and also (vi. 5) that many pretended prophets deceived—nay, he says, madened—the people, by promising to show them great signs and wonders from God, as the tokens of their approaching deliverance. Nevertheless, even there the principal reference may be to the events of the latter days, when a due regard to the prophetic declarations of their Lord will be found the best means of keeping Christ's Holy Catholic Church firm in her faith and obedience, amid every trial, unmoved by infidelity on the one hand, and fanaticism on the other, patiently waiting for the coming of the Lord, 2 Thess. iii. 5; συνῆρα ἀπακείχονθα, Phil. iii. 20. As respects the ψευδόχριστοι, I cannot find any evidence in Joseph. to the existence of such. That ψευδοπροφήται existed, there is testimony afforded by Jos. Ant. xxiv. 1, where one of this description is characterized as γόης, or one who affirmed himself to be a prophet, and engaged to divide by miracle the waters of the Jordan, and make a way for his followers to pass over the river into Perea. This depends, indeed, on the question whether ἰσὶς Theudas be the Theudas spoken of in Acts v. 36, or not; but if, as I have shown in my note there, it has been well made out that there were two impostors of that name, then the testimony of Joseph. here is left intact. The reference may, however, be likewise to the Egyptian impostor (προφήτης εἶναι λίγων) mentioned in Acts xxi. 38, and Jos. Ant. xx. 8. 6. Bell. ii. 13. 5, though not without some reference to the latter days. As to the words δῶσ. σημεῖα—καὶ τέρ., these also readily admit of a twofold reference. As respects their primary reference, there is sufficient evidence in Joseph. to prove that there were persons laying claim to miraculous powers, and prob. establishing their claims by various sleights of jugglery, which it is unnecessary for me to do more than allude to; but which, I would say, were less pernicious than those other sleights, not of hand, but of brain, consisting in a certain faculty of making truths look like appearances, and appearances like truths; thus confounding moral good and evil, and paving the way to Atheism, which will prob. mark the latter days. In short, not difficult is it to imagine in what will consist the various trials reserved for the faithful at that period, whose wisdom it will be to bear in mind their Lord's warning, ἰδοὺ, προεῖρηκα ὑμῖν.

28. ὅπου γὰρ—ἀετοί] In this figurative simile (which seems founded on Job xxxix. 30, οὐ δ' ἀνῶσι τιβειώτες, παραχρῆμα εὐρίσκονται, scil. οἱ ἀετοί) there seems an allusion to the certainty, as well as suddenness of the destruction; the meaning being, that 'the Son of man would come (figuratively by the Roman armies) as certainly and suddenly as birds of prey, discerning a carcass from afar, are sure to flock around suddenly from all quarters, and pounce upon it.' To the accuracy of which representation Oriental travellers bear ample testimony. Since, however, eagles do not feed on dead bodies, the best Commentators suppose the bird here meant to be the Vultur percnopterus, or γυψαίστες, which was by the ancients referred to the eagle genus; and the same Hebr. term denotes either one or the other. By πτώμα is designated the Jewish nation, lying, like the fabled Prometheus, a miserable prey to the foes who were tearing out her vitals. Under the allusion, however, is couched a great moral truth,—that 'wherever there is flagrant impiety, thither will vengeance from heaven surely and suddenly light upon it.'

I must not omit to notice the licence exercised by the ancient Critics, and our recent Critical Editors, on this portion, by cancelling the γάρ at v. 27, on the authority of only 3 MSS., a few Versions, and Irenæus, notwithstanding that internal evidence, and the testimony of the Pesch. Syr. Version, is added to the overwhelming amount of external authority (for I find the word in all the Lamb. and Brit. Mus. MSS.).—I say internal evidence, since it was far more likely to be omitted in so few copies by accident, than interpolated by design in all the rest. However, it may have been removed by fastidious Critics, who stumbled at the γάρ introducing vv. 27 and 28, as involving what is considered as, in style, worse than a tautology. Had the Critics been possessed of more judgment than one can give them credit for, I should have supposed that they thought the gravity and dignity of the apophthegm would be enhanced by the asyndeton, espec. from their having observed its effect on other passages, as John xix. 12. Gal. iii. 15. Col. iii. 4. At v. 27, Lachm. and Tisch. cancel the καὶ, on authority as strong as in the former case it is weak; and I find it absent from all the Lamb. copies except one, and all the best of the Mus. copies. Yet I cannot consider even this a case for change, when I take into account the presence of the καὶ in almost all the copies supra xvii. 12. xviii. 39. xxiii. 28. infra v. 33. Luke xi. 30. xvii. 10, et al. Of course, what is here said applies still more strongly at v. 37, where Lachm. and Tisch. cancel the καὶ from only two MSS.

²⁹ εὐθὺς δὲ, &c.] On this and the following verses the opinions of Commentators are much divided. The ancient and early modern ones understood the expressions literally; referring the whole to the awful events which will precede the final catastrophe of our globe, and the day of judgment; espec. as in the next chapter, and other parts of Scripture, the same signs are mentioned as ushering in the last great day. But from the connection here,—espec. in the parallel passages of Mark and Luke,—and from the assurance contained in them all, 'this generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled,' the most eminent later modern Expositors refer the passage to the signs accompanying the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish state. 'As (say they) our Lord has from v. 15 shown by what signs his disciples might know that the destruction of the Temple and city was at hand, so now he, in prophetic imagery, depicts the total ruin of the Jewish state.' They consider the language as highly figurative, understanding by the darkening of the sun, &c. the ruin of states and great personages. The appearance of the sign of the Son of man they take to denote the subversion of the Jewish state; and the gathering together of his elect they refer to the gathering of the Christian Church out of all nations. All which is very agreeable to the Prophetic style; for "as in ancient Hieroglyphic writings (observes Bp. Warburton) the sun, moon, and stars were used to represent states and empires, kings, queens, and nobility; and their eclipse or extinction denoted temporary disasters, or entire overthrow; so the Prophets, in like manner, call kings and empires by the heavenly luminaries. Stars falling from the firmament are employed to denote the destruction of the nobles and other great men. See Isa. xiii. 10. xxiv. 23. li. 6. lx. 20. Ez. xxxii. 7. Dan. viii. 10. Ezech. viii. 16. Jer. iv. 23. xv. 9. Joel ii. 10, 13, 31. iii. 15. Amos viii. 9. Apoc. vi. 12 sq. Inasmuch that, in reality, the prophetic style seems to be a speaking hieroglyphic. And as our Lord here sustained the character of a prophet, so he vouchsafed to employ prophetic imagery." Of similar figurative language many examples, too, have been adduced from the Greek writers by Wetst. But true as this may be, it is carrying truth beyond its due bounds, by not attending to that double reference so prevalent throughout this chap. Indeed, but for the εὐθὺς μετὰ τὴν θλίψιν, &c., and the words at v. 34, the passage would seem applicable only to our Lord's final advent. Though, when we consider that, throughout this chap., he makes the destruction of Jerusalem and the ruin of the Jewish state a type of the end of the world,—speaking of the former event in terms which would seem more suitable to the latter,—we are authorized, and, on account of the two passages just referred to, seem bound to interpret vv. 29, 30, and 31, as though directly pointing to the end of the world and the day of judgment, yet figuratively glancing at the destruction of the Jewish state, and the establishment of the Christian dispensation on the ruins of the Jewish. And this, as we have seen, is more than justified by the foregoing passages from the Old Test., nearly as parallel as some which pass for quotations; comp. Rev. vi. 12, 13, καὶ τακίῃσονται πᾶσαι αἱ δυνάμεις τῶν οὐρανῶν, καὶ ἐλθρήσεται ὁ οὐρανὸς ὡς βιβλίον, καὶ πάντα τὰ ἄστρα πείσονται, where the same double sense likewise subsists, and is recognised by Bp. Lowth. In αἱ δυνάμεις τοῦ οὐρανοῦ we have an expression freq. in the Sept. to denote the heavenly bodies. There is no vain repetition, but intensity of sense communicated by the expression of the same thing in other words.

τῷ οὐρανῷ^m καὶ τότε κόψονται πᾶσαι αἱ φυλαὶ τῆς γῆς, καὶ ὄψονται τὸν Τίον τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐρχόμενον ἐπὶ τῶν νεφελῶν τοῦ οὐρανοῦ μετὰ δυνάμεως καὶ δόξης πολλῆς. ³¹ ^m Καὶ ἀπο- ^m ^{Supra 18.} ^{41.} ¹ ^{Cor. 15. 52.} ¹ ^{Thess. 4.} ^{16.} στελεῖ τοὺς ἀγγέλους αὐτοῦ μετὰ σάλπυγγος φωνῆς μεγάλης καὶ ἐπισυνάξουσιν τοὺς ἐκλεκτοὺς αὐτοῦ ἐκ τῶν τεσσάρων ἀνέμων, ἀπ' ἁκρων οὐρανῶν ἕως ἁκρων αὐτῶν.

allusion to the sign from heaven required. See supra xvi. 1. But it should rather seem that τὸ σημεῖον really means the visible appearance; q. d. 'Then shall be seen the visible appearance of the Son of man,' i. e. then shall the Son of man visibly appear, and shall give manifest evidences of his power by the destruction of the Jewish state, as subservient to the establishment of the Christian dispensation—such, at least, is its primary reference. It is plain that our Lord refers to that well-known prophecy of Daniel predicting the advent of the Son of man as 'coming in the clouds of heaven,' in order to enter upon an universal and everlasting kingdom; thereby intimating its approaching fulfilment as the true sign of his coming so earnestly inquired after by his disciples. Yet this does not hinder that the expression φαίνεται τὸ σημ., &c., should not, according to the other reference, have its fulfilment in the display of some physical sign indicative of the actual advent of the Son of man. As to what that may be we are left quite in the dark, and ought not rashly to speculate on it. Further, in αἱ φυλαὶ τῆς γῆς (the land) we may discern a double sense, so as to denote, according to the primary one, the inhabitants of Judæa (who would feel the hand from on high in the dire calamities coming upon them). See Luke xxiii. 28, and comp. Zech. xii. 12),—according to the secondary one, to intimate that the nations of the world that 'lieth in iniquity' will wail (see Matt. xi. 17, and note) when Christ comes to judgment. In ἐρχόμενον ἐπὶ τῶν νεφελῶν, &c., we have gorgeous imagery, which might seem assimilated to the character of Hebrew poetry, to designate that majesty of approach referred to in δόξης πολλῆς, and that putting forth of power, denoted by δυνάμεις; in which view we may compare Ps. xviii. 9—12. Is. xix. 1. Yet the literal sense seems required by the assurance of the Angel at our Lord's ascension, οὕτως (meaning, in clouds) ἐλεύσεται (return) ὡς τρόπον ἰδεῖσθαι πορευόμενον εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν' this evidently referring more especially to our Lord's coming at the last day. The expression δυνάμεις may have reference both to the power manifested in the final destruction of Jerusalem, &c., and in the secondary sense, to that shown in the destruction of the universe (2 Pet. iii. 7. 10. 12), the raising of the dead, and the other events of the last great day; all evincing the power of Christ's kingdom.

cation, which even those who have recognized it before seem here to forget. The application of the words to the final advent of our Lord (here principally intended) is too obvious to need pointing out. But neither ought the first advent of our Lord to be kept out of view; for, even in that application, the words have much propriety; τοὺς ἀγγέλους αὐτοῦ denoting the preachers of the Gospel, announcing the message of salvation, and gathering those who should accept its offer from every quarter of the globe (see v. 14) into one society under Christ, their common Head. In the words μετὰ σάλπ. φων. μεγ. there should seem, in both the above applications, to be a reference to the method of convoking solemn assemblies among the Jews and Gentiles,—namely, by sound of trumpet, implying a summons of the most public and authoritative kind. See Is. lviii. 1. Jer. vi. 17. Ez. xxxiii. 3—6. In the words ἐκ τῶν τεσσ. ἀνέμων we have a Hebrew formula, denoting, 'from all quarters or regions of the globe;' for, according to Jewish ideas, the winds served not only to denote the cardinal points of heaven, but to mark the regions which lay in the direction of any of them. The words ἀπ' ἁκρων—αὐτῶν are also a Hebrew form, containing an emphatic repetition of the same thing. Strange is it that Mr. Alf. should seem inclined to receive καὶ before φωνῆς, from MS. D and 6 cursives, with some Latin copies, since it is merely a critical alteration devised for the purpose of removing a certain harshness, which other Critics sought to remove by cancelling φωνῆς. As to the passage of 1 Thess. iv. 16, ἐν φωνῇ ἀρχ. καὶ ἐν σάλπιγγι Θεοῦ, that does not, as Mr. Alf. imagines, support the καὶ here, since the two passages are altogether different in character. Moreover, the φωνῇ and the σάλπιγγι are there necessarily distinguished, while here they could not, without occasioning a very jejune sense to arise. I suspect, however, that the former Critics inserted the καὶ from bearing in mind the passage of 1 Thess. And as to jeune quaintness, while the ancient Critics had a good digestion and relish of such cates, neither are their admirers in modern times a whit behind them in that faculty and taste.

³² ἀπὸ δὲ τῆς συκῆς—παραβολὴν.] The full sense is: 'Take [for your instruction] the illustration which may be derived from the fig-tree.' There is here an answer to the inquiry, v. 3, as to the time of this destruction, which our Lord intimates will be as plainly indicated by the signs above mentioned, as the approach of summer is by the buds of the fig-tree.

35. ὁ οὐρανὸς — παρελεύσονται] Griesb., Fritz., Lachm., and Tisch. edit παρελύσεται, from 4 ancient MSS. And so Griesb., Fritz., and Scholz, on the parallel passage of Mark, edit from many more MSS.; but Tisch. retains παρελεύσονται. In the parallel passage of Luke, Lachm. edits παρελύσεται, but Griesb., Scholz, and Tisch. παρελεύσονται, very properly, since the external evidence for the singular is small. As to the passages of Matthew and Mark, the external authority for παρελύσεται is very much stronger in the latter than in the former; and if παρελύσεται be edited in the former, it ought still more in the latter. But I prefer retaining παρελεύσονται in both passages, since it is confirmed by the parallel passage of Luke.

36. This, too, is intended as an answer to the question at v. 3. The sense of the verse will partly depend upon the reference, which is by most Expositors supposed to be the final advent of Christ exclusively. Yet as the words following relate partly, if not chiefly, to the destruction of Jerusalem, so must this, at least primarily; though in the secondary, but more august sense, it may be referred to the day of judgment. And indeed ἐκείνη ἡμέρα is often used to denote that period; as 1 Thess. v. 4. 2 Thess. i. 10. 2 Tim. v. 4. i. 12. 18. iv. 8; whereas the expression is very rarely used of the destruction of Jerusalem.

— καὶ τῆς ὥρας]. The Article, not found in several ancient MSS. both here and in Mark xiii. 32, has been cancelled by Griesb., Matt., Fritz., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch. Bp. Middl., however, affirms that the Article is here required by propriety. Yet that is no sufficient proof that it was used by the Evangelist. At any rate, that there is not, as many suppose, an Hendiadys, is plain from what follows at vv. 37. 42. 50, and xxv. 13, nay, seems intended to introduce a more definite, and a stronger term, q. d. imo horæ, which expression would seem to demand the Article. Upon the whole, the reading is an open question. At any rate, there is nothing to warrant the cancelling of the words καὶ τῆς ὥρας, with MS. L and some ancient cursive copies;—a method which does not untie, but only cuts the knot. The Lamb. and Mus. copies all have the text. rec. The mon just after is cancelled by Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch., from B. D. L, and 18 cursive MSS. (to which I could add a few of the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies), which is confirmed by the usage of Matth. elsewhere. See vii. 21. x. 32 sq. xi. 27. xii. 50. xv. 13. xvi. 17. xviii. 10. 19. 35. xxvi. 29, 30, 42, 53. The genuineness of the word may be doubted.

As respects the doctrine involved in the words, suffice it to refer to Calvin, Grot., Hamm., Whitby, and Pye Smith (Scr. Test. t. ii. p. 33 seqq.), who allege the authority of the Fathers generally, Concilium non obstantibus. I must, however, still interpose a quo warranto, and refer the reader to my remark supra xix. 18. Between this and the next verse should, in harmonizing, be brought in Luke xxi. 34—36, with Gresw., which is very important, as presenting the serious caution then given by our Lord, to be on their guard lest they should be entangled unawares in the ruin which would suddenly overwhelm their country, and also—unless they took heed—occasion a more fearful ruin. This caution was, I apprehend, first given, as it stands in the passage of Luke, briefly; and then, after a short pause, the deeply important subject was resumed, as recorded in Matt. xxiv. 37, introduced by the comparison deduced from the case of Noah, and continued thenceforward up to the 13th ver. of ch. xxv., terminating with the oft repeated admonition to watchfulness, which is, indeed, the ground-tone of the whole of these portions of the two Evangelists. In that of Matth., however, the lesson is carried out much further, and the exhortations are earnestly enforced by various considerations, espec. by contrasting the widely different results of the two different courses—the blessedness of the one, and the banefulness of the other, as terminating in the awful sentence πορεύσθε ἀπ' ἐμοῦ, οἱ κατηραμένοι, εἰς τὸ πῦρ τὸ αἰώνιον. In the carrying out of the above purpose, the Discourse (the last our Lord pronounced in public before he was offered up), as it proceeds, assumes gradually a parabolic form, until at length it passes into regular Parable. I need scarcely say, that both in the passage of Luke and in this portion of Matth., the reference is almost exclusively to the second advent of Christ to judgment; the great purpose of our Lord being, in both, to warn his hearers, and, through them, all his disciples of every age, against that unpreparedness arising from self-security and sensuality, neglect of prayerful watching, which unfits men to meet their Judge, though he may be at the door, and their doom be that judgment without mercy (James ii. 13), of which the vengeance exercised by Christ at his first advent on the unbelieving Jewish nation was but a type.

37—39. The force of the comparison here (occurring also in Luke xvii. 26, 27, with the addition of the days of Lot) involves principally the point of the suddenness and unexpectedness, as τοῦ Τιού τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. ³⁸ ὥσπερ γὰρ ἦσαν ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ταῖς πρὸ τοῦ κατακλυσμοῦ τρώγοντες καὶ πίνοντες, γαμοῦντες καὶ ἐγκαμίζοντες, ἄχρι ἧς ἡμέρας εἰσῆλθε Νῶε εἰς τὴν κιβωτὸν, ³⁹ καὶ οὐκ ἔγνωσαν ἕως ἡλθεν ὁ κατακλυσμὸς καὶ ἦρεν ἅπαντας· οὕτως ἔσται καὶ ἡ παρουσία τοῦ Τιού τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. ⁴⁰ * Τότε ^{a Luke 17. 30.} δύο ἔσονται ἐν τῷ ἀγρῷ· ὁ εἰς παραλαμβάνεται, καὶ ὁ εἰς ἀφίεται. ⁴¹ δύο ἀλήθουσαι ἐν τῷ μυλῶνι· μία παραλαμβάνεται, καὶ μία ἀφίεται.

characterizing each of the awful calamities here predicted, q. d. 'The same shall take place at the advent of Christ, as did in the time of Noah.' The case of Lot is also adduced in 2 Pet. ii. 4—10. iii. 5, 6. Thus are brought together the two grand circumstances in Holy Writ, which bear upon the present case,—thereby, of course, attesting the historic reality of the Deluge, which has been more than called in question by the Neologians of our days. The words ἦσαν τρώγοντες, &c., and those of Luke, ἡσθιον, &c., represent graphically the fancied security, and carelessness, with which the persons carried on the ordinary business of life, with all its sensual pleasures, when on the very brink of destruction. The sentiment is then further developed and illustrated at vv. 38—41.

³⁹ οὐκ ἔγνωσαν] Meaning that they did not care to know it, though they had ample means for knowing it from the earnest warnings in the preaching of Noah, confirmed by his preparation of the ark; notwithstanding which, they, in point of fact, did not know, did not bring the danger home to their hearts, so as to bring forth fruits unto repentance and ultimate preservation.

⁴⁰ τότε δύο ἔσονται, &c.] Some take this to denote that the destruction will be as general as it will be unexpected; so that no two persons employed together shall both escape. Others suppose it to mean that some of both sexes shall escape, while others shall perish; implying a providential distinction. Both those views may be admitted (as merging into each other); the scope of the verses being to illustrate both the suddenness (see Luke xxi. 35) and the awful nature of the catastrophe,—and at the same time to intimate, that, however wide-spread, it will not be without merciful exceptions. Of those in the same place and in the exercise of the same occupation, some shall perish, while others will be spared.

The ὁ twice here occurring, is in each case absent from MSS. B, D, L, and is cancelled by Fritz, Lachm., and Tisch., seemingly, and in the case of Fritz, avowedly, on account of the μία—μία of the next verse; the very circumstance, I imagine, which caused the Critical Reviser of the text of B, &c., to remove the ὁ, forgetting that in the parallel passage of Luke xvii. 36, the ὁ is found in almost every MS., at least every MS. that has the verse, the cause of whose omission I have, after other Editors, pointed out.

^{42—44}. Here our Lord resumes the tone of direct exhortation; and, having hitherto spoken of the Judgments he would in his first Advent inflict on the unbelieving Jews,—a type of the general judgment at his last Advent,—he proceeds to inculcate the necessity of being always prepared to meet that final judgment. Accordingly this, and the subsequent matter, form the Moral of the whole Prophetic Discourse, and point its practical Application to Christ's faithful disciples of every age.

^{45—47}. Our Lord had, as we find from Luke xii. 42—47, given this parabolic illustration on a former occasion, in answer to a question from Peter, which question suggested the Parable, or parabolic illustration, here employed. The question was (xii. 41) Κύριε, πρὸς ἡμᾶς τὴν παραβολὴν ταύτην λέγεις, ἢ καὶ πρὸς πάντας; For the Apostles, it seems, were always fancying that they should have exemptions and privileges beyond the multitude. Now the answer to Peter was intended to correct this erroneous notion; and, in order to prevent its being again entertained, the foregoing general admonition to watchfulness, as a duty incumbent on all Christians, was here again—in earnest repetition of already heard and then received doctrine—urged as espec. incumbent on those who are entrusted with any spiritual charge, as οἰκονόμοι τῶν μυστηρίων τοῦ Θεοῦ, to feed the flock of Christ with the seasonable food of sound doctrine. On the same principle we may account for several of these last sayings of our Lord in public being repetitions of what had been said on former occasions, or at least references thereto; which would naturally bring to mind what had been, we may be sure, carefully treasured up in memory. But, to advert to the matter at v. 45, as respects the force (somewhat debated) of τίς ἔρα ἴστιν,—the most correct view is, I apprehend, that of the Greek Fathers and Commentators, and some eminent modern Expositors,—namely, that this is a case in which interrogation has exclamation combined therewith, as intended to express how rare and estimable is such a servant! Yet the idiom is one so seldom met with, and the examples adduced of it so little to the purpose, that the following, from Max. Tyr. Diss. xxxi., in which there is a very similar turn, may be not unacceptable: εἰ δὲ ποῦ τις ἐστὶ ἀγαθός—τίς οὖν ἴστιν ὁ κυβερνήτης οὗτος; κ.τ.λ. As respects the reading οἰκτεῖται edited by L. and T., instead of θεραπεῖται, from 2 MSS. only, it is manifestly a gloss; and the other alterations of the same Editors at vv. 45, 46, could easily be shown to be mere paradoxiώσεις.

κατέστησεν ὁ κύριος αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τῆς θεραπείας αὐτοῦ, τοῦ δίδόναι αὐτοῖς τὴν τροφήν ἐν καιρῷ; ⁴⁶ * Μακάριος ὁ δούλος ἐκεῖνος, ὃν ἐλθὼν ὁ κύριος αὐτοῦ εὐρήσει ποιοῦντα οὕτως. ⁴⁷ * Ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι ἐπὶ πᾶσι τοῖς ὑπάρχουσιν αὐτοῦ καταστήσει αὐτόν. ⁴⁸ Ἐὰν δὲ εἴπῃ ὁ κακὸς δούλος ἐκεῖνος ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ αὐτοῦ· Χρονίζει ὁ κύριός μου ἐλθεῖν ⁴⁹ καὶ ἄρξηται τύπτειν τοὺς συνδούλους αὐτοῦ, * ἐσθίη † δὲ καὶ * πίνη μετὰ τῶν μεθύοντων ⁵⁰ ἥξει ὁ κύριος τοῦ δούλου ἐκείνου ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἣ οὐ προσδοκᾷ, καὶ ἐν ὥρᾳ ἣ οὐ γινώσκει. ⁵¹ * καὶ διχοτομήσει αὐτόν, καὶ τὸ

48. κακός] I am still of opinion that by this term κακός here found, though absent from the parallel passage of Luke, is intimated a transition, not from a good to a bad servant, but from the good to the bad mind of the same servant who has before been mentioned. This seems required by the parallel passage of Luke xii. 45. As to the course pursued by Fritz., and by Tisch. (1 Ed.), to cancel the ἐκείνους, that is forbidden by the concurrent testimony of all the MSS. and Versions. Hence the only unobjectionable mode of interpreting the words is that which I have already proposed, and which, so far from being novel, was adopted as early as the time of Euthym., who explains the words to mean ὁ ἀπίστος καὶ ἄφρων ἀποβάς, 'he who has turned out,' 'proved himself' ἀπίστος and ἄφρων from being πιστός and φρόνιμος. So too Dr. Hammond and Abp. Newcome, I find, interpret. The view which I advocate has the advantage of making all plain and intelligible. The person designated is not an absolute, but a virtual, or practical unbeliever, who, because his Lord delays his coming, is apt to think, and acts as if he thought, his Lord would never come at all; and, accordingly, he scruples not to do things the most unbecoming in a minister, making himself odious by a violent and despotic carriage ("lording it over God's heritage," 1 Pet. v. 3) joined with a worldly spirit, and evil and corrupt life and conversation.

After χρον. ὁ κύριος the word ἐλθεῖν is cancelled by Lachm., from MSS. B 6, 33, Copt. and Sah. Vers., as also Iren. and Orig.—to which authority I am enabled to add that of Ephr. Syr., teste Jacks. This authority, however, is quite inadequate in a case like the present, in which internal evidence is in favour of the word, from the greater likelihood of its having been put out, as superfluous, than put in because necessary. As to Versions and Fathers, they are in a case like this of no inconsiderable weight against a word, though they cannot safely want of MS. authority.

49. After συνδούλους the pron. αὐτοῦ is inserted, from several of the best MSS. (including the principal Lamb. and Mus. copies), Versions, and Fathers, by Grieb., Lachm., Tisch., and Scholz. All the best Editors from Weta. to Tisch. are agreed on the reading ἐσθίη καὶ πίνη, instead of ἐσθίειν and πίνειν,—a reading which has the strongest evidence of MSS., Vers., and Fathers, and is confirmed by internal evidence. In support of the reading δι, to the authority of the MS. C and 8 ancient cursives, I add that of Lamb. 1175, 1179, 1187, 1188, Scr. m. n. and 3 ancient Mus. copies; as also the Pesch. Syr., Pers., Arab., Æthiop., and Copt. Versions, also Ephr. Syr., teste Jacks. And the reading is worthy of more attention than it has received from the Editors; yet, after all, I suspect it to be no other than a critical emendation, liable, however, to the objection that this highly Classical form of expression τε—καὶ is scarcely to be met with in the Evangelists.

51. διχοτομήσει αὐτόν—θήσει] Of these words various interpretations have been propounded, which I have shown to be alike inadmissible. Suffice it here to advert to those which have at least verisimilitude. Worthy of attention is the exposition of Chrys. and Euthym., adopted by Beza, Mald., and Valckn., according to which διχοτομ. is understood to denote separation from the rest of the servants, and consignment to a prison; two punishments being here denoted,—that of removal from an office ill discharged, and that of being thrown into an ergastulum, or house of correction for bad servants; the term being, they think, employed for the purpose of intimating, that such are merely pretenders to be good servants, but not in reality such, as being those who render only eye-service, being unfaithful to their trust, equiv. to the τῶν ἀπίστων in the passage of Luke,—namely, such as are not true believers at all,

XXV. 1 * Τότε ὁμοιωθήσεται ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν δέκα • Rev. 10. 7. παρθένοι, αἵτινες λαβοῦσαι τὰς λαμπάδας αὐτῶν, ἐξῆλθον εἰς

since the hypocrite cannot be really a believer. According to this view, the expression will be a forcible one, to denote what we understand by cutting off and excluding from any society; and, as the words following, 'there shall be weeping,' &c., will have reference to the positive punishment to be inflicted, so διχοτομ. may thus be said to have reference to the negative one of privation of the joys of the blest. And certainly the sense thus yielded is very suitable; but proof is wanting that διχοτομῆς ever signified to separate. The only evidence hitherto adduced is merely such as is supplied by the phrase τίμνειν διχα, as used in the sense seorsim secare. But I cannot find that διχοτομῆς had ever any such sense; nevertheless, its verbal noun διχοτόμησις is used by Sext. Emp. ix. 284, in the sense separation; and therefore the above interpretation may be the true one,—agreeably to which, the person is considered as a covenant-breaker; and in the term expressing the punishment thereof there is an allusion to the punishment of covenant-breakers by the being put out of covenant by a sort of figurative oulawry. In this view, the covenant alluded to would be the baptismal covenant violated by practical infidelity, and the punishment separation from the congregation of the faithful both here and hereafter, consignment to the society of the accursed, condemned to woe everlasting. But this positive infliction cannot without violence be extracted from διχοτ. taken in the foregoing sense merely by a philological implication. Accordingly, I am still of opinion that the simplest, most natural, and obvious sense, and that confirmed by the phrase employed in Luke just after δαρήσεται πολλὰς, is that which supposes the term to signify, 'will scourge him severely,' i. e. 'adjudge him to the severest punishment.'—διχοτ. being taken as in the case of many similar ones, such as δαρεῖν, 'to flog,' τίμνειν μέσον. So Hist. Susannæ, v. 35, σχίσαι σε μέσον,—and 39, πρίσαι σε μέσον,—and Arrian, Epict. iii. 22. 2 (of a disorderly servant), ἐπιστραφείς δι' ὁ κύριος, καὶ ἰδὼν αὐτὸν σοβαρῶς διατασσόμενον, ἐλύσας ἔτεμεν.

The next words are added as it were to screw up the representation to the highest pitch, q. d. 'As the master will miserably scourge such a servant, and consign him to the woeful abode of incorrigible criminals, so will the Lord consign the wilfully disobedient disciple to the abode of hypocrites, HELL, where there is ὁ κλαυθμὸς, καὶ ὁ βρυγμὸς τῶν ὀδόντων.'

XXV. The two Parables which follow (vv. 1—13, 14—30) are intended to carry on the subject treated of in the latter part of the preceding chapter (this being one continued discourse on the Mount of Olives, in sight of the Temple). That subject was, in a more especial sense, the coming of Christ at the day of Judgment, or, what is tantamount to it, the hour of death. And the object of both is to warn men of the necessity of being always prepared to meet their Judge. Accordingly, at the close of these parables there is a transition to the subject of the general judgment only.

Of the former Parable, vv. 1—13, recorded by St. Matthew alone [which (as Mr. Gresw. observes) was intended to be as applicable to the moral probation and moral responsibility of all who agreed in the character of Christians in general, as the parabolic allegory which had preceded, to those of the ministers of religion in particular], the moral meant to be conveyed is, the blessedness and necessity of endurance unto the end (see Calv. and Gresw.), and consequently (as the ancient Fathers are agreed) the evil of a late repentance; on which see Bp. Taylor, Works, vol. iii. p. 345.

1. τότε] i. e. at the period just before spoken of, when the Son of man shall come to judgment; or, as some explain, to his personal reign on earth preceding it. Of ὁμοιωθ. the full sense is, 'will be found like unto,' by many points of similarity, thus illustrating difference of character, &c. The practical application is supplied by our Lord himself, v. 13.

—λαμπάδας] i. e. rather torches than 'lamps;' for, as appears from a Rabbinical writer in Lightfoot, they were formed of a piece of iron wrapped round with old linen, and moistened with oil.

—ἐξῆλθον εἰς ἀπάντ. τ. ν.] A difficulty exists as to the going out here spoken of, which Rosenm. and Kuinoel endeavour to remove by understanding the verb of intention, not of action. Grotius has recourse to a philological device, supposing the figure Prolepsis. Both methods are alike inadmissible. The difficulty is thus handled by Mr. Greswell, vol. v. p. 453: 'That they must not be supposed to go forth directly to meet the bridegroom, nor consequently to the place where he was, appears from the result; that they must be supposed to go forth to some quarter different from that whence they set out, and some quarter where they might expect to meet with the bridegroom at last, follows from the necessity of the case. We may presume, then, that the place to which they are supposed to go, is the house of the bride.' A solution evidently formed on that proposed by myself in Recons. Synop., that there were two goings forth; one to a certain distance on the way from the bride's house; namely, some friend's house by the way; the other from thence, when, on the bridegroom's party being announced, they move forward to meet him. Whether Mr. Greswell has improved upon, while he has borrowed my solution, is very doubtful. At any rate some other Expositors, as Bp. Lonsdale, have adopted it in its unimproved state. Nevertheless, how the preliminary assemblage of the virgins, from their houses respectively, to attend on the bride, can be supposed to be adverted to in the words ἐξῆλθον εἰς ἀπάντησιν τοῦ νυμφίου, I am at a loss to see. And after all there is, perhaps, no occasion to suppose two goings forth, since, strictly speaking, the narrative has not even commenced at v. 1; the thing being spoken of only in a general way; as much as to say, that the case in question bears a close resemblance to that of a marriage party of virgins going forth to meet the bridegroom.

This final view, set forth in my third Ed., in which I still acquiesce, I find adopted by Mr. Alf., who remarks that ἐξῆλθον is not their final going out (v. 6), for only half of them did so, but their leaving their own homes. See λαβοῦσαι—ἐλαβον, &c., vv. 3, 4.

2. αἱ φρόνιμοι.] The αἱ has no place in MSS. B, C, D, L, and others, and has been cancelled by Fritz., Lach., and Tisch.; but wrongly. The text, rec., indeed, is without the αἱ, which had been put out by the Elz. Editor, though it was in all the former Editions. It was, however, afterwards restored by Matthæi, Griesb., and Scholz, though again dismissed by Lachm. and Tisch.; yet without reason, since internal evidence is quite in its favour, from its being most likely to have been put out by some who did not perceive that the Article has here great force, q. d. 'the remaining five;—a use of the Art. freq. in the best writers.

4. αἱ φρόνιμοι.] Render, 'the provident.' Such they were, as taking care to provide a supply of oil to keep their lamps burning; which, spiritually understood, is, 'preserving the inner spiritual life duly fed with the oil of the Spirit of grace.'

5. ἐνύσταξαν πᾶσαι, καὶ ἐκάθεδον.] 'they all became drowsy, and began to sleep.' This punctuation, which I think called for by the occasion, I find in some of the most ancient MSS., as the Lamb. 1193, of the 8th century.

6. The ἔρχεται after νυμφίος is absent from 5 uncial and several cursive MSS., together with the Coptic, Arab., and Sahid. Vers., and some Fathers. Internal evidence in this case is nearly equal, considering that the word may have been removed by the Critics, for the purpose of correcting a slight negligence of composition as existing in ἔρχεται—ἐξέρχεσθε. I find it in all the Lamb., Scriv., and Mus. copies, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Vers.

7. ἐκόσμησαν] lit. 'put them in order for use;' for the more Class. ἐπισκίασαν, sometimes, however, used by the Sept., as Exod. xxx. 8.

9. The reading which I have, with Lach. and Tisch., adopted, οὐ μὴ, instead of οὐκ, is, I find, supported by many ancient MSS.; to which I add all the best of the Lamb. and Mus. copies; and it derives confirmation from Jer. iii. 12, in some copies: καὶ οὐ μὴ στῆριώ τὸ πρόσωπόν μον ἐφ' ὤμαρ, where other copies (even the Vat. and Alex.) have simply οὐ. In such a case, however, the οὐ μὴ is not put for οὐ, but yields a stronger sense (see note on Luke xxii. 34. Rev. ix. 6), such as is very suitable in the passage above noticed of Jerem.; and not less so here, as well calculated to express the extreme fear that the prudent virgins felt lest the oil should not suffice for both. As to the ellipsis, there is no grammatical ellipsis at all, but rather an aposiopesis of some words suppressed cercundia causâ, to some such effect as this, we are afraid, or 'we must take care,' or such like; the ancients attaching some kind of shame to denying a request. Though, in the present case, as the request was unreasonable, so the denial was justifiable, and indeed unavoidable; since the oil which the prudent virgins had taken with them would probably be no more than sufficient for themselves; and consequently to have shared it with the others would only have rendered it insufficient for all, and thus have occasioned the non-attendance and exclusion of all. In fact, they do not refuse, but intimate that they dare not, must not, grant the request, lest there should not be enough of oil for both parties.

The words πορεύεσθε—πρὸς τοὺς παλῶντας καὶ ἀγοράσατε ἑαυταῖς, I would not, with Luther and Calv., regard as spoken in mockery, but in earnest, earnest, as was fitting; for (as Matth. Henry observes) 'those who deal foolishly in the affairs of their souls, are to be pitied, not insulted over, for "who made thee to differ," &c.?' By the action of buying is to be understood procuring in any way (without reference to price), as in Is. lv. 1, "Come, buy wine and milk without money and without price;" and again, Rev. iii. 18, "buy of me gold tried in the fire." Thus it is intimated that the oil of grace is to be earnestly sought, and carefully preserved when obtained, through earnest prayer, from the only Dispenser, the Holy Spirit, sent, through the intercession of Christ, from God the Father. See John xiv. 16.

The δι before πορεύεσθε is absent from several of the most ancient uncial, and not a few ancient cursive copies (to which I add 2 Lamb., 4 Scriv., and one Mus. copy), and it is cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch., with more than usual reason. Internal evidence is rather against than for the word, which might seem more likely to be put in than put out. Yet I am not sure that the Asyndeton is suitable here. And considering the quarter whence the reading comes, I cannot but suspect it to have been cancelled by certain Critics, who thought it came too soon after the δὲ just before.

12. οὐκ οἶδα ὑμᾶς] A form of absolute repulsion and rejection, q. d. 'I know nothing about you; go about your business'; as in the passages of Issus and Plautus adduced by me, supra vii. 23.

13. ἔργηορεῖτε οὖν, &c.] An admonition containing the great fundamental truth which it is the purpose of the whole parable to inculcate, and with reference to which all its minuter parts are brought to bear. The words ἐν ᾗ ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρ. ἔρχεται are absent from several uncials, and many cursive MSS., most of the Verns., and some Fathers; and are cancelled by Griesb., Fritz., Scholz., Lach., and Tisch. They have certainly the air of an addition to fill up the sense, perhaps from supra xxiv. 42. 44. The sentence may indeed thus seem to terminate somewhat abruptly (the very reason which, we imagine, led the ancient Critics to fill up what appeared wanting); but several passages might be adduced from the Classical writers where something at the end of a sentence is left to be supplied from the context, or the subject-matter. One example may here suffice. Polymen. p. 749, ed. Maass.: Καὶ οὕτως τὸν καιρὸν οὕτως τὴν ἡμέραν προέλεγον, when he would lead them to battle.

14. ὥς περ γὰρ ἄνθρωπος, &c.] Something here seems wanting, which Commentators variously supply; some, by ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν; others, by ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου; which last, from the context and character of the similitude, is preferable. However, there may be, as Grot., Mald., and Fritz. think, an Anacoluthon, or unfinished construction.

The Parable now introduced, peculiar to Matth., nearly resembles that of the Pounds at Luke xix. 12; though there are several points of dissimilarity, on which see Greswell. It is meant still further to illustrate the manner in which Christ will deal with men at his return to judgment. Or to enter more particularly into its nature, there are, Greswell thinks, two histories combined therein; the 1st comprehending the first 5 verses; the 2d continuing to the end; one containing a scheme of probation; the other one of retribution; one preparing the way for the other; and of course the latter economy forming the principal subject of the parabolic narrative. But the more obvious, and the simpler mode of viewing the matter is, to consider the different sums delivered to the servants here in such different proportions, and employed by them in as different modes, as representing the various gifts bestowed upon, and the different opportunities afforded to, the various members of Christ's Church; and which admit of being by them employed either profitably or unprofitably. The reckoning with, and the calling to account of, those servants, has too obvious a reference to need pointing out. By the utter rejection of the merely slodiful servant's excuse, we learn how utterly unavailing must be any excuse that shall be urged in extenuation of whatever duty, laid upon us, shall be left unfulfilled. A yet more important lesson is here supplied, in the different portions dealt out to the faithful servants, and awarded to the proportional measure of profitable employment of the advantages and opportunities, be they many or few, which have been dealt out to them by him "who ordereth all things according to the purpose and counsel of his own will." See Eph. i. 11.

— τοὺς ἰδίους δούλους] If the ἰδίους be regarded as emphatic, or even very significant, it will mean (as Greswell explains) 'his own peculiar servants'; meaning a certain number opposed to the rest of his household; implying, as Wetstein explains, such as he judged fittest for such a trust. But ἰδίους may be here used simply for the possessive pronoun, as often both in the Sept. and the New Test., ex. gr. Job vii. 10. Prov. xxvii. 8. Matt. xxii. 5. Tit. ii. 5. 1 Pet. iii. 1. 5. And the ancient Versions, as well as the αὐτῶν of Mark xv. 20, confirm this. The use, however, of the term at the next verse in the sense peculiar, may incline one to think it so meant here; and thus it will denote 'his own servants'; meaning professing Christians, as opposed to heathens. They may be called 'his own servants,' his peculiar, private property, by way of intimating that as they were "bought with a price" by their Master, so it is their duty to be devoted to his work, as slaves to their owners. Hence the master might, and often did, on travelling to a distant country, distribute portions of his capital to such of his slaves as could, either by handicraft employments or petty trading, fructify it; and consequently he could call to account, and, when requisite, punish, those who had neglected their duty in that respect, which duty was to be discharged κατὰ τὴν ἰδίαν δύναμιν, 'according to their respective capacity and ability.'

κατὰ τὴν ἰδίαν δύναμιν καὶ ἀπεδήμησεν εὐθέως. ¹⁶ Πορευθεὶς δὲ ὁ τὰ πέντε τάλαντα λαβὼν, εἰργάσατο ἐν αὐτοῖς, καὶ ἐποίησεν ἄλλα πέντε τάλαντα. ¹⁷ ὁ δὲ δύο, ἐκέρδησεν καὶ αὐτὸς ἄλλα δύο. ¹⁸ ὁ δὲ τὸ ἐν λαβὼν, ἀπελθὼν ὥρυξεν ἐν τῇ γῇ, καὶ ἀπέκρυψε τὸ ἀργύριον τοῦ κυρίου αὐτοῦ. ¹⁹ Μετὰ δὲ χρόνον πολὺν ἔρχεται ὁ κύριος τῶν δούλων ἐκείνων, καὶ συναίρει μετ' αὐτῶν λόγον. ²⁰ Καὶ προσελθὼν ὁ τὰ πέντε τάλαντα λαβὼν, προσήνεγκεν ἄλλα πέντε τάλαντα, λέγων· Κύριε, πέντε τάλαντά μοι παρέδωκας· ἴδε, ἄλλα πέντε τάλαντα ἐκέρδησα ἐπ' αὐτοῖς. ²¹ Ἐφῆ [δὲ] αὐτῷ ὁ κύριος αὐτοῦ· Εὐ, δοῦλε ἀγαθὲ καὶ πιστὲ, ἐπὶ ὀλίγα ἡς πιστὸς, ἐπὶ πολλῶν σε καταστήσω· εἰσελθε εἰς τὴν χαρὰν τοῦ κυρίου σου. ²² Προσελθὼν δὲ καὶ ὁ τὰ δύο τάλαντα λαβὼν, εἶπε· Κύριε, δύο τάλαντά μοι παρέδωκας· ἴδε, ἄλλα δύο τάλαντα ἐκέρδησα ἐπ' αὐτοῖς. ²³ Ἐφῆ αὐτῷ ὁ κύριος αὐτοῦ· Εὐ, δοῦλε ἀγαθὲ καὶ πιστὲ, ἐπὶ ὀλίγα ἡς πιστὸς, ἐπὶ πολλῶν σε καταστήσω· εἰσελθε εἰς τὴν χαρὰν τοῦ κυρίου σου. ²⁴ Προσελθὼν δὲ καὶ ὁ τὸ ἐν τάλαντον

16. εἰργάσατο ἐν αὐτοῖς scil. χρήματα. As we should say, 'made money with them.' The only instance of the ellip. of χρήματα which I have met with in the Class. writers is in Pausan. iii. 23, 2, τῆς γὰρ Δήλου τότε ἑμπορίου τοῖς Ἕλλησιν οὖσιν, καὶ ἄδειαν τοῖς ἐργαζομένοις (merchants) δοκούσιν παρέχειν. In this use ἐργάσασθαι signif. 'to invest capital.' Ἐποίησα, 'acquired by traffic;' a use chiefly found in the later Greek; the early writers employing κερδῆσαι, though Aristotle says χρήματα ποιῶν, Plato ἀργύριον π., and Theophrastus ποιήσας τάλαντα.

18. For ἀπέκρυψε, 'hid away,' 5 very ancient MSS. have ἱκρύψη, which has been edited by Lachm. and Tisch., but on insufficient authority; not to say that compound verbs are frequently by the scribes changed to simple ones. The talents in question were evidently delivered to the persons for use and improvement. And the servant, who had the one talent, unfaithfully neglected to use it, and was on that ground fearfully accountable. Why, indeed, he should not have simply let it lie and rust in a corner unemployed, and not have taken the trouble to dig a hole and hide it away, is not very obvious. The reason might be this, that he might not lose the talent by its being stolen, but have it to produce and restore to his lord at his return. Perhaps, too, in this circumstance of hiding, there is an allusion to one kind (and that one of the most important) of talents committed by Providence to men's charge, namely, that of wealth, which to be duly employed must be imparted to those that need. Unless, indeed, the particulars of digging and hiding away be introduced ad ornatum, by an allusion to what forms a very characteristic action of the wise, who will neither impart to others, nor expend upon himself.

20. The words ἐπ' αὐτοῖς, not found in 4 ancient MSS., have been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. here, and at v. 22,—in each case on very inadequate authority, as opposed to all the rest of the MSS., and all the Versions. They were, I suspect, only removed for the purpose of doing away with something at variance with Class. composition.

21. The δὲ after ἔφη, not found in 6 uncial and 9 cursive MSS., has been cancelled by almost all the late Editors. And so, indeed, at v. 23 ἔφη αὐτῷ occurs without the δὲ in all the MSS. Here it is prob., though not certainly, an interpolation.

— εἰσελθε εἰς τὴν χαρὰν τοῦ κ. σ.] In order to disentangle what has been unnecessarily made perplexed, we have here not only to recognize a blending of the Story with the Application, but to regard the latter as chiefly in the speaker's mind, and hence meant to be principally borne in mind by those whom he addressed. Accordingly, while in the former view the meaning will be, 'Enter thou into the joy possessed by thy Lord, and laid up for his faithful servants;' yet in the latter, and principal one (as applied to all true Christians), it will be, 'Enter thou (meaning such a faithful and tried disciple) into the bliss prepared for thee [as purchased by his own blood] by thy Lord.' There may, however, be a conjoint allusion to the joy of our Lord spoken of in Heb. xii. 2, even the satisfaction of his soul at the completion of his labour of love (see Is. liii. 11), and so ushering in the glory spoken of John xvii. 24, of which his faithful disciples will be witnesses, nay in which they will be sharers. In the expression εἰσερχεσθαι εἰς τὴν χαρὰν there is not any Hebraic idiom, for μετρίχειν τῆς χαρᾶς, as in Ps. xciv. 11; for even there any such sense would be derogatory, nor does it exist elsewhere in the Old Test.

22. λαβὼν is cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. on the authority of 4 of the most ancient MSS. But the hand of a Classical correction is here again, as often, visible.

24. σκληρός] 'gripping,' 'one who exacts his due to the uttermost, ἀκριβοδικαίος. So Joseph. Ant. vi. 14, uses it of Nabal. And so Arrian, cited by Kypke: οἱ κατοικοῦντες ἱμποροὶ σκληρότεροι, scil. εἰσι. And Stob. Sermon. p. 383, ἀνδρὶ σκληρῷ καὶ ἀπὸ παντὸς πορίζοντι. The expressions following are agricultural metaphors, though not unexampled in the Class. writers, e. g. Aristoph. Eq. 392, τάλλότριον ἀμῶν θίρος.

25. φοβηθεῖς] i. e. 'fearing lest, if I should lose the money, thou wouldst severely exact it of me,' by taking away all my substance (Kuin.). This was evidently a mere excuse; but, as Euthym. observes, the parable puts a weak excuse into the mouth of the slothful servant, in order to show that in such a case no reasonable apology can be made.

26. πονηρὸν δ. καὶ ὀκν.] Render, 'evil and slothful,' by a sort of Hendiadys, 'evil' or 'bad,' because too sluggish to do his duty. So Jos. Ant. xvi. 9, κατηγόρι· Σύλλαιον, ὅντα πονηρὸν δούλον.

— ἦδεις, &c.] Said by the figure Synchoreosis: 'Be it as you say that I am, &c., then ought you to have taken the more care not to deprive me of what is really my own. Though it were true, as you say, that I reap where I sow not, and you durst not risk the money in merchandise, you ought to have put it out to the public money-changers to interest; some exertions should have been made to turn it to account.' Against this, however, it is urged by others, that it would make our Lord allow that he reaped where he did not sow; which is not true. They would therefore take the sentence as an interrogative one,—by which it will be an argument out of the man's own mouth to condemn him, upon his own principles, for not acting suitably to his own hard conceptions of his lord. But they confound a rhetorical synchoreosis with a real one, a positive admission that a thing is really true.

27. βαλεῖν] for δίδουαι, as in Luke xix. 23; for the more Classical δίδουαι, according to the Commentators. But it may rather be said to be for καταβαλεῖν, pay in, as Mark xii. 42. Luke xxi. 2. So Diog. Laert. ii. 20, τὰ βαλλόμενα κίματα ἀποτίειν.

— τραπέζιταις] These discharged not only the offices of our bankers, in receiving and dealing out money, and giving interest upon it; but also in exchanging coins, and distinguishing genuine from forged money. See Greswell, vol. iv. 447 sq.

— ἐκομισάμην αὐν τὸ ἐμὸν] The force of the Middle verb determines the sense to be, 'I should have received back for my own use.' That this was a frequent sense, as said of money put out at interest, is evident from the examples adduced by Wets. and Kypke. As respects the exact sense of τόκος, the framers of our Common Version would, in consideration of the context here, have done better to have rendered, not usury, as Wycliff, but vantage, as Tyndale; since the term scarcely denotes more than the gain produced by money let out to use, whether that gain were great or small. And the Jews were, by the law, allowed to take such profit from money lent to Gentiles; and the idea of any exorbitant (or, as we should say, usurious) interest were unsuitable to the circumstances of the present case.

28. ἄρατε οὖν] These words have been by most Commentators considered as merely serving as a finish to the picture. But if the observation at v. 29 be meant (as it must) with especial reference to the preceding command, we may, as Mr. Greswell suggests, 'gather from it, not only that the good use of a trust of one kind may be expected to lead to the enjoyment of a trust, and probably a greater, of another kind; but that where many have been invested with a certain trust in common beforehand, with a view to a certain use thereof, to be required in a certain manner to themselves, the failure of some in the use and administration of that trust, and the consequent loss of their claims to a reward on account of it, in their own person, will lead to this result in behalf of others who have made a better use of the same, that the reward which might have been earned by the former will be given, over and above their proper remuneration, to the latter.'

29. τῷ γὰρ ἔχοντι—ἀπὸ δὲ τοῦ μὴ ἔχοντος, &c.] Fritz and several of the recent Commentators cancel the words ἀπὸ δὲ, or else (as do Lach. and Tisch.) read τοῦ δὲ μὴ ἔχοντος, on the authority of 3 uncial and 4 cursive MSS., with the Syr. Vers. and Chrys. But the evidence for this reading is weak; for Chrys. has the words in his text; and I find nothing in his Homily to show that he had them not in his copy. The authority of a Version is, in cases like the present (where the sense seems overloaded in the expression), any thing but considerable; not to mention that the MSS. in question are few in number, and such as abound in unauthorized alterations, of which this is manifestly one, and that resorted to for the purpose of getting rid of an unclassical pleonasm; though thus a construction is adduced so harsh, that even the grammatical dexterity of Fritz is ineffectual to make any thing satisfactory of it. The common reading is, I doubt not, to be retained, and the pleonasm to be numbered with pleonasm falsely so called, because involving an intensity of sense.

³⁰ ἀχρεῖον] It is sufficient to regard the term as denoting the idea of unfruitfulness, his not doing good, though he is not mentioned as doing positive harm. Notwithstanding which, however, he is consigned to outer darkness, the ζόφος τοῦ σκότους at 2 Pet. ii. 17, where, as says Wesley, 'there shall be weeping of the careless, thoughtless sinner [rather, the unfruitful Christian], and the grinding of teeth of the stubborn and obdurate sinner. All tending to show that there is no such thing as negative goodness.'

from a marginal Scholium. However, internal evidence is rather against ἀγ. in the present passage.

³². πάντα τὰ ἔθνη] 'all nations,' both Jews and Gentiles, both quick and dead. In opposition to the Jewish notion, that the Gentiles would have no part in the resurrection.

— ἀφοριεῖ αὐτοὺς—ἐρίφων] Meaning (by a pastoral image) will separate, among those nations, the bad Christians from the good. So xiii. 49, ἀφοριεῖς τοὺς ποιητοὺς ἐκ μίσου τῶν δικαίων.

— ἀφορίζει] The full sense is, 'separates them, after they have been mixed together' in grazing [so as to put them in different stalls for the night]. Comp. Hom. ll. ii. 475, νομῶ μίγνυσθαι; by διακρ. there is denoted the separation of each sheep, and each flock, from the rest. We cannot doubt that 'their Judge will discriminate men's moral state, amidst the complicated varieties of human character; will estimate their actions by an infinitely penetrating development of their motives; will, accordingly, by an infallible decision, completely and for ever separate them one from another.'

³⁴. ἐρεῖ ὁ βασιλ. This and v. 40 present the only occasions on which (at least hitherto) we find our Lord was pleased to apply to himself the title of King. Up to this time he only spoke of himself as Son of man, and, by implication, Son of God, which carries with it co-kingship with the King Eternal, &c. Accordingly, in Rev. xvii. 4. xix. 6, he is styled 'King of kings.' But the term was here called for by the attendant circumstances, which all mark royal majesty. This, indeed, is implied by the expression throne of glory; not to say that the exercise of universal judgment, final and without appeal, was regarded as the very essence of Royalty.

— ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου] This has been thought to countenance the doctrine of absolute decrees. But the expression may merely be supposed to denote, by a Hebraism (what the context plainly shows it to mean), that the kingdom of heaven was all along prepared for those who should approve themselves, by the performance of those good works which invariably spring from a true faith. And, among these, those of charity, hospitality, and benevolence, are here especially introduced, as representatives of all the active virtues. Not that we are to understand from γὰρ that the promise of salvation belongs to these, or any individual virtue: the performance of other duties being implied in the specification of these great and leading ones (comp. James i. 27); still less are we to suppose that the salvation arises from one's own merit, be it what it may, but from the free grace of God through Christ our Saviour.

35. συνηγάγετε] scil. εἰς τὸν οἶκον, 'hospitably entertained me.' The complete phrase occurs in 2 Sam. xi. 27, and Judg. xix. 18. The difference between the Class. and the Hellenistic use is this,—that in the latter, the phrase is used of one only; in the former, of more than one; as in Plut. Symp. ii. 10, ἰστιάτωρ ἀδελφῶν—εἰς ταῦτό συναγαγόν. The duty of hospitality, or receiving strangers, was, in ancient times, from the fewness of inns, of great importance to the comfort of society; inasmuch that it was considered, even by the heathens, as a highly meritorious virtue, nay, a religious duty; as we may infer from Hom. Od. xiv. 66, ἔτιν', ὃ μοι θίμει ἔστι | ἔτινον ἀτιμῆσαι, πρὸς γὰρ Διὸς εἰσιν ἅπαντες | ἔτινον. Hence we see why, in the Scriptures of the Old Test., and espec. of the New, so great a stress should be laid on the discharge of this Christian duty. Indeed, we learn from the Jewish writings, that their greatest Rabbis agreed in reckoning this, and the kindred duties subjoined, v. 35, as religious duties, and those which should obtain the highest reward in the life to come.

37. ἀποκρ.—οἱ δίκαιοι] Meaning those just spoken of as having performed the above duties and acts of kindness to those in need; "from which (observes Bp. Lonsdale) it appears that they are those in whom such acts have proceeded from righteous principles, and have formed a part of a righteous course of life." It must, however, be borne in mind, that if these righteous persons have discharged these, or any other religious duties, on truly righteous principles, they will ever be ready to acknowledge themselves unprofitable servants, in the sense contained in our Lord's injunction, Luke xvii. 10. As respects the words following, they may be, as the Commentators say, parabolic, yet only as bearing a resemblance to the matter, and having the air of parable, though with the purpose not so much, as some suppose, to impress the great truth that Christ highly regards works of charity performed for his sake, but representing forcibly the humility of the justified saints, in setting so lightly by their imperfect, or rather in their view worthless, services, so as scarcely to remember that they were ever done, much less to think that they should ever be so richly rewarded.

40. ἐφ' ὅσον ἐποιήσατε] Here we have an explanation of what was meant at vv. 35 and 36. So close is the union between Christ and his members, that he looks on whatever is done to them as done to himself, and rewards them accordingly. Comp. Matt. x. 42. This, indeed, agrees with what the Scriptures elsewhere declare, that what is done unto the poor, in relieving their wants, is done unto God himself, under whose especial care they are. Thus it is said (Prov. xix. 17), 'he that hath pity on the poor lendeth unto the Lord.'

41. The ancient Fathers are in general agreed, that though our Lord here says to the righteous, 'Come ye blessed of my Father,' he does not say to the wicked, 'Go ye cursed of my Father,' because God is the Author of man's happiness, but man only of his own misery. This is shown at large by Bp. J. Taylor, in his Sermon on Christ's Advent to Judgment, and espec. § 4, p. 44, vol. v. of his Works, edit. Heber. The learned Prelate seems favourably disposed to the reading ὁ πατήρ μου, which was approved by Mill, and was placed by Griesb. in his inner margin, as probably the true reading; while Lachm. and Tisch. both reject it; and with reason, since the external authority for it is very slender, and that opposed by the ancient Versions, as also by internal evidence, considering that it has every appearance of being a gloss, or rather a fulsa alteration, derived from some marginal Scholium. Dr. Mill, indeed, regards it as undoubtedly genuine; but on turning to the two chief passages of his Gr. Test., where he treats on this point (pp. 38 and 72 of his Prolegomena), I cannot find that he assigns any such reasons as are at all convincing; whereas the reasons for rejecting it are such as almost to compel assent. Its great strength is in the Fathers alleged for it. Yet those are almost all Latin Fathers, or Greek Fathers in a Latin Version. As to the passages of Clem. Rom. and Just. Mart. Dial., they would, I suspect, if overhauled, turn out a συκινὴ ἐπικουρὰ; not to say, that the soundness of the doctrine is very questionable. The Commentators do not well account for the circumstance, that after Διαβόλῳ follows καὶ τοῖς ἀγγέλοις α., and not, as one might have expected, τοῖς δαίμοσιν, or δαιμονίοις, the Devil, and his imps, the inferior devils. So Œcumen. (or the Greek Father from whom he compiles in his Intro. to the Galatians), κατὰ τοῦ Διαβόλου καὶ τῶν δαιμόνων αὐτοῦ. However, the term ἀγγ. seems here used for the sake of matching what was before said of Christ and his holy angels, to whom are here most fitly opposed the evil angels of Satan. Thus in Rev. xii. 7, Christ and his angels are said to triumph over the devil and his angels; he being the Prince of the devils and the rest his subjects, to support his cause and carry out his purposes. I have said Christ and his angels; for though Μιχαὴλ be there mentioned, and not Χριστός, yet the best Expositors are agreed that there Μιχ. represents Christ, as I have there shown at large.

—εἰς τὸ πῦρ, &c.] Render, 'unto the everlasting fire destined,' &c.

—αἰώνιον] Considering the opinion of the Jews, and, indeed, of the ancients in general, as to the eternity of future punishments, our Lord's hearers could not fail to understand this word in the usual acceptation everlasting, rather than (as some ancient and several modern Commentators contend) in that of a very long, but limited duration. And this may be considered one of the strongest arguments against an interpretation so unwarranted and presumptuous.

XXVI. Mark xiv. 1. Luke xxii. 1. On leaving the Temple, our Lord closed his public ministry on earth as a Teacher—(I say public, for the subsequent discourses at John xiv.—xvii. were delivered in private to his disciples)—and after having given his disciples privately many weighty admonitions,—especially apprising them that he would assuredly return again unto judgment, with power and great glory,—he proceeds to inform them of the near approach of those sufferings, and of that death, which he had previously intimated to them while they were journeying with him to Jerusalem to keep the Passover. Accordingly, the Evangelist now introduces a narrative of our Lord's Passion, and of events subsequent thereto.

—πάσχα] 'the paschal feast.' See my Lex.

² καὶ ὁ Υἱός] The καὶ is best taken in sense χρονικῶς, for καὶ τότε. It is often used for ὅτε, which may admit of being resolved into καὶ τότε. That his death was near at hand, our Lord had repeatedly apprised his disciples; but he had not until now told them the exact time.

3. οἱ γραμματεῖς] These words, not found in 4 uncial and 14 cursive MSS. (to which I add Mus. 1810, and de Missy 1, omitted by Weta. and Scriv. y), have been cancelled by Lach., Tisch., and Alf.; but wrongly, for the οἱ γραμματεῖς were not likely to be absent on this occasion, being a necessary component to form the πρεσβυτήριον τοῦ λαοῦ, or Governing Council, the Jewish Senate. So it is said, supra xxii. 66, συνήχθη τὸ πρεσβ. τοῦ λαοῦ, ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ γραμματεῖς. It was more probable that the words should have been omitted, by accident, from so few MSS. (I find them in all the Lamb. copies, and all the Mus. ones except 3 and the Scriv. y), than that they should have been interpolated in all the rest, from the parallel passages of Mark and Luke. Besides, further on in this chap. (v. 57) Matth. particularly adverts to the γραμματεῖς as a component part of the Body, and at xxvii. 41, he brings together all three parties; and so supra xvi. 21. xx. 18. xxi. 15. Hence it were unaccountable that he should omit the γρ. here. That they attended, we learn from Mark and Luke. Are we, then, not bound to suppose the omission to have arisen from inadvertence of the scribes (by reason of the repeated καὶ—καὶ) than neglect on the part of the Evangelist? The carelessness of the scribe of B appears by his alone omitting λαοῦ just after.

3—5. Mark xiv. 1. Luke xxii. 2. The τότε here does not refer to what has immediately preceded, but, as often, to something that has preceded some time before, though short; so here what has been recorded at chap. xxiii., where our Lord denounces woe on the Pharisees, &c. And we cannot doubt that the whole of what was said by him was faithfully reported to them. Accordingly, the connexion of τότε is with that occurrence, and it may be rendered thereupon.

4. δόλῃ κρ.] So, for the text. rec. κρ. δόλῃ, I have now edited, from all the principal uncial, and very many cursive MSS. (to which I add all the Lamb. and nearly all the Mus. copies), with Matth., Gr., Sch., Lach., Tisch., and Alf. It is probably the true reading, and the external authority for it is far stronger than what Mr. Alf. states. Instead of 28 cursives, he might have said 88, since there are upwards of 30 Lamb. and Mus. copies alone; but, from the carelessness of Kuster, Weta., Gr., and espec. Sch., in stating the full amount of evidence, it is impossible to say how many of both the Western and the Eastern Family.

6. Σίμωνος τοῦ λεπροῦ] The name Simon was so common a one among the Jews, that it is no wonder that some surnames should have been adopted by way of distinguishing the particular Simon meant; and accordingly, such an addition is generally found subjoined to the name in the N. T. But the appellation often had reference to something which had existed, but did not necessarily then exist. So it must have been in the case of this Simon; for otherwise none would have resorted to his house in any way, still less as guests; and the meaning intended is, doubtless, 'who had been aforesaid a leper.' He had probably been cured of his leprosy by our Lord. Considering that we are quite in the dark as to what this Simon was, it is needless to discuss the question whether he was the master of the house, or only a guest of Martha, as the mistress; nor will the expression at John xii. 2, διηκόνει, supply any proof. (See note there.) Mr. Alf. gravely chronicles the reading 1 m. of M, D, namely, λεπρώσου; and Lachm. actually thinks it worth putting into the scales for weighting! though this choice morsel, for a critical palate, is only worth notice as being one among a thousand proofs how that MS. certainly, and, I doubt not, several others of its kith and kin, had its text corrupted from the Latin Versions, both the Vulgate and the Italic.

7. προσῆλθεν αὐτῷ γυνὴ] On reconsidering the debated question, whether the transaction recorded here and at Mark xiv. 3—9, be the same with that in John xii. 2, I am still of opinion, that the two accounts have respect to the same transaction; and, of course, it follows that one or other of the two narratives must be inserted out of the strict chronological order, which there is greater reason to think is observed by John, than by Matthew and Mark. As respects the variations in the two accounts, they are too minute to deserve the name of discrepancy; and, as I am not professedly a Harmonist, the consideration of such matters does not come within my province.

—ἀλάβαστρον] This denotes, not a box, but a cruse for unguent, which (as we learn from the writers on Antiquities) was much of the form of our oil-flasks, with a long and narrow neck, sealed at the top. The vessel was so called because it had been first always, and was afterwards generally, made of a sort of marble called onyx (from being of the colour of a human nail), and also alabaster (from its extreme smoothness). Thus the vessel came to be called ἀλάβαστρον; and it retained that name even after it came to be formed of other materials, as glass, metal, or stone. The phrase ἀλάβ. μύρου occurs also in Hdot. iii. 2, and Athen. p. 268, where there is not so much an ellipsis of πλῖνον, or such like, as a peculiar use of the Genit., though confined to nouns which denote any kind of vessel, as here ἀλάβ., and supra xiv. 13, κεράμιον ὕδατος, not unfreq. in the Sept., and sometimes in Class. writers, as Hom. Od. i. 196, δίπας οἶνον: Soph. El. 758, χαλκὸς σπῆδον: Dionys. Hal. Ant. p. 2028, 4, ἀμφάλτου—ἀγγεῖα: Theophr. Char. 17. John calls this μύρον νάρδου, and Mark, yet more distinctly, μύρ. νάρδ. πιστ. Now νάρδ. might of itself denote a liquid unguent, as is certain from Theophr. H. Pl. ix. 72. Dioscor. i. 66, comp. with Hor. Ep. v. 59, and Tibull. ii. 2, 7, and with πιστικῆς, perhaps yet more so (but see note on Mark xiv. 3). Consequently it would seem that μύρον denotes (as the κατέχευεν absolutely requires us to understand) a liquid unguent; and that it is susceptible of that sense is proved by Heyne on the passage of Tibullus.

— βαρυτίμου] Lach. (as also Tisch., 1 Ed.) omits, from A, D, L, M, and not a few cursive MSS. and some Versions, πολυτίμου, but though I can add 1 Lamb. and 3 Mus. MSS. that is incompetent authority, and quite in opposition to internal evidence, inasmuch as the word has every appearance of being adopted as a plainer term (probably suggested by the parallel passage of John xii. 3) substituted for the less obvious, and, in this sense, scarcely pure Greek term βαρυτ. It occurs, indeed, in Strabo xvii. p. 798, τῶν βαρυτίμων βαρεῖα καὶ τὰ τέλη, and Heliodor. L. ii. p. 113, μὴ βαρυτίμων εἶναι, but, I believe, no where else: and even its use by those writers will not prove that it was not (as I suspect it to have been) a peculiar idiom, formed on the use of gravis in Latin, but confined to Asia Minor and Syria.

— κατέχευεν ἐπὶ τὴν κεφαλὴν] Lachm. edits τῇ κεφαλῇ, from B, D, M, and several cursive MSS.—which is, I doubt not, a mere critical alteration (but quite unfounded), possibly suggested by the expression in Mark, κατὰ τῆς κεφαλῆς, which has the characteristic exactness of that Evangelist, the sense being, ‘down upon his head.’ There is no such discrepancy as Mr. Alf. represents between the two passages of Matthew and Mark, as compared with John, since John does not say κατέχευεν ἐπὶ τοὺς πόδας, but ἔλειψε τοὺς πόδας. Now since it is plain that the unguent for the head was liquid, poured out of a long-necked cruse, and that for the feet was simply ointment (highly scented) rubbed on the feet after they had been washed and dried with a towel, it appears that the two actions were quite distinct (as, indeed, is evident from what we read Luke vii. 46), and accordingly the mention of one does not imply a negative on the other. Both these marks of respect were (it appears from a comparison of John with Matthew and Mark) bestowed on our Lord; but no imputation of inaccuracy attaches to either one or the other of the Evangelists; if, at least, the thing be weighed in the balance of candour.

9. The words τὸ μύρον, absent from A, B, D, L, and about 12 cursive MSS. (I add 3 Lamb. and 4 Mus. copies), together with some Versions and Fathers, have been cancelled by Lach., Tisch., and Alf. Certainly internal evidence is against them; and they have no place in the parallel passage of Mk.; at least, not in the text. rec.; but see note. Here, at least, they have prob. been introduced from John xii. 5.

10. ἔργον—καλὸν ἔργον] That καλὸν is a stronger term than ἀγαθόν would have been, is evident; but that ἔργ. καλόν signifies, as Alf. explains it, merely ‘a noble act of love,’ is more than I can admit. That will depend on the disposition of Mary towards our Lord, which, from all the circumstances of the case, must have been more than attachment, and may have amounted to a deep reverence to One, whom she regarded as the Messiah, and to whom this extraordinary mark of devout reverence was fully due. This view I find supported by the authority of Chrys. in his 80th Homily; and, of modern Expositors, by Calvin, who, indeed, ascribes this deeply reverential act of piety as dictated by the secret instinct of the Spirit. It may have been so.

12. πρὸς τὸ ἐντ. μ. ἐπιταφιάσαι] On the term ἐνταφ. see my Lex. The best Commentators ancient and modern from Grot. downward, are of opinion that πρὸς τὸ has reference, not to the intention of the woman, but rather to the agency of Divine Providence; it being not unfrequent in Hebrew for any one to be said to do a thing for this or that end; which, however, is not really intended by him; only his act is consequent upon it alimunde: as 1 Kings xvii. 18. In either view, however, the words must be regarded as suggesting the nearness of his death; and (as Grotius says) justifying what had been done by an argument à pari: that, had she expended this on his dead body, they who used such ointments could not reasonably object to it; and had, therefore, no ground now to do so, as he was so near death and burial. But the view which I have taken at v. 10, of the motives which actuated Mary to her work of devout reverence to her Lord, if well founded, renders the application of the principle adverted to here unnecessary. Mr. Alf. himself admits, that ‘he can hardly think our Lord would have said what is expressed in this verse, unless there had been in the mind of Mary a distinct reference to our Lord’s burial, in doing the act.’ This is the truth, but, I apprehend, not the whole truth. For a distinct reference should rather be said a full persuasion, whether ex instinctu Spiritus, according to Theophyl., L. Brug., Calv., and Lightf., I would not say. Mr. Alf. seems inclined to understand the πρὸς τὸ ἐνταφ. of Mary’s intention, which he admits is strongly attested by the words of Mark xiv. 8, and John xii. 7. But then he neutralizes that admission by saying, ‘that all the company surely knew full well.’ That may be questioned. The Apostles had prob. never so brought the matter of Christ's death and passion home to them, as to justify the expression 'surely knew full well.' The knowledge of Mary, whether dictated by Divine inspiration or not, was of a very different kind. Her close attention to all that had lately occurred in the case of our Lord, and her devotedness to him, would make her far more quick-sighted in the matter than the rest of the company, and might of itself inspire a conviction that our Lord's hour was come; and hence any act of pious reverence, such as she had meditated, must be done at once.

¹³ ὅπου ἐὰν—λαληθ. εἰς μνημ. αὐτῆς] I agree with Mr. Alf., that "this announcement is a distinct prophetic recognition by the Lord of the existence of written records, in which the deed should be related; and still more, that we have here a convincing argument against that view of the three first Gospels, which supposes them to have been compiled from an original document." But I by no means agree with him in his third remark, that the same consideration is equally decisive against Luke's having used, or even seen, our present Gospels of Matthew and Mark: though this hypothesis has been ably maintained by Schleiermacher in his Essay on Luke. That Luke may not have seen Mark's Gospel I grant, but that he never had seen Matthew's, I cannot admit. On this questio vexata, see more in the Intro. to Luke's Gospel.

¹⁴—¹⁶. Mark xiv. 10. Luke xxii. 3, narrating the agreement of Judas with the Chief Priests and Elders to betray our Lord. The τότε is a particle too indefinite in its import to enable us to determine when this treachery was concocted; but it was prob. immediately after the meeting of the Sanhedrim, v. 3. And thus the particle will be (as occasionally elsewhere) resumptive, and may be rendered 'whereupon,' or 'thereupon.'

material as to need being got rid of in so violent a manner. For the two expressions employed by Mark and Luke may be said to imply the payment which, accordingly, as we learn infra xxvii. 3, 5, was promptly rendered.

¹⁷ τῇ δὲ πρώτῃ τῶν ἡμέρων] We are here brought to the consideration of a most litigated question,—namely, whether our Lord celebrated the Passover before his crucifixion, and if so, at what time? There are expressions in the Evangelists which seem, at first sight, contradictory. John appears to differ from the rest respecting the time that the Jews partook of the Passover; and supposes that they did not eat it on the same evening as our Saviour; yet all the Evangelists agree, that the night of the day in which he ate what was called the Passover, was Thursday. He is also said to command his disciples to prepare the Passover, and he tells them he had earnestly desired to eat this Passover with them. Yet we find that on the day after that on which he had thus celebrated it, the Jews would not go into the judgment hall lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the Passover. Now the law required that all should eat it on the same day. The principal solutions which have been propounded of this intricate question are as follows: 1. That our Lord did not eat the Passover at all. Of those who adopt this opinion, some contend that it is only a common supper that is spoken of; others, that Jesus (like the Jews of the present day) celebrated only a memorative, not a sacrificial Passover. 2. That he did eat the Passover, and on the same day with the Jews. 3. That he ate it, but not on the same day with the Jews; anticipating it by one day. Of these solutions, the first, in both its forms, is alike inconsistent with the plain words of Scripture, φάγειν τὸ πάσχα, and θεῖν τὸ πάσχα. That our Lord did not eat the Passover rests merely on conjecture; and the place, the preparation, and the careful observance of the Paschal feast, alike forbid the notion of a common, or of a memorative supper. As to the second solution, it is equally inadmissible, since, on that hypothesis (as Dr. Townsend says), 'if our Lord ate it the same hour in which the Jews ate theirs, he certainly could not have died that day, as they ate the Passover on Friday, about six o'clock in the evening. If he did not, he must have been crucified on Saturday, the Jewish sabbath, and could not have risen again on the first day of the week, as the Evangelists testify, but on Monday.' The third solution (which has been adopted by Scaliger, Casaub., Grotius, Bochart, Hamm., Cudw., Ernesti, Michaelis, Benson, Kuinoel, Bentley, Townsend, and many other eminent Commentators) has the strongest claims to be preferred; since it is most consistent with the language of the Evangelists, and best reconciles any seeming discrepancies. The Passover was to commence on the first full moon in the month Nisan; but, from the inartificial and imperfect mode of calculation by reckoning from the first appearance of the moon's phasis, a doubt might exist as to the day; and this doubt afforded ground, occasionally, for an observance of different days; which, it is said, the Rabbinical writings recognize. Now this diversity would obviously make a day's difference in the calculation; so that what would, to one party, be the fourteenth day, would, to the other, be the fifteenth. Strictly speaking, indeed, the Feast of unleavened bread did not begin until the evening of the day when the Paschal lamb was eaten, i. e. just at the beginning of the 15th day of the month. Here, however, the 14th is called 'the day of unleavened bread,' and there is reason to think that it was by some accounted so. Thus Jos. Ant. ii. 15, 1 (cited by Wets. and others), we have, ἐορτὴν ἀγομένην ἐφ' ἡμέρας δεκά, τὴν τῶν ἀζύμων λεγομένην, of course, including this day in the feast. At any rate, although, as appears from John xviii. 28, our Lord celebrated this his last Passover one day earlier than the Traditionarii, the ruling party among the Jews; yet he might be said equally to observe the ritual command, of eating on the 14th of Nisan. This solution, which is not a mere novel device, but, as we find from Euthym. and Theophyl., was held by some ancient Greek Fathers, is, on the whole, the most satisfactory; though I am ready to grant that, as this is a point on which the learned have in every age disagreed, so will it, I apprehend, from the scantiness of the materials for our judgment, never, perhaps, be settled to our entire satisfaction.

18. τὸν δεῖνα] An idiomatic expression used by both the Hellenistic and Class. writers (see my Lex. in v.) to denote a person whose name it is not material to mention, but whether known or unknown to the party addressed does not follow. If, however, as appears from the passages of Mark and Luke, the person spoken of was unknown to them, our Lord could hardly be said to suppress the name of the person. It is strange that Mr. Alf. should say, that if the person was, as we read in the parallel passages of Mark and Luke, 'to be found by the turning in of a man with a pitcher of water,' why not say by their meeting a man? From what is said in Luke, it appears that the meeting was this,— that, as they entered the city gate, he would be issuing from it. On further consideration of the matter, I am of opinion that our Lord did not here speak from any previous arrangement with the person in question, but acted in virtue of his infinite knowledge, 1 Sam. ii. 3, and unlimited command of all circumstances to bring about any event.

The αὐτῶ, absent from 5 uncial and 10 cursive MSS. (add Lamb. 528, 1179, Mus. 1810, 5540, 1774, 11,838), is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. Internal evidence is against it, and it was probably, though not certainly, introduced from the parallel passage of Mark.

—ὁ διδάσκαλος λέγει] This expression does not of itself imply that the person was a disciple of our Lord; but the air of the context and the circumstances suggest it. The μου after κατάλυμα in Mark xiv. 14, according to the text of Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., would, if genuine, prove it; but see my note. Then the full sense would be, 'Our Master and thine saith.' By ὁ καιρὸς is meant, not 'the time' of the Passover, but 'my time,' meaning that of Christ's passion and death,—a use of καιρὸς often occurring in St. John.

20. ἀνέκειτο] Though the Passover was directed to be eaten standing (Exod. xii. 11), yet the Doctors had introduced the reclining posture (usual at meals from ancient times), accounting it a symbolical action, typifying that rest and freedom to which, at the institution of the rite, they were tending, but had not yet attained.

22. For ἕκαστος, Lach. and Tisch. edit εἰς ἕκαστος, from 6 uncial and a few cursive MSS. The εἰς was evidently derived from the parallel passage of Mark.

23. Commentators are not agreed whether this was meant to designate the betrayer; or whether it was only a prophetic application of a proverbial saying; indicating that 'one of his familiar companions would betray him,' and not meant to be applied particularly, except by the person himself intended. The latter opinion is preferable. Indeed, it is plain, from Mark xiv. 20, that Christ did not mean to particularly designate him, since he says εἰς τῶν δώδεκα ὁ ἔμβ., &c. See also Luke xx. 21. Theophyl. and Grotius are of opinion that Judas reclined near Christ; so that, though there were more dishes on the table,—of which every one dipped his bread into the one nearest to him,—yet he helped himself from the same dish. Thus would Jesus move easily (and without the others hearing) answer the interrogation of Judas by the words 'thou hast said,' and thus John would more unobservedly (on asking who the traitor should be) receive the sign from Jesus. The disciples (except John, see John xiii. 26), it should seem, did not, until Judas's departure, understand who was meant. They only knew, at the time, that some one of the twelve, who had been helping himself from the same dish with Jesus, would betray him. It should seem that the question, 'Is it I?' was asked by Judas immediately after he had received the sop from Jesus; and that the question asked by John, who it should be? was asked immediately after Jesus had made the public declaration, 'One of the twelve, who has been dipping his hand in the same dish, and whose hand is on the same table with me, will betray me.'

—ὁ ἐμβάψας] Render: 'he who has dipped,' or rather 'dived'; for we need not suppose, with the Commentators generally, that this was merely dipping the hand into liquid, like soup; but rather (agreeably to the Oriental custom of taking food with the hand from one common dish) diving the hand into a deep dish (like a soup-tureen), in order to transfer the meat, already torn up into pieces, to one's own plate, or others'. See a passage of Major Taylor cited by me in Rec. Syn. In fact, ἐμβάψας is an Hellenistic idiom for ἐμβαλῶν, which occurs in a fragment of Anac., χεῖρά τ' ἐν τρυγγῇ βα- λαῖν for ἐμβ. An idiom, however, so rare, that no example, I believe, has ever been adduced by any Philologist; and I have myself only met with one,—namely, in Philostr. de Sophis. Vitis, xxi. 3, where, speaking of a party of harvest-men sitting at dinner under an oak-tree, and suddenly killed by lightning, he says, οἱ θορισταί, ἐφ' ὅτερον ἱκαστος ἐτυχὶ πράττωνόντες ἀπέθανον (I conjecture ἀπέθανον). Ὁ μὲν γὰρ κύλικα ἀναρομύμενος (in παννύκτιος), ὁ δὲ πίνων, ὁ δὲ βάπτων (I conject. ὁ δ' ἐμβ.), ὁ δ' ἐσθίων, ὁ δὲ τι ποίῳν (I conject. ὁ δ' ὅ, τι, 'whatsoever', π.), πάντες ψυχὰς ἀφῆκαν. Perhaps, however, by τρυβλίον here is denoted not the bowl in question, but only a certain vessel, such as was used for holding oil or vinegar, or sauce in general. Accordingly, it would here denote the vessel which contained the sauce for the paschal lamb, and into which the pieces of meat (taken with the fingers from the common deep dish, which contained the meat already divided into convenient ψωμῖα) were divided, previously to being eaten.

²⁴ ὑπάγει] 'is going.' The present tense is used to denote the nearness of the things pre- dicted. There is, too, an euphemism, 'is going (unto death),'—an idiom common to most languages, in words denoting to depart; and of which the Commentators adduce examples, both from the Sept. and the Classical writers. In the Anthol. Gr. vii. 169, we have the complete phrase εἰς αἶδμν ὑπάγειν.

—καθὼς γέγραπται π. α.] Namely, in Pa. xxii. 1—3. Is. liii. 8. Dan. ix. 26. Zech. xiii. 7. Καλὸν—γεννήθη is a formula employed by the ancients to express a condition the most misera- ble. So Schemoth R. § 40, p. 135: 'He that knoweth the Law, and doeth it not, it were better for him that he had not come into the world.'

There is a remarkable permutation of order in the placing of the words: the natural order would have been καλὸν ἦν τῷ ἀνθρ. ἔκ. εἰ οὐκ ἔγεν. αὐτός; but this is not to be ascribed to Hebraism, or too strictly criticised, since such negligences of collocation occur occasionally in the purest Greek writers, espec. Hdot. and Thu- cyd.,—nay, even in that most polished of prose writers, Xenoph. Suffice it to instance Cyp. i. 4. 2, καὶ γὰρ, ἀσυνήσαστος αὐτοῦ, οὐδὲποτε ἀπέλιπε τὸν πάππον; and i. 4. 20, ταῦτα εἰ- κόντος αὐτοῦ, ἔδοξε τι λίγειν τῷ Ἀστ.

—τὸν ἄρτον] Bp. Middl., on the authority of some MSS. (nay, many; for to the 60 adduced I add Lamb. and 5 Mus. copies), would cancel the τόν: which he thinks called for by its absence in the parallel passages of Mark and Luke; and Lachm. does cancel it. But it is more probable that the τόν was removed by those who wished to conform the text of Matthew to that of the other Evangelists, and St. Paul; which, how- ever, is unnecessary; since, though the sense with the Article is more definite (i. e. the loaf, or rather cake, thin and hard, and fitter to be broken than cut. See note on ch. xiv. 19), yet it would be sufficiently intelligible without it. That two cakes of unleavened bread were pro- vided for the Passover, all the accounts testify; though as only one was broken by our Lord, it is no wonder that in the new ordinance founded on the Jewish rite, only one (and that large or small in proportion to the probable number of com- municants) should be provided. To advert to the critical proceedings of the recent Editors—Lachm. and Tisch. first cancelled, then restored it to the context. Mr. Alf. first bracketed the word, remarking, in his note, that no stress must be laid on the Article, even supposing it to be genuine: while in his 2nd Ed. he restores to the text what he had before virtually cancelled; and that on the very ground which I have long since pointed out, namely, as being removed because not in Mark, Luke, and Paul. But the most correct mode of stating the case is to say, that internal evidence, as well as external authority, is against it. It might, in such a few MSS., be omitted by accident; and, generally speaking, it was more likely to be removed than inserted—removed, I mean, by those who did not (as in the case of Mr. Alf.) understand the force of the Article, which force has been well explained by Mr. Green, Gr. N. T., p. 220, to mean the single loaf customarily placed on the table at supper: and he justly remarks, that, 'of two writers similarly circumstanced, and equally careful, one might naturally insert, and the other omit it.' The Art. here is also confirmed by John xiii. 18 (since v. l.), ὁ τρώγων μετ' ἐμοῦ τὸν ἄρτον, where, as Mr. Green observes, the Article is employed δεικτικῶς to denote the loaf placed on the table, though not in its Paschal character.

—εὐλόγησας] On again carefully considering the claims of the two rival readings to preference, εὐλογ. and εὐχαριστήσας, I must now decide in favour of the text. rec. εὐλογ., since, although εὐχ. has very strong external authority in its support (thus I find it in almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), yet internal evidence is for εὐλογ. I suspect that the ancient Critics, stumbling at εὐλογ. as not being sufficiently definite, chose to adopt in preference the term used in the passages of Mark and Paul, εὐχαρ., not being aware that εὐλογ., to ask a blessing upon, may imply εὐχαρ., to return thanks, but not vice versa. The Pesch. Syr. translator must have had εὐλογ. in his copy, and it is found in many of the most ancient of MSS., B, C, D, Z.

—ἔκλασε] Namely, as a type of the breaking of his body on the cross.

—ἔστι] All the best Commentators (of course excepting those of the Romish Church) are agreed that the sense of ἔστι is, represents, or signifies; an idiom common in the Hebrew, which wanting a more distinctive term, makes use of the verb substantive; a simple form of speech, yet subsisting in the common language of most nations. See Gen. xl. 12. xli. 26. Dan. vii. 23. viii. 21. 1 Cor. x. 4. Gal. iv. 24. Thus the Jews answered their children, when asking respecting the Passover, 'what is this?' 'This is the body of the Lamb, which our fathers ate in Egypt.' See Bp. Turton's Examination of the words in which the Eucharist was instituted, P. ii. of his 'Roman Catholic doctrine of the Eucharist considered (in answer to Dr. Wiseman's Lectures); espec. § 2, in which he discusses the force of the words of the institution, and shows that they must be understood figuratively, and not, as the Romanists contend, literally.' It is well observed by Wetstein, that 'while Christ was distributing the bread and wine, the thought could not but arise in the minds of the disciples, What can this mean, and what does it denote? They did not inquire whether the bread which they saw were really bread, or whether another body lay unconspicuously hid in the interstices of the bread, but what this action SIGNIFIED? of what it was a representation or memorial?'

27. τὸ ποτήριον] The τὸ, abs. from B, E, F, G, L, Z, and 7 or 8 cursive MSS., is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., as if interpolated from the parallel passages of Luke and Paul. But it involves so strong an improbability that the word should have found its way into all the copies, except comparatively very few (for I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies except two), that we may justly suppose it to have been omitted by accident. That it can scarcely be dispensed with, has been ably evinced by Bp. Middl., who observes, 'That in this case, as well as in that of ἄρτον, it may be fairly presumed that uniformity was intended by the sacred writers.' Be that as it may, it would seem that one cup only was used; for (as observes the Bp.) 'though four cups of wine were to be emptied at different times during the ceremony, a single cup four times filled was all that the occasion required.' Which of the four is here meant, Commentators are not agreed. It is generally supposed to have been the third, or the cup of blessing; which was regarded as the most important of the four. That the wine was mixed with water, all are agreed; and this custom the Romanists still scrupulously retain; though they hesitate not to violate the next injunction, πίετε αὐτοῦ πάντες, by confining the cup to the clergy (as if the words were meant for the Apostles only), notwithstanding that this view is utterly forbidden by the reason subjoined why all are to drink of it; and in spite of the strong authority of Antiquity, in the practice of the Church up to a comparatively recent period.

—εὐχαριστήσας] From this term the rite afterwards took its name; espec. as the service was a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving. Indeed, it was customary among the Jews never to take food or drink without returning thanks to God the giver, in prayer, by which it became sanctified.

28. τοῦτο γάρ—διαθήκη] i. e. 'For this is my blood, by which the new covenant is ratified.' So Luke: τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη ἐν τῷ αἵματί μου, 'By the administration of this cup I institute a new Religion, to be ratified by my blood.' In the federal sacrifices of the ancients it was (as Grotius and Hammond show) usual to receive the blood in a vessel; which was itself drunk by the more barbarous nations, but by the more civilized wine was substituted for it; to which the colour would contribute; espec. considering that wine was called 'the blood of the grape.'

—πρὸ πολλῶν ἐσχ. εἰς ὄφειν ἄμ.] Meaning, 'shed (i. e. about to be shed) as a propitiatory sacrifice for the sins for many' (namely, as many as should believe in him. See, however, my note, supra xii. 28). It is not correct to say, with many other Expositors, that this is the forgiveness of sins itself, which is conveyed to all true believers. I find no warrant for the doctrine, and no evidence of its applicability here. What really is conveyed to the faithful recipient is the comforting assurance of being in a state of forgiveness; by assurance being understood, certain knowledge arising from entire trust, as the foundation of our great and endless comfort in those holy mysteries which are the pledges of his love. So Calvin well remarks: "Quum dicitur fundendus sanguis in remissionem peccatorum, his verbis nos dirigimur ad mortis Christi sacrificium, sine cuius memoriā nunquam ritē Cena celebratur. Nec vero aliter satiari (i. e. with our spiritual food and sustenance in the Sacrament) possunt fideles animæ, nisi quatenus Deum sibi placatum esse confidunt."

— ἐκχυνόμενον εἰς ἄφ. ἀμ.] Here (as Grotius remarks) there is a transition from the idea of federal to that of piacular sacrifices; in which the victim was offered up in the place of the man, who had deserved death.

^{29.} οὐ μὴ πῶ—Πατρὸς μου] On the sense of these words there exists much diversity of opinion, chiefly occasioned by the various senses assigned to ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ Πατρὸς μου, which some Expositors think equiv. to ἐν οὐρανῷ, the Gospel dispensation; while others refer the words to Christ's mediatorial kingdom: and, others, again, to his Millennium reign. But for the 3rd interpretation there is very slender ground; and as to the 2nd (which supposes that our Lord merely intended to announce the abrogation of the Jewish Passover, and the substitution of the Christian Lord's Supper in its place) it is based on a sandy foundation; for it does not appear that our Lord here had any reference to the discontinuance of the Passover. The first interpretation is very suitable to the context, and supported by the parallel passage of Luke, ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ, often denoting the Gospel dispensation. Thus καινὸν will be put adverbially for ἐν καινῷ τρόπῳ, 'in a new manner,' i. e. a spiritual one, namely, by the virtual presence of Christ at the celebration of the Sacrament. Yet specious as this may appear, there is something unsound in principle; for it is pressing too much on the force of an adverb. Besides, not to say that the passage of Luke is not certainly parallel, when, we may ask, was it fulfilled? At the commencement of Christ's kingdom after his resurrection, when he ate and drank with his disciples, say the above Commentators, who adduce Luke xxiv. 30. 45. John xxi. 13. Acts i. 4. x. 41. But we do not learn that he drank at all, much less that he drank wine. He merely ate a little of some fish and honeycomb, which his disciples set before him (and that merely to convince them that he was really risen from the dead, and no phantom), and then probably presented the rest to his disciples.

And so, indeed, several MSS. and Versions (including the 2 later Syr. and Vulg.) say in words. Accordingly, this interpretation may justly be considered untenable; and it would seem that the only one safely to be adopted is that by which βασιλ. τοῦ Πατρὸς μου is taken for ἐν τῇ βασιλ. τῶν οὐρανῶν, supra viii. 11, Luke xiii. 29. xiv. 15. xxii. 30, where the joys and glories of heaven are represented under the image of 'sitting down at a feast.' And the general sense, couched under this strongly Oriental metaphor, is, 'I shall not henceforth [any more, οὐκέτι, as it is expressed in Luke] feast with men, until I partake with you of a new, even a spiritual, and far more glorious feast in my Father's kingdom in heaven.' See supra xiii. 43. The καινὸν (meaning 'new' and 'superior,' as εὐδὴ καινῇ in Rev. v. 9. xiv. 3, and oft. elsewhere) is so used in reference to the spiritual nature of the kingdom in question, and consequently its vast superiority.

For γενήμ., I have, with Lach., Tisch., and Alf., received γενήμ., on very strong external authority (to which I add nearly all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, confirmed by internal evidence, considering that γενν., as being a late Greek form, was likely to be introduced by the scribes. The γεν. τῆς ἀμπέλου, taken as a periphrasis for οἴνου, is confirmed by the Sept. and N. T., though occurring with a slight variation in the Class. writers.

^{30.} ὑμνήσαντες] Not, 'having recited,' as some render: but, 'having sung,' or 'chanted.' From the researches of Buxtorf and Lightf., it is almost certain that this ὕμνος was the latter part of the Hallel (which consisted of Ps. cxiii., cxiv., cxv., cxvi., cxvii., cxviii.); the former part, or the first two of those Psalms, having been chanted during supper.

^{31.} πατάξω—πολύμην] On carefully reconsidering this important quotation with the aid afforded by the elaborate researches of Hoffmann, I am quite of opinion, with him, that this is not, as some say, an application of the passage by our Lord to himself, by an argument a fortiori, but a prediction. That this is not, as Grot. and others suppose, a proverbial expression (though such an one might exist), is clear from the use of the regular formula citanti. As respects the reference in the passage of the Prophet, the Expositors almost universally regard the person referred to as Judas Maccabeus, or some one else, in short—by a singular perversity—any one but CHRIST. All the various views, however, have been weighed in an even balance by Hoffmann, and found wanting. I agree with him, and with Dr. Henderson, on Zech. xiii. 7, that the only satisfactory solution of the difficulty here is that which regards the words as directly and exclusively prophetic of the person and sufferings of the MESSIAH. This, they show, is required not only by our Lord's express appropriation of them to himself; but also by the identity of the subject treated of with that in Zech. xi. 4. 7. 10—14. xii. 10, for the shepherd here spoken of can be no other than the shepherd here mentioned, who is said to 'be rejected, to be sold, to be pierced,' &c. Not only (observes Dr. Henderson) is the Messiah there designated as the Shepherd of Jehovah, to indicate the relation in which he stood to the Father in the economy of redemption, but he is described as יְהוָה נַרְיָא, lit. the Man of my Union: in which interpretation Dr. Henderson shows that even the highly heterodox De Wette, and the learned Jew Arnheim coincide. He might have strengthened this from the σύμφυλόν μου of Aquila. Indeed, that we may not think too meanly of the skill of the Sept. Translator in his version πολίτην, let us suppose that he wrote συμπολίτην, and that the scribe mistook the σ (abbrev.) for ω. Be that as it may, the Hebrew term expresses, as Dr. Henderson observes, the very idea intended to be conveyed by the Holy Spirit, by whom the words were indited. And of whom can this be said but of the Divine Immanuel? who was one with the Father, and who could say, 'he who hath seen Me, hath seen the Father.'

As respects the discrepancy supposed to exist between πάταξον and the Hebr. and Sept., the quotation is according to the Sept., at least as we have it in the Alex. and other copies, except that for πάταξον we have πατάξω, which, as Maldon. has shown, amounts only to this, the changing of him who commands the striking into him who himself strikes: and surely when we consider WHO it is that adduces the words of Scripture, even Christ, who, through the Holy Spirit, indited the words of Scripture, and who is the Lord of Scripture no less than Lord of the Sabbath—we must bow to any alteration thereof for better adaptation to the purpose, viz. to make it more directly prophetic, not only of the sufferings of the Messiah (the great Shepherd, Is. l. 6), but also of the scattering of the sheep by the dispersion of the disciples, through fear, into sudden flight and temporary abandonment. If this should be thought taking too much for granted, we may consider that as the Hebr. Imp. קָרַן smile, is, as Dr. Henderson thinks, taken as oft. for the Fut., in order to express more forcibly the certainty of the event, thus the change in question would be next to nothing. Besides, the two Hebr. words קָרַן smile, and קָרַן I will smile, are so much alike, that they might easily be confounded; and I doubt not that some copies of the Sept. had πατάξω. At any rate, St. Barnabas, ch. v., quotes thus: Αἰγὴ γὰρ ὁ Θσός—"Ὅταν πατάξω τὸν ποιμένα, τότε σκορπισθήσονται τὰ πρόβατα, which tends to confirm the text, rec., for which διασκορπισθῶσιν has been adopted on strong, but scarcely sufficient authority, by Lach., Tisch., and Alf. The reading of the Vat. MS. ἰσκάσσει τὰ πρόβ. is a manifest blunder of the scribe for ἰσκειδάσαι, a very rare word, yet occurring in Aristoph. Eq. 795, τὴν εἰρήνην ἰσκειδάσας. It only remains to observe, that the Future was more suitable to our Lord's present purpose. And I cannot doubt that our Lord had in mind, though he could not well, as to any present purpose, cite the next clause of the verse in the Prophet; and we may best render: 'But I will turn back my hand upon his little ones,' viz. for protection to them. Comp. Is. l. 25. But there may be some allusion to this return, or recurrence of the Divine favour in the words of the next verse, which intimate a temporary resumption of the Lord's pastoral office on the scene of his former cares. See John x. 13, comp. with x. 3, 4. All this the disciples would not fail to understand after the event, and thus their faith would be confirmed.

κικραγεῖν, and φθέγγεσθαι. As the Rabbinical writers have told us that cocks were forbidden to be kept in Jerusalem, because of the 'holy things,' it has been objected that Peter could not hear one crow. But (without cutting the knot by disallowing the testimony of the Talmud) we may, with Reland, maintain that the cock might crow outside of the city; and yet, in the stillness of night, be heard by Peter from the house of Caiaphas, which was situated near the city-wall. And that cocks were kept in the vicinity of the city, there is no reason to doubt. But perhaps the best mode of removing the difficulty would be to render, 'before cock-crowing.' So Aristoph. Eccl. 391, ὅτε τὸ δαύταρον ἄλεκτρον ἰφθέγγετο. Moreover, this phrase, like the correspondent one in Latin, is founded upon general custom: and, indeed, several ancient MSS. read ἀλέκ. τραφωνίας, a good gloss, undoubtedly. It has been thought a contradiction, that Mark xiv. 30 says, πρὶν ἢ διεφθῆναι. But there will be none, if it be considered that the heathens reckoned two cock-crowings; of which the second (about day-break) was the more remarkable, and was that called, κατ' ἔξοχην, the cock-crowing. Thus the sense will be, 'before that time of night, or early morn, which is especially called the cock-crowing, thou shalt deny me thrice.' In Mark (who relates the thing more circumstantially, but with no real discrepancy) the expression καὶ ἀλέκτωρ ἐφώνησε may be rendered, 'and it was cock-crowing time'; in Luke and John, οὐ μὴ ἀλέκτωρ φωνῇ, 'it shall not be cock-crowing time.'

—ὁμοίως δὲ καί] The δὲ, which I have received, with Matth., Gr., Fr., and Scholz, was removed by Griesb. in his 2nd Ed., and is not received by Lachm. and Tisch. But though external authority is nearly equal for (it has place in all the Lamb. and nearly all the Mus. copies) and against it, yet internal evidence is rather in favour of the word; considering that it was more likely to be put out by Critics, as superfluous, or passed over by careless scribes, than to have been put in by Critics; for why should they have been desirous to insert a petty particle from another Gospel? Mr. Alford, as might be expected, excludes it, with the brief remark, "inserted from Mark," as if it were a matter of fact, and not a mere opinion, and that involving, as we see, great improbability. But Mr. Alford, like his masters, Lachm. and Tisch., systematically takes for granted interpolations; doubtless as an easy short-cut, to save the trouble of weighing and balancing external authority with internal evidence,—an operation for which Critics, who too quickly adopt readings without showing cause, or pronounce verdicts without summing up evidence, may not have the where-withal. Hence the variations of Lachm. and Tisch. from each other, and not unfrequently from themselves. The formula occurs in Luke v. 10. x. 32. Rom. i. 27. 1 Cor. vii. 3 and 4. James ii. 25, sine v. l. It scarcely ever occurs in the Classical writers; which I suspect led the Critics to cancel one or other of the two particles, and sometimes both; as infra xxvii. 41,—a reading which Lachm. was half inclined to adopt. The δὲ was evidently in the copies used by the Pesch. Syr., Sahid., and Copt.; and the Cod. Vercell. (4th cent.) of the Ital. Version, the Compl. Ed., and those of Colinaeus and the two first of R. Stephens, though thrown out by Steph. in his third, to which circumstance it is to be attributed its absence in the text. rec.

³⁶ Γεθσημανεῖ] Hebr. גֶּתְשֶׁמָנִי, 'place of oil-presses'; situated at the foot of the Mount of Olives. Not, what some have supposed, the village in which the produce of the Mount of Olives was prepared for use; for the term χωρίον can only mean a field, or close, as in Thucyd. i. 106. Paus. i. 29, 2. They were probably deceived by this χωρίον having a name assigned to it. Yet that fields had names, we find from 2 Kings xviii. 17, 'the fuller's field.' 2 Sam. ii. 16. Acts i. 19, 'Aceldama, the field of blood'; and Pa. xlix. 11. Compare Thucyd. i. 108, μάχη ἐν οἰνοφύτοις, where the Editors fell into the same error of thinking οἰνοφ. to be a town. We find by Maundrell, that the very close in question is still pointed out; and the Missionary Herald for 1824, p. 66, attests that there are still several ancient olive-trees in it; so ancient, indeed, that Lamartine, Pilgrim. vol. i. 78, thinks they are coeval with the age of Christ.

³⁷ ἤρξατο λυπ. καὶ ἀδμ.] Since ἀδμ. is evidently the stronger term, there would seem to be a dimas; though the exact force of the term is disputed. Euthym. explains by ἀλύειν καὶ ἀμυχανεῖν, 'to be, as it were, distraught,' 'to know not what to do.' He rightly derives it from the adjct. δάδμων, which is not, as Buttm. and Liddell suppose, a term fabricated by Hesych. and Eust., since it occurs more than once in that very pure Greek writer, Hippocrates, e. gr. p. 563, δ, ἀλύων καὶ ἀδμυνώνων ὁ θυμός. The word is derived from Perf. Pass. of ἀδῶν, v. neut. το

 ἕως θανάτου· μέναιτε ὧδε, καὶ γρηγορεῖτε μετ' ἐμοῦ. 39 Καὶ † προελθὼν μικρὸν, ἔπεσεν ἐπὶ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ, προσευχόμενος καὶ λέγων· Πάτερ [μου,] εἰ δυνατόν ἐστι, παρελθέτω ἀπ' ἐμοῦ

surfeit, to be satiated,—whether, as Hesych. remarks, κόρον τινός ἢ λύπης, lit. 'to have,' as we say, 'enough' of any thing, espec. of labour. So is used the noun ἄδος in Hom. II. λ. 87, and the verb at κ. 98. Mark does not, as Mr. Alford affirms, use ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι for λυπεῖσθαι: he better knew the force of the two words. He rather passes over λυμ. and only uses ἐκθ. in order to aid in drawing forth the full idea meant to be conveyed. What he meant by ἐκθαμβ. will appear from my note on Mark xiv. 33. That Matth. should have used ἀδην. in the sense I have laid down, not of 'labour,' but of grief,—(a force recognized by Hesych.)—involves no harshness, as will appear from the fine line of Pope,—'To melt in full satiety of grief.'

38. After λέγει I have, with Matth., Fr., and Scholz, adopted into the text, though in small characters, the words ὁ Ἰησοῦς, for which there exists strong external authority. The doubt, however, which I formerly felt as to their genuineness has been rather increased than diminished. For though the uncial MSS. which have the words form the majority, yet they are not the most ancient: all of those are without the words, and their testimony is strengthened by all the earliest Versions; not to mention that internal evidence is rather against than for them, from the greater probability of their having been put in, from the marginal Scholla, by the Scribes, than put out by the Critics. And the heavy phalanx of cursive MSS., including all the Lamb. but one, and nearly all the Mus. copies, does not materially help their cause, when we consider that antiquity, in a case like this, is of great weight; and this applies to ancient Versions no less than ancient MSS.

—περίλυπος—ἕως θανάτου] For the former of these two expressions comp. our Lord's words recorded only elsewhere in John xii. 27, νῦν ἡ ψυχὴ μου ταρασσεται,—and for the latter and for both, Jon. v. 9, σφόδρα λελύπημαι—ἕως θανάτου. From the expression λέγει in the foregoing verse, it appears that the meaning here meant to be expressed was, that the sorrow was so intense as altogether to overwhelm him, inasmuch that the cup of endurance was all but "to overflow full," and such as to have exceeded the utmost point of endurance, had not, as we find from Luke xxii. 43, our Lord's bodily strength been upheld by an angel from on high. With respect to the nature of the deep sorrow here expressed, it is such as far transcends the powers of the human understanding, in their present imperfect state, fully to comprehend, and to which the most anxious investigations that ever have, or ever will be made, must be inadequate. On so deep and mysterious a subject, little is it that we can know; and to it we cannot approach too reverently. That the cup was not simply death (as some of the ancient Interpreters understood) we may be very certain. That the agony was occasioned (as some suppose) through the Divine wrath, by our Redeemer thus bearing the sins of the world, is liable to many objections; as is also the opinion, that our Lord had then a severe spiritual conflict with the great Enemy of mankind. The deadly horror was probably produced by a variety of causes, arising from his peculiar situation and circumstances, which it were presumptuous too minutely to scan. At the same time, however, we may rest assured that our Lord's agony was, in some mysterious way, connected with the offering of himself as a sacrifice for the sins of the world, and the procuring of the redemption of mankind.

39. προελθὼν] Many of the best MSS., including very many uncials, have προσελθὼν, which was adopted by Matthæi and Scholz, but on insufficient grounds. The common reading has been rightly retained by Griesbach, Fritz, Lachm., and Tisch.; for it is in vain to urge MS. authority in words so perpetually confounded as προ and προς in composition. But even were that waved, and MSS. were in favour of προς, yet the testimony of Versions and Fathers, all of them on the side of προ, would turn the scale in favour of προ.

—The μου is absent from L, D, and several cursive MSS., with several Fathers (to which I add Just. Mart., Valent., and Cels., cited by Anger), and it is cancelled by Lach. and Tisch., also by Alf., who briefly characterizes it as "correction to conform to v. 42"—as if it were a matter of fact, which is far from being the case. For while external evidence against the word is quite insufficient (add, too, that all the Lamb. and Mus. copies have it), internal evidence draws two ways, considering that it was quite as likely to be omitted by accident, as inserted from v. 42. Moreover, all the ancient Versions recognize the word,—for though Tisch. testifies that Cod. Amiat. of the Vulg. has not, I testify that the Lamb. MS., of the 7th century, has it; and the omission in the other only arose from variation of position, some copies having the 'mi' before 'pater.' Accordingly, the amount of evidence, external and internal, is, I maintain, rather in favour of than against the μου: at any rate, there is no case for alteration.

—εἰ δυνατόν ἐστι.] 'We are here (says Grotius) to distinguish between what is impossible per se, and what is impossible hoc vel illo pacto. Now per se nothing is impossible with God, except such things as are in themselves inconsistent, or else are repugnant to the Divine nature. The sense, therefore, is, "if it be consistent with the counsels of thy Providence for the salvation of men." Comp. John xii. 27. Thus the words are perfectly reconcilable with those of the parallel passage of Mark xiv. 36, πάντα δυνάτὰ σοι.

Ἰν παρελθῆναι—τὸ ποτήριον (meaning the cup of bitterness spoken of John xviii. 11) there is the same figure as supra xx. 22, where see note. But the παρὰ in παρελθ. will not render it necessary for us to suppose, with Wets., an allusion to a cup being carried past any one at a banquet (though he adduces passages more than sufficient to prove what no one would doubt), because that would not comport with the august air of the context. Indeed, the παρα refers not so much to the cup, as to the thing represented under that figure,—namely, the whole of that suffering inexpressible, which now impended over our Redeemer; and accordingly, the preposition only signifies away, as when a threatening evil passes away, blows over, as we say, like a thunder-cloud. This is placed beyond doubt by a passage of Demosth., p. 291. 12, παρελθεῖν ἐποίησα τὸν τότε παριστάμεν τῷ πόλει κίνδυνον ὑσπερ νίφος. With the sense by a bold figure suggested in ποτήριον (and δρασκεῖν furtū in Is. li. 17, “who hast drunk at the hand of the Lord the cup of his fury; hast drunken the dregs of the cup of trembling”), I would compare a passage (scarcely inferior in sublimity to the above passage of the Prophet) in Æschyl. Agam. 1367, τάδ' ἂν δικάσιεν ἢν, ὑπερδίκων μὲν οὖν Τροῶνδε κρατὴρ' ἐν δόμοις κακῶν ὅδε Πηλέας δραίων, αὐτὸς ἐκτίνει μολών.

το ποτήριον τούτου· πλὴν οὐχ ὡς ἐγὼ θέλω, ἀλλ' ὡς σύ. ⁴⁰ Καὶ ἔρχεται πρὸς τοὺς μαθητὰς, καὶ εὐρίσκει αὐτοὺς καθεύδοντας, καὶ λέγει τῷ Πέτρῳ· Οὕτως οὐκ ἰσχύσατε μίαν ὥραν γρηγορῆσαι μετ' ἐμοῦ; ⁴¹ ὁ γρηγορεῖτε καὶ προσεύχεσθε, ἵνα μὴ εἰσέλθῃτε εἰς πειρασμόν· τὸ μὲν πνεῦμα πρόθυμον, ἡ δὲ σὰρξ ἀσθενής. ⁴² Πάλιν ἐκ δευτέρου ἀπελθὼν, προσηύξατο λέγων· Πάτερ μου, εἰ οὐ δύναται τούτο τὸ ποτήριον παρελθεῖν [ἀπ']

40. οὕτως] Itane? sicne? for οὕτως, like εἴτα, and some other particles, is so used with interrogations, as to denote wonder mixed with censure. See my Lex. Render: ‘Are ye, then, so utterly unable,’ &c. From the natural sense of the term γρηγορεῖν our Lord now passes to the metaphorical, and engrafs upon it an exhortation to Christian watchfulness; on which subject see an excellent Sermon on this text by Dr. South, vol. vi. 353, where, after observing that, ‘in the Christian warfare, the two great defensives against temptation are watching and prayer, he remarks, I. that watching implies, in the first place, a sense of the greatness of the evil we contend against; 2dly, a diligent survey of the power of the enemy, compared with the weakness and treachery of our own hearts; 3dly, a consideration of the ways by which temptation has prevailed on ourselves or others; 4thly, a continual attention to the danger, in opposition to remissness; 5thly, a constant and rigid temperance. II. That Prayer is rendered effectual, 1st, by fervency, or importunity; 2dly, by constancy, or perseverance. III. That Watching and Prayer must be always united; the first without the last being but presumption; the last without the first a mockery.

41. By εἰσέλθῃτε εἰς πειρ. is meant not simply to ‘come into temptation,’ but so to enter into temptation as to succumb to it, what would be involved in the expression ἐμπίπτειν εἰς πειρ., at 1 Tim. vi. 9. So Isidor. Etip. 226, explains by ἵνα μὴ ἄττηθῃτε τῷ πειρασμῷ καὶ καταποθῇται ὑπ' αὐτοῦ. The passage of Witsius cited by Stier and Alf., was wholly derived from this of Isidore. However, εἰσέλθ. is here used, and not ἐμπίπτ., because the former implies something voluntary on our part, whereby we court rather than avoid temptation. Accordingly our Lord suggests the means whereby the will may be influenced, and the purpose carried from intention into action: now the latter may be mainly promoted by the means above-mentioned, but that will be ineffectual without the former. Thus, as Calvin well remarks, we must note that the mode of resistance of temptation is here represented, ‘non ut nostra virtute et industriâ freti, colligamus animos, sed potius ut, consilii nostræ infirmitatis, arma et vires petamus a Domino.’ One can scarcely doubt that St. Peter had this injunction of his Lord in mind when in his 1st Epist. v. 8, 9, he wrote: Νήψατε, γρηγορήσατε, ὅτι ὁ ἀντίδικος ὑμῶν διάβολος κ.τ.λ., ὃ ἀντίστηται στήριόι τῇ πίστει, where by τῇ πίστει is surely to be understood, not as our Theologi neoterici affirm, ‘in the Christian religion,’ but in faith, as the great moving power to set man to work; accordingly the best comment on that passage is one of St. Paul, Eph. vi. 10—18, where, among other arms in the Evangelical Panoply, he espec. dwells on the shield of FAITH; and then adverts to the other indispensable means, earnest prayer in the spirit and instant watchfulness, ἀγρυπνία, having doubtless in mind his Lord’s earnest injunction (Mark xiii. 33), βλέπετε, ἀγρυπνεῖτε καὶ προσεύχεσθε.

— τὸ μὲν πνεῦμα—ἀσθενής] This is meant not as an excuse for their frailty, but as an incentive to greater vigilance, accompanied with prayer.

42. πάλιν ἐκ δευτέρου] Some would refer πάλιν to ἀπελθὼν, and ἐκ δευτ. (scil. χρόνου) to προσηύξατο. But the Class. exx. adduced by the Commentators show that the words must be taken together: which, however, involve no pleonasm, but a stronger expression.

The words τὸ ποτήριον, and ἀπ' ἐμοῦ, are cancelled by L., T., and Alf., on the authority of a few uncial and some 10 cursive MSS. (to which I add Lamb. 528, and Mus. 17,982)—‘additions from v. 39, as the varr. readings show,’ says Mr. Alf. But the variations in position may, as in numerous other cases, have occasioned the omission. Besides, the support of the Pesch. Syr. strongly attests the genuineness of τὸ ποτ. There is less certainty of that of ἀπ' ἐμοῦ. Again, why should Mr. Alf. represent the authority for the words as consisting of only a couple of MSS. of the old Latin Vernon, when it is in reality that of all the uncials except five, and all the cursives except a very few, confirmed by the Vulg., and, contrary to Mr. Alford’s assertion, the Pesch. Syr.? That Just. Mart. read τὸ ποτήριον, is plain from his C. Tryph. p. 331.

43. For εὐρίσκει, Lach., Tisch., and Alf. read εὑρεν, from 5 uncial, and 17 other MSS. But internal evidence (no less than external authority) is rather in favour of εὐρίσκει, the narrative present for the imperf. or aor. being quite in the manner of the Scriptural writers. That it should have been altered to match the εὐρίσκει at v. 40 for no apparent reason, is improbable. At any rate, there is no case for change.

44. ἀφείς αὐτούς] i. e. 'having left them' in the stato they were, viz. asleep; lit. 'having let them alone.' So it is said, supra xv. 14, ἀφείρε αὐτούς. The words ἐκ τρίτου have been cancelled by Lach., Tisch., and Alf., from ancient MSS.; but they are sufficiently defended by the great body of the MSS. confirmed by the Versions. They were probably lost from variety of position.

45. καθεύδετε τὸ λοιπὸν, &c.] Here we have an imperative permissivæ, though of a peculiar kind, there being, as Bengel remarks, left understood some such expression as si vacat, 'if you can bring yourselves so to do;' or, as Chrys. and Euthym. explain, εἰ δύνασθε, which words are left unsaid per aposiopesis, by which the point of the sarcasm (for irony, which many Commentators injudiciously suppose, there is none) is spared them. At ἀναπαύεσθε I have pointed as I have, because there is a sort of aposiopesis, which may be filled up by what is expressed in the πείχει of Mark xiv. 41, forming the trus interpretation of an obscure, because brief, expression; and brief, because the occasion called for brevity. The term, however, is best considered as a formula of exclamation; when we say 'Tis enough,' or, 'Enough!' By this it is intimated that the time for duteous attention, in watching with him, was gone by, and the season for trial and suffering, the ἡ ὥρα mentioned in our Lord's prayer (Mark xiv. 35) was just at hand, and the Betrayer on the point of appearing to usher in the sad scene which was only to end with the last outcry, Matt. xxvi. 50, and the τετέλεισται, John xix. 30.

After ὥρα I have removed the comma, because here the καὶ is to be taken as put for ἢ in the sense of time when, as oft. in New Test. See my Lex. By ἀμαρτ. are to be understood, not the Roman soldiers only, who came to apprehend our Lord (and who being idolaters, were termed such), but the Jews who had been compassing his death; to both classes the appellation was highly suitable. Though in pronouncing these words our Lord meant to remind them of what he had foretold in Galilee, and to intimate that the time for its fulfilment was close at hand. See supra xvi. 21. xvii. 22. Mark ix. 31. x. 33. Luke xiv. 6, 7. 26. 46.

47. ὄχλος πολὺς] Such it might well be called, as being a mixed multitude, consisting not only of the detachment (what in the passage of John is termed σκιῶρα) of the Roman soldiery in garrison at the Tower of Antonia, but the officials of the Jewish Council, nay, it would seem from Luke xxii. 52, some of the chief priests themselves, together with the apparitors and servants in attendance on the principal persons.

49. κατεφίλησεν] Agreeably to the customary mode of salutation in ancient times, especially in the East; which is still retained in Spain and some parts of Italy and France. In the Classical writers the κατα is usually intensive; but in the Sept. both the simple and the compound are used indifferently. Here, however, we may suppose from κατα an intensity of sense, very suitable to the character of the betrayal, intimating that he on this occasion kissed his Master with an officious earnestness greater than usual, both with a design to conceal his treachery (as in a case recorded 2 Sam. xx. 9, 10), and that there might be no mistake about the sign by which he was to point out the person of Jesus. Mr. Alf. says that 'the term is not to be pressed on, being only another for ἐφίλ.' But 'to kiss tenderly' is not pressing on the sense, but drawing it fully out; and the word is, I believe, always so used in the Class. writers, e. gr. Xen. Mem. ii. 6. 33, ὡς τοὺς μὲν καλοὺς φιλήσαντές μου, τοὺς δὲ ἀγαθοὺς καταφιλήσαντές. It is true that in the negligent use of terms, so frequent in the Sept., the same Hebr. word קָוַץ is rendered indifferently by φιλέω and καταφ.; but, in the passage before us, the circumstances of the case justify, and even demand the full sense; and this is confirmed by the Παῖσι, Παῖσι of Mark.

Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν αὐτῷ ἑταίρε, ἐφ' * δὲ πάρει; Τότε προσελθόντες ἐπέβαλον τὰς χεῖρας ἐπὶ τὸν Ἰησοῦν, καὶ ἐκράτησαν αὐτόν. ⁵¹ * Καὶ ἰδοὺ, εἰς τῶν μετὰ Ἰησοῦ, ἐκτείνας τὴν χεῖρα, ^{x John 18. 10. 50. ἐφ' δὲ πάρει.] On carefully reconsidering the reading here, I see reason to defer to the authority of almost all critical editors, from Matth. and Griesb. down to Tisch. and Lachm., by admitting the reading ἐφ' δ. The very rarity of the construction with the accus. attests its genuineness. This seems to be an Hellenistic idiom, since it occurs in Jos. Ant. xix. 2, 4, γνωρίσασα ἐφ' δὲ ἰχώρει. The dative is used by the Class. writers. See more in my note on Thucyd. i. 134, γνῶναι ἐφ' ᾧ ἰχώρει. The εταῖρος is prefixed for the purpose of ushering in these words, which are, of course, not to be considered as a question for information (that could not be needed), but a demand for explanation, q. d. (in the words of Matth. Henry) 'Is it peace, Judas? Comest thou as a friend, or an enemy? If as an enemy, why this kiss? If as a friend, what are these swords and staves? Thou knowest best.' There is thus an appeal to the conscience of the betrayer. The remonstrance here implied is expressed in the words of Luke: φιλήματι τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου παραδίδω; where see note.

51. τὸ ὠτίον.] The whole ear, not (as Grotius understands) the tip of it; for that is inconsistent with the οὗς in the parallel passage of Luke. Besides, ὠτίον is not unfrequently used in the LXX. for οὗς. And (as Lobeck on Phryn. p. 211, observes) the common dialect calls most parts of the body by diminutives, as τὰ ῥινία, and τὸ ὀμμάτιον.

— In ἀπέσπασε we have Alexandrian Greek (found only elsewhere in the Sept., and once in Ptolemy) for the Classic ἔσπασε, just as ἀφείλε is the same (though found only in the later Greek writers) for Class. ἀπέτεμε, or ἀπέκοψε, as in John.

52. πάντες γὰρ ἀπολοῦνται.] This is not, I conceive, as some think, a prediction of the destruction of the Jews, who took up the sword unjustly against Christ and his disciples (see Rev. xiii. 10): nor is it, what others suppose, a proverbial saying against repelling force by force, founded on its evil effects on the person so resisting. It was, I apprehend, meant to inculcate a most important lesson of Christian ethics on far higher ground, representing the procedure as not only imprudent, perhaps illegal, but irreligious; intimating that such determined resistance to wrong not only proves its own punisher, but, by taking that vengeance which belongeth unto God into its own hand, misses of the redress which the Judge on the throne above will mete out.

53. ἡ δοκεῖς, &c.] The connexion seems to be this; 'Or [if that argument will not avail, take this—that I need not thy assistance] for thinkest thou' &c. The argument in this and the verse following is, that seeking such aid would imply both distrust in Divine Providence, and inattention to the revealed will of God in his word; that it would be besides unlawful, and unnecessary;—unlawful, because at variance with the spirit of the religion he was promulgating; unnecessary, because he could if he judged fit, call to his aid superhuman and irresistible power.

56. I am still of opinion, that the words form a continuation of our Lord's speech, and are not a remark of the Evangelist,—both because this is forbidden by the parallel passage of Mark, and espec. since thus our Lord's speech would lose much of its completeness. I cannot but think that the misconception as to the point has arisen from an imperfect idea as to the true sense of the words τούτο δὲ ὅλον γέγονεν, ἵνα &c., which is, 'But the whole of this has been done, has taken place [as it has], so that the Scriptures should be fulfilled;' inasmuch as the Passion which had taken place, and the Cross which was at hand, were but the fulfilment of Scripture in the Prophecies of Isaiah and others.

— ἀφέντες α. ἐφυγον] 'forsook him and fled,'—namely, for the moment; though Peter and John must very soon have turned back, since John at least came up in time to enter in with Jesus into the palace of the high priest; and probably many of the rest were but little in the rear of them. There was, however, enough of desertion fully to verify our Lord's prediction, and show them how weak were their late professions of fidelity to the death, v. 35. This frank statement by the Evangelists, of a fact which redounded so much to their own discredit, has been justly considered as affording a strong attestation of their thorough honesty in the general record of facts, so much so as to make them in the record of these facts worthy of entire confidence.

57. ἀπήγαγον πρὸς Κ.] i. e. after having been first taken to Annas (as we learn from John xviii. 13), in order, it should seem, to do him honour, while the Sanhedrim was collecting,—a mark of attention to which he was entitled as being really High Priest, but who, as we learn from the passage of John, only entered into the matter in a general way (this being one by a previous audience), and, after putting Jesus into bonds, sent him to Caiaphas for a fuller hearing before the Sanhedrim (by this time collected together), in order to a subsequent regular Trial.

59. After ἀρχιερεῖς the words οἱ πρεσβύτεροι are cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, D, L, and 3 cursive MSS. and some later Versions,—insufficient authority; espec. considering that the evidence of the MSS. at large is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Vers. However, the words may have been introduced from the parallel passage of Luke. Just after, for θανατώσωσιν αὐτόν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. adopt αὐτὸν θανατώσουσι, from 9 uncial and 2 cursive MSS. (to which I add all the Lamb. but one, and most of the Mus. copies); and this may possibly be the true reading, as far as regards -σουσι, the construction being one often found in very ancient copies; but as to the alteration, that has internal evidence as well as external authority against it, and was one proceeding from certain Critics. To account for the usual position, with Mr. Alf., as one derived from the parallel passage of Mark, is a mere flimsy device for the nonce,—for to suppose upwards of 400 copies altered in the position of two words, where the alteration could not affect the sense, were absurd. The other alteration was continually employed by the Alex. Critics, who had not sufficient judgment to see that the natural order, in writings like the Gospels, is far more likely to be genuine than the artificial.

—ἐζήτουν ψευδομαρτυρίαν] We need not suppose that they suborned false witnesses. Had they done this, they would have tutored their witnesses better than to be rejected even by themselves. But the meaning seems to be, that, though they professed to inquire for true evidence, yet they readily entertained any, whether true or false, that might criminate Jesus. Nay, they studiously sought and encouraged the latter; whilst, on the other hand, all testimony in his favour was (by the Jewish law) rejected; for, though it was permitted to say any thing, true or untrue, against false prophets or persons suspected of idolatry, no man was permitted to appear in their behalf. In short, the best view that can be taken of the term ψευδομ. (for which Mark has μαρτ.) is, that the judgment of the Evangelist is blended with his narrative, as is not unfrequent in ancient writers. At οὐχ εὖρον just after we must supply μαρτυρίαν (taken from ψευδομαρτ.), by which it is to be understood μαρτυρίαν ἱκανήν, or, as Mark expresses it, ἰσχυρ.

60. The remarkable variation in the reading of the MSS. of this verse is such as to induce one to suspect interpolation, though only so far as to warrant bracketing the latter καὶ οὐχ εὖρον,—and yet even those words might be cancelled by certain Critics for the purpose of removing a tautology, or, at least, an awkwardness in phraseology. But, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, one in which palaeographical and critical reasons have much to do, the most simple reading, and that from which the others might spring, is entitled to the preference; and it is probable that the second οὐχ εὖρον is not genuine, and that the insertion arose from the second καὶ being misunderstood; whence some Revisers removed the καί, while others—though retaining it—repeated the οὐχ εὖρον. Although the external evidence for the absence of the words is slender, it is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., Sahid., Ital., Vulg., Copt., Arab., and Pers. Vers. It is not true that the Vulg. does not recognize the καί, as the Editors represent; for Jerome, in writing cum, meant, I would say, to express the sense intended by the καί; though in using cum he used it for quum, 'although.' Again, it is not true that the Pesch. Syr. does not recognize the καί. The Translators of that Version ought to have written not et, but quum (equiv. to quoniam). The same remark applies to the Arab. and Pers. Versions. But, in a case like this, the authority of Versions is not very great. On the whole, in weighing the evidence for and against the two readings in question, it is difficult to say which preponderates. In such a case I cannot do better than imitate the prudence (unwonted) of Lachm., by simply bracketing, rather than follow the too characteristic headlong impetuosity of Tisch. and Alf. But I must not omit to notice, that the ψευδομαρτυρεῖς after δύο is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., on the authority of B, L, and 5 cursive MSS., together with several Versions and Origen—authority this quite insufficient. Mr. Alford dismisses the text. rec. with his usual short-cut, "supplementary;" but saying is not proving, and he is bound to show why supplied. Far more likely was it to be removed than inserted,—removed by Critics who deemed it superfluous, and thought that, after the ψευδομ. only three words before, it involved a kind of tautology. But the intention of the Evangelist was to express that the charge involved in εἶπον, &c., was a false testimony. This, too, was the intention of St. Mark; but carried out with more precision thus: καὶ τινες ἀναστάτες ψευδομαρτυροῦν κατ' αὐτοῦ λέγοντες. In short, by cancelling the word ψεύδου, our Critics, like their brethren of old, have frustrated the intention of the sacred writer, by taking away the prominency which it was his purpose to give to the false testimony of the witnesses in question.

61. δοῦναι αὐτῷ This was (as appears from Mark xiv. 58, and John ii. 19) in effect a falsity, by the suppression of some words of Christ, together with the αἰτίαν which explained them, and adding others. Hence the witnesses are justly termed ψευδομάρτυρες. By This temple our Lord plainly meant his body. If it could have been proved that Jesus had spoken irreverently of the Temple, by predicting its destruction, that would have afforded some ground for a charge of blasphemy, which was a capital offence. But that they were unable to prove; and they were obliged to satisfy themselves with endeavouring to fix on Jesus the offence of intending the destruction of the Temple. That some of the multitude thought so, or affected to think so, appears from infra xvii. 40, ὁ καταλὼν τὸν ναόν, &c. The same course was taken against the Proto-martyr Stephen, on which occasion (as we learn from Acts vi. 13) their foremost accusation was, that 'he had spoken blasphemously against the Holy Place, by saying that Jesus would destroy that place,' &c. However, on the present occasion the High Priest, finding that even this vague imputation could not be substantiated (ὅτι οὐδὲ οὗτος ἴσθι, 'consistent,' ἦν ἡ μαρτυρία α.), thought fit to change his ground, artfully seeking to provoke our Lord to say something whereby he might afford matter for a criminal charge; and accordingly he puts (v. 62) the interrogatory, "Answerest thou nothing as to what those [witnesses] testify against thee?" For so I would render, with Campb.; because I now give the preference to the punctuation of Fritz., Lachm., and Tisch., by which the double interrogation, harsh, and, at the same time, feeble and forced, is removed; and this is confirmed by all except the Syr. and Sahidic,—and, even with respect to them, the second interrogation is, I think, inserted without warrant. The mistake arose, I doubt not, from its not being perceived that there is here the elliptical use of τί for κατὰ τί, which is not so rare, but that it is also to be recognized at Phil. iii. 15, and Philem. 18. The

8, τ¹ which Origen reads, is no other than a correction of diction, as will appear from note on Mark ix. 11.

63. ἀποκριθεῖς] Mr. Alf. remarks that ἀποκριθεῖς here is omitted in G, L, Z, I, 13, 33, 69, 102, Ital., Vulg., Copt., Sah. Vers., and Origen, "because of the former clause, in which our Lord said nothing." That may be the case; but then these are of the very class of MSS. so magnified by Critics of the school of Lachm.; though, indeed, this is only one of a thousand instances marking at once gross ignorance, and licence unbounded, which the devotees to system are too blind to perceive. But another reason why the Critics removed the ἀποκριθ. was, because they could not digest the strong Hebraism; whence, again, at Mark xiv. 20, the MSS. B, C, D, L, and nearly the same Versions, but without any cursives, leave out ἀποκρ., which has accordingly been cancelled by their obedient servants Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.

— ἔθορκίζω σε, &c.] This seems to have been the most solemn form of administering an oath. Ὀρκίζω and ἔθορκ. are used in the LXX. to express the Hebr. שָׁוַע, 'to make to swear, to swear in,' to put to one's oath. The ἐγὼ points at the exaction of the oath; and κατὰ has reference to the stretching of the hand upon, or towards, the person or object sworn by. As this oath of adjuration brought an obligation, under the curse of the Law, it imperatively claimed a reply, when the adjuration accompanied an interrogation; and the answer thus returned was regarded as an answer on oath; in which case falsity was accounted perjury. Thus, our Lord, who had before disdained to reply to an unfounded, and even absurd charge (spec. before judges who had predetermined to find him guilty), now thought himself bound to answer, as an example to others of reverence towards so solemn a form.

— ὁ Χριστός, ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ] Grotius and Whitby remark, that from this and other passages (as Matt. xvi. 16), it is clear that the Jews expected their Messiah to be Son of God (interpreting the 2nd Psalm as said of him); which title, it is also certain, they understood as implying Divinity, otherwise the High Priest could not have declared the assumption of it to be blasphemy, which has been well defined 'tho saying or doing any thing by which the majesty of God is insulted, uttering curses or reproaches against God, also the arrogating and taking to oneself that which belongs to God.' In this latter sense the Jews must have understood it, when they said, "We stone thee for blaspheming, and that thou, being a man, makest thyself God;" 'for what blasphemy (says Mr. Coleridge, Table Talk, i. 142) could there be,—unless the assuming to be the Son of God was assuming to be of the Divine nature? That the Jews did so believe of their expected Messiah, has been thoroughly proved; but by none more convincingly than by the writer of the Lettres de quelques Juifs à M. Voltaire.

64. σὺ εἶπας] This must be substantially equiv. to ἔγω εἶμι, though whether the form has, as Mr. Alf. says, any reference to the convictions and admissions of Caiaphas, may greatly be doubted. Of the former we can know nothing; and of the latter there exists no proof. The truth is, that one is as much a simple assertion as the other; but probably the σὺ εἶπας had more of gravity and dignity (as supra v. 25, as addressed to Judas); nay, on an occasion like this, more of solemnity. Of the many citations from the Classical writers, not one is to the purpose. Those from the Rabbinical writers adduced by Schoëtig. are quite sufficient to prove this to be, as he affirms, solemnis affirmantium apud Judæos formula. And this suits both of the two passages, where alone it occurs in Scripture. But, although it was doubtless a Jewish formula, and consequently likely to occur in St. Matthew's Gospel, yet it would be almost unintelligible to the persons for whom St. Mark formed his Gospel; accordingly, he chose the substantially equiv. form ἔγω εἶμι. Of course, this simple statement of the force of the formula as an ordinary Hebrew idiom, excludes Mr. Alford's fine-spun theory that 'it is never used, unless some reason is latent in, or to be gathered from, the words of the questioner.' This would make the formula unfit for the purpose of any such formula,—i. e. to be used on the various occasions of common life. The πλὴν just after should be rendered "but further," "moreover."

— Here ἀπ' ἄρτι stands for ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν (used by Luke), which, by a slight accommodation, may mean μετὰ μικρόν, as Euthym. here explains, and may point at the speedy result of the transactions now taking place. The words following have reference to the sublime imagery descriptive of the Messiah's advent in Dan. vii. 13, 14. [See supra xxiv. 30, and note xxv. 31. 1 Thess. iv. 16.]

— τῆς δυνάμεως] for τοῦ Θεοῦ; literally, the Power, abstract for concrete, as we say 'the Almighty' (see Heb. i. 3; viii. 1. 1 Pet. iv. 14); an idiom founded on the Jewish mode of expressing the Deity, הַיְהוָה, the Powerful One.

Thus, in Luke xxii. 69, and sometimes in Philo Jud., τοῦ Θεοῦ is added, as it were, to determine the sense. Hence the expression is not ill rendered in the Syr. Vers. by a word signifying numinis (as in 2 Thess. ii. 4), far preferable to the rendering of Schleus. virtutis. The advent here meant is, primarily at least, the coming of Christ to take vengeance on the Jews at the destruction of Jerusalem; and secondarily, but chiefly, his final advent to judge the world, here alluded to in the term καθήμεν.

65. διέῤῥηξε τὰ ἱμάτια] It was a custom among the ancients to express the more violent passions, espec. grief and indignation, by rending the garments, either partly, or from top to bottom, but sometimes from bottom to top. From Lev. x. 6, it appears that the High Priest was forbidden to rend his garments; but this was only in mourning for the dead. That he might and did rend them on other suitable occasions we learn from 1 Macc. xi. 71, and Jos. Bell. ii. 15. 4; among such other occasions was espec. that of hearing blasphemy, 2 Kings xviii. 37.

66. ἔνοχος θανάτου i.] A form of, as we say, 'finding guilty,' not of actual condemnation by formal sentence. How ἔνοχος comes to have this sense, see my Lex.

67. ἐκολάφισαν] Between κολαφίζω and βαπτίζω there exists the same distinction in signification as between our verbs to thump (i. e. 'strike with the fist'), and to slap, or 'strike with the open hand.' The expression used by Mark (xiv. 65), ῥαπισμασι, is a stronger one, meaning lit. that they 'pelted him with slaps'—an idiom probably of common Greek—involving, indeed, a catachresis in the use of βάλλω; not, however, without example in even our best writers, who so use the verb to pelt.

68. προφήτευσον ἡμῖν, &c.] To understand this, it is proper to bear in mind (what we learn from Mark and Luke), that Christ was blindfolded when these words were pronounced; in which there was a taunt on his claiming the title of Messiah, and a play on the double sense of προφητεύειν (which is often used in a sense corresponding to our verb to divine, or guess), whereby they called on him to prove his claims to supernatural knowledge.

69. ἔξω] i. e. outside of the place where Jesus was examined by the council; which was the vestibule, called by Matth. πύλων. For ἐκῶθ. ἔξω, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read, from B, D, L, Z, Δ, and 5 cursives (to which I add one of the Lamb. and one of the Mus. copies), ἔξω καθ. It is entitled to attention, as presenting the more natural collocation, but is not, without more authority, entitled to be adopted.

^{70.} ἡρνήσατο λέγων· Οὐκ οἶδα τί λέγεις] This is regarded by the Commentators as a form of strong denial; and they adduce in proof of this a passage of Soph. Aj. 265, πῶς τοῦτ' ἔλεξας; οὐ κάτοιδ' ὅπως λέγαις. But that passage is of a different kind from the present; for there the words are simply those of persons professing surprise at hearing a thing, together with ignorance as to what it means, implying a desire to be informed, as John xvi. 18, οὐκ οἶδαμιν τί λαλεῖ. However, it does seem to be a form of speech (seemingly one of common life) which, when used in answer to a question, implied a denial of the thing brought forward by interrogation. A strong proof of this is supplied by the Mishna de Juremēt. viii. 3, 6, "Si quis interrogaverit quid est bos meus? et alter responderit: Ignoro ubi tu fabularis" ('what thou talkest about'), answering to λαλεῖς. That I understand as a covert way (like our phrase, 'I know nothing about it') of saying, I have not got it.

The word αὐτῶν is inserted before πάντων by Griesb. and Sch., on very strong external authority; which I could further strengthen from the Lamb. and Mus. copies. I agree, however, with Lachm. and Tisch., in not admitting it, because internal evidence is against it. It could not well be omitted in so many MSS. from homœoteleuton; but was, we may suppose, inserted from a marginal, or interlinear Scholium.

^{71.} τοῖς ἐκεῖ] Almost all the uncials, and a good many cursive MSS., have αὐτοῖς ἐκεῖ; while not a few others have αὐτοῖς ἐκ., which is adopted by Matth. and Scholz, but αὐτοῖς ἐκ. by Tisch. and Alf.; while Lachm. retains the text. rec. τοῖς ἐκεῖ—very properly;—for, considering the confusion in the MSS., and the strange varieties presented, the simplest reading, and that from which the others might have sprung, is to be preferred. Now such, I apprehend, is τοῖς ἐκεῖ, which is too elegant a Grecism (being used by Thucyd., Plato, Soph., &c.) to have come from the scribes, still less to have arisen from accident. The origin of the confusion in the copies was, 1) the occurrence of the adverb ἐκεῖ (which adverb has elsewhere occasioned similar effects); and, 2) the ignorance of the scribes as to the construction of ἐκεῖ with the Article; which, though frequent in the purest Greek writers, occurs no where else in the New Test.; which misconception occasioned those scribes, or blundering Critics, to refer the adverb ἐκεῖ to the following context, in which case they would read τοῖς, which then could not stand, as if αὐτοῖς. Thus all is clear, and we have no need to resort to Mr. Alford's gratuitous supposition, that τοῖς ἐκεῖ was an "emendation for perspicacity;" he might rather have said propriety, for the other is too bad Greek to have proceeded from any but ignorant scribes. How Grot., Mill, Matth., and Scholz could have been induced to read it, though supported by such strong external evidence (for I find it in nearly every Lamb. MS. and most of the Mus. copies), I know not, since it is utterly out of place—so much so, that I remember no other instance of an address commencing with an adverb like ἐκεῖ.

^{73.} οἱ ἐστῶτες] scil. ἐκεῖ, for παρῃστώτες, 'those who stood [by, or near],' the term used in John i. 35. iii. 29. xviii. 18.

— ἡ λαλία σου δηλὸν σε ποιεῖ] 'thy dialect betrayeth thee.' Different provinces of the same country have usually their distinctive idioms, accent, &c., which in the remoter parts are more strongly marked, such as Brittany in France, Biscay in Spain, and Wales and Cornwall in England. That this was espec. the case in the instance of Galilee, we learn from the Rabbinical writers, who not only tell us that the speech of the Galileans was broad and rustic, but have pointed out at large the points of difference; which resolve themselves into the imperfect pronunciation of some letters, and the confounding of others, espec. the gutturals, with each other. See Wets., whose matter, however, was derived, with abridgment,—though, as usual, without acknowledgment,—from the elaborate Dissertation of Lightf. on the Dialect of the Galileans, as differing from the rest of the Jews in the 87th chap. of his Cent. Chorograph.

^{74.} On reconsidering the reading here, I am now of opinion, that vain is it to attempt to resist the evidence of almost all the MSS. (including all the Lamb. and Mus. copies) which present καταθεματίζειν. I have therefore admitted the word into the text. But, as I cannot find the slightest vestige of its existence except in this one passage, I presume it to have been a term of the provincial Greek of Palestine, arising from a negligent pronunciation of καταναθεμ.

XXVII. 1. πρῶτας δὲ γεν.] The meeting of the Sanhedrim could not be held till the morning, since the courts of the Temple were never opened by night; nor, if they had been then held, could judgment have been pronounced; for among the Jews justice was administered only in the day-time.

2. δήσαντες] This word is, on account of John xviii. 12 (whence it appears that Christ had been bound before), by most Commentators supposed to be put for δεδεμένον. That, however, is too violent a way of removing the discrepancy. It is better, with Elsner and Fritz., to suppose that our Lord's bonds had been removed during examination, and were now again put on him.

— ἡγεμόνι] So he is sometimes styled by Josephus also; though, properly speaking, Pilate was only an ἐπίτροπος, or Procurator, as Joseph. and Philo often call him. He was indeed virtually ἡγεμὼν, because he (as was not unusual in the lesser provinces) had entrusted to him the authority of ἡγεμὼν, as if President (which included the administration of justice, and the power of life and death); in subordination, however, to the President of Syria, to whom was an appeal en dernier ressort.

3. ἰδὼν ὅτι κατεκρ. μεταμ.] On what is here said is chiefly founded the opinion of some of the ancient Fathers, as well as many modern Commentators (as Whitby, Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, and A. Clarke), that Judas was partly induced to betray his Master by the expectation that, as Messiah, he could not suffer death, but would no doubt deliver himself from their hands, in some such way as he had done aforetime. Of course, we have no means of ascertaining whether this was so or not, except from what his Lord said of him, and from what we find said of him by the sacred writers. But in neither is there the least countenance given to the above notion. And to suppose that the condemnation of the Lord took him by surprise, as those Commentators suppose, is, as Mr. Alf. observes, 'inconsistent with his own confession, v. 4, where the words παραδόντες αἷμα ἀθῶον express his act,' and imply his deliberate purpose. Besides, in taking the price of his Lord's blood he must have made up his mind to the event, and therefore have incurred the whole guilt; facti orimen habebat. Strange it is that any should have fancied in what Judas did on this occasion the marks of repentance. The very term employed, not μετανοῶν, but μεταμίλομαι, very rarely used elsewhere in the New Test., quite discountenances this; and the language used by our Lord, supra xxvi. 24, and John xvii. 12, conjoined with that of Peter, Acts i. 25, forbids us to suppose his feeling to have been more than, what the force of μεταμειλ. will authorize,—namely, the remorse occasioned by the stings of an upbraiding conscience; which, however, was roused only when the thing was done, and could not be undone—when, instead of the petty gain, the shame arising from universal abhorrence alone presented itself; for, as Elsner remarks, 'apud improbos conscientia vigilare non solet, nisi cum res sit conclamata.' Besides, even in the term ἡμαρτον there is only an acknowledgment of sin, implying, at most, only a change of mind as to the act done, so as to wish it undone; but by no means that change of heart indispensable to 'repentance not to be repented of.' In short, it was only a bitterness of remorse which was calculated to terminate, as it did, in despair and suicide.

4. αἷμα ἀθῶον] 'an innocent person.' A signification frequent in the Sept., Philo, and other Hellenistic writers; by which αἷμα corresponds to σάφς καὶ αἷμα. The word ἀθῶος, indeed, properly, and always in the Classical writers, signifies impunis, the not being liable to punishment. Yet the Hellenistic usage is not only defensible, but perhaps more agreeable to the primary signification of the word.

5. ἀπελθὼν ἀπήγατο.] The plain import of the words would seem to be, 'he went and hanged himself;' a sense supported by the ancient Versions. Since, however, it has been thought inconsistent with the account given by Peter (Acts i. 18) of the death of Judas, many methods of interpretation have been devised to reconcile this discrepancy. See my Recens. Synop. But, after all, there is nothing to authorize us to desert the common signification of ἀπάγχεσθαι (wherein the reflexive sense is to be noticed, on which see Thucyd. iii. 81, and my note), nor any reason to doubt that Judas hanged himself as Athiophel did before him (2 Sam. xvii. 23), prob. selecting that mode of suicide, simply because it was frequent; indeed of the expression itself, ἀπελθὼν ἀπήγατο, &c., many examples have been adduced, both from the Sept. and the Class. writers. And, as we shall see further on, it involves no real discrepancy with St. Luke's account. Whereas the other interpretations are open to many objections. Thus, even that which assigns the sense 'was suffocated,' (literally 'suffocated himself,') introduces a signification which cannot with certainty be established; for though in Hdol. ii. 131, ἡ καὶς ἀπήγατο ὑπὸ ἀχρεῖς may, with Perizon., be rendered, 'was suffocated with grief' (an effect of mental agony which is known to sometimes occur), yet it seems far better to render the expression, with the Editors in general, 'hanged herself'; a sense occurring also at vii. 232: λίγεται—ἀλλοῦ ἀγγελοῦ—ὡς ἡτίμωτο, ἀπάγξασθαι. Besides, the context, and the use of the expression ἀπελθὼν, point to an action, not to any thing of so passive a nature as dying of grief. The best mode of reconciling the apparent discrepancy is to suppose (with many eminent Expositors), that after he had suspended himself,—prob. from a branch of a tree overhanging a precipice,—the rope breaking, or giving way (from the noose slipping, or otherwise), he fell down headlong, and, from falling on some prominent and sharp substance, burst asunder, so that his bowels protruded. Thus, in a Rabbinical writer cited by Wets. on Acts i. 18, 'quidam de tecto in plateam decidit et ruptus est enter, et viscera ejus effluerunt.' So πρηνής in the passage of Acts may be taken, like our headlong, simply of falling down from a high place; as in the examples adduced by me in Recens. Synop. And this view is confirmed by the air of the expression, which implies falling from on high. Thus the narration in Matthew is sufficiently reconciled with that in the Acts, by supposing, that in the former is recorded the kind of death by which Judas sought destruction; and in the latter, that by which he made his final exit; and which, at least, was the result of the other.

6. κορβανᾶν] 'The treasury.' See my Lex. 7. τὸν ἀγρὸν τοῦ κεραμέως] The Article τοῦ expresses a particular field known by that name, doubtless so called from having been occupied by a potter, to dig clay for his wares: just as the field at Athens, appropriated as a cemetery for those who fell in the service of their country, was called Ceramicus, from having been formerly used for brick-making. This, of course, would make a field unfit for tillage; though good enough for a burying-ground. And thus the smallness of the price may be accounted for. By τοῖς ξέν. understand such Gentile strangers as happened to die in Jerusalem.

9. τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ Ἰερ.] The following passage is not found in Jeremiah; but something very like it, and, as it seems, the very prophecy, occurs in Zech. xi. 12, 13; which has induced some to suppose a corruption of the names, arising from MS. abbreviations. But that is taking too much for granted. The usual solution of the difficulty is, to suppose that Matt. simply wrote διὰ τοῦ προφήτου indefinitely, omitting, as he often does, the name of the prophet, and that Ἰερμ. was written in the margin, and then brought into the text. This may, indeed, seem rather cutting than untying the knot; though it is at least better than tying a new knot, by exchanging one knot for another; as is done by Mr. Mede and Bp. Kidder.

— διὰ Ἰερμ. τ. πρ.] What Bp. Lonsdale remarks, that 'this is one of the very few passages in which a sufficient explanation of a Scripture difficulty cannot be given,' is in a great degree true, espec. if we understand him to mean such an explanation as ought to be satisfactory to the persons for whom he drew up his work. The difficulty, however, must be acknowledged to be, from the peculiar circumstances of the case, not a little formidable; but nevertheless such as admits of being in a great measure obviated. Mr. Alf., indeed, finds here no difficulty at all; for, according to the view which he takes of the origin and authorship (as he is pleased to call it) of the three parallel Gospels, there is nothing to forbid his admitting that the author wrote Jeremiah for Zechariah,—forgetting which Prophet had the words,—and that, in quoting them, he, by trusting to the same treacherous memory, has quoted inaccurately. "We have," Mr. Alford subjoins, "similar mistakes in two places in the Apology of Stephen, Acts vii. 4, 16, and in Mark ii. 26." How far and to what degree those can be called mistakes, we shall consider on the proper occasion. For the present we are engaged with the one before us. As to the difficulty here found, "various means," observes Mr. Alford, "of evading it have been resorted to, which are not worth recounting." That many of them are such cannot be denied; but that some are worth recounting, and more than one are worth adopting, I hope to be enabled to show, as far as so extensive a question for discussion can be brought within the limits of an Annotation. The wide difference of opinion that exists on the passage, has arisen (as observes Dr. Henderson on Zech. xi. 12) partly by the fact of certain discrepancies existing between the accounts which the verses (in the Evangelist and the Prophet respectively) furnish, and partly by the consideration that the Evangelist expressly ascribes the words which he quotes to Jeremiah, and not to Zechariah. As respects the former of these points, it may (I agree with Dr. Henderson) be considerably obviated by the general observation, that the discrepancies are not greater than we meet with on several other quotations made from the O. T. by the writers of the New; and are by no means such as to affect the end which either the Prophet or the Evangelist had in view. "In adducing the citation," continues Dr. Henderson, "the latter had his eye more intent on the historical circumstances which he had just detailed, than on the strict grammatical construction and wording employed in the prophecy; accordingly, he fixes upon the principal points,—the despicable price at which Christ had been sold, and the appropriation of the money, as a compensation to the potter for the possession of his field; and having faithfully exhibited these to the view of his readers, he is less solicitous about the wording of the prophet; nay, the changes which he introduces into the phraseology are such as his position, in the character of an historian, required." Of these Dr. Henderson proceeds to notice some examples. The above view is quite confirmed by the following remarks of the very learned Hoffmann, in a most elaborate Dissertation on the subject at vol. ii. p. 170—197, of his 'Demonstratio Evangelica,' where, after remarking generally, "Certum est, utrumque locum in summa rei, et quoad præcipuas circumstantias, egregiè conspirare, et Evangelistam, licet non singulos verborum opices, sensum tamen oraculi prophetici exactè referre," he proceeds to adduce examples, which I need not cite, since the matter is nearly the same as Dr. H.'s; and Hoffmann has discussed, in the course of the Dissertation, the alleged discrepancies most ably, and so as to leave scarcely any thing to which a candid inquirer can take exception. As respects the introductory observation of Hoffmann, ubi supra, there is much to confirm its truth in the following remark of the very learned and orthodox Vitringa on Isa. lxiv. 4, which deserves to be well weighed: "Firmitas demonstrationis Novi ex V. T. non tam nititur omnium semper vocum conspiratione, quam concordia rerum, ad caput causæ pertinentium. Modum sæpe excedunt Philologi, in studio conciliandi universas utriusque Testamenti voces discrepantes, dum ex hoc illoque Scriptore N. T. homine spirituali, dicta Scripturæ spirituali sensu allegante, facere volunt Grammaticum." To this purpose is also the following observation of Flacius and Hoffmann combined: "Prophetarum munus fuit quid futurum esset prædicere, Evangelistarum vero, quid sit factum narrare; itaque cum Spiritus Dñi illorum oracula non exscribat, sed interpretetur, minime certe debuit enumerandis vocalibus adstringi. Scil. Scriptores N. T. sæpe mutarunt verba, ut ne meri tantum Translatores essent, sed Exegetæ simul, et ipsa eorum versio claritatem N. T. referret." See more to the same purpose in the able Dissertation of Hegelmäier (the Editor of Hoffmann's opus aureum), de recta ratione allegata N. T. ex V. T. interpretandi.

But to advert to the quæstio verata as to the real writer of the passage quoted—that St. Matth. should have really ascribed to Jeremiah a prediction which tallies so exactly with that in Zech. as not to allow one to doubt of their close affinity, is, indeed, a source of great perplexity; which perplexity is increased by the fact attested by Dr. Henders., the learned Translator of and Annotator on Jeremiah, that no such passage is to be found in any part of the predictions of that prophet. That Mr. Alf. should allow himself to suggest that Jer. xviii. 1, 2, and perhaps xxxiii. 6—12, may have given rise to the mistake, is amazing, since it involves an imputation on the Evangelist worse than that of failure of memory, or negligence. Such being the case, I quite agree with Hoffm. and Dr. Henders., that if it be allowed to take for granted, that the passage cited by St. Matthew is "ipsum quod apud Zecharie cap. xi. legitur, honori S. Scripturæ omnino melius longè consultum erit per ingenuam confessionem, quod mendum irreperit in Textu Matthæi, quam per violentas nominis Jeremias vindicias." Upon the whole, we are, observes Dr. Henders., shut up to one or other of the following conclusions: 1) that the one name is substituted for the other by a lapsus memoria: 2) that the portion of the book of Zech. in which the words are found, though now bearing his name, was written by Jeremiah, and by some means or other, to us unknown, has been appended to the real prophecies of Zechariah; or, 3) that there is a corruption of the name in the Greek text of Matth. The first of these positions will not, I agree with Dr. Henders., be admitted by any who believe in the plenary inspiration of the Apostles; a doctrine fully established on Scripture authority; and which, if denied, would completely annihilate our confidence in their testimony. As respects the second hypothesis, that, however ably maintained by Bp. Kidder and others, cannot stand, since it has been fully evinced by Dr. Henders., in the Preface to his Transl. of Jeremiah, that there is no solid foundation for the opinion, that the last six chapters of Zechariah were not written by that Prophet. It only remains that we assume a corruption in the Greek Text of the Evangelist. That a variety of reading as to the text of the Evangelist has from ancient times existed, cannot be denied. St. Augustine testifies, that in his time some MSS. had not the name of Ἰερμίου. In fact, it is omitted in MSS. 33 and 157, and perhaps in others hitherto uncollated or ill collated. It is also absent from the Pesch. Syr. Version in the Polyglott, Pers. Vers., and in a Persic MS. in the possession of Dr. Henders., dated 1057, in the Modern Greek Vers. in the Veron. and Vercell. MS. of the Ital. Version, as also in a Latin MS. of Lucas Brugensis. The Greek MS. 22 reads Ζαχαρίου, as also do the Philoxenian Syriac in the margin, and an Arabic MS. quoted by Bengel.

Under these circumstances we may suppose, as did Origen and Euseb., and many modern Critics, as Beza and Valckn. have done, that the reading Ἰερ. arose from the negligence of scribes, and that after the name having been written, Ζῳου may have been altered into Ἰου, whence Ἰερμίου. And though Wets. replies that no such abbreviation is to be found, whether new or old, that is not conclusive; for he himself collated but few MSS., and those somewhat carelessly. Considering how very carelessly all the MSS., with the exception of some fifty, have been collated, no one should presume to say that a certain reading does not exist. However, there is so little of proof, and so much taking for granted, in this hypothesis, that I cannot venture to adopt it. In short, I must finally acquiesce in the view of Hoffmann and Dr. Henders., that the Evangelist did not himself insert either name, but wrote simply διὰ τοῦ προφήτου, as he oft. does in his quotations, e. gr. i. 22. ii. 5. 15. xiii. 35. xxi. 4. xxvii. 35. For this reading there is, as we have seen, authority rather weighty as respects antiquity, for it cannot be doubted that the Pesch. Syr. and Italic Translators had not Ἰερμίου in their copies: to which I would add that Augustine precisely testifies "non omnes Codices Evangeliorum habere quod per Jeremiam dictum sit, sed tantummodo per Prophetam." And he is inclined to credit and to put faith rather in those copies which have not the name Jeremiah. But then he is deterred from so doing because "most of the Greek and Latin copies have the name: and it is not to be thought that they (i. e. the writers) would put in a word to make the Scripture faulty!" Alas! little did the good Father know of what had been done, was doing, and would be done by scribes and Critics. In all the above five passages of St. Matth. referred to, there are some MSS., more or less, that have the name of some prophet inserted by a Critic sua auctoritate, or by a scribe from an interlineary or marginal Scholium—and often ignorantly enough:—then why should not the same have taken place in the present instance? The only awkward circumstance that exists is, that the name should have found its way into nearly all the copies. But instances of a spurious reading having come into all the copies is of no unfrequent occurrence in the Class writers, of almost perpetual occurrence in Josephus, and occasionally in the Sept., not to say in the Hebrew original in a few instances; nor is this quite without example in the New Test., e. gr. supra xxiii. 36, there is, as I have shown, good reason for thinking that either the words υἱοῦ—Βαραχίου have crept in from a Scholiast, or that the word Βαραχίου did not come from the Evangelist. In short, I shall have taken much pains to little purpose, if I have not succeeded in evincing that the case is at least not so desperate as Bp. Lonsdale seems to have thought, or as Mr. Alford was pleased to take for granted.

11. The δὲ is resumptive from v. 2. "Ἐσθη, 'stood' [for trial]. For ἔσθη, Lachm. and Tisch. read, from 5 MSS. and Orig., ἔσθθη. But that is, I doubt not, a mere alteration proceeding from certain Critical correctors, whose purpose it was to introduce a more technically correct and forensic term, having in mind a passage of Mark, xiii. 9, ἐπὶ ἡγεμόνων—σταθίσαι, where the reading of many MSS., some editions, and Theophyl., has every appearance of being an alteration of the very same kind, with a view to Matt. x. 18, ἐπὶ ἡγεμόνων ἀχθήσεσθε; and Acts xxv. 6.

—Σὺ εἶ ὁ βασιλεὺς τ. 'I.] This question arose out of the circumstances of the case; for we learn from Luke xxiii. 2, that our Lord's accusers had charged him with hindering the people from giving tribute to Cæsar, by saying that He was their king. As to the charge of blasphemy, on which they had themselves condemned him, it would by Pilate, as he had no respect for their religion, be disregarded. Hence they thought fit to take a new ground of accusation against Jesus, by charging him with being a sedition person, an enemy to the Roman government; an accusation which, considering the impatience with which the Jews bore the Roman yoke, would be in itself probable, and also such a charge as his allegiance to his sovereign would forbid him to decline entertaining.

12—14. Comp. Luke xxiii. 5. On this occasion, as on the former, xxvi. 64, to the accusations of the Chief Priests, xxvi. 62, our Lord returned no answer. Their accusation was doubtless expressed in the form "Ἐλεγεὶν ἑαυτὸν Χριστὸν βασιλεῖα εἶναι," which they knew Pilate would interpret as a claim of political kingship, though they themselves well knew it was what Jesus did not claim; and therefore our Lord did not deign to make them any answer. It seems from Luke xxiii. 6—12, that they represented Jesus as actually paving the way to assuming sovereignty, by stirring up the people to rebellion against their lawful sovereign, and that not once, but throughout the land in a progress from Galilee to Jerusalem. Whereupon, on the mention of Galilee, as the place where the offence had been committed, Pilate sent him forthwith to Herod.

15. κατὰ δὲ ἑορτὴν, &c.] The Commentators are not agreed whether by καθ' ἑορτὴν we are to understand 'at feast time,' or, 'at the paschal feast.' The latter opinion is thought to be proved by John xviii. 39. And though that passage be not decisive, yet, according to propriety of language, this would seem to be the best founded opinion. There will be little difficulty in supposing, that as ἑορτὴ would of itself, without addition, most readily suggest the idea of the paschal feast, so καθ' ἑορτὴν would mean 'at the paschal feast.' And in this way the expression is used in Jos. B. J. i. 11. 5. It has been debated whether the custom here spoken of was of Jewish or of Gentile origin. But, considering the rigidity of the Mosaic institution, the former is improbable. It was doubtless of Gentile origin; though whether of Syrian, or Roman, is doubted; more probably the latter, as an especial favour from the Roman Emperor, to gratify the people at a time when it was thought politic to please them; but with no reference to the Greek Thesmophoria, or the Roman Lectisternia. We have, indeed, no historic mention of this practice; but neither could we expect any. As to Josephus, many things which we might far more expect to be noticed, are not even glanced at by allusion. But surely the united testimony of all the Evangelists to a fact in itself highly probable, is sufficient. From the strong expression of Luke ἀνάγκη· εἶχον ἀπολύειν, it would seem to have been of such long standing, and so uninterrupted, that the people regarded the grant as a right.

16. Strange it is that Fritz, Tisch., and Meyer, should here and at the next verse prefix Ἰησοῦν before Βαραββ., against the almost united testimony of MSS., Versions, and Fathers, chiefly on the authority of an ancient Scholium found in some MSS. Mr. Alford's 'true account' how the Βαραββάν arose, is any thing but satisfactory. But surely we are not bound to account for every variety of reading, on pain of being otherwise obliged to receive a reading. Those who are thoroughly acquainted with MSS. well know that there is nothing too absurd, not to say monstrous, that is not to be found occasionally even in the best MSS.

19. τοῦ βήμ.] See my Lex.

— τῷ δικ. ἐκείνῳ] Meaning, not merely in a forensic sense, 'that innocent, unoffending person,' but 'that righteous, godly person;' as said of one whose heart is right with God, as well as his actions squaring with the laws of man. See Matt. xiii. 43. 49. xxiii. 29.

— κατ' ὄναρ] It has been much debated whether this dream was natural, or supernatural. The latter view was maintained by the Fathers and the earlier Commentators; as the former is by most of the recent Interpreters. And, indeed, we may so well account for the thing from natural causes (history having recorded many similar cases), that we are not required—perhaps scarcely warranted—to call in the supernatural. Σήμερον may mean, '[early] this morning.' And warning dreams were always supposed veracious.

23. τί γὰρ κακὸν ἐπ.] The γὰρ has reference to a clause omitted, expressing a refusal of the punishment demanded, q. d. 'Not so, or why so, for,' &c. That this is not a Hebraism (as some have thought) is evident from the Classical examples which have been adduced by Krebs.

24. ἀπενίψατο τὰς χεῖρας] A symbolical action, to express being guiltless of the thing: a custom, as regarded the Jews, founded on the precept of Deut. xxi. 6, 7, where, in case of a murder of which the perpetrator is unknown, the elders of the nearest town are commanded to wash their hands, in testimony of their innocence, over the victim, which was sacrificed for expiation of the crime. It has, indeed, been disputed among Commentators, whether Pilate here followed Jewish or Gentile custom. But, considering the purpose of the action, namely, to testify his innocence to the people, the former is the more probable. Besides, there has never been any proof adduced that such a custom existed among the Gentiles. For the Gentile custom to which Commentators appeal, was only that of washing the hands, not to attest innocence, but to expiate crime, though involuntary. At any rate, it is plain from Pilate's words, and the answer made to them by the people, that here more was meant than disavowing any participation in the thing about to be done, namely, no less than solemnly to attest his innocence, and to cast on them the guilt of the crime. And as Pilate had lived long enough in Judæa to become thoroughly acquainted with Jewish customs, and would be more likely to adopt a Jewish form, for the satisfaction of the Jewish people, no doubt can well be entertained but that the action was done according to Jewish, not Gentile custom.

The expression ἀθῶός εἰμι ἀπὸ τοῦ αἵματος Ἀβρᾶμ. The term ἀθῶός, as used in the sense guiltless, innocent (lit. removed from liability to death or 'penalty'), is frequent in the Sept., though not found in the Class. writers, except in the very later ones.

25. τὸ αἷμα—ἡμᾶς] Elmer and Wetstein have proved that it was usual among the Greeks for the witnesses, on whose testimony any were put to death, to devote themselves, and even their children, to curses, if they bore false testimony. The antiquity of the custom in Judæa is plain from 2 Kings ii. 37; and its use among the Jews of after times cannot be doubted. It is, however, of more importance to advert to the complete fulfilment of this fearful imprecation, attested by the whole history of the Jews, both in that generation and the one following (when the weight of it fell on them in horrors hitherto unexampled. See Jos. Bell. ii. 11, 9. v. 11, 1. Philo, t. ii. p. 527), nay, for many succeeding ages up to a comparatively recent period.

26. φραγελλώσας] See my Lex. Scourging, either with flagella (termed by Horace horribilia)—as in the case of slaves—or (as in that of free persons) with rods, was among the Romans a prelude to capital punishment.

27. τὸ πραιτώριον] The word here denotes, not that part of the camp so called, but a magnificent edifice, in the upper part of Jerusalem, which had formerly been Herod's palace, and was afterwards the abode of the Roman Procurators when they sojourned at Jerusalem; for their residence was at Cæsarea.

28. ἐκδύσ. αὐτόν, &c.] Philo relates a similar piece of mockery practised on an Alexandrian, in ridicule of the royalty of Agrippa; in which description the term χλαμῆς, and other of the expressions here found, are used. The χλαμῆς was a kind of round cloak confined on the right shoulder by a clasp, so as to cover the left side of the body, and worn over the other garments. It was used alike by officers and privates; but, of course, with a difference in texture and dyeing. What is here called κοκκίνη is by Mark denominated πορφύρα, and by John, xix. 2, πορφυρέον ικ. Yet there is no real discrepancy; for though the colours are, properly speaking, different, yet πορφυρέος denoted sometimes a bright red; and hence the words κοκκίνη and πορφύρα were sometimes interchanged. Thus, in English, the expressions purple and red are often interchanged. And so in Hor. Sat. ii. 6, 102, 'rubro cocco tincta vestis' is the same as vestis purpurea at v. 106.

29. στέφανον ἐξ ἀκανθῶν] There has been no little debate as to the nature and materials of this crown; some contending that as this, like all the rest of what was done by the soldiers, was merely in mockery of Jesus' regal pretensions, there could be no motive to cruelty; and they propose to take the word ἀκανθῶν as the Genit. plural, not of ἀκανθα, but of ἀκανθος, i. e. the bear's foot, which is rather a smooth than a thorny plant, and would be more convenient to plait. Those, on the other hand, who defend the common version, reply that both ἀκανθα and ἀκάνθινος often occur in the New Test. and Sept., and always in the sense thorn and thorny; and that the ancient Versions, and some ancient Fathers, all confirm that version. The latter interpretation is the best founded. There is, however, great reason to think, with Theophylact, that the crown was not of mere thorns, but of some prickly shrub (probably acacia). So in a similar passage cited by Wetst., we have 'in capite corona subito exstitit, ex asperis herbis, espec. since those fit to make a fillet are such.

32. ἐξερχόμενοι] 'as they were going out [of the city]': for executions were, both among Jews and Gentiles, conducted outside of cities.

—ἡγγάρευσαν] lit. 'impressed,' implying compulsion (see note on Matt. v. 41); though it was customary for the criminal himself, when strong enough, to carry his own cross, which had been done in the present instance, until the meeting with Simon. The cross was denominated σταυρός, Valck. thinks, from the obsol. σταύω, cognate with στάω, to fix,—namely, in the ground. About the middle of it was fixed a piece of wood, on which the crucified person sat. For the height of the cross was (contrary to the common opinion) such as to admit of this,—being only such as to raise the feet of the crucified person about a yard from the ground. The hands were fastened to the transverse piece with nails; but the feet were either nailed or tied to the post with ropes, and thus the wretch was left to perish gradually, either by exhaustion, by famine, or by ravenous birds. See Artemid. Oneir. iv. 49. Crucifixion can be traced back to as early a period as the age of Semiramis; and was a punishment chiefly inflicted on slaves, or free persons convicted of the most heinous crimes.

33. Γολγοθᾶ] γολθᾶ, from Heb. גִּלְגָּל, but the second λ was dropped for euphony. The place was so called, I think (with Cyril of Jerusalem, and several moderns, from Reland to Meyer), from the form of its site (being what in Old English was called a knoll, or bald cop) bearing some resemblance to the upper part of a skull; which is confirmed by the singular being used in all the Evangelists. Alford objects to this, because Meyer's derivation from Κρανίου, a wood near Corinth, does not apply. Then why not derive it from κράνον, cognate with κάρηνον, from καρά, caput? So we say top of the head, and the crown of the head. The reading δ for δν is confirmed by external authority (including nearly all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and decided internal evidence, it being a grammatical correction. I have now removed both the brackets at λεγόμενος, because there is no sufficient authority to warrant its being cancelled, nor even for its change of position; indeed, the variation of position doubtless caused its omission. For λεγόμενος the reading λεγόμενον is of too slender authority to merit attention, and might be altered either way to suit the context; but it cannot belong to Γολγοθᾶ δ without a certain harshness. This sense of λέγεσθαι is found also in John xx. 16, 'Παῖς σου· ὃ λέγεται διδάσκαλε. Thus in a kindred passage of Matt. i. 23, ὃ ἵσθι, μεθρηνεύόμενον, μεθ' ἧμῶν ὁ Θεός. See also Mark v. 41. xv. 22. 34. John i. 42. Acts iv. 36.

34. ὄξος—μεμυγμ.] Mark xv. 23, mentions a potion administered to Christ, but he calls it ισχυρισμένον οἶνον. To remove the discrepancy, some Commentators suppose that it was the same drink under different names; since ὄξος is used to denote wine (especially the poorer kinds); and χολή, though properly signifying wormwood, yet sometimes in the Sept. denotes any bitter infusion. Others are of opinion, that the potions mentioned by the two Evangelists were distinct mixtures; the vinegar mingled with gall being, they think, offered in derision; and the myrrh wine, the medicated cup usually administered to criminals about to suffer a painful death. The former interpretation, however, seems to be preferable; and it is confirmed by the ancient gloss which has crept into many of the best MSS., and all the beat of the ancient Versions, οἶνον. [Comp. Pa. lxix. 21.]

35. ἵνα πληρωθῇ—κλῆρον] These words are found in comparatively few MSS., and have no place in the ancient Versions, and several Fathers, nor the Edit. Princ. They have been cancelled by every Editor of note from Wetstein to Scholz.

37. αἰτίαν αὐτοῦ.] Namely, the τίτλιν, or ἐπιγραφὴν τῆς αἰτίας, 'his crimination,' 'the crime laid to his charge;' which was engraven on a metal plate, in black letters on a white ground. The trifling discrepancy in the words of this inscription may very well have arisen from the language in which it was written.

38. δύο λησταί] i. e. 'highway robbers,' or rather, 'brigands,' with which, and banditti of all sorts, Judaea then swarmed; a state of things which had arisen from the miserable destitution of the bulk of the people, occasioned by the shameless oppression of those blood-suckers, the Roman governors, of whom each one exceeded his predecessor in every bad quality of a governor.

42. ἄλλους—σῶσαι] Beza, Bengel, Pearce, and some others, would take the words interrogatively; which makes them, they think, more cuttingly sarcastic. This, however, quite alters the air of the passage, and destroys the antithesis, which, as Fritz remarks, is strengthened by the Asyndeton. Comp. Aristid. iii. 430 (of Palamedes), πάσας τὰς ἄλλας εὐρίσκων μηχανάς, μὴν οὐχ εὐρίων, ὅπως σωθῆσεται.

— βασιλεὺς, &c.] We may remark the distinctive taunts of the Jews and of the Romans; the former of whom pointed at Jesus' claim to be King of Israel (i. e. Messiah); the latter, to his assuming the title of King of the Jews; which, however, many of the Romans understood as equiv. to Messiah.

— πιστεύσομεν αὐτῷ] The MSS. here fluctuate between πιστ. αὐτῷ, the text rec., πιστῖς. ἐπ' αὐτῷ, and πιστ. ἐπ' αὐτόν. Griesb., Matth., and Scholz, read ἐπ' αὐτῷ; Tisch., ἐπ' αὐτόν; while Lachm. and Alf. retain the text rec. αὐτῷ; and certainly a well-known Critical Canon is in favour of this reading (which needs such support; for the weight of external evidence is quite against it, almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies having ἐπ' αὐτῷ): and in this I must myself acquiesce. The simple dat. occurs supra xxi. 25, 32, bis, and one does not see why it should not have been used here (and it is observable that the ἐπ' may have arisen from a marginal or interlinear Scholium): not to mention that the construction with ἐπ' nowhere occurs in Matth., nor, I believe, in the other Evangelists. The reading ἐπ' αὐτόν, adopted by Tisch., has no claim to preference, since the authority for it is very slender, B, L, and some 8 cursives, in opposition to internal evidence, considering that the constr. of πιστ. with accus. after ἐπὶ or ἐν is confined to the Gospel of St. John. In short, I suspect that the αὐτόν arose from an error of scribes for αὐτῷ. That it must have been so, is plain from the reading πίποιθεν ἐπὶ τῷ Θεῷ, for τὸν Θεόν, found in that MS. only.

⁴³ πίποιθεν ἐπὶ τὸν Θ.] Said, we may suppose, not with reference to any particular declaration of our Lord expressing this, but in allusion to that fearless yielding up of himself to the soldiers sent to apprehend him, through an entire dependence on the Divine aid for deliverance. In uttering, however, this taunt, in words borrowed from Ps. xx. 8, the Priests little knew that they were citing a prophecy of the Messiah, then in its fulfilment by the jeering words, and mocking actions, of the passing multitude (see v. 39), and the scornful defiance of those who had set them on. The variations here from the Sept. are inconsiderable, and immaterial, since this is no quotation. Even as it is, the Hebr. ו might be rendered by עיינא, seeing that; and it is not improbable that there was such an Hellenistic use of εἶ.

⁴⁴ οἱ ληστὰι—αὐτόν] Or rather one of them, as is stated in the more exact account of Luke. This trifling discrepancy may, however, be removed; not, indeed, by supposing an enallage, nor by introducing the figure of Amplification (which cannot here apply), but by supposing that the Evangelist speaks generally. Αὐτόν (for the common reading αὐτῷ) is found in almost all the best MSS., and is adopted by every Critical Editor.

⁴⁵ σκότος—πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν] There are here two points demanding our attention, which have occasioned no small perplexity to the Commentators; 1. the darkness here recorded; and 2. the distance to which it extended. On the former subject, they are not agreed as to the nature of the darkness, and its cause. The recent Expositors in general, espec. the German ones, seek to account for it as something happening in the ordinary course of nature; while the ancient, and the earlier modern ones, regard it as preternatural. That it could not be produced by a total eclipse of the sun is certain; for that can only take place at the time of the new moon; whereas it was now full moon. Besides, a total eclipse never continues beyond a quarter of an hour. Some ascribe it to a mist arising from sulphurous vapours, such as precede or accompany earthquakes. This, the naturalists tell us, may extend to a semi-diameter of ten miles from any spot. But can such a haze as that be all that is here meant? Surely not. Taking all the circumstances of the case into account, we cannot doubt that both that darkness and the accompanying earthquake (to which the Rationalists so triumphantly appeal) were alike preternatural, though how produced, who shall venture to affirm? It may have been produced, as Elmer supposes, by a preternatural accumulation of the densest clouds, enveloping the whole atmosphere,—such as that mentioned at Exod. x. 21; brought preternaturally, at the stretching forth of the hand of Moses, over the whole land of Egypt, except that portion occupied by the children of Israel,—and when we seriously reflect Who it was that was then suffering, we can have no difficulty in accounting for these signs of sympathy in nature (see the passage of Dionys. cited below), nor in seeing their applicability. We may surely feel warranted in supposing that all this was intended to portend the withdrawing of the light of God's countenance from a land in which the Son of God, the Sun of Righteousness, was suffering an ignominious death, even the death of the Cross. But to turn to the second question: the extent of this darkness. Most of the ancient interpreters regard it as extending over the whole earth; though some of them, as Origen, and the most eminent modern ones, confine it to Judaea, which may be considered the true view. For, first, there is nothing in the words of the original that compels us to suppose universality;

ἕως ὥρας ἐννάτης. ⁴⁶ Περὶ δὲ τὴν ἐννάτην ὥραν ἀνεβόησεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς φωνῇ μεγάλῃ, λέγων Ἑλὶ, Ἑλὶ, * λειμὰ σαβαθανί; τοῦτ' ἐστὶ Θεέ μου, Θεέ μου, ἵνατί με ἐγκατέλιπες;
^{x Pa. 60. 21.} ⁴⁷ Τινὲς δὲ τῶν ἐκεῖ ἐστῶτων ἀκούσαντες, ἔλεγον "Οτι Ἑλίαν
^{Mark 15. 34.} ⁴⁸ * Καὶ εὐθέως δραμὼν εἰς ἐξ αὐτῶν, καὶ λαβὼν

and it is more natural to take the expression of Judaea, the place of the transactions recorded. The Fathers, indeed, and some modern Commentators (espec. Grotius) allege, in proof of its universality, passages of Phlegon, Thallus, and Dionys. the Areopagite. But they are not agreed on the nature of Phlegon's testimony: indeed, nothing which they ascribe to him has any direct bearing on this event. As to the passage adduced from Thallus, cited by Jul. Africanus,—who mentions a darkness over all the world, and an earthquake which overturned many houses in Judaea and elsewhere,—there is reason to think that Thallus lived, not before, but after Christ, and as the more ancient Fathers quote him for other matters, but never for this, no weight can be attached to the passage in question. As to the story told of Dionys. the Areopagite, who said that 'either the Author of nature suffered, or that he was sympathizing with some one who did,'—it is entitled to still less attention, since Dr. Lardner has proved that all the writings attributed to him are spurious. Besides, there was surely (if we may venture to pronounce on the inscrutable purposes of Almighty Providence) a peculiar propriety in the darkness being confined to Judaea,—as indicating the wrath of God on that country for the enormity then perpetrating; thus presenting an apt emblem of the spiritual darkness in which that benighted region was involved. Finally, by adopting this view, and by not needlessly exaggerating the intensity of the obscuration, we are enabled satisfactorily to account for the silence of the Pagan Historians, and even Josephus, without supposing in the latter, as some do, a wilful suppression of truth.

46. There is great doubt as to the true reading of the middle term of the three employed in this ejaculation. The great body of the copies have λαμὰ, as found in the text. rec. and retained by Griesb. and Scholz; while λειμὰ is edited by Matth., λημὰ by Lachm., and λεμ. by Tisch. and Alf. There is considerable authority for λειμὰ, as found in many of the uncial, and not a few of the cursive MSS., to which I add several of the most ancient and valuable Lamb. and Mus. MSS.; and almost all the rest have λειμὰ. The reading of Lachm. is almost wholly without evidence, for the reading of B is doubtful; but if λημὰ be, as it probably is, in that MS., it is only an Itacistic spelling for λειμὰ. The λεμὰ of Tisch. and Alf. is the least probable of all the readings, and is only found in 2 or 3 MSS., and in them was probably a mere error of the scribes for λειμὰ, which, as having the strongest claims to be the true reading, I have now adopted. As to vulg. λαμὰ, it arose merely from error of the scribes, who often confound α and ε. See exx. adduced in Greg. de Dial. p. 625. 652. 706. 760. Ed. Schaefer. It may, however, have arisen from the Gospel of St. Mark. It is remarkable that the same var. lect. occurs in both; and it is scarcely possible to fix the true reading of each, if they did differ, as we may suppose they did, judging by the ελοι of Mark.

Of more consequence, however, is it to consider the purpose for which the words were pronounced. They must not be supposed to express (what some have ventured to ascribe to them) impatience, much less despair; nor, again, what others recognize, the natural effusions of corporeal and mental anguish, scarce conscious of the complaints uttered under this severe sense of suffering; a view which involves nothing short of irreverence. Rejecting, then, all such views as attribute to the exalted Sufferer any thing like querulousness of spirit, much less distrust in Divine support, we may suppose that our Lord in thus addressing God as his God, intended thereby to express a sense of entire trust in his heavenly Father; and in the use of the term ἐγκατ. he speaks the language, not of distrust, but of desertion—that desertion (in its awfully mysterious character making no other than part and portion of the great mystery of redemption) under the sense of which Christ our Saviour speaks of himself as given up for a season to endure in his human nature that anguish which it belongs not to the mind of man to conceive, nor the tongue of man to express, and which we may best characterize as the unknown sufferings of our Redeemer. The expression is formed on, but conveys far more than what is said of righteous men in Isa. xlix. The mental anguish endured by our blessed Lord may be supposed to have been, in some way or other, connected with his being made a curse and a sin-offering for us. See 2 Cor. v. 21. Gal. iii. 13. It may have been, what some have supposed, the manifestation to his soul of God's hatred to sin, made in some way not explained (nor, indeed, to be explained), which Christ our Saviour experienced in that dread hour. However, on a subject so awfully mysterious as the present, it more particularly becomes believers to abstain from misplaced speculation, and learn σωφρονεῖν ἐν τῇ σοφίᾳ. Enough is it to know that, by citing the verse, and thus applying to himself what is admitted to have reference to the Messiah, our Lord had for his purpose to turn the attention of his disciples to the whole Psalm, and to intimate to them that he was now fulfilling no other than what had been there foretold, and suffering what it was there predicted Christ would suffer.

47. [Ἑλίαν φωνεῖ] These were not, as some imagine, Roman soldiers—for they could know nothing about Elias—but Hellenistic Jews, who intentionally perverted our Lord's words, in derision of his claim to be the Messiah; and with reference to a common opinion, that Elias would return to life at the coming of the Messiah, and prepare the way for his kingdom. See supra xvii. 10.

48. καὶ εὐθὺς—ἐπὶτότε αὐτόν] Namely, in consequence of what Jesus had just before said, as recorded by John xix. 28, διψῶ.

 49 Οἱ δὲ λοιποὶ ἔλεγον Ἄφες ἴδωμεν εἰ ἔρχεται Ἡλίας σῶσαι
 αὐτόν. 50 Ὁ δὲ Ἰησοῦς πάλιν κράξας φωνῇ μεγάλῃ, ἀφῆκε

— καλάμω] Some render reed; Campbell, stick. But I prefer, with Markland, 'a stalk' or 'stem'; a not unfrequent, nay, perhaps, the primary, sense of the word. Thus Matthew and John will be reconciled; for the ὑσσώπω of the latter is equivalent to καλάμω ὑσσώπων. The stalk of the hyssop is, in the East, so long, that it might easily reach our Lord on the cross; espec. since it was by no means so high as is commonly supposed. Περιθείς may be rendered, 'winding,' or 'fastening it round.'

49. Mr. Alf. is inclined to differ from the Editors generally as to the words ἄλλος δ᾽ αἶμα, added in B, C, L, and other MSS.—and that on the ground that, if admitted, a considerable difficulty would be created, as we should here have the piercing with the spear occurring before, and, indeed, occasioning, the death of Jesus. "This is certainly," continues he, "very improbable; but we can hardly imagine an interpolator committing such a blunder, if it be one. The history of the addition must remain obscure, in our entire ignorance of the early history of the text." And so he quietly disposes of the matter. But I do not see any such great difficulty in "imagining an interpolator committing such a blunder;" for Interpolators in other cases have committed blunders full as great. I rather suspect, however, that the words were, in those MSS., brought in by a scribe from the margin, where the passage had been written by a Scholiast, who thereby showed his ignorance, as did afterwards the next Transcriber his carelessness, without the commission of rashness by any one. It is not true, what the Editors from Mill downwards have asserted, that Chrysostom has this passage in his text. He merely introduces it with a comment in his Annotation. Why he should have commented on the words in this place, is explained by the circumstance that, as Matthæi has pointed out, "in the Ecclesiastical Reading occurring between Matt. xxvii. 39—54, and xxvii. 55. 61, there is read John xix. 31—37." Be that as it may, it would seem that the Scholiast's words, written in the margin, were not meant for the place they occupy in the above MSS., but for another, i. e. after ἀφῆκε τὸ πνεῦμα, and were introduced into the text not only without the intention of any Critic, but at quite a wrong place. Even could we get over the all but decisive fact, of the words being verbatim the same with those in John, it is impossible that St. Matth. should have used them, since they run counter to what he evidently intended. The purpose of the two Evangelists Matthew and John was different. The former intended simply to record the circumstances of the death of Christ; the latter, to say what should afford indubitable evidence of the reality of that death (a lance thrust into the pericardium being by all medical men admitted to be necessarily mortal; nay, the object of the soldier must have been thereby to ensure death)—an evidence by no means superfluous, since the reality of that event almost all unbelievers had denied, and certain misbelievers, such as the Docetæ, had called in question. If it be asked, what then did this Scholiast mean to effect by what he wrote in the margin?—I answer, that, intending (as I believe he did) the passage to apply not to v. 49, but to v. 50, he purposed, I imagine, to support, by adducing these words of St. John, the opinion, that the circumstance there recorded took place before, and not after, our Lord's death (an opinion which had become so prevalent, as early as the General Council of Vienne, that it needed being condemned by the Fathers), in order fully to evince, by 'making surety doubly sure,' the reality of Christ's death. But this intention was frustrated by the writer of the next transcript introducing the words, not only into the text, but at the wrong place.

— οἱ δὲ λοιποὶ ἔλεγον] By οἱ λοιποὶ are, I agree with Maldon. and Bengel, to be understood the rest, as opposed to those mentioned at v. 47, τῶν ἐκεῖ ἰστώτων. Of these by-standers some said "That man calleth on Elias," and of those, some, when they heard Jesus exclaim διψῶ, went and took the means to supply that want. But the rest, it seems, so far from supplying it, objected to its being supplied, saying, "Let be, i. e. wait, and see whether Elias will come and help him or not." Of ἀφίναί in this sense examples occur in the best Class. writers, as Hdt., Æsch., and Thucyd. Yet to so understanding the words an objection presents itself in what is stated in the parallel passage of Mark, where the same person who ran and fetched the sponge, and, filling it with posca, and putting it on a stalk, gave our Lord to drink, is represented as using the same words, ἀφες ἴδωμεν εἰ, &c. To remove this discrepancy, we may, with Elsn., regard ἀφες, and its equiv. ἀφετε, as constituting a formula enjoining (of course, in derision) quiet and silence, while awaiting the coming of Elias. This, however, has too much the appearance of a device for the nonce; and the sense thus arising is forced, and at the same time jejune. One thing is quite clear, that the import of ἀφετε is the same in both Evangelists; and it may signify, what many Expositors suppose to be the sense, 'Desist!' Yet they adduce no sufficient example in proof. It seems best to adopt the sense permit, suffer, as in Matt. vii. 4. Mark xv. 36. Luke vi. 42, and some passages of Epict. adduced by the Commentators; in all which cases the word is followed, as here, by the Subj. without iva, which many here supply, but wrongly; for I doubt not that the Imper. and Subj. are to be closely united, as in Luke vi. 42, ἀφες ἐκβάλω τὸ κάρφος, permitte, or sine, estimat (having very much the appearance of a Latinism), and that the real sense, probably by a provincial idiom, is 'Let us see whether, &c.'

50. κράξας φωνῇ μεγάλῃ] Gruner (a German Physician, author of a learned Tract to prove the death of Christ real, and not, as some sceptics have pronounced, a mere syncope) and Kuin. take this to indicate a loud outcry from pain; as in the case of persons oppressed with an excessive congestion of blood about the heart—the precursor of suffocation. But that does not here apply; for this was not a mere outcry, but an exclamation in words (as often in prayer to God, see Rom. viii. 15. Gal. iv. 6), which words were those subjoined in Luke xxiii. 46, Πάτερ, εἰς χεῖρας σου παραθήσμαι τὸ πνεῦμά μου, declarative of the entire trust with which, having accomplished the purpose for which our Lord came into the world, he resigned his spirit.

— ἀφῆκε τὸ πνεῦμα] Many ancient and some modern Commentators suppose something preternatural in Christ's death, as being the effect of his volition. But there is nothing in the words of Scripture to countenance such an opinion; though our Saviour's volition must be supposed to accompany his offering himself for the sins of the world. The term is no other than such as is frequently used, both in the Sept. and the Classical writers, of expiration, either with πνεῦμα or ψυχήν.

51. καταπέτασμα τοῦ ναοῦ] Meaning, the interior of the two veils which separated the Holy of Holies from the Sanctuary, and which is called by that name in the Sept., Philo, and Joseph. On the form and materials of this veil, see the authors referred to in my Recena. Synop. From a passage of Pausan. v. 12, 12, which I have there adduced, it appears, that exactly such a veil (of woollen, richly embroidered, and in colour purple) was used at the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, and at that of Jupiter at Olympia. It reached from the roof to the ground, and was drawn up and let down by ropes. See Exod. xxvi. 31. 2 Chron. iii. 14.

This rending of the veil must, like all the other occurrences of this awful scene, be regarded as preternatural. For, though some recent Interpreters ascribe it to the earthquake just after recorded, yet surely no earthquake could rend a veil of 60 feet long, so exceedingly thick as, from its size and purpose, it must have been, still less from top to bottom. Besides, the earthquake is evidently distinguished from the rending of the veil. On its symbolical intent see Heb. ix. 24. This supernatural rending of the veil, probably in the presence of the High Priest, who burnt incense in the Holy Place, at the evening sacrifice, must not be regarded (with Chrys.) as a sign of the destruction of the Temple being at hand, and the abolition of the Jewish Economy. It rather, as Bp. Lonsdale observes, betokened the entering of Christ, our High Priest, into the presence of God to make atonement for our sins by his own blood, and thereby open a way into heaven for all believers. See Heb. ix. 7—12. 24—26. x. 12—14. 19—22.

— καὶ ἡ γῆ ἐσεισθη] This also must surely be regarded as preternatural; for though an earthquake be not of itself such,—yet, when we consider the time and the circumstances which accompanied the one here described, we cannot but regard it as produced by the direct agency of the Author of nature, and therefore, so far, preternatural. As to the fact, vestiges still remain, in immense fissures, which attest the violence of the rending, and show the propriety of the words καὶ αἱ πέτραι ἐσχίσθησαν. Nay, Col. Napier, in his Reminiscences of Syria, p. 151, says that “the rent in the rock is still to be seen, though covered with a silver plate.” He adds, indeed, that “there is only tradition to prove that this is the identical rent.” Yet this is a case in which tradition may be allowed to have competent weight. That the fissure in question is not the work of art, is testified by the above traveller.

52. καὶ τὰ μνημεῖα ἀνεψήθησαν] An effect not unfrequently attributed to earthquakes in the ancient writers. So Aristid. i. 504, says of the great earthquake at Rhodes: ἀνέριπτοντο δὲ οἰκίαι καὶ μνήματα ἀνέβρύγγοντο. So in the late terrible earthquake in Antigua, the coffins were thrown with violence out of the deepest graves, and the corpses tossed in various directions. But here the opening of the graves was brought about for a particular purpose, pointed out at the next verse. The words μετὰ τὴν ἔγερσιν αὐτοῦ (strangely omitted in the Syriac Version) have a deep significance. The graves were probably opened at the very period of the death of our Lord, though, for an obvious reason, the dead did not, as we may suppose, ‘rise and appear unto many’ until Christ rose, and, also during the forty days, appeared unto many. But in τῶν κεκοιμημένων there is not, as some have imagined, a Hebraism; for the idiom is found in the Class. writers, while in the Script. ones it is used of holy men who slept in the Lord. See my Lex.

53. καὶ ἐξελθόντες—εἰσῆλθον, &c.] In this narrative there are three points which demand our attention. 1. Who were the κεκοιμημένοι. 2. What was the purpose of their being raised from the dead. 3. What was the time at which it took place. As to the first, they were doubtless holy persons, whether Jews (as old Simeon), or such as had lately died in the faith of Christ. They must have been persons not long dead, or they would not have been recognized by their contemporaries. The purpose probably was, to show that the power of the grave was destroyed, by life and immortality being brought to light in the Gospel, and a pledge, of course, being thus given of the general resurrection. As respects the time, that is thought to depend upon the disputed point, whether the phrase μετὰ τὴν ἔγερσιν αὐτοῦ be taken with the preceding, or with the following words. Yet, in reality, that is unimportant; so that the words are not referred, by taking for granted a transposition, to ἠγέρθη at the preceding verse. But whether the resurrection of the saints was, as the words seem to imply, gradual, begun at the rending of the graves, and accomplished at the resurrection of Christ, or immediate on the opening of the tombs, is more than I would venture to determine. As respects the hypothesis of the sceptical school in Germany, that vv. 52, 53, are spurious, it is forbidden by the fact, that the words are found in all the MSS. and Versions,

and are so alluded to by the early Fathers as to show their existence in their time; and interpolation at an earlier period was impossible.

54. γενόμενα] For this Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read γινόμενα, from B, D, and two cursive MSS. of mean order. Mr. Alf. pronounces the text rec. to be 'a correction to sense!' from the parallel passage of Luke; whereas it is only an error of scribes, by whom the words are often confounded. Besides, little likely is it that such a correction to sense (was it not sense already?) should have been introduced into Luke's Gospel in all the MSS., including all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, confirmed by all the Versions from the Pesch. Syr. and the most ancient MSS. A and B. The expression τὰ γενόμενα often occurs, as supra xviii. 31 (where D, L, have γίν., but no Editor received it), also infra xxviii. 11. Mark iv. 23. Luke xxiv. 8. When γινόμενα does occur in the MSS., it is when the context requires it, as Luke xxi. 31. In short, the reading in question is wholly undeserving of attention. With as little reason, Mr. Alf. just after editis visis Θεοῦ, from B, D, &c. (the et cetera being of one mean cursive MS.), and some Versions, as if Versions were of any weight in matters of position!

— ἀληθῶς—οὗτος] I have proved at large in my Recens. Synop. that Θεοῦ Τίος cannot mean, as Grotius, Campbell, Rosenm., and Kuinoel maintain, 'an innocent and just man,' or 'a son of a God' (i. e. a demi-god); but 'the Son of God,' 'the Messiah.' The soldiers could not but know Jesus' pretensions to be such; and the import of the phrase must have been not unfamiliar to them. And seeing the awful and extraordinary circumstances which accompanied his death, they might well exclaim, some of them, 'This was truly an innocent and just person!' and others, 'This was truly the personage he affirmed himself to be—the Son of God.' See note supra xiv. 33., a passage of exactly the same character with the present.

57. ἄνθρωπος πλούσιος] Also, as appears from Mark and Luke, a βουλευτής, meaning a member of the Sanhedrim. These two points, the riches, and the honourable station, of Joseph, are mentioned, as directing attention to the fulfilment of the prophecy of Isa. liiii. 9.

— ἐμαθήτευσας] Not 'had been,' as Wakef. renders, but 'was then' a disciple. So in John we have ὢν μαθητής, and in Luke and Mark ἦν προσδεδόχμενος τὴν βασιλ. τοῦ Θεοῦ. Doubtless he was fully a believer in the Messiahship of Jesus, but, as is said in the parallel passage of John, 'secretly, for fear of the Jews.'

58. ᾔτήσατο τὸ σῶμα] Though the bodies of crucified persons were not interred by the Romans, yet they were generally given, on application, to their friends for burial. This would be more espec. done in Judæa; because the custom of the country (founded on the Scriptural command, Deut. xxi. 23) required the bodies to be buried before sunset.

59. ἐνετύλιξεν—σινδόνι] Similar language is found in Hdut. ii. 86, in his description of embalming. The σινδών was a web, or wrapper of fine linen, which was used for the same purpose as our sheet (see Thucyd. ii. 49, and my note there), and also employed to roll around a corpse, previously to interment or embalming, being then secured by linen bandages.

60. ἐν τῷ καινῷ αὐτοῦ μν.] These two circumstances are mentioned, (1) to show the honour paid to our Lord by Joseph, and (2) to preclude any cavil of the Pharisees; as if the corpse had been resuscitated by touching the bones of some prophet; see 2 Kings xiii. 21.

— προσκυλίσαν λ.] It was an Oriental custom to guard the entrances of caves and subterranean sepulchres; but not, however, confined to the East, but extending to the West, as appears from the Classical passages adduced by Grotius, and by myself in Recens. Synop.; whence it appears that in the early ages stones were generally used in the place of doors to caves or vaults. The stone-panelled doors, which close many of the Egyptian monuments, were an invention midway between the block of stone of the primitive times and the wooden door of after ages.

— προσκυλ. τῇ θύρᾳ] Lachm. and Alf. subjoin ἐπὶ τοῦ θύρα, from A and 3 cursive MSS., while Tisch. retains the text. rec.; very properly, since, besides vast preponderance of external authority for the text. rec., the ἐπὶ was likely to be added either from the passage of Mark, or because elegance of style rather calls for it. So Aristoph. Vesp. 200, ὅθι σὺ πολλοὺς τῶν λίθων πρὸς τὴν θύραν. And yet the dativus is found, however rarely, also in Maneth. v. 200, χώματι λίθον προσκυλίσασα, formed on Hom. Od. xiii. 370, λίθον δ' ἐπέθηκε θύρῃσι.

— μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας] i. e. within three days, equiv. to 'on the third day.' See note on Matt. xvi. 21. That the Jews so understood it, is plain from the next verse. To which of the prophecies (whether that at Matt. xii. 40, or at Matt. xxvi. 61) they alluded, is not clear. Certain it is, however, that our Lord's declaration that he should rise from the dead, was publicly known.

The word νυκτὸς is absent from a considerable number of the uncial and not a few of the cursive MSS., to which I am enabled to add 3 Lamb. and 5 Mus. copies. It is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; and indeed internal evidence is against it. It is also not in the Arab., and Copt., and Æth. Versions; but it is, notwithstanding what Mr. Alf. says, in the Pesch. Syr. It may, however, have been brought in from a Schol. formed on xxviii. 13.

— ἔχετε κουστωδίας] I still decidedly prefer to take ἔχετε as an indicat., though this view involves the objection that there is no record of any such guard being placed under the direction of the chief priests. I know of no intimation to this effect in Josephus, a writer in whom, if any, we might expect to find it. But it clearly appears from what is said xxviii. 11, that the guard over the body of Jesus was under their orders. Thus it is observable that ἀπαγγέλλω is frequently, in the Greek historians, used of military persons, charged with the execution of certain duties, and then making report to their superiors of what has been done by them. We may suppose then that, though Josephus has not noticed the circumstance, the chief priests had placed at their disposal during the feast a detachment of troops, quite distinct from the usual garrison in the Castle of Antonia, in order to keep the peace in the Temple, at a time when the turbulence of the multitude did, as we know abundantly from Josephus, often show itself in daring overt acts even within the sacred precincts. The guard stationed in the Castle of Antonia was merely intended to quell any tumult in the city.

— ὡς οἴδατε] Of this disputed expression the best rendering is that of Grotius and others, 'quantum potestas.' In fact, there is an ellipsis of ἀσφαλίσματα, to be supplied from ἀσφαλίσασθε. The literal sense is, 'as safely as ye know how,' i. e. can.

⁶⁶ σφραγίσαντες] A mode of security in use from the earliest times, when it supplied the place of locks. See Dan. vi. 17. Pausan. vi. 26. Diog. L. iv. 59. Theophr. Char. xviii. Lycoph. Cass. 511. In the present case, the sealing material is supposed to have been affixed to the two ends of a cord or band brought round the stone. Μετὰ τῆς κουστωδίας may either be referred to ἡσφάλισαν τὸν τάφον, or the words may be taken as a brief expression for μετὰ τοῦ προσδίδναι τὴν κουστωδίαν. But the former view is preferable, from its greater simplicity; and exx. of the sense occur in the Class. writers, as Thucyd. iii. 66. v. 82. viii. 73, and in the New Test.

XXVIII. 1. Ὁψὲ δὲ σαβ. [‘at the end of,’ or ‘close of the Sabbath,’ equiv. to the expression in Mark, διαγενομένου τοῦ σαββάτου, ‘Sabbath being ended.’ So Philostr. Vit. Ap. iv. 18, ὁψὲ μυστηρίων. Thucyd. iv. 93, and Zon. Hist. ii. 1, 14, ὁψὲ τῆς ἡμέρας, ‘at the close of the day,’ lit. ‘late of the day.’] On the force of the genit., see Buttm. Gr. § 132, 4.

—τῇ ἐπιφωσκούσῃ] An elliptical expression for ἅμα τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐπιφ. The complete one occurs in Hdot. iii. 86, and ix. 44. The word is used properly of the first appearing of the heavenly bodies, and may be paralleled by our verb to dawn. Μίαν is for πρώτην, by an idiom often found in the Sept., and derived from the Hebrew; though it exists, more or less, in most languages. On the evidence for our Lord’s resurrection, and the arguments establishing the credibility thereof, see Horne’s Introd., vol. i. p. 239. 260. For a harmony of the various narratives, see West and Townson, and espec. Townsend (Chron. Arr.) and Greswell. On the change of the Sabbath from the 7th to the 1st day of the week,—which arose out of our Lord’s resurrection on the latter,—the reader is referred to Horne’s Introd., and to a pamphlet of Dr. Millar of Armagh. From those works it appears, that there is a sufficient warrant in Scripture for the change of the Sabbath, without recurring to the Romish doctrine of independent tradition; and also that there is great reason to think the Patriarchal Sabbath coincided with our Sunday; also that, as it was thrown back to Saturday, in order to commemorate the Jewish Exodus,—so the return to the original Sabbath, when the purpose for which the new one had been appointed was answered, was just as reasonable as its former change.

2. σεισμός ἐγέν.] Wholly untenable is the interpretation adopted by Hamm., Le Clerc, and others, by which σεισμός is supposed to denote tempest, whirlwind; since the only proof of this sense which they adduce is that συσσεισμός is so used: but that is only from the sense imparted by the συν in composition. Still less can that of Markl. and others be admitted, trembling, fear; for though they allege in proof Philo Jud. τρόμος τε καὶ σεισμός πάντα τὰ μέρη συνεικύνε, yet that sense the word acquires from τρόμος being joined with it. And though Markl. speaks of innumerable examples of this sense of σεισμός, I have not been able to find one of σεισμ. standing alone in the sense trembling, fear (except, indeed, Isa. xxviii. 19, where Symm. renders by σεισμός, Theodot. by κίνημα; but the former is required by the Hebr. text). In short, that sense would here be wholly unsuitable. The sense might be tornado, which is found supra xiii. 24, and Ezek. iii. 12; but that would be equally unsuitable. The words are, I apprehend, best rendered: ‘And lo! there had been a great concussion,’ = κίνημα, ‘shock;’ namely, as appears from the γὰρ, that occasioned by the angel in removing the huge block of stone which closed the entrance. Of course, we must suppose the thing to have taken place preternaturally; and it would seem that the stone was not simply rolled away, which could cause little or no shock, but ejected from the mouth of the cave with some violence. This is not forbidden by the term ἀπεκύλ., which may only denote removal in any such way as the context may determine. I cannot assent to the assertion of Mr. Alf., that καὶ ἰδοὺ—ἐγένετο must mean that the women were witnesses of that which took place. Expositors are almost all of the contrary opinion; and with reason, since that is implied in the term ἐκάθητο, which is well rendered sedebat in the Vulg., and ‘was sitting’ in the Pesch. Syr.; and the Pers. Vers. well renders, ‘there had been, and had descended.’ We may, however, justly suppose that the violent concussion from the ejection of the stone had taken place but a very short time before the women came up; who must have heard the noise and prob. felt the shock while on their way. The words ἀπὸ τῆς θύρας are omitted in B, D, 2 cursive MSS., the Vulg. and Ethiopic Versions, and Origen;—slender authority, but confirmed by internal evidence, considering that the words were far more likely to be put in than put out; and ancient Versions have, in a case like this, no little weight against a disputed word that might easily be supplied from the context. Moreover, the circumstance that several uncials, and not a few cursive MSS., have the addition of τοῦ μνημείου, casts a shade over the genuineness of the words in question.

3. ἰδέα] Tisch. edits εἰδέα, from A, B, C, D, E, M, and 6 or 7 cursives; to which I add Lamb. 1192, 1193 (of the 9th cent.), 528, Scriv. h, and Mus. 11,836, 17,982, de Miss. 1; while Lachm. and Alf. retain ἰδέα—very properly; for I agree with Dind. on Steph. Thea. in v. that εἰδέα is a forma vitiosa, introduced by scribes in some passages of Hippocr. and in Aristoph. Theam. 436. That very learned Scholar was, it seems, not aware of the existence of the form in this passage of the Gr. Test., also in the Alex. and other MSS. in the Sept. at Genes. v. 3, and perhaps elsewhere in the varr. lectt. of the Sept. But its existence in this passage, and the one at Genes. v. 3, throws great light on its true origin, as serving to show that it arose not from the negligence of scribes, but from an Itacism; for almost all the MSS. adduced in favour of the form are copies which nearm with Itacisms, of which, I doubt not, this is one: and, in short, I cannot, after much search, find that the word ever existed: indeed, it was not likely to do, since it would be contrary to analogy, for ἰδέα is formed from the Infin. ἰδεῖν, as ἴδω from the 2nd Aorist. The affinity for which Tisch. contends between ἰδία and ἴδω does not prove, as he imagines, that ἰδία ever existed, not even as a barbarism. As respects the sense of the word here, it is not form or shape, but aspect, visage, as having a sort of beamy radiance. The Evangelist probably had in mind a passage of Daniel: καὶ τὸ πρόσσωπον αὐτοῦ ὡς ἡ θάλασσα ἀστραπῆς. This sense of ἰδία is found also in 2 Macc. iii. 16, and sometimes in Class. writers, as Thucyd. vi. 4. Comp. Soph. frag. 421, ἀστραπαὶ οὐμάντων, and Aristoph. Ach. 566, βλάπτειν ἀστραπῆς.

In λευκὸν ὥσει χιῶν we have a comparison frequent in writers of every nation; whiteness having ever been a symbol of purity and sanctity. See Dan. vii. 9. Apoc. iii. 4. vi. 11. vii. 9. 13. Hence, among all the nations of antiquity, it was customary for those who celebrated divine worship to be clothed in white raiment. But from the expression used in the passage of Luke, ἐν ἱσθήσεσιν ἀστραπτοῦσαι, it is plain that something more than simply the colour of the raiment is meant, intimating that there was a sort of flashing brightness emitting rays of, as it were, lightning. Comp. the passage of Jos. Ant. xix. 8, 2, cited on Acts xii. 21.

⁸ ἔξελθ.] B, C, L, and 3 cursive MSS., have ἔπελθ., which is adopted by Tisch. and Alf., though not by Lachm.;—very properly, since the authority for that reading is quite insufficient, and not strengthened by internal evidence; for to suppose ἔξελθ. altered in all the copies but 6 from the passage of Mark, involves the height of improbability; since there would be no motive for altering, the sense being the same. Yet there is a distinction, and Critics might with some reason think ἔπελθ. the more correct term. An instance of this occurs elsewhere, e. gr. supra iv. 24, where the ἔξηλθα of C and several cursives was, I doubt not, a mere critical alteration (suggested by Mark i. 28. Luke iv. 24. vii. 17), proceeding from certain magidelli, who would not permit the Evangelist to use his οὐκ term.

—μνημείου] The μνημεῖον, or monumentum, amongst the Greeks and Romans, and perhaps the Jews, consisted of the cave, πηρὸς σπηλαιοῦ, and ἔστι, τὸ ὑπαίθριον, a small inclosure in the same ground around it. This whole μνημεῖον was also itself situated in a larger space of ground, outside of the inclosure, called by the Romans tulata monumenti; and here corresponding to the cultivated garden.

—μετὰ φόβου καὶ χαρᾶς μεγ.] Comp. Jos. Ant. xix. 3, 1, ἀμβάσταζε δι' αὐτὸν, οὐ πάντῃ βαλνύν τοῖς ποσὶ δυνάμειον ὑπὸ τοῦ φόβου καὶ χάριτος τῶν ἐκταμένων. From the terms τρόμος καὶ ἑκστασις employed in the passage of Mark, this αισ., intermingled with joy, appears to have amounted to a feeling of trembling ecstasy of surprise and joy.

⁹ ὡς δὲ ἱππορ.—αὐτοῦ] B, D, and 14 cursive MSS., with the Syr., Vulg., and some other Versions and Fathers, omit these words, which are cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., Meyer, and Alf., but retained by Math., Griesb., Fritz, and Scholz. It would seem so obviously lost by homoteleuton as scarcely to leave it a question; but on more mature consideration, I think the genuineness of the words, at least, doubtful. The first and second arguments urged by Mr. Alf. are, indeed, of slender weight; the first almost without any weight at all, for, after very extensive experience in collating, I must say, that the very best MSS. are not free from this fault; and also that the omission is not unfrequently passed over unnoticed by Collators; besides, it cannot be doubted that they were left out in some of those MSS. from that very cause: and yet that would not prove that they might not have been interpolated. As to Mr. Alford's third argument, it has, I admit, more force; but, after all, internal evidence is equally balanced, considering that the words might be removed by certain fastidious Critics as unnecessary, and as tending to draw the sentence out beyond due measure; and two different classes of Critics may have shortened it in two ways; and again the words may have arisen from a marginal Scholium: but the former is the more probable occurrence. Under these circumstances, I think it best to place the words in brackets.

— ἐκράτησαν αὐτοῦ τοὺς πόδας] The sense by some Commentators assigned to ἐκράτ., 'kissed his feet,' is one of which the word is incapable. Neither does it admit of that which is expressed in the E. V., took hold of, for that would require ἐκράτ. τῶν ποδῶν, according to the use of another expression not unfrequent in the N. T., namely, κρ. τῆς χειρὸς. I would render 'clasped his feet,' an action accompanying supplication, and symbolical of the help and protection implored (so Milton, P. L., "thy suppliant, I beg, and clasp thy knees"), though in the present case adoration is included, which, that the action sometimes implied, appears from Pliny, Paneg. § 21, "Non Tu civium complexus ad pedes tuos deprimis."

¹⁴ ἐὰν ἀκουσθῇ—ἐπὶ τοῦ ἡγεμ.] The full sense is: 'If this should transpire [in the course of inquiry] coram Præside.' By τοῦτο understand ὁ λόγος οὗτος, 'this account of the affair.' From Just. Mart. Dial. p. 355, it appears that the Chief Priests took measures to give currency to this lie in all parts of the world where Jews resided: and, accordingly, it is found in some of the Rabbinical writers. In the expression ἀμερίμους ποιήσ., there is a forensic allusion,—the sense being, as we should say, 'to bear any one harmless.' And as our term harmless is used to signify safe and sure, so here ἀμείρ. has that sense, as also in Herodian, l. iii. 3, 9, ἀμείρουν ἔχειν τὴν φρουράν.

¹⁶ εἰς τὸ ὄρος οὐ, &c.] Since neither by Christ himself, in his prophetic declaration at Matt. xxvi. 32, nor in his promise, supra v. 10, nor by the Angel, v. 4, is any mountain specified as the place of meeting between him and his disciples, it is argued by Whitby, Mackn., and others, that the words οὐ ἐτάξατο must be referred, not to ὄρος, but to Γαλιλαίαν. This, however, would be doing such violence to the construction, that it cannot be admitted. At the same time, there is little doubt that the Apostles did assemble for that purpose on a mountain (for the same reason that our Lord chose mountains, for prayer, &c.); and both probability and Ecclesiastical tradition concur in pointing out Tabor as the place. Are we, then, to suppose that there is, in the passage before us, a reference to a particular spot of meeting, which, nevertheless, has not been mentioned by the Evangelist, where one might have expected it, supra v. 10? I think not; for neither do the other Evangelists, who have supplied what Matthew here omits, make mention of this circumstance; which yet would not be likely to be omitted. And it is scarcely probable that our Lord would appoint the place, and not fix the time: since any long continuance in so wild and desert a place as Mount Tabor, would have been very inconvenient to the disciples. I cannot help suspecting, that the words εἰς τὸ ὄρος (which ought to be rendered, not 'into a mountain,' but 'unto the mountain') are not genuine. They are not found in 6 MSS., and may have arisen from a remark in the margin (proceeding from some of those who were well aware of the Ecclesiastical tradition, that this transaction took place at Mount Tabor), whence it seems others afterwards introduced the words into the text, thinking them required by the οὐ, and as serving to make the thing more definite. By their removal the difficulty in question will vanish; since the οὐ will thus refer to Γαλιλαίαν just before, and the reference to v. 9 will be more distinct; vv. 11—15 being in some measure parenthetical. The οὐ is thus used for ol, whether, as at Luke x. l. xxiv. 28, and 1 Cor. xvi. 6. If this solution be thought not satisfactory, we may suppose, if not a reference, yet an intimation of some interview having taken place previously to this in Galilee, though unrecorded. And if we could adopt Mr. Alford's view as to the imperfect and fragmentary nature of the materials out of which this narrative is constructed, it would render that omission not improbable. Sed non tali auxilio!

Some of the best Expositors are of opinion that, although the Evangelist does not mention more than the Eleven, yet that we may suppose there were many more witnesses; namely, the Seventy, and others of the recently converted disciples, so that the number may coincide with the 500 mentioned by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 6. But thus what is said v. 19, πορευθέντες μαθητ. π. τ. ζ. would have to be referred to the whole; which cannot be meant. Besides, St. Paul there expressly distinguishes the appearance to the Apostles (the Eleven) from that to the 500 (meaning the disciples at large). That more than the Eleven were present, is scarcely to be doubted; but the circumstances above stated seem to confine us to the Seventy disciples; though we can hardly suppose that even all of those would be present.

17. προσεκύνησαν αὐτῷ] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel the αὐτῷ from B, D, 2 cursive MSS., and 1 Ital. and Vulg. Versions;—most incompetent authority, espec. since internal evidence is in favour of the word, which was more likely to be removed by fastidious Critics, than to have come in from a marginal Scholium. According to this critical reviser, we obtain a highly Classical construction, αὐτὸν being taken with both the Particip. and the Verb; whereas, according to the text. rec., the construction is quite Hellenistic, but on that very account more likely to be genuine. Besides, the Critic forgot that Matth. no where uses the accus. after προσκ., except in one passage, and that only a citation from the Sept.; and if he meant προσκ. to be taken absolutely, that construction no where occurs in the three parallel Gospels.

— οἱ δὲ ἐδίστασαν] There has been some difficulty raised both as to the construction, and to the persons meant by οἱ δὲ. As to the former, there can be no doubt but that the οἱ δὲ is rightly taken, by some ancient and several of the best modern Commentators, for τινὲς δὲ; of which many examples are adduced. But the latter difficulty is not so easily removed. To resort to conjectural alteration, with Beza, is to cut the knot. To take ἐδίστασαν, with Grotius, Doddridge, and Fritz., as a pluperfect ('had doubted'), is harsh, and too much like a device for the nonce. As to the latter, though there is some perplexity in the matter, yet considering that οἱ δὲ could not be taken of one; neither would it, after the two appearances at Jerusalem recorded in John, be at all likely to have taken place in the case of any one of the Apostles except Thomas; and accordingly we are compelled to refer the expression οἱ δὲ to those other, viz. of the Seventy disciples, some few of whom (and the idiom almost always has reference to a comparatively few) might have some scruples, doubting the actual bodily presence of the Lord. This I find confirmed by Just. M. de Resurr. ix. p. 594, D, τῶν μαθητῶν (he does not say ἀποστόλων) αὐτοῦ μὴ πιστευόντων, εἰ ἀληθῶς σῶματι ἀνίστη, βλεπόντων αὐτῶν καὶ δισταζόντων. εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· οὐκ ἔχετε πίστιν; Vide ad Luc. xxiv. 38.

18. In what follows after λέγοντες to the end of v. 20, we have, as Grot., Beza, and Bp. Lonsdale point out, the chief heads of the several discourses which our Lord is by the other Evangelists recorded to have addressed to his disciples during the period intervening between his resurrection and ascension. These heads are, (1) the Universality of his Power; (2) the Commission given by him to the ministers of his Church to the end of the world. Mr. Alf., indeed, flatly denies this; affirming that the words προσελθ. ἐλάλ. αὐτοῖς λέγων forbid us to suppose it. But surely the term προσελθ. must be kept quite apart, as purely narrative, and graphic in character. And then the words ἐλάλ. αὐτοῖς λέγων will be no other than the usual formula, to usher in something to be said of great importance, as here. That their purpose is only, as Mr. Alf. says, 'to intimate that what follows was spoken then and there,' is more than any one can well credit, except Mr. Alf., qui secum habet! I am indisposed to admit his assertion, that what is here said was not meant for the Apostles only, but extended to all the brethren present. I would, however, rather say, extended to the μαθηταί also then present. But nearly all those (being of the Seventy disciples) would, we may suppose, be sooner or later ministers of the Word, or missionary teachers thereof. See Eph. iv. 11. Hence there is nothing to overturn the usual view of this passage as being a Commission both to the persons in question and their successors. This has been shown by many, but by no one more clearly than by Matth. Henry, who concludes with the weighty remark: "The Old Test. promise of a Gospel ministry is made to a succession, Isa. lix. 21; and this must here be understood, otherwise how could Christ be with them all way to the end of the world?"

— καὶ προσελθόντων] 'and having come towards, approached them;' for it would seem that they had at first seen him at some distance.

— ἐδόθη μοι πάντα ἔξουσία] 'there is committed to me all power,' meaning authority of every kind, and in the highest degree. Comp. John xvii. 5, 24, with Dan. vii. 14, αὐτῷ ἐδόθη ἡ ἀρχὴ καὶ ἡ τιμὴ καὶ ἡ βασιλεία, denoting authority of every kind, ἡ ἔξουσία αὐτοῦ, ἔξουσία αἰώνιος, corresponding to the δόξα προαιώνιος in the above passage of John. The τῇ before γῆς is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, D, and one cursive 2nd manu. Mr. Alford pronounces it [alteration] 'for conformity with ἐν οὐρανῷ;' but this verdict is, I would say, too summary to be just. Is it not σία ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς. ¹⁹ Ἱ Πορευθέντες [οὖν] μαθητεύσατε ^{1 Mark 16. 15.} πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, βαπτίζοντες αὐτοὺς εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Πατρὸς ^{Luke 24. 47. Isa. 52. 10. Acts 1. 28, 30.}

far more likely that the της should have been accidentally left out in two MSS. (for the other MS. being a fellow copy, must not be reckoned), than that it should have been inserted in all the copies but two,—for I find it absent from all the Lamb. and Mus. copies? It was surely more likely that the Critics should have brought in της, as thinking that the noun required the Article, and knowing that it generally has it. Yet it can dispense with it, and often is without it even when οὐπ. without the Article does not precede. The Article της is interpolated in a few copies of the Western Family at Heb. viii. 4. Besides, if Mr. Alf. has decided rightly here, he must have decided wrongly at 1 Cor. viii. 5, εἰτε ἐν οὐρανῷ, εἰτε ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, where he cancels της, from A, B, D, E, F, G, K, 7 cursive MSS.—another proof this that the Critics did interpolate the Article της even when the preceding οὐπ. was without it. Sometimes, however, they removed it when preceded by οὐπ. without the Article. So supra vi. 10, where B, Z, Δ, and 6 cursive MSS. omit της, which Lachm. and Tisch. there cancel, and Mr. Alford, Ed. 1, brackets, very rightly; but if so, wrongly here. It may, indeed, be asked, if St. Matthew used the Article there, why should he not use it here? I answer, that such exact uniformity is not to be expected in a composition so inartificial as that of the present Gospel, nor to be required from one writing in a foreign language, with little or no heed to such grammatical minutiae as this.

But, to turn from words to things—and to consider a point deeply important—the words in question have been so explained as to derogate from the Divinity of Christ. But, when properly understood, they will by no means lead to any such conclusion. It is justly argued by Whitty and Mede, that ‘as in his Divine nature our Lord doubtless had this power from all eternity, so, if this declaration be supposed to be made with respect to his Divine nature, it must be understood of him as being God of God, deriving his being and essence by an eternal generation from the Father. But he was also perfect man, as well as perfect God; and therefore the words may have been spoken in reference to his state of humiliation, now about to terminate in glory at the right hand of God; before which time he could not exercise the power, though he had before received it. But having (as is here intimated) now received it, he would exercise it, as Mediator between God and man, and as the Head of his Church, till the consummation of all things.’ It is scarcely necessary to remark, that such unlimited power as is implied in πάντα ἑξουσία, &c. (comp. Eph. i. 20—23. Col. ii. 10. Heb. i. 6. Rom. xiv. 9. 1 Cor. xv. 24—28. Phil. ii. 9—12), could neither be received nor exercised by any Being less than God; therefore Christ is God.

19. πορευθέντες οὖν μαθητ., &c.] In other words, ‘I have now all power committed unto me, by virtue of which, I empower and commission you my disciples (see John xx. 21) to enlarge, settle, and govern the Church which I have founded,’—a commission which embraces three particulars, μαθητεύειν, βαπτίζειν, and διδάσκειν, i. e. 1. to disciple them, or convert them to the faith; 2. to initiate them into the Church by baptism; 3. to instruct them, when baptized, in the doctrines and duties of a Christian life. From the present passage we may infer three things,—1. the necessity of baptism; 2. the lawfulness of Infant baptism; 3. the doctrine of the Trinity. As respects the first particular, it can need no establishing to any except Quakers and Socinians; as regards the second, ‘no argument can,’ as Dr. Doddridge says, ‘be drawn from these words to the prejudice of infant baptism,’ because, though espec. adapted to adults, as necessarily forming the bulk of the first converts; yet it need not be thought to exclude infants, who cannot be expected to have faith, in order to be baptized. Now this inference would necessarily be drawn by the Jews, since they were accustomed to see infants baptized; and would naturally conclude, that as no alteration was announced, the mode of admission into covenant with God remained the same. The propriety of infant baptism may be inferred from the strong analogy which the rite bears to circumcision, and the baptism of proselytes, which included their children as well as themselves. There is precisely the same reason why the children of Christians should be admitted from their infancy into the Christian covenant, as why the infants of Jewish parents should be admitted into the Mosaic covenant; infants being as capable of covenanting in the one case as in the other. And if God did not consider their age any objection against even circumcision, or the baptism of the children of Jewish proselytes; we have no reason to urge it as an objection against being received to Christian baptism. In short, it may be confidently pronounced, that Infant Baptism has subsisted from the times of the Apostles to the present day. Timothy was brought up a Christian, ἀπὸ βρέφους, ‘from an infant,’ as multitudes of others must, when whole families were baptized. So also Justin Martyr, Apol. i. says that there were then many of both sexes, 60 or 70 years of age, οἱ ἐκ παλδων ἡμαρτηύθησαν τῷ Χριστῷ, ἀφθοροὶ διαμύνονσι. And certain it is, that in Tertullian’s day the practice was general. ‘In fact, had infant baptism not subsisted in the time of the Apostles, what (as Wetstein observes) would have been done with the infants, or male children of Christians? Were they to be circumcised? certainly not. Were they, then, to be brought up in neither Judaism nor Christianity, but with their minds a mere tabula rasa? certainly not. “Bring them up,” says St. Paul, “in the fear and nurture of the Lord.” Otherwise they would have been in a worse condition than if their parents had never been Christians. And though nothing is said in Scripture to enjoin infant baptism, it was not necessary that it should be expressly enjoined; just as neither the age nor sex of those admitted to the Lord’s Supper is mentioned or prescribed. On the other hand, there was a good reason why that should not be done; namely, lest superstitious persons should stick at the bar only of the doctrines, and give their chief attention to what is ceremonial, to the neglect of what is essential.

As regards the third point, the doctrine of the Trinity clearly results from the form in which the indispensable rite of Baptism is administered, since the expression ὀνόματος, not ὀνομάτων (as applied to three Persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost), is represented to us under these three Persons; and that these three Persons are of equal dignity, is evident from the command being given to baptize equally in the name of all three, without any mention of or allusion to any difference, distinction, or superiority, showing that each is properly God; and consequently worship is to be rendered, and glory ascribed, to each indifferently. As respects the force of the εἰς, there is little doubt that εἰς τὸ ὄνομα, should be rendered 'into the name of,' implying the taking upon us the name, and professing ourselves devoted to the faith and obedience of the three Persons.

I must not omit to notice that the οὖν is absent from most of the uncials, and a large proportion of the cursive MSS., and has been cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., but retained, within brackets, by Lachm.;—very properly, since internal evidence is against it, including some Versions; and in a case like this Versions are of great authority. To the Fathers alleged against it I add, from Jacks., Euseb. non semel, and Const. Ap. ii. 26, 4. v. 7, 18. vii. 22, 1. It would seem to be not genuine, but inserted, as Alf. says, for connexion, as pointing out source, what we should express by accordingly. It may, indeed, be asked why, if thus necessary to draw the connexion, should it not then have been expressed by the Evangelist? I answer, that this is one of those cases in which the Asyndeton may have place, being suitable to passages in which the writer or speaker is under the agitating influence of strong mental feeling. Thus in 1 Tim. i. 17, Bengel re-

Finally, for βαπτίζοντες, Tisch. reads, from B, D, βαπτισαντες; while Lachm. retains the text. rec. Mr. Alf. regards the other as a "correction for Ecclesiastical propriety," meaning, I suppose, that the Critics thus wished to make it plain that baptism should precede instruction. This I can confirm from the Const. Apost. vii. 40, ὁ Κύριος ἡμῶν—παρήγγισεν εἰπὼν, Μαθητεύσατε πρότερον πάντα τὰ ἰθὺν—καὶ βαπτίσατε αὐτούς. Now here we may trace this exercise of 'Ecclesiastical propriety' in the insertion of πρότερον. And it is evident that, on this loose citation, the writer accommodates the tense in βαπτ. to that in μαθ., which I suspect is all that the concoctor of the reading βαπτισαντες intended, since from his carelessness about Scriptural purity one cannot imagine he had any great sense of Ecclesiastical propriety.

20. The ἰδοὺ is highly significant, denoting 'Mind!' and the ἐγὼ is (as Calv. and other Commentators point out) emphatic, intimating to them Who it was that was to be their great Supporter, q. d. "Si officio suo strenuè fungi velint, non respiciendum esse quid ipsi possint, sed conjuncta Ejus potestate nitendum, sub cuius auspiciis militant." See also Bucer. The expression μεθ' ὑμῶν is to be understood of Christ's spiritual presence by all needful support, including, of course, that of the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, implied, through the Promise, in Christ's presence. I quite agree with Calv., that the words μεθ' ὑμῶν are not to be understood exclusively of the Apostles, nor even the Disciples present—which would exceedingly impair the force of these weighty words—inasmuch as Christ here promises his aid, not to one age only, but to every age unto the end of the world. Of course, it relates, as Bengel says, to the Church Universal.

ΤΟ ΚΑΤΑ ΜΑΡΚΟΝ ΕΥΑΓΓΕΛΙΟΝ.

I. Ἡ ἈΡΧΗ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, Υἱοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ—
² ὡς γέγραπται ἐν [Ἠσαΐα] * τῷ * προφήτῃ Ἰδοὺ, ἐγὼ ἀπο-

I. The writer of this Gospel is almost universally admitted to have been John, surnamed Mark, who was sister's son to Barnabas, and son of Mary, a pious woman, at whose house the first Christians usually assembled at Jerusalem. This is, indeed, denied by Grotius, and, after him, by Dr. Burton; but the objections of the former have been overruled by Fritz. And as to what is urged by the latter, that 'if the Evangelist died, as we are told by Eusebius, in the 8th year of Nero (i.e. A.D. 61 or 62), he could not be mentioned in the 2nd Epistle to Timothy, which was not written till, at the earliest, A.D. 64;' we are surely not authorized to reject, on so slender a ground, what rests on high probability, supported by the earliest Ecclesiastical tradition, on a point where it could scarcely fail to preserve the truth. It is more reasonable to suppose, either that Eusebius was misinformed as to the exact date, or some mistake of the scribes in the figure.

Mark was not an Apostle, nor one of the Seventy disciples, since St. Peter (1 Pet. v. 13) calls him his son [namely, in the faith], i.e. his convert. For the outlines of the Evangelist's history, traced from the New Test., and the early Ecclesiastical writers, the reader is referred to Mr. Horne's Introduction. The time when this Gospel was written is much disputed, and cannot be determined with certainty; but it is with most probability fixed at A.D. 66 or 67, and a little after the time when Luke published his Gospel: certainly not till after the death of Peter, and probably Paul. This matter is, however, closely connected with another question, of far greater importance, — whether, in writing his Gospel, Mark made use of the Gospel of Matthew? On this the opinions of the learned are at the antipodes; some maintaining that Mark's Gospel is only an abridgment of Matthew's; others, that Mark made no use of that Gospel—nay, was totally unacquainted with it: indeed, that the Gospels were all of them formed without knowledge of, and independently of, each other. Now here, if ever, 'in medio tutissimus ibis.' The instances of verbal coincidence are so striking (nearly the whole of the Gospel being found in Matthew) as to forbid the latter supposition.

And as to the former, it may, with full confidence, be maintained, that this Gospel is not a mere abridgment of Matthew's, since it differs from it (as we shall see) in many important respects. The question whether Mark made use of Luke's Gospel is of more difficult determination. Dr. Hales thinks that Griesbach has, by an elaborate process, furnished strong internal evidence of the priority of Luke's Gospel to Mark's. In using these Gospels, Dr. Hales thinks that Mark in general rather adopted the language of Matthew, but the order of Luke; yet neither implicitly; and that, besides, he is more circumstantial and exact than either of them in the relation of joint facts. 'Now,' Dr. Hales argues, 'had Luke followed Mark (as is the common opinion), it is not credible that he would have omitted all those; since even John has used some.' And this priority of Luke to Mark is not only maintained by many eminent moderns, but was held by the ancients. Thus Clem. Alex. attests that Gospels with the genealogies were first written. And so Julian mentions them in the order—Matthew, Luke, Mark, and John. We can, as Dr. Hales observes, account thus for the order in which they at present stand. 'From the time that the notion prevailed that Mark's Gospel was an abridgment of St. Matthew's, it was natural to place it next to St. Matthew's.' This (I would add) might take place, even on the opinion that Mark chiefly followed Matthew. Thus, also, when Tertullian ranges the Gospels of Matthew, John, Luke, and Mark, he classifies them into original, and, in some degree, compilatory compositions.

To advert to a yet more important subject—it may be thought surprising, that persons of acknowledged talent and competent judgment should have adopted opinions so diametrically opposite to each other, as to the origin, or sources, and nature of the Gospels. But the truth is, that the existence of such striking verbal coincidences between Matthew, Mark, and Luke, when coupled with the remarkable variations, if not discrepancies, in their respective accounts, presents a most perplexing phenomenon. Hence men of talent have set themselves to devise such hypotheses, respecting the origin of the Gospels, as may satisfactorily account for this phenomenon; and, as might be expected, they have, to a certain degree, been successful. Of the many that have been propounded, FOUR alone deserve any attention. 1. That one or two of the three Gospels were taken from the third. 2. That all three were derived from some original document, Greek or Hebrew, common to all three. 3. That they were derived from detached narratives of parts of the history of Christ, communicated by the Apostles to the first converts. 4. That they were derived from oral tradition. Now as to the traditionary hypothesis, suffice it to say, that, besides proceeding on a wholly gratuitous assumption (as to the existence of verbal Gospels), and taking for granted other things (as to the length of time which elapsed before a Gospel was committed to writing, &c.), it only brings upon us new and real difficulties in the place of alleged ones (especially as to the uniformity of such tradition), and is utterly inconsistent with the striking verbal coincidences found in the Gospels. As to the documentary hypothesis, even in its most modified and least objectionable form (No. 3), it is liable to the same objections, though not in the same degree, as No. 2, of completeness and artificialness; and the 2nd to the fatal one, the silence of all Ecclesiastical antiquity as to the existence of any such primary document, or documentary narrative. Indeed, of all these three hypotheses (namely, 2, 3, 4), we may truly say, that, while they are such as by no means to command our credence, they detract, esp. the 2nd and 4th, not a little from the authority of the first three Gospels as inspired compositions. Whatever may be the modifications with which either the documentary or the traditionary hypothesis may be brought forward—whatever may be the refinements resorted to—they are insufficient to elude the plain inference implied in each and all, that the Evangelists are scarcely to be regarded as regular, much less as inspired writers. There is, indeed, the smaller excuse for resorting to these hypotheses, since it is wholly unnecessary so to do; as will appear from an examination of the first-mentioned hypothesis, which has been held, with various modifications, by many of the most eminent Theologians and Commentators, ancient and modern. Even to this view, indeed, objections may, and have been made, which are thus summed up by Mr. Horne, vol. i. 494, 496: '1. The Evangelists could have no motive for copying from each other. 2. It does not appear that any of the ancient Christian writers had a suspicion that either of the first three Evangelists had seen the other Gospels before he wrote his own. 3. It is not suitable to the character of any of the Evangelists, that they should abridge or transcribe another historian. 4. It is evident, from the nature and design of the first three Gospels, that the Evangelists had not seen any authentic written history of Jesus Christ. 5. All the first three Evangelists have several things peculiar to themselves, which show that they did not borrow from each other, and that they were all well acquainted with the things of which they undertook to write a history.' On a close examination, however, of these objections, some, it is conceived, will be found groundless; others to proceed from misapprehension, or taking for granted what has not, and cannot be proved: in short, that all put together have not weight enough to decide even a doubtful case. That there should have been such various modifications of the hypothesis now under consideration, is no proof, as the objectors to it allege, that it is wholly unfounded. Extremes have in all ages produced extremes. From the strong verbal coincidences between this Gospel and that of St. Matthew, many, from the time of Augustine downwards, have regarded Mark as a mere epitomizer of Matthew. Now this is at variance with the universal testimony of early antiquity, and is forbidden by the alterations in the order of time and the arrangement of facts, and the addition of much matter not found in Matthew. The strong coincidences may serve to prove that he often followed Matthew; but his frequent deviations from Matthew show that he was by no means an abridger. But, on the other hand, that the succeeding Evangelists did not see each the Gospel of his predecessor, is, as Dr. Hales observes, 'a negative which cannot be proved. Whereas the affirmative is highly probable, from the intimate connexion and correspondence between them, and appears to be sufficiently established from internal evidence.' Upon the whole, there seems no good reason to reject the first-mentioned hypothesis; which will, I apprehend, have only to be duly modified, and properly limited, to free it from all reasonable objection. The state of the evidence as to the verbal coincidences is, as we have seen, such as utterly to exclude the notion (otherwise improbable) that the Evangelists who followed the first did not know, much less make use of, their predecessors' works. The case seems to have been this: 1. That the Gospels of Matthew and Luke were original and independent narratives, except that Luke probably made some use of the Hebrew original of St. Matthew. 2. That Mark's Gospel appeared after those two; and that the Evangelist freely used the matter contained in one or the other, according as it suited his purpose, and was agreeable to his plan. 3. That such parts as are not found in Matthew or Luke were mostly derived from St. Peter (under whose sanction and direction Mark wrote), or when not, from the testimony of 'eye-witnesses and ministers of the word.' As to the discrepancies (which, however, have been exceedingly exaggerated) between Mark's Gospel and that of Matthew, they will (as Dr. Hales observes) 'not prove that he could not have known of it, or used the Gospel, but only that he felt himself authorized to claim the character of an original historian; which, considering his many advantages for arriving at the truth, and the countenance and direction of St. Peter, he might well do.' This view, while it satisfactorily accounts for the verbal coincidences, cannot, when properly understood, be justly thought to derogate from the credit of St. Mark's Gospel, as a Canonical work, or one written under Divine inspiration.

II. There are indeed not wanting those who,

ὠντος ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ, Ἐτοιμάσατε τὴν ὁδὸν Κυρίου, ἐν-

strenuously contending for the Gospels being formed independently of each other, are of opinion that these coincidences in the writings of the Evangelists may be sufficiently accounted for without having recourse to the supposition that the later Gospels were, in some degree, formed on the preceding ones. According to this view, the verbal coincidences are ascribed to the uncommon attention with which Christ's sayings were treasured up in the memories of his hearers, and the supernatural aid promised to 'bring all things to their remembrance, whatsoever he had said unto them' (John xiv. 26). See Bp. Gleig, and Archdeacon Nares, cited by Mr. Horne. But this, it should seem, is ascribing more to memory than, even under the most favourable circumstances, it can be expected to minister. At all events, it is not well judged to bring in the principle of strict verbal inspiration, in direct opposition to the strongest internal evidence of one Gospel, at least, being partly formed from the other two. There is nothing, it is apprehended, in the above view derogatory of the just claims of either Evangelist; espec. of Luke, as will appear from his own preface to his Gospel; on which see the notes in loco. Inspiration, as far as it was needed, was, we may be sure, so far granted; and to suppose it to have proceeded beyond that is unwarrantable.

To advert to the purpose of the Gospel; the ordinary view cannot be better expressed than in the words of Dr. Hales. 'A brief and plain account of the grounds of the Christian religion was, even after the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, wanted for plain and unlettered persons. And this need Mark, under the sanction, and with the occasional assistance, of St. Peter, undertook to supply, at the request (as we learn from early Ecclesiastical writers) of the Christian converts of Rome, who had attended on St. Peter's preaching. In compliance with their request, Mark most judiciously selected, and sometimes enlarged, the more important parts of Matthew and Luke, and adapted them to his peculiar purpose; which was to give a succinct history of our Lord's ministry, commencing from the preaching of the Baptist to his Ascension, and concluding with the preaching of the Apostles every where throughout the world. Hence we are enabled to account for his omission of certain portions of their Gospels, either entirely or partially; on the same principle that John, coming after him, omits considerably more, so as to form a distinct Gospel, which may be considered as a supplement to the rest [see, however, Intr. to St. John's Gospel. Ed.], with only the insertion of so much matter common to the former, as to connect his Gospel with theirs.'

The former part of this statement, though substantially true, is so far incorrect, as it represents St. Peter as having originated and set on foot this Gospel; though Jerome says as much, or even more,—namely, that Mark wrote all at Peter's dictation, and the term ἑρμηνευτής, used of Mark by Papias and Irenæus, may seem to favour this. But Clemens Alex. says that it was written by Mark at a distance from Peter, and without his knowledge or approbation. But far earlier authority is more to be credited. It should seem, that though Peter was not with Mark when he was prevailed upon by Peter's hearers and disciples at Rome to write the Gospel,—yet that when he came to know the fact, he gave his approbation and sanction to the thing; knowing that Mark had enjoyed such ample advantages of hearing his preaching, and of profiting by his private communications, as to the Gospel history, as would enable him to furnish to the persons in question what was needful for their purpose. This seems to be the general view adopted by Dr. Davidson, in his able Introduction to the Gospel. I agree with him in thinking that the term ἑρμηνευτής, applied to Mark by Papias and Irenæus, means 'a person who explains in another language the discourses of a second party'; not, however, giving a bare version of them, but unfolding them in a style adapted to their contents. Comp. Platon. Polit. p. 290, ἑρμηνευταὶ γὰρ πρὸς νομίζοντα παρὰ θεῶν ἀνθρώποις. Nor will this be inapplicable to such private communications as Mark had from Peter. And it can scarcely be doubted that Mark had, while in attendance on Peter, not neglected to note down, for his own future use, and possibly for the use of others, what he had heard from Peter privately in Hebrew, entering it down in Greek. There is no little confirmation of this in Papias' words, ἵνα γράψας ὡς ἀπεμνημόνευσεν, i.e. 'had made memoranda of them'; not 'recollected,' as Dr. Davidson says; and οὐδὲν ἡμαρτε only intimates that in adopting the plan he did what he thought was essentially necessary 'without any great strictness of order and arrangement'; such is the sense of the disputed expression οὐ τάξει. The term ἀπομνημονεύματα, used by Euseb. Dem. Ev. iii. 5, confirms the above view. 'If, then,' as observes Dr. Davidson, 'this Gospel contains a faithful abstract of Peter's discourses [rather representation, formed on positive documentary memoranda], we may safely rely on it as ultimately based on Apostolic authority.' But if this be the case, what shall we say to the presumption of Mr. Alford, not only in running counter to all ancient authority, and almost all modern belief, but in characterizing the opinion as "quite futile?" In weighing the authorities for the view above set forth, he says, "We may observe that the matter is not one of patent fact, but one which could, from its nature, have been known to few persons." This, however, has been shown at large by an able writer in the Edinburgh Review, No. 191, to be a very erroneous view of the case. "The close connexion," then, the Reviewer goes on to say, "of St. Peter with St. Mark, as his companion and spiritual son, appears from 1 Pet. v. 13. St. Mark's mother was the Mary to whose house Peter resorted immediately after his miraculous delivery from prison (Acts xii. 12). And, if St. Mark did 'follow the authority of the Apostle in his compilation, this would be 'a patent fact' on the very instant of its publication, for the whole of its authority would be derived from that very circumstance. The external testimony to the influence of St. Peter on St. Mark's Gospel may or may not be deserving of implicit credit, but it is unquestionably much fuller than that to the Hebrew original of the Gospel of St. Matthew. The testimony of Irenæus is the same for both facts. That of Papias himself is confirmed by the statement of John the Presbyter, expressly cited by Papias. Besides this, there is the evidence of the African Tertullian, as regards St. Mark. And, finally (a passage which has escaped Mr. Alford's notice), Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryph. § 106, in one of the very few passages in which he distinctly refers to St. Mark's Gospel, actually quotes it as ἀπομνημονεύματα [memoirs] of St. Peter." I would add that, for the truth of the opinion in question, we have the weighty authorities of John the Presbyter, Papias, Irenæus, Clem. Alex., Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, and Tertullian (adv. Marcion, c. v.). See more in Dr. Routh's Rel. S. p. 403.

III. To advert to internal evidence, attesting the correctness of the above-stated view, "the very character of the Gospel itself (observes Dr. Davidson) coincides with the testimony of antiquity, and is in favour of a close connexion between the writer and St. Peter. Thus we find an especial reference to the person of the latter by the insertion of his name, where no reason for it can be discovered in the event related, and where no light is thrown by it on the event itself. His presence is marked in the Gospel where the recording of it is of no importance. This doubtless arose from Mark's desire to bring out the Apostle into prominence, as his authority, while it evinces an intimate knowledge of circumstances respecting Peter unnoticed by the other Evangelists. See i. 36. v. 37. xi. 20—26. xiii. 3. xvi. 7."

IV. With respect to the persons for whom this Gospel was intended, the truth here, as often, will be found in medio. It was probably written chiefly, though not exclusively, for the Gentile converts and the Hellenists, chiefly of the West.

V. To advert to the characteristics of this Gospel, 1. as to mode of narration; 2. as to diction and phraseology.

(1.) As to mode of narration. His descriptions are vivid and picturesque; and not only so, but minute in detail, in reference both to persons and things, espec. localities, and also in respect to notices of time and number. His use of the Narrative Present is very frequent; and persons are introduced as directly speaking far more than in the other Gospels. It has been observed with some truth by Dr. Davidson, that Mark is characterized by a conciseness, and apparent incompleteness of delineation, which are allied to the obscure. This feature has, however, been grievously exaggerated by Critics, who do not make sufficient allowance for the imperfect state of the ordinary text, as will appear from my critical discussions thereon.

(2.) As to the peculiarities of diction; they have been arranged by Credner under the following heads: 1. The frequency of Latinisms; 2. Unusual words and constructions; 3. Frequent use of diminutives, and repetition of the substantive instead of the pronoun, or repeating the same thing in other words, or by subjoining the opposite; 4. Connecting expressions similar in sense; 5. The ἀπ᾿ λεγόμενα are numerous, and, as I have shown, almost all, more or less, provincialisms, peculiar to Palestine and Syria. But some of those arise from the strong infusion of Hebraistic colouring, and others from the circumstance of Mark being an unpractised writer. His style, indeed, is far from being pure, or his composition exact. Nay, Dr. Davidson piles up a no small mass of constructions and modes of expression, 'which are,' he pronounces, 'an offence against all the elementary principles of the Greek language.' If this was the case seven years ago, when his criticism was formed mainly on the text of Griesb., what would he now say on reference to the text of Tisch. and Alf., in which such offences are at least quadrupled, so as to make it, Dr. Davidson would still more think, impossible to account for the "Evangelist's linguistic peculiarities?" I trust, however, that my discussions on the state of the text will convince that learned and able writer, and other unprejudiced judges, that most of those offences must be laid at the door of the scribes, pseudo-critics, and sciolists.

VI. Finally, as to the time and place of writing this Gospel; the latter has been assigned by some to Alexandria, by others to Rome; but Dr. Davidson truly remarks, that the weight of ancient testimony is in favour of the latter. "The accounts," continues he, "of Irenæus and Clemens agree in this, that the Gospel was written at Rome, after Peter's arrival in the imperial city, or after the beginning of A.D. 63." It is impossible, he thinks, to determine the date more nearly than A.D. 64, which is two years earlier than is usually fixed. Since nearly the whole of this Gospel (i.e. with the exception of some 24 verses, and sundry short inserted clauses or words) is contained (at least with an occasional change of terms) in one or both of the two parallel Gospels of Matthew and Luke, it has been thought proper, in order to avoid all needless repetition, and to reserve the room for a more important purpose, to give comparatively little of explanatory annotation on such portions as are common to those Gospels; the reader being referred for all such (with the exception of a few words and phrases which are, for some particular reason, explained on Mark, but not on Luke) to the Notes on the parallel passages of those Gospels. Moreover, for the convenience of the reader in consultation, the Tabular Arrangement of Harmonic Parallels has been in this Gospel retained, while in the other two Marginal Parallel References, greatly improved, have been substituted in their stead—thus placing under the very eye of the reader a reference to those portions of Matthew or Luke, where he may seek the annotatory matter which he needs. The Editor also desires to inform his readers, that since, for reasons which it is difficult to imagine, the state of the ordinary text of this Gospel—as found in the Stephanic and Elzevir Editions—is in a far less perfect condition than that of any other of the Books of the New Test., with the exception of the Apocalypse, his former text has undergone a thorough revision, based on extensive researches, and necessarily involving a far larger portion of critical annotatory matter than would have been called for, had it not been for the remarkable diversities of reading perpetually found in this Gospel, espec. in those portions which are common to Matthew and Luke.

CH. I. 1. ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου—Θεοῦ] On the construction, and consequently the sense, of the first 4 verses of this chapter, much difference of opinion exists. Suffice it to advert to the two methods of adjusting the former, and settling the latter, which seem most entitled to attention. Very many modern Expositors, from Beza to Kuin., agree in regarding v. 1 as a separate sentence, forming a kind of title to the book. They also regard v. 4 as containing the apodosis to v. 2. 'It was not unusual (says Campbell) with authors to prefix a short sentence, to serve both as a title to the book, and to signify that the beginning immediately followed. So Hosea i. 1.' In this view they quote the commencing sentence of the History of Herodotus; to which I have, in Recens. Synop., added the Proems of Thucyd., Procop., Oecel., Luc., Timæus, and some other writers. Thus the ὡς, which may be rendered scilicet, will refer to v. 4, as the completion of the prophecies mentioned. Nevertheless, there is something arbitrary and forced in this mode of interpretation; and the examples adduced are, with the exception of Hosea i. 1, not quite to the purpose, as being of a different character. Hence I am now inclined to give the preference to the method propounded by the ancients almost universally, and by many eminent modern Expositors, as Erasmus, Calvin, Bullinger, Zeger, Maldon., Wolf, Bp. Chandler, Markl., Fritz, and others down to the time of Dr. Bland and Bp. Lonsdale, according to which mode of viewing the construction, vv. 2 and 3 are semi-parenthetical, and meant to illustrate the context, as serving to show in what sense John is said to be the beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and to intimate, that what is afterwards related is agreeable to Prophetic announcements. So Bp. Chandler observes that "it serves to show the connexion between the Old and the New Test., and that the latter began where the former ended." This is still more forcibly set forth in the able note of Bede (in the Catena contained in the works of Thom. Aquin. vol. iv. p. 429), which serves to show what Mark meant by characterizing John as the beginning of the Gospel,—understanding thereby his preaching and ministry,—which Mark might well term the 'beginning of the Gospel,' inasmuch as by that preaching and ministry it was evident that the Dispensation of the Law and the Prophets was come to a close, and that of the Gospel already commencing. So our Lord, Matt. xi. 13, says, πάντες γὰρ οἱ προφῆται καὶ ὁ νόμος ἔως Ἰωάννου προεφήτευσαν, i. e.,—as is implied in the next verse, and expressed in Luke xvi. 16,—up to John only, to be then succeeded by the Gospel. See more in the able note of Calvin, who is here instar omnium. As respects the ancient Commentators, Theophyl. and Victor, both make the sense to be,—that John, the last of the Prophets, was the beginning of the Gospel. Euthym. says the same, but more at large; these several Commentators doubtless forming their exegeses from the Greek Fathers. But in v. 3 Euthym. draws from another source, and one far more precious, the following passage, which sets the matter in a light clearer than I have met with elsewhere: Εἰπὼν δὲ Μάρκος, ὅτι ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου οὕτως γέγονεν ὡς γέγραπται ἐν τοῖς προφήταις, εἰτα παραγαγὼν καὶ τὰ προφητικά ῥήτα, λοιπὸν ἐπιχειρεῖ ἀποδεικνύειν, ὃ προῖητο, καὶ ἀρχεται λέγειν τὰ κατὰ τὸν Ἰωάννην, ὅπως ἦλθεν ἐπὶ τὸν Ἰορδάνην, ὅπως ἐκήρυξε, καὶ, ἀπλῶς, ὅπως ἡ ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου γέγονεν. It is true that this holding of the sense suspended, by introducing this interposed portion, involves some harshness; but not greater than what occurs in some other passages of the New Test., and even of the Class. writers, espec. Thucydides.

The τοῦ before Θεοῦ is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, D, L, and one cursivo MS.;—very insufficient authority; espec. considering that internal evidence is adverse, inasmuch as the word was more likely to be removed by Critics (who thought that as there was no Article before ἰοῦν there ought to be none here) than that it should have been inserted—and for no obvious reason—in all except 4 MSS., for I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies.

2. For ὡς Tisch. reads καθὼς, from B, D, L, Δ, and 5 cursives (to which I add Lamb. 1179), while Lachm. and Alf. retain ὡς, for which καθὼς was a mere alteration of Critics into the more usual term. For τοῖς προφήταις, all the recent Editors are agreed in reading τῷ Ἠσ. τῷ προφήτῃ, on not inconsiderable authority, confirmed by the most weighty ancient Versions, and by internal evidence, considering that τοῖς προφ. has every appearance of being a mere correction from Critical Revisers, who thought such called for by the fact that two Prophets, Malachi and Isaiah, are cited; and accordingly I have adopted it as heretofore. But the same critical reasons which warrant the abandonment of the ordinary reading, dissuades the adoption of Ἠσαῖα, external authority being no stronger than in the other case, and internal evidence against the word, which was far more likely to be put in than put out. As to the Vulg. and Jerome, urged in favour of Esaiæ, though Jerome inserted Esaiam in his Version, yet in his note, Malachi iii. 1, he expresses suspicion of its having arisen in the way just pointed out. Victor rejects the word, terming it an erroneous reading, and fortifies his opinion by the authority of Euseb. in his work (alas! lost) περὶ τῆς δοκούσης ἐν τοῖς Εὐαγγέλοις περὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως διαφωνίας. Matthæi has shown that nothing is more common in MSS. than the introduction of such names of prophets. I agree with Dr. Mill and Fritz, that there is every reason to think that the original reading was ἐν τῷ προφήτῃ, from which the other two arose—namely, from those who took upon themselves to supply, in two different ways, what seemed to them a deficiency, or an incorrect statement. The neglect of the formula citationis before the second passage occasioned the alteration; and ignorance as

3. 4. τίας αὐτῶν. ὁ Ἦν δὲ ὁ Ἰωάννης ἐνδεδυμένος τρίχας καμήλου, καὶ ζῶνην δερματίνην περὶ τὴν ὀσφύν αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἐσθίων ἀκρίδας to the usage of the sacred writers, the addition. Surenh. and Hoffm. bear united testimony to the omission of the formula, both in the Scriptural and the Rabbinical writers, and also that it was frequent for the Rabbins to join together several quotations from several parts of Scripture, introduced by a single formula. Origen, as cited in the Catena of Victor, confirms this view; remarking, that it is not uncommon for the sacred writers to bring together, occasionally epitomizing, different passages of the Prophets.

The ὅς just after is expunged by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, D, one cursive MS., some Latin copies, and Latin Fathers: but the vast preponderance of external authority is not balanced by internal evidence, but the reverse, since it was more likely to be left out by accident, or removed as superfluous in three copies, than to have been put in in all the rest (including all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and why? "From the Sept.," says Mr. Alf.; but comparatively few copies have it; consequently it was as likely to be thrown out, from those many which have it not. Add, too, the existence of the pronoun in the Heb. and all the other Versions, with the Chaldee Paraphrase; as also its being called for by the emphasis implied in the context, which emphasis has an augustness inexpressibly great, seeing that in this prophecy of the Messiah is contained an incontrovertible proof of the Divinity of the Messiah; as is acknowledged by Rabbi Kimchi. See Dr. Henderson in loc. Nor must I omit to observe, that the ὅς is called for by the φωνὴ βοῶντος in the next clause, which cannot dispense with the pronoun (εἰμὶ being understood) in order to make any construction.

With far more reason, because on far greater amount of authority, may we suppose the words ἐμπροσθέν σου not genuine; and yet I find them in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies. They were probably, though not certainly (see Fritz.), brought in from Matt. xi. 10, and Luke vii. 27. Their absence from the Pesch. Syr. is quite against their authenticity.

4. After Ἰωάννης, B, L, Δ, and 2 or 3 cursive MSS. add ὁ, which is adopted by Tisch. and Alf., but rejected by Scholz and Lachm.,—rightly; since the authority is very insufficient, espec. considering that it is not aided by internal evidence; for as to Mr. Alford's hypothesis to account for the corruption in all the copies, save half-a-dozen, it takes too much for granted. The truth of the matter seems to be, that the reading ὁ βαπτ. arose from an attempt on the part of Critics to get rid of some of the difficulty, which embarrasses this introduction to the Gospel; but in vain, for even thus no tolerable sense can be extracted from the words. Besides, the united testimony of all the ancient Versions against this reading goes far to condemn it.

— βάπτισμα μετανοίας] Genit. of source or occasion, q. d. 'a baptism issuing from previous repentance; and a rite binding its recipients to the subsequent purity of life, of which it was symbolical.' It was to be a 'death unto sin;' but it did not involve, as not having the gift of the Spirit, a 'new birth unto righteousness.'

Euthym., after Chrys. and others, remarks that John's baptism was one of repentance and reformation only; Χρίστας, that of remission of sins. And so, but more at large, Victor, Catena., who concludes with the weighty and original remark of some Father: Τὸ μὲν Ἰωάννου βάπτισμα διὰ μετανοίας ἐκάθηται εἰς ὑπερηφανίαν ἀγιασμοῦ· τὸ δὲ τοῦ Χριστοῦ διὰ χάριτος ἡγίαξεν ἐν τελείωσιν. It is strange that Origen, Contr. Cels. l. i. p. 35, Spenc., should represent John the Baptist as promising expiation to those who undertook his baptism; referring to a passage of Josephus in proof of his assertion. But Joseph., in the passage alluded to (Ant. xviii. 5, 2), says no such thing. His words, which are remarkable (though scarcely known to the best informed theologians), are these: Κτείνει γὰρ τούτων Ἡρώδης, ἀγαθὸν ἄνδρα, καὶ τοὺς Ἰουδαίους κελύοντα ἀρετὴν ἐπασκούντας, καὶ τῇ πρὸς ἀλλήλους δικαιοσύνῃ καὶ πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν εὐσεβείᾳ χρομένους, βαπτισμῷ συνίεναι· οὗτοι γὰρ καὶ τῇ βάπτισιν ἀποδεκτὴν αὐτῷ φανίσθαι, μὴ ἐπὶ τινῶν ἀμαρτιῶν παραιτήσει χρομένων, ἀλλ' ἐφ' ἀγνείᾳ τοῦ σώματος, ἅτε δὴ καὶ τῆς ψυχῆς δικαιοσύνῃ προεκκαθαρίστην. It is quite clear that the Jewish historian's notion of the real nature of John's baptism was very imperfect, and his information of the true cause of Herod's putting him to death very incorrect.

5. καὶ ἐξεπορεύετο—ἐν Ἰορδ.] There is here considerable variety of reading; though not such as calls for any alteration of Text. The reading ἐξεπορεύετο is supported by strong external authority, which I could confirm from the Lamb. and Mus. copies; but as the variation of number in a verb almost continually occurs when a noun of multitude is used, the thing becomes a matter of doubtful disputation. The Eastern Class. of MSS. usually has the plural; the Western the singular; but there are exceptions, and internal evidence would seem generally in favour of the former. Here, however, it may be thought that the singular (confirmed by all the ancient Versions of weight) came from the Evangelist. As respects the position of πάντες, that is a question not so easily settled. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., place it after Ἰορδ., with B, D, L, 4 cursives, and several Versions,—very insufficient authority, espec. since internal evidence is not in its favour. That πάντες should, as Mr. Alf. imagines, have been "removed after Ἰορδ., as not in Matt., and as seeming to assert too much, and then reinserted after Ἰβαπτ.," is taking too much for granted to be safely acquiesced in. That Revisers of a text did not unfrequently bring in a word from another Gospel, cannot be denied; but that they removed words because not in another Gospel, cannot, I think, be truly asserted. Instances of that sort are at least very rare. As to the position of the clause ὅτι αὐτοῦ, adopted by Tisch. and Alf. (though not by Lachm.), the authority for it is far too slender to justify its adoption. To suppose, with Mr. Alf., the position changed from Matt. in all the copies except three, involves the highest improbability. On the other hand, it was likely that a change of position should have been adopted in those three copies, espec. since in two of the three copies changes of position, after the will and pleasure of the Critical Revisers, are perpetually introduced.

6. One would rather have expected the matter contained in this verse to have come in after v. 4; and it may have had that position in the copy used by Just. M. C. Tryph. 88. p. 316, adduced by Anger, who assigns to it that place in his Harmonia. But to suppose so long a parenthesis would involve a harshness not less than that of the present position of the verse. Moreover, the use of the connexive δὲ, and the structure of the sentence, exclude the notion of its being parenthetical. The change of ἦν δὲ into καὶ ἦν by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, L, and 2 cursives, on the surmise that the change of particle was introduced from Matth., is very uncritical. I find not an atom of support for it in the Lamb. and Mus. copies. At Ἰωάν. I have introduced ὁ from most of the uncial, and about 30 cursive MSS.; to which add all the Lamb. copies except 2, and all the best of the Mus. ones; besides which, it was more likely to be left out than put in. Its use is quite agreeable to propriety.

7. κύψας λύσαι] The term λύσαι, as used of the ὑποδήματα, occurs alone in the passage of Luke; but Mark here throws in the addition κύψας, while Matth., for λύσαι, adopts βαστάσαι, — a term quite equivalent as regards the present purpose, inasmuch as the same servant who carried any one's sandals, would have the office of unbinding them. In κύψας there is an allusion (graphic, as in John viii. 7. 8, κύψας ἔγραψεν) to the posture in which the action was done. And, indeed, as the sandals were fastened to the foot by very complicated straps, they could not be loosed without some trouble.—Accordingly, this was esteemed a menial, nay, servile office; more so than carrying the shoes. So Lucian, Herod. v., ὁ δὲ τις, μάλᾳ δουλικῶς ἀφαιρεῖ τὸ σανδάλιον ἐκ τοῦ ποδός. Diog. Laert. vi. 44, πρὸς τὸν ὑπὸ τοῦ οἰκίτου ὑποδοῦμενον. Plut. Symp. vii. 8, 4, τοῖς τὰ ὑποδήματα κομίζουσι παιδαρίοις ('servants'). It is not correct to say, with Mr. Alford, that 'the unloosing of the sandals amounted to the same thing with the carrying of the sandals,' since the former was esteemed a more servile office, as we see, implying a troublesome act, and a stooping posture; as is plain from the above passage of Lucian. Accordingly, the expression in the present passage is stronger than that in Luke; and there is certainly in one, if not in both, an allusion to the dutiful attention of the disciple to the Master.

8. The particle μὲν is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, L, and 3 cursives; to which I add the Leicester MS., teste Jacks.—authority sicut der, but helped out by the concurrent testimony of all the ancient Versions, and by Origen, and confirmed by the fact, that Mark scarcely ever uses the particle μὲν. Accordingly, I have bracketed the word, which, as having place both in Matth. and Luke, was probably introduced. As respects the ἐν before ὕδατι and πνεύματι ἁγίῳ, cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., I cannot even bracket it, since the authority for it is only that of 3 or 4 MSS.; and Lachm. retains both, placing the latter in brackets. As to the former, Mr. Alford thinks the ἐν was introduced from the passage of Matth.; but it might, in so very few copies, have been excluded because not found in Luke, and for the purpose of improving the Grecism. As to the latter, the presence or absence must depend on the former; and as Luke uses the ἐν before πνεύματι both here and in Acts i. 5. xi. 16, I cannot think that Mark would omit it.

9. Lach. by bracketing the καὶ before ἐγένετο, on the sole authority of one MS., B, acts most uncritically, since it removes a characteristic Hebraism, such as is frequent in the Gospels, as also in the Sept. Suffice it to instance one example—Gen. xiv. 1, 2, ἐγένετο δὲ ἐν τῇ βασιλ.—βασιλεὺς Ἑλ. καὶ θ. βασ. ἰθὺν. ἐποίησαν πόλεμον, where we have the same omission of ὅτι, or of καὶ, which the Hebraism rather requires. The note of time here, like the τότε in the passage of Matth., may seem indefinite; but, from what precedes, it must be during the period of John's preaching, which we know was subsequent to his baptizing. And this is clearly expressed in Luke iii. 21, by ἐν τῷ βαπτισθῆναι ἀπαντα τὸν λαόν. It appears, then, to have been after all the people had been baptized, and John had begun to preach, that our Lord came and applied to John for baptism. The situation of this desert I have pointed out and described in my note on Matt. iii. 1. I have not adopted, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., the change of position at the end of the verse, because the authority for it, B, D, L, and 8 or 9 cursives, is insufficient (and I cannot find a single Lamb. or Mus. copy confirming it, except Scriv. γ), and internal evidence is against the change, considering that it was more likely that some dozen MSS. should be altered in position (such being perpetually the case in B, D, and L, and often from mere caprice), than that the whole number, with the exception of those dozen MSS., should have been altered, for no particular reason. The construction here, βαπτ. εἰς τὸν for ἐν τῷ, does not occur elsewhere, but is one formed on the sense to plunge or immerse into water, rather for the sake of bathing or washing, as in John ix. 7. Jos. Ant. iv. 4, 6. Plut. de Superst. It would seem to be a phrase of Provincial Greek. Comp. λούεσθαι εἰς τὸ βαλάνιον.

10. εὐθέως ἀναβ.] It is true that, as Mr. Alf. says, εὐθ. is a favourite connecting word with Mark; but the form which he almost always adopts is the ordinary one, εὐθείως, not the more Class. εὐθὺς, which, wherever it occurs, is, unless external authority for εὐθὺς be very strong, to be ascribed to the polishing school of the Alexandrian Critics. Here, however, to the 4 MSS. adduced, I must add a Cambr. MS. (Tr. Coll. x. 17, 4) collated by Mr. Scrivener. Be the form as it may, the word ought here to be construed with εἶδε, which must, as it has been by the best Commentators, be referred to our Lord—not, as it is by others, to John the Baptist: a construction this found also infra v. 36.

The ἀπὸ just after may have been derived from Matth., as also the ἐκ adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, D, L, and 8 other MSS.; but without stronger authority there is no proof that it was.

— σχιζομένου] Render, not 'opened,' but 'cleaved,' or 'cleft,' this being a term more forcible, and, as it were, graphic, than the ἀνεώχθησαν of Matth. and Luke. One term, however, is as faithfully descriptive as the other. We must not, notwithstanding, mix up, as Wets. and Elsn. have done, passages in which the term is applied to the cleaving of lightning, since, as even the semi-Rationalist Fritz. admits, 'hic cælum dehiscit, ut Divinus Spiritus, relicto Domicilio, ad Jesum desuper possit alabi.' Of σχιζ. the sense is, parted asunder. So Phlegon, p. 37, τοχίσθη ὁ οὐρανός, and so Latin dehiscit and discedo.

The ὥσει, for text. rec. ὥς, is founded on the strongest evidence external and internal. For ἐπ' αὐτόν, the reading εἰς αὐτόν adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, D, and a few cursive MSS. of the same class, may be the genuine reading; but proof is wanting that it is.

11. ἐν ᾧ εὐδ.] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read σοί, from B, D, L, and about 20 cursives of the same class, confirmed by several Versions. Alf. traces the text. rec. to Matth.; but σοί may quite as well have originated from Luke. Now, considering that internal evidence is equally balanced, external authority ought to determine the case, and that is decidedly in favour of ᾧ. As respects the important point of doctrine to be concluded from this passage, see note on Matt. iii. 17, and Bp. Taylor's Works, vol. ii. p. 181 [comp. infra ix. 7. Ps. ii. 7. Ia. xliii. 1. Matt. xvii. 5. 2 Pet. i. 17].

12. ἐκβάλλει] 'urges,' impels, as said of the powerful influence of the Holy Spirit. For εὐθὺς, A, D, K, and not a few cursives (to which I add almost all the Lamb. and many Mus. copies), have εὐθείως, which is adopted by Lachm., whom I have followed. See note supra v. 10.

13. καὶ ἦν μετὰ τῶν θηρ.] The air of the words points at the very spot of the temptation, which seems to have been in the wildest and most retired parts of the desert, and thus, to use the words of Virgil, 'in silvis, inter deserta ferarum Lustra, domosque.' Similarly Jos. Ant. xv. 10, 1, οὐτε πόλιν αὐτοῖς ὑπῆρχε, ὑποφυγαὶ δὲ κατὰ τῆς γῆς καὶ (delend. ausp.) σπηλαία [ὑπῆρχον] καὶ κοινὴ μετὰ τῶν βοσκομάτων διαίτα. The καὶ here is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, B, D, L, 6 cursives, with the Vulg., Ital., and other Versions, and Origen. Alf. regards it as a correction for ἐν τῇ ἐρ. But it needed no correction; and that such a correction should have been employed almost universally is incredible. There is the strongest authority, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Vers., for the word, which was, I doubt not, thrown out by Critics as involving a pleonasm; just as infra vi. 55, where καὶ is omitted in B, L, Δ, and others, and is cancelled by Lachm. The same so-called pleonasm occurs infra v. 11, ἦν δὲ καὶ πρὸς τῷ θραί, though it has there escaped the critical knife. Here, however, other Critics removed the pleonasm by putting out ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ, as appears from not a few ancient MSS. In several passages of the New Test. καὶ, where seemingly unnecessary, is omitted in some copies more or less. It is of very rare occurrence in the Class. writers, inasmuch that I only know one instance—Aristoph. Av. 758, Εἰ γὰρ ἐνθάδ' ἐστὶν αἰσχρὸν τὰν πατέρα τυπταῖν νόμον, Τοῦτ' ἐκαὶ καλόν, &c., where the omission of καὶ in some copies, and its change into καίτις in others, are only two critical alterations devised for the purpose of getting rid of what was deemed superfluous; though the seeming pleonasm involved, in reference to ἐνθάδε, is rather intensive.

14. τῆς βασιλ.] Cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, L, and some 6 cursives, with several Versions, and Origen; but the vast preponderance of external authority, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Vers., forbids this. And as to internal evidence, it was more likely to be removed by some Critics as superfluous (thus others removed τοῦ Θεοῦ) than to have been brought in, as Mr. Alf. supposes, from Matt. iv. 23. Indeed, there the τῆς βασιλ. is found, yet not τοῦ Θεοῦ.

15. πεπλήρωται] 'adest, κτθ.' Time is said πληροῦσθαι, partly when it is gone, and partly when any particular period approaches. So John vii. 8. Luke xxi. 24. Comp. Joseph. Ant. vi. 4. 1, ἐξεδίχματο τὸν καιρὸν γενέσθαι· πληρωθῆναι δὲ αὐτοῦ κ.τ.λ., and Acts vii. 23. 30.

The full sense of the phrase περιπ. ὁ καιρὸς is, that 'the time spoken of by the Prophets for the full completion of the period assigned to the Old Covenant and the introducing of the New, is now being proclaimed to the world in that last address of God by his Son, spoken of in Heb. i. 2,' or, in other words, that 'the time fixed in the counsels of God, and indicated in ancient prophecy, Dan. ix. 24—26, is now fully come,' and the spiritual kingdom of God, through the Messiah, is about to commence. See Gal. iv. 4. Eph. i. 10.

The καὶ before λίγων is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., on strong external authority; while by Lachm. it is retained;—very properly, since internal evidence is in its favour, from the greater likelihood of its having been put out by some Critics, than put in by others. The καὶ is absent from 4 of the Lamb. and most of the best Mus. MSS.

—μετανοεῖτε καὶ πιστεύετε] These words advert to the difference between John's preaching and that of our Lord; for, as observes Bp. Pearson, On the Creed, 'John had before called the Jews to repentance; Christ now calls them to the duty of faith, of which they had not before heard.' Thus πιστεύετε ἐν τ. εὐαγγ. means, 'Believe the glad tidings which are now brought to you of pardon and salvation by the Gospel.' 'In whichever way' (viz. to believe in or on), continues he, 'one may choose to explain the passage, the principle still remains fixed, that free salvation [gratuitous justification] is offered us by God, in order that we may live unto Him by turning unto righteousness.' 'Thus,' as Matthew Henry observes, 'we are taught that the two must go together; they will mutually assist each other. Repentance will quicken faith, and faith make repentance evangelical.'

16. For περιπατῶν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., read παράγων, from B, D, L, and 8 cursive MSS., with some Versions;—authority insufficient to warrant the adoption of the reading. Internal evidence is evenly balanced, considering that περιπ. may have been adopted by Revisers from the passage of Matth., and παράγ. may have been a mere alteration of Critics for the sake of introducing a more Classical term, and one which they thought more suitable in sense; but the former is the more probable. Besides, though παράγ. is a pure Classical term, yet it occurs both in the Sept. and the New Test., as infra ii. 14. xv. 21. John ix. 1. Mark xi. 21. The authority, indeed, of the Pesch. Syr. Vers. might seem strongly in favour of περιπατῶν, yet the Partic. Past will not decidedly prove that the Transl. had περιπατῶν in his copy. He has, at Matt. xii. 1, used the same word in the sense going along; and so he might here mean to do, and have thus given a free version of παράγων, of which, perhaps, he did not distinctly perceive the exact force. At any rate, that was probably the case with the Biblical Revisers, who therefore readily adopted the easier term περιπατῶν.

For text. rec. αὐτοῦ, I have now, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., received Σίμωνος, from strong external authority (including nearly all the Lamb. and most of the ancient Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence. I have also, on grounds quite as strong, received the ἀμφι. We may suppose βάλλ. to have been introduced from the parallel passage of Matthew, where the term was quite suitable, because the construction is there very different from the present, inasmuch that, in the common text, we have a commixture of the two. Strong is the external authority, including 3 Lamb. and 4 ancient Mus. copies, for ἀμφιβάλλ., which is also confirmed by internal evidence, as consisting in the circumstance of the term being extremely rare, and therefore not likely to have been brought in from the carelessness of scribes. Moreover, rare as it is, it has good authority, being found, also as a piscatory term, in the Sept. Vers. of Habak. i. 17, διὰ τοῦτο ἀμφιβαλεῖ τὸ ἀμφίβλητρον αὐτοῦ, where ἀμφιβ. well expresses the general sense,—that of 'casting and moving about.' That the expression was derived from the use of the term de re piscatoria, we may infer from Soph. Antig. 343, φύλον ὀρνίθων ἀμφιβαλὼν ἄγχι, for terms of fishing and bird-catching have often the same figures in common; and accordingly, ἀμφιβ. in that passage signifies 'having caught by the use of the net.' Thus the sense here intended is, 'casting a net around so as to enclose the fishes.' There would seem a touch of the graphic, such as is found in Hesiod, Scut. H. 213, 15, αὐτὰρ ἐπ' ἀκταῖς ἦστο ἀνὴρ ἀλιεὺς δεδοκίμενος· εἶχε (I conj. ἶσχε, standing for κατεῖχε) χερσὶν ἰχθύσιν ἀμφίβλητρον ('held in his hands a casting-net for the fishes') ἀπορρίποντι ἰοικώς ('like one about to cast out'). The above passages of Habak. and Hesiod will fully defend and illustrate the word ἀμφίβλητρον, here cancelled by Tisch. and Alf. (not, however, Lachm.), on the authority of only three MSS. against all the rest, confirmed by all the ancient Versions. Mr. Alf. takes for granted that the word was introduced from the passage of Matth.; which it might in a few MSS., but not in all except three. It might be omitted in those few by accident, though more prob. removed by the fastidiousness of half-learned Critics.

by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on the authority of B, C, L, and 10 cursives; though internal evidence confirms the vastly preponderating external authority, supported by the Pesch. Syr. Vers., inasmuch as it was far more likely to be put out by the Critics, than put in by the scribes.

20. μετὰ τῶν μισθωτῶν.] This circumstance is thrown in by the Evangelist, not so much to show the respectability of station of Zebedee and his sons, as to intimate that in obeying our Lord they did not leave their father without help to carry on his business.

21. εὐθέως τοῖς σάββασιν—synag.] From a comparison of what is here said with that at Luke iv. 32, it is plain that their entry into Capernaum was the day before the Sabbath; so that the Sabbath here mentioned must be not only the next Sabbath, but the day after their arrival. Though it cannot be said that there is here an allusion to our Lord's custom of attending at the Synagogue each Sabbath, as recorded in Luke v. 16, yet there is something in the air of the words that seems to glance at it.

Tisch. and Alf. cancel εἰσελθὼν, from C, L, Δ, and 4 cursive MSS.; while Lachm. retains the text. rec.—very properly, since the authority for the change is quite inadequate, espec. considering that internal evidence is against it; for as to supposing, with Mr. Alf., that the reading “arose from the construction giving offence,” that is taking for granted what cannot be proved, and is exceedingly improbable to have taken place universally. Besides, it should be proved that the construction διδ. εἰς ever existed. Far more probable is it that the Critics took offence at the homeliness of the composition, and gave a more compact mode of expression. As to Versions, they are not, in a case like this, of any great weight.

22. Comp. vii. 28, 29, and see note.

23. καὶ ἦν ἐν τῇ συναγ.] Tisch. and Alf. insert εὐθέως between καὶ and ἦν, from B, L, and a few cursive MSS. But there is no place here for the word, and I doubt not that it crept into the text from the margin, where it was meant to indicate a var. lect. on εὐθέως at v. 21; and no wonder, since, though εὐθέως occurs in Mark's Gospel nearly fifty times, it hardly happens once but that some MS. or other (sometimes several) has εὐθεύς. Lachm. prudently rejects the word. And he evinces the same good judgment at v. 24, by not receiving the οἰδαμεν of MS. L, Δ, some early Fathers, and late Versions; which reading has been caught up by Tisch. and Alf., though a manifest alteration introduced for the purpose of suiting the plur. ἡμῖν and ἡμᾶς just before; and that for want of its being borne in mind that in the use of the plural reference is had to those fellow-demons who were supposed to be ever in readiness to join this or that demon,—(see Matt. xii. 45, and Luke xi. 26.)—though at οἶδα he, as being the principal and spokesman of the rest, uses the singular.

—ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῳ.] This peculiar phrase, which recurs infra v. 2, is not, as some suppose it, formed on Hebrewism; nor is there, as others imagine, a use here of ἐν for σύν. It is no other than a brief expression—probably of common life—in which there may be an ellipsis. of ἐνεχόμενος, suggested by the prep. ἐν; and the expression held bound by a demon is one in frequent use to denote the being possessed by that demon. Persons so possessed were called κάτοχοι, i. e. κατεχόμενοι ὑπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος. The man here spoken of must have had lucid intervals, otherwise he would not have been admitted to the Synagogue. His disorder seems to have been epilepsy, brought on by demoniacal agency.

24. ἔα] An interjection, thought to be derived from the imper. of ἰδῶ, ‘let alone;’ but rather a natural exclamation, like the Latin va! and English ‘ha!’ of surprise or displeasure; espec. before a question, as here. And so in the Class. writers, as Æsch. Prom. 298, ἔα, τί χρῆμα; et al., and often in the Gr. dramatists; sometimes, though rarely, in the prose writers, as Arrian Epict., who has ἔα, ἀνθρώπε, ἐπὶ τί ἰλήλυθας; The true force of the expression here seems to be the same as in the passages of Æsch. and Arrian above adduced. Yet so little was the idiom understood, that the ancient Translators passed the word over as unintelligible; and the ancient Critics made short work by expunging it. Thus the word is omitted in B, D, and 2 cursive MSS. And the Critical Editors of our own times, altogether unaware of what had occasioned the removal of the word, have cancelled it. Mr. Alf. recurs to the usual device, which cuts off inquiry, pronouncing it to be from Luke; but in the passage of Luke the same MS., D, omits it, twice the number of cursives, and the same Versions.

—ἤλθες ἀπολέσαι ἡμᾶς.] Expositors are not agreed whether this clause should be taken interrogatively or declaratively. The recent Editors

οὐδὰ σε τίς εἶ, ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ. ²⁵ Καὶ ἐπετίμησεν αὐτῷ ὁ Ἰησοῦς, λέγων· Φιμώθητι, καὶ ἐξέλθε ἐξ αὐτοῦ. ²⁶ Καὶ σπαράξαν αὐτὸν τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἀκάθαρτον, καὶ κράξαν φωνῇ μεγάλῃ, ἐξῆλθεν ἐξ αὐτοῦ. ²⁷ Καὶ ἐθαμβήθησαν πάντες, ὥστε συζητεῖν πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς λέγοντας· Τί ἐστὶ τοῦτο; τίς ἡ διδαχὴ ἡ καινὴ

generally prefer the latter mode. But there is more point and spirit, and perhaps more propriety, in the former. By ἀπολίσαι is not meant (as most Commentators imagine) βασανίσαι (though the term in this connexion is used by Matthew), but rather, as Euthym. explains (in a popular sense), 'to destroy our power,' by expelling us from earth; so βασανίσαι expresses the final end of them, namely, the being consigned to hell torments.

For οὐδὰ, Tisch. and Alf. read οὐδαμν, from L, Δ, 2 late Versions, and some Fathers; while Lachm. retains text. rec. οὐδὰ—very properly, since internal evidence, as well as external authority, is in its favour; and surely the more difficult reading, as this is,—espec. when found in all the copies but two,—is to be preferred.

—ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ] A designation occurring also at Luke iv. 34, and John vi. 69, of Christ, the Son of God ('whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world,' John x. 36), and derived from those passages of the Old Test. where Christ is foretold under the title of 'the Holy One' (sometimes it is one appropriated to God the Father), as Ps. xvi. 10. Dan. ix. 24. Comp. Acts ii. 27. iii. 14. The addition of Θεοῦ denotes origin; the Messiah being the only-begotten Son of the Father, equal with the Father. See Euthym.

26. σπαράξαν] Σπαράσσειν signifies prop. to tear and rend; but here and infra ix. 20. 26, and also Luke ix. 39, and sometimes in Sept., to throw into convulsions and spasms, such as accompany epilepsy, and which are sometimes called σπαραγμοί, though usually σπασμοί, by the Greek Medical writers. In the parallel passage of Luke the expression is, ῥίψαν αὐτὸν εἰς μίσην, alluding to the effect of such convulsions, the being prostrated on the ground, with violent agitation of the limbs. See a passage of Aræteus cited in my Rec. Syn. Mr. Alf. dexterously places in juxta-position the σπαράξαν of Matth. and the μυδίν βλάναν of Luke, in order to indicate a manifest discrepancy; but had he been a little more attentive, and much more candid, he would have perceived that the expression,—which is not to be pressed on, but taken popularly,—is only to be understood of ἐξῆλθεν, meaning that the demon did him no injury at his exit, which might have been expected from the malevolence of the spirit, but was prevented from doing this by the spirit, at least, of our Lord's injunction, ἐξέλθε.

For κράξαν, Tisch. and Alf. read φωνῆσαν, from B, L, and 1 cursive MS., together with Origen; while Lachm. retains κρ.; and very properly, for though Mr. Alf. regards κρ. as a correction to the more usual word, yet he might have said to a highly suitable term, instead of one unprecedented in that sense; and although the phrase φωνήσας φωνῇ μεγ. occurs in Luke xiii. 46, and Acts xvi. 28, yet it is only as used of articulate sounds, and as followed by λέγων, or εἰπών. In fact, φων. is more used of uttering an articulate outcry, or, as here, screech; and one cannot imagine that the Evangelist would use such a term, so utterly inadequate, as ἐφών. Whereas the Critics, it seems, were not so scrupulous, and stumbling, we may suppose, at the Dative of kindred varying from the verb, and forgetting such passages as Rev. xiv. 18, ἐφώνησε κραυγῇ μεγάλῃ (there, however, altered by the same class of ancient and modern Critics to ἐφώνησε φωνῇ), chose to remove the anomaly by altering κράξαν to φωνῆσαν.

27. For πάντες, Tisch. and Alf. read ἅπαντες, from B, L, U, and 2 cursives; and Alf. remarks "from Luke." But it is there ἐπὶ πάντας, and that an alteration in so very minute a case should have been introduced into all the copies except 4, is incredible. On the other hand, it may very well be supposed that the α arose, as in very many other cases, from the preceding αν,—a circumstance which would, as it has often elsewhere, occasioned the interchange of the two words by the scribe. See Luke v. 11. vii. 16. xvii. 29. xix. 7. xxi. 4, bis. xxi. 12. Acts vi. 15. xiii. 29. xxv. 24. Gal. iii. 28. 'Εαυτοὺς just after for αὐτοὺς, edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., may be the true reading. I find it in all the Lamb. and the most ancient of the Mus. MSS. Yet the α may have sprung from the σ preceding.

—τίς ἡ διδαχὴ—ἐξουσίαν] Remarkable is the variety of readings existing in this passage;—a variety usually arguing some deep-seated corruption. And, in fact, Griesb., after an able disquisition, comes to the conclusion, that the passage came into the state it now is by two equivalent modes of expression being blended into one; and he would cancel τί ἐστὶ τοῦτο; while other Critics, as Eichhorn, Paulus, and Kuin., resort to other modes even of conjectural emendation, to relieve the sentence of its seeming redundancy. The question is, whether there really is any superabundance of wording? Griesb. maintains, indeed, that Mark might have written either τί ἐστὶ τοῦτο; or τίς ἡ διδαχὴ ἡ καινὴ αὕτη; but not both. Yet, as Fritz. remarks, neither Griesb. nor any one else ever scrupled at such a passage as Mark vi. 2, πῶθεν τοῦτω ταῦτα; καὶ τίς ἡ σοφία ἡ δοθεῖσα αὐτῷ; and xi. 28, ἐν ποῖα ταῦτα ποιεῖς; καὶ τίς σοι τὴν ἐξουσίαν ταύτην ἰδῶκαν; all bearing more or less affinity to this of Mark. Moreover, the mark of interrogation is partly a mark of exclamation, as may be argued from the term θαμβεῖσθαι just before, and the θάμβος in the parallel passage of St. Luke, terms denoting a mixture of amazement and awe (even religious awe), as in Plut. Per. 6, δεισιδαιμονία—πρὸς τὰ μετέωρα (i. e. 'natural phenomena of the heavens') θάμβος ἐξεργάζεται. This is confirmed by the parallel passage above alluded to of Luke iv. 36, τίς ὁ λόγος οὗτος; of which words the sense is unquestionably that laid down by Fritz., 'ecquis (i. e. quam potens) est sermo hic?' lit. 'what sort of a word,' or 'address, is this?' The expression in Mark. τί ἐστι τοῦτο; is quite distinct from the τίς ὁ λόγος of Luke. Euthym. well remarks, that they styled the doctrine, that of Christ, new, as quite differing from that of the Scribes, or even of John the Baptist; for they only taught, but Christ, in addition, cast out demons by authority. From what has been said, it cannot but be plain, that both Lachmann's mode of editing the passage—διδάχῃ καινῇ κατ' ἐξουσίαν καὶ—and Tischendorf's and Alford's, διδάχῃ καινῇ κατ' ἐξουσίαν καὶ —are alike inadmissible, both as resting on very slender authority, and as yielding a forced, and, at the same time, a jejune sense, any thing but characteristic of this Evangelist. It would seem, that the designation ἡ καινὴ αὕτη διδάχῃ was, even at that early period, applied to the doctrine of the Gospel; though only by those who were ill-affected to it. We find it recurring in Acts xvii. 19, as applied by the Athenian Philosophers.

On the whole, there seems no good reason to abandon the text. rec., which is found in all the MSS. (including the Lamb. and Mus. copies), except comparatively a few, and confirmed, too, by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions. I have pointed as I now have, because it seems most in accordance with the air of the context, and is confirmed by the parallel passage of Luke. Mr. Alf., indeed, maintains that Mark's text has been 'variously conformed to Luke's:' but the phenomena of the variations do not prove his position; nay, the distinctive character of each, as I have edited, when compared together, tends to disprove this hypothesis; which, indeed, involves a great improbability, by supposing all the copies, except four, to have been thus tampered with. Finally, the reading which I support, and the punctuation which I adopt, are confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version. Accordingly, the general sense may be thus expressed: 'What new and extraordinary doctrine must this be, that the promulgator of it speaks with authority from on high, even to the unclean spirits, and they obey him!' Ἐν ἐξουσίᾳ is a forcible form of expression, including, by a certain pregnancy of sense, both authority and power, ἐν ἐξουσίᾳ (says Euthym.) διὰ τὸ προστάσσειν, ἐν δυνάμει διὰ τὸ ἀνέμειν. Of course, the source of both must be understood, both here and supra v. 22, to be God himself.

28. Ἐξῆλθε δέ] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read καὶ ἐξῆλθε, from 5 uncial and a few cursives, confirmed by the Syr. Vers., and by internal evidence, considering that this commencing of a sentence with καὶ is quite in the manner of Mark. The expression τὴν περίχωρον τῆς Γαλιλ. might of itself denote, as Fritz. and others think, the country circumjacent to Galilee: but taken in conjunction with the passage of Luke, it cannot but mean (and that it may mean, is plain from infra vi. 85. Matt. xiv. 35. Luke iii. 3. iv. 37) the surrounding country of Galilee,—that part of it circumjacent to Capernaum, embracing, it would seem, Upper Galilee generally.

29. For ἐξελθόντες ἦλθον, Lachm. and Tisch. (1 Ed.) read ἐξελθὼν ἦλθεν, from B, D, and several cursive MSS., and the Arab., Pers., Æthiop., and Italic Versions, as also Euthym. and Theophyl. But in his second Ed. Tisch. restores the text. rec.; very properly, since the external authority for it is vastly superior, and is confirmed by the Syr. and by the Vulg. Versions, as also by internal evidence, considering that it is plain that the reading arose from the parallel passages of Matth. and Luke.

30. κατέκειτο] Κατακλιθεῖς, like the Latin jacere, is a term appropriate to one who is confinèd to his bed by sickness (βεβλημῆν, Matth.); and though generally used absolutely, is sometimes, as here, followed by a participle of some verb denoting sickness; either a general term, as νοσῶν and ἀσθενῶν, or a particular one, as here. Ἦγειρεν κρατήσας τ. χ. must be considered in the same light as the ἤψατο τῆς χειρὸς αὐτῆς—namely, as an instance of Christ accompanying his words ('Be thou healed,' or the like) by a corresponding action; either simply touching the hand, or raising the person from his couch, as symbolical of recovery. Inasmuch that ἐγείρω sometimes, as v. 31, by implication, denotes to heal.

31. The αὐτῆς after χειρὸς is cancelled by Tisch., from MSS. B, L, but retained by Lachm.;—very properly. We may suppose it to have been expunged by fastidious Critics of style.

32. ὅτε ἔδω ὁ ἥλιος] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἔδωκε, from B, D, and 1 cursive MS.; and Alf. regards ἔδω as a correction of ἔδωκε, but wholly without proof. The state of the evidence shows that the correction lies in the other quarter. The Critics supposed the sense to be, 'when the sun had set,' and here introduced ἔδωκεν, just as at the parallel passage of Luke iv. 40, D has ἔσταντος; others, ἔσταντος, and Orig. ἔσταντος. But, besides the utter deficiency of good evidence for ἔδωκεν, the form is very rare in the Class. writers, and almost confined to poetry; it occurs only once in the Sept., and, I think, never in Joseph., where ἔδω is said of the setting of the sun, and occurs several times in the Sept., and occasionally, though not frequently, in the Class. writers. There is not a particle of evidence for the use of the Aorist ἔδυσσε as Pluperf. In short, this is one of the innumerable false corrections in MSS. B and D; though, if admitted, it would overtask the ingenuity even of a Meyer to extract any real discrepancy between what is here said and the parallel passage of Luke. Otherwise, indeed, why should the same class of Critics have pursued the same operation of correcting there?

The people waited, then, till sunset (lit. 'when the sun was dipping the horizon')—which was the end of the Sabbath—before they would bring their sick; since even to seek medical assistance in the day, unless in extreme danger, was deemed a breach of the Sabbath.

34. πολλοῖς] Matth. says, πάντας. But the one term is not inconsistent with the other. Jesus healed many, even all who were brought to him. [Comp. Acts xvi. 17, 18.]

—οὐκ ἤφιε—αὐτόν] scil. τὸν Χριστὸν εἶναι, as is expressed in very many MSS. and in Luke iv. 41. The sense, as appears from both Evangelists, is, 'He would not suffer them to speak, because they knew, and would address him as Messiah;' a title to which our Lord as yet made no public claim, lest he should excite tumult among the people.

35. ἔννυχον] An adverb formed from the accus. neut. of the adj. ἔννυχος, nocturnus (like μεσονυκτιον in Theocr. Id. xxiv. 11). It occurs also in 3 Macc. v. 5, and, though very rarely, in the later Greek writers. I find no authority for the reading ἔννυχα, which has place in 4 uncial and a few cursive MSS., adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. The ον was prob., as is often the case, mistaken by the scribes for α. However, I find ἔννυχα in Lamb. 1188 (an ancient Lectionary), and it has place in Scriv. y, also a Lectionary, and copied from a MS. of great antiquity.

36. κατεδίωξαν αὐτόν] lit. 'followed him up closely,' 'went in eager quest of him, out of ardent desire.' Cf. Hos. ii. 7. The word not unfreq. occurs in the Sept., but not in the Class. writers. Grieb., Matthæi, Fritz., Scholz, Lach., and Alf. read σε ζητοῦσιν, on strong external authority (not, however, so strong as that for ζητ. σε), but against internal evidence. The correction, if it deserves the name, evidently came from the polishing school.

38. κωμοπόλεις] Κωμ. is a rare term, occurring elsewhere only in Strabo, Ptolemy, Ma-

lela, and Isid., denoting something between a city and a village,—namely, an unwalled country-town, such as those mentioned in Thucyd. i. 5, 1, as ἀτείχιστοι καὶ κατὰ κώμας οἰκούμεναι; such, in fact, as we may infer from Jos. B. J. iii. 3, 2, where in his description of Galilee, after noticing the amazing fertility of the province, he adds that there were πόλεις πυκνὰι, καὶ τὸ (delend. suspicor) τῶν κωμῶν πληθὺς πανταχοῦ πολυάνθρωπον (conj. -ων) διὰ τὴν εὐθηνίαν ('abundance of food') ὡς τὴν ἱλαχίστην ὑπὲρ παντακισχιλίου πρὸς τοῖς μυρίοις ἔχειν οὐκίτορας, where what is last said must refer to the cities, not the κωμαί,—and, in fact, the words καὶ τῶν κωμ. εὐθην. form a semi-parenthetical clause. The emendations I propose must have been in the copy used by Ruffinus in the fifth century. But the question is, to which of those two classes are we to refer the κωμοπόλεις of St. Mark? I have no doubt that it is to be referred to the cities; and that the population was meant to comprehend that of the dependent villages. Some of these, in the interior of the country, were κατὰ κώμας οἰκούμεναι, and I doubt not are what Mark so accurately terms κωμοπόλεις; and although Luke writes πόλεις, yet Josephus elsewhere testifies that in these were in Judea κωμαὶ πόλιναι μίγεσθαι οὐκ ἀποδίουσαι. The reading ἐξῆλθον for ἐξηλήνθα, adopted by Tisch. and Alf., from B, C, L, and 1 cursive MS., is very specious, as being somewhat confirmed by John xvi. 27, 28, παρὰ τοῦ Πατρὸς ἐξῆλθον. Ἐξῆλ. παρὰ τοῦ Πατρὸς—καὶ πορεύομαι πρὸς τὸν Πατέρα, but the authority of all the MSS. except four, confirmed by all the Versions, is irresistible, espec. since we may well imagine ἐξῆλθον to be a false correction suggested by the passage of John, and meant to match with the term used in Luke, ἀπίσταλμαι, 'I was sent,' as the Pesch. Syr. expresses the sense. Thus there is no real discrepancy between Mark and Luke, since in the former the mission from God is implied, in the latter expressed.

After ἀγωμεν Tisch. and Alf. insert ἀλλαχού, from B, C, L, and 1 cursive MS., with 3 late Versions; while Lachm. rejects it,—very properly; since to suppose it, as does Mr. Alf., removed because superfluous and not found in Luke, is most improbable; for the persons Mr. Alf. has in view, though they often introduce a reading from a parallel Gospel, yet they very rarely remove a reading because not found in another Gospel; and, as to removing what might seem superfluous, that they never thought of doing, leaving this to that class of slashing Critics, whose system, but partially developed in early times, has been fully carried out by their admirers and imitators of the present day.

39. ἐν ταῖς συναγ.] The reading εἰς τὰς συναγωγὰς, adopted by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from some 25 MSS.—to which I add 2 Lamb. copies, 2 Mus. ones, and a Cambridge MS. (Tr. Coll. B. 10. 16) lately collated by Mr. Scrivener—has internal evidence in its favour; but it needs further evidence to warrant its adoption. If it be adopted, the sense must be—notwithstanding Mr. Alford's velo—‘at their synagogue,’ equiv. to the ἐν ταῖς συναγωγαῖς at Luke; though even there Tisch. and Alf. introduce, from 3 uncial and 8 cursive copies, this same intolerably harsh construction; and yet there I find less support for it than here; indeed I feel sure that such “unlicensed Greek” never came from St. Luke. Lachm., I find, prudently retains ἐν ταῖς συναγ. Finally, to suppose it to have the same sense as in a passage of Thucyd. v. 45, cannot be thought of, since ‘to preach unto their synagogues’ would make absolute nonsense.

41. ἥψατο αὐτοῦ] Tisch. and Alf. edit αὐτοῦ ἥψ., from B, L, and several curs.; and Alf. regards the text. rec. as “an alteration from Matthew and Luke to avoid ambiguity;”—as if it were probable that such an alteration could come into all the MSS. except three. The truth is, that this is one of the innumerable alterations of the Framers of the text of B, introduced for the purpose of presenting what they deemed a more dignified position.

43. ἐμβριμησάμενος αὐτῷ] See note on Matt. ix. 30.

— εὐθὺς ἐξῆλθ. αὐτόν] ‘despatched him forthwith,’ i. e. hurried him off without delay, doubtless that he might reach Jerusalem, and show himself to the priests, and present the usual offering on being cleansed, before they should get knowledge of it, and plot some stratagem to hinder the effect of the miracle on the people. The words of Mark, when interposed with those of Matthew and Luke, serve to attest our Lord's extreme earnestness, viz. that the leper might tell no man of his cure, but show himself as speedily as possible to the officiating priests.

45. ἤρξατο κηρύσσειν—τόν λόγον] ‘et about proclaiming and publishing abroad the report of the thing done.’ Κηρ. is so used infra v. 20, and so in Eurip. Cress. frag. vi. 3. μή πᾶσι κηρύσσειν τάδε. Luke v. 15, contains the immediate effect of this κηρύξις,—namely, διήρχετο δὲ μᾶλλον ὁ λόγος περὶ αὐτοῦ, and in what is here said, ὥστε μηκέτι αὐτόν δύνασθαι φανερώς εἰς πόλιν εἰσελθεῖν, we have the ultimate result.

— ἤρχοντο πρὸς αὐτόν] The purpose of this is expressed in Luke, ἀκούειν καὶ θερ.—αὐτόν. Πανταχόθεν, found in 8 uncial and 19 cursive MSS. (to which I add 3 Lamb. and 4 Mus. copies), is probably, though not certainly, the true reading.

II. 1. εἰσῆλθε πάλιν] So, for πάλιν εἰς, all the Editors from Matthæi downwards, on strong evidence, external and internal. Having gone from Capernaum (supra i. 21), our Lord had visited various parts of Galilee, and preached in the synagogues, and was now returned to that city.

— εἰς οἶκον] ‘at home,’ in opposition to from home (see note infra vii. 17), as he had been until now; whether at Peter's house, or not, does not appear. The text of Lachm., ἐν οἴκῳ, is a manifest gloss.

2. μηδὲ τὰ πρὸς τ. θ.] The full sense is, that not even the vestibule had room to hold more of those who resorted to him from various parts, many from a distance, even from Judæa (see Luke v. 17); some, as the Pharisees and Lawyers, out of curiosity, and to watch his words; others, again, in order to be healed of various diseases. The words here, ἐλάλει αὐτοῖς τὸν λόγον, may be understood of those who came to him for instruction; though not to the exclusion of those who came to him to be healed, since the time when he healed many of their maladies, was recent.

3. παραλυτικὸν φέροντες—τεσσάρων] We are not to understand that the patient was carried aloft. i. e. above the press, by four persons, one at each limb, which would have been inconvenient to him, and, under the circumstances, scarcely possible; but carried along lying on a couch borne aloft by four persons.

4. ἀπεστέγασαν τὴν στέγην, &c.] In the interpretation of this passage there are some difficulties, which have appeared to many Commentators so formidable, that they have endeavoured to remove them by resorting to various methods, almost all of them at variance with the meaning of the terms ἀπεστέγασαν, στέγην, and ἐξορύξαντες. The interpretation of Lightfoot, Whitby, Kuin., and Winer, is the least liable to objection, which supposes that the bearers brought the paralytic to the flat roof of the house by the stairs on the outside, or along the top, from an adjoining house, and then forced open the trap-door which led downwards to the πτερύρον. But this forcing open the trap-door rests on mere supposition, without any support from the context; nay (as Fritz remarks), the words ἀπεστέγασαν τὴν στέγην ὅπου ἦν can only mean that the bearers tore off the tiles in the very place under which they knew Jesus to be. We may suppose that, not able to approach Jesus in the room where he was (probably an upper room), they ascended to the flat roof by the outer stairs, and having uncovered the roofing (whether tiles or thatch), removed the rafters, and dug through the lath-and-plaster floor at or about the place where they understood our Lord to be, they let the couch with the paralytic person on it down through the opening. No other method could have effectually attained the object,—namely, of bringing the couch to Jesus without having to pass through the crowd.

— ἐξορ. has here a significatio pragnans, i. e. digging through and scooping out. So Joseph. Ant. xiv. 15, 12, καὶ τοὺς ὀρόφους τῶν οἴκων ἀνασκάπτων, 'digging up, and removing.'

— χαλῶσι] So Acts ix. 25, χαλᾶσαντες αὐτὸν ἐν σπυρίδι, and xxvii. 17. 2 Cor. xi. 33. Not found in the Class. writers, who would have used κατασχ. or καθυμᾶσι, as in Aristoph. Vesp. 379 and 396. The ὅπου adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., instead of ἐφ' ᾧ, from B, D, L, is a manifest παραιδιόρθωσις, though one which by altering 'obscurum per obscurius' puts out the slender light we had,—in fact, makes a faint sense to become nonsense. The obscurity in question chiefly arises from extreme brevity, some words denoting end of action being left to be supplied, q. d. 'where Jesus was,' in fact ὅπου ἦν, which, being said just before, could not well be here repeated; and consequently, it would seem, was intended to be supplied mentally. There is no little awkwardness in the wording at ὁ παραλ. κατέκειτο, which would be removed if we could feel warranted in adopting the reading of the MS. B, ἦν ὁ παρ. κατακείμενος; but internal evidence is quite against it. Accordingly, we may suppose ἐφ' ᾧ ὁ παραλ. κατέκειτο to be an imperfect mode of expressing that sense; and even then ὅπου ἦν, scil. ὁ Ἰησ., has to be supplied. The passage of Luke removes all obscurity, and expresses how the thing was done very clearly by καθῆκαν αὐτὸν σὺν τῷ κλινιδίῳ εἰς τὸ μέσον ἔμπροσθεν τοῦ Ἰησοῦ. That there was something not a little laborious in the operation in question, is plain from the marked attention (recorded by all three Evangelists) excited by that strong faith in our Lord's power to heal the sick, which could alone have prompted so difficult and almost impracticable a mode of accomplishing the purpose in view. I have, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., received κράβαττον, on very strong authority (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence.

5. σοι] Griesb., Fritz., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit σου, omitting the σου following, from some MSS., confirmed, as they think, by ver. 9. But those MSS. are too few, 5 uncial and 10 cursive, to have much weight; and ver. 9 can have none; for supposing σου there to be the true reading, yet what is so likely as that when a formula, such as ἀφίενταί σοι αἱ ἁμαρτίαι σου, is not employed directly, but put hypothetically, that it should be shortened?

7. For λαλεῖ βλασφημίας, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read, from B, D, L, and the Ital. and Vulg. Vera. λαλεῖ; βλασφημεῖ. But the authority for this reading is next to nothing compared with all the other MSS., confirmed by all the Versions except the Vulg. Moreover, internal evidence is against the reading, from its being evidently one of two modes pursued by the Critics to introduce a mode of expression more familiar: these Correctors, it seems, not reflecting that the context requires a strong mode of expression, such as, 'How doth that man dare to so speak blasphemy!' plur. for a high degree of the singular, as in Rev. xiii. 5. 1 Tim. vi. 4. The other mode to which I have alluded was the removing of οὕτως, which greatly enervates the sense. The reading could not come, as Mr. Alf. thinks, from the passage of Luke, because a Reviser would have taken more than simply the term, and not have left the wording more difficult than that in Luke. Besides, there is something so far-fetched and jejune—so different from the characteristic simplicity of style of the present Evangelist—in this petty affectation of δυνάτης, as betrays the hand of a shallow Critic.

— εἰ μὴ εἰς ὁ Θεός] Some point εἰ μὴ εἰς ὁ Θεός, in the sense, 'but one—that is God.' And they adduce as examples Matt. xix. 17, and Mark x. 18. But even in those passages, where see my note, εἰς ὁ Θεός may be the true pointing. And such is here required by the parallel passage of Luke. [Comp. Job xiv. 4. Is. xliii. 25.]

8. εὐθὺς] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. adopt the reading εὐθὺς, from MSS. D, L, and others. The same variety constantly occurs in St. Mark's Gospel, and is almost always confined to a very few MSS., B, D, L, or B, L, and sometimes 2 or 3 of the small-letter MSS. Lachm. sometimes adopts, and sometimes rejects, the εὐθὺς, which involves manifest inconsistency, for want of going by some principle. Now this use of εὐθὺς as an adverb is frequent in the Class. writers, but is I think very rarely found in St. Mark and St. John; and never, I believe, in St. Luke (for as to two passages of that Evangelist, vi. 49, and Acts x. 16, see my notes there); nor is it ever found in the Epistles of St. Paul, St. Peter, and St. James. Nevertheless, the above MSS. introduce it about forty times where it has no place in any of the rest of the MSS. And, considering the quarter from which this peculiar reading proceeds, I can scarcely doubt it was an emendation of style introduced by the Alexandrian Critics, and so sweeping in its operation that they have absolutely excluded εὐθὺς from the text of St. Mark; for as to two passages, ii. 2, and xiv. 72, they have there cancelled the word. There are not wanting traces of this alteration in St. Matthew. See xiv. 27. xxi. 2 and 3. xxvi. 74. As to St. Mark, it is not clear to me that he ever used the form εὐθὺς; for in i. 12, Lachm. himself, I find, reads εὐθὺς, from some of the most ancient MSS. Again at i. 23 and 28, the word is bracketed by Lachm.; and at vii. 25, it has place only in those very MSS. that introduce the former. All the rest of the MSS. have neither εὐθὺς nor εὐθὺς—very properly.

— ἐπιγνοὺς—τῷ πνεύματι αὐτοῦ] The expression here employed is a more definite, and a stronger one than (though of the same kind as) ἰδὼν, supra v. 5, which denotes the existence of an inherent spiritual power to know what is in man; whereas this denotes the having and the possessing a full and complete knowledge of. The addition of τῷ πνεύματι αὐτοῦ makes it more definite: and I am now of opinion that the interpretation of almost all recent Expositors 'in his mind' (as equiv. to in himself) is inadmissible, as not doing justice to the force of the expression, which it would almost sink to a redundancy. One might approve of the interpretation of others, 'by the Holy Spirit which was in him,' if one could think, with Dr. Bland, that 'it was the intention of the Evangelist to signify that our Lord in this case did not, as others [mere men], derive his knowledge from the ordinary methods of discovery open to all men, but from peculiar powers which he possessed independently of every thing external.' Yet the Evangelist could not mean to rest in glancing at the supernatural, since far more is required by the context, in which is involved an indirect claim to Divinity. The only interpretation which will do full justice to the force of the expression, is that of all the ancient and the early modern Expositors, who explain it to mean, 'by the Spirit of his Divine nature,' which, of course, carries with it omniscience. See Chrys., Theophyl., and Euthym., and also Bede in the Catena of Thom. Aquin.; also Maldon. and Calvin, who are agreed that it involves a claim of Deity.

— ὅτι οὕτως αὐτοὶ διαλ.] The αὐτοὶ, which I long since admitted into the text, from nearly the whole of the uncial, and very many cursive MSS. (confirmed by both the Syriac Versions, the Gothic, and Slav. Versions, and Theophyl.), has been rejected by Lachm., and also by Tisch. in his first Ed., who, however, has admitted it into his second Ed. (as has also Alf.); and rightly, for internal evidence, as well as external authority, is in its favour. Far more likely is it that it should have been put out than put in, since it produces a somewhat heavy effect, and would not, I imagine, have been employed by the Evangelist, had not a sort of emphasis been intended, as in the case of ὅτι in Matt. ix. 4, ἵνα τί ὑμεῖς ἐκθυμίσθετε κακά; where I have evinced the pronoun to be genuine.

9. σου αἱ ἁμαρτίαι] I have, with almost all the recent Editors, adopted this reading instead of vulg. εἰ, because it is supported not only by very strong external authority, but by internal evidence, as being the simplest mode of reading, and that from which the other varr. lectt. might flow. As respects ἐγείραι, why I have chosen to retain this form will appear from my note on Matt. ix. 5; though, after all, it is sometimes an open question which of the two forms is the more genuine. One thing is certain, that, as I have there shown at large, the form ἐγείρου, adopted by Tisch. and Alf., from B, D, and a few cursives of mean order, cannot be the true reading. As to Itacism, supposed by Mr. Alf. to be involved in ἐγείραι, if it exists at all, it cannot do so here, because, as I have shown, we are enabled to account for the αι in another and better way.

10. ἵνα δὲ εἰδῆτε, &c.] Render: 'But that ye may know that the Son of Man on earth hath rather hinders than helps the sense; and as having no place in three MSS., the Pesch. Syr., and Hilary, may be suspected to have come from the margin, and to have proceeded from certain Correctors, whose purpose it was to remove a sort of inconvenience involved in the construction here, by making a new sentence commence after ἁμαρτίας. Under these circumstances, I have, with Rosenm., Kuin., Fritz., and Anger, pointed as above, because I am of opinion that the words σοὶ λέγω were carried forward straight on from ἁμαρτίας, the words λέγει τῷ παραλ. being merely an inserted notice of the Evangelist,—though not confined to the present, but, as we have seen, common to Matthew and Luke. The general sense is as follows: "Ye object to my saying, Thy sins be forgiven thee, but which is easier to, &c.; but I will now take the latter mode, that, if I do not speak the words ἀφίενται σοὶ αἱ ἁμαρτίαι σου (thy sins be forgiven thee), ye may know that I have the power to forgive sins."

I still continue to retain, with all recent Editors except Tisch. and Alf., the position ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς ἀφίεναι, on the strongest external authority, confirmed by internal evidence.

15. For καὶ ἰγένετο, Tisch. and Alf. read καὶ γίνεται, from B, L, and 1 cursive MS. — a reading worthy of attention, as having internal evidence in its favour; but not of adoption, unless on far stronger evidence, espec. considering that the idiom is, as far as I know, unprecedented at least in the New Test. and the Sept.

— ἦσαν γὰρ—αὐτῷ These words have been variously rendered. Most Commentators, after Grotius, take the καὶ for the relative οἱ, and render, 'for there were many who had followed Levi, and had sat down to table with him.' But this involves a needless repetition; and it should rather seem that the αὐτῷ is to be referred to Jesus, the sense being, 'for there were many present [in Levi's house], and they had followed Jesus into the house.' Render: 'for there were many who had followed him [i. e. Jesus], and sat down to table with him.' So in the passage of Luke: καὶ ἦν ὄχλος τελωνῶν πολλῶν, καὶ ἄλλων, οἱ ἦσαν μετ' αὐτῶν κατακείμενοι.

By αὐτοῖς understand 'Jesus and his disciples.'

16. The τί before ὅτι is cancelled by Tisch.
and Alf., from B, L, and 4 cursives. Alf. regards the text. rec. as a 'correction to make it interrogative,' as in Matth. and Luke; but that it should have been done almost universally is incredible. More likely is it, that in those 6
MSS. it is an alteration proceeding from Critics who stumbled at the unclassical construction ἐλεγον· τί ὅτι, and so removed the ὅτι—I say unclassical, as coming after ἐλεγον. When it is so used (which is very rarely the case), it is only at the commencement of a sentence, and even then only in conjunction with οὐν, as in Lucian, Tim.
§ 28; for as to the passage of Strattis ap. Pollux.
iii. 146, τί ὅτι ὥσπερ οἱ σταδιδρόμοι προανί-στασαι; there the true reading, as found in the most ancient of the MSS., and approved by the Editor Meinecke, is τί ποθ' ὥσπερ, which be might have confirmed from Xen. Mem. ii. 73, τί ποτὶ ἴστυν, ἴφη, ὅτι, where that elegant writer keeps the τί and the ὅτι as far as possible apart, and interposes the ἴφη.

17. The words εἰς μετάνοιαν are cancelled by all the recent Editors as inserted from Luke, whence also inserted in Matt. ix. 13. See note there. Internal evidence is against them in both cases.

18. For τῶν Φαρισαίων, Griesbach, Fritz., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read οἱ Φαρισαῖοι, from MSS. A, B, C, D, K, M, and several cursives, with the Syr. Vers. and some MSS. of the Vulg. The mistake probably arose from a var. lect. on οἱ Φαρισαῖοι at the latter part of the verse, and noted in the margin, being negligently brought in here by the Reviser of the text.

I still continue to reject the reading a little further on, οἱ μαθηταὶ τῶν Φαρ., instead of text. rec., οἱ τῶν Φαρ., adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on the authority of only 4 MSS., B, C, L, and 33, to which, however, I must add Lamb. 1179, and a MS. of Trin. Coll. (B. x. 16), collated by Mr. Scrivener; for, besides being very weak in external authority, it has internal evidence against it. It should seem that, from the omission of μαθηταὶ at the end of the verse in Cod. B and 2 others, the μαθηταὶ was brought in here by the Reviser, as coming in more forcibly,—but cancelled there on the authority of Luke v. 33, in order to prevent a tautology. But the phraseology of Matth. differs not a little from that of Luke.

—σοὶ μαθηταὶ] It is strange that almost all Commentators should take this σοὶ as a Dative for Genit. For although the Dative is used for the Genitive, both in the Scriptural and Classical writers, yet only under certain circumstances, which here do not exist. Fritz. rightly remarks, that many such passages are either corrupt, or wrongly understood. And he adds, that unless a Dative can depend on the idea included in the subst., or be inserted by the bye, or be a Dativus commodi, or the like, it cannot be coupled with a substantive. He very properly takes the σοὶ as the Nominative plural of σὺν, σὴ, σὺν.

20. For ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις, I have now received the reading ἐκείνη τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, since the external authority (to which I add 2 Lamb. and 3 Mus. copies) for it is considerable, and internal evidence is quite in its favour.

21. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel the καί; but I still pause; not, indeed, because the particle 'cannot be dispensed with;' for, in fact, good Greek composition would rather reject it: and hence it was cancelled by some Critics, and passed over by the ancient Translators, except the Æthiopic; though only because they did not perceive the force of the καί, which is used for the δι of Matth.; this being one of those cases (frequent in the New Test.) in which the simple καί is put where Class. writers either put nothing, or use some other particle.

—ἐπιρράπτει] 'stitches on,' equiv. to the ἐπιβάλλει of Luke, 'dappeth on;' both these, it would seem, terms of common life. I should say the same of the βάλλει in the next verse, found also in Luke and John xiii. 5, but that it occurs in good writers (though of later Greek), such as Arrian Epict. iv. 13, 12, οἶνον ἵνα βάλλω εἰς τὸν πίθον.

For ἱματίῳ παλαιῷ, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ἱματίον πάλαιον, from MSS. B, C, D, L; but I still retain the dative, with Griesb., Fritz., and Scholz; for the accus. seems adopted by the Critics from the parallel passage of Luke, without considering that there the preceding verb is ἐπιβάλλει; though even there a few MSS. have the dative. I cannot find a single example of the accus., but of the dative two, Nonn. Dionys. iii. 25. ix. 3, and of the cognate προσράπτω, Dio Cass. l. lxii. 7. Phryn. ap. Bekk. Anecd. Dionys. Laert. vi. 91, κῶδιον προσράψαι τῷ τριβῶνι. The only other example I know of ἐπιρρ. is in Hesych. and Suid. in v. κάβαπτος.

In the words following there are two modes of reading, one adopted by Tisch. and Alf.—by the latter, as being 'the least conformed to Matth.' All I can say is, that when we consider that there are two modes of reading, and each resting on very slender evidence, we can scarcely fail to trace in both the hand of critical alteration without improvement. Here, at least, there is no case for change of Text. Of the two readings I should prefer that of Tisch. and Alf., which I find confirmed by two ancient Lamb. MSS., and the Trin. Coll. B. x. 16, of Scrivener, and 3 Mus. copies.

22. For ὁ οἶνος ἐκχέεται — ἀπολύονται, Tisch. and Alf. read ὁ οἶνος ἀπόλλυται καὶ οἱ ἀσκοί, as they allege, from B, L, and 102. But on close examination, I find the reading in no one of them; but it is picked out of them all—a procedure forbidden by sound criticism, because it is next to resting the reading on conjecture.

The next words, καὶ ὁ οἶνος—ἀσκοί, are cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., on the authority of D and 4 Latin copies. The MS. B, indeed, omits the last word, βλητέον, which is only to be accounted for by supposing that the Reviser of the text, stumbling at the harshness of the idiom, expunged it, meaning to have substituted for it βάλλουσι (which the Reviser of the MS. D brought into his text of Luke viii. 28), but neglecting to do so—perhaps leaving an open space, which was never filled up. Instances of this sort occur not unfrequently in the more ancient MSS. Under these circumstances, though we may suspect that the confusion of readings, arising from the carelessness of scribes, and the headlong rashness of Critics, has deprived us of the means of coming to any certainty of text, yet this would seem no case that calls for change.

24. ἐν τοῖς σάββασι.] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. expunge the ἐν, on the authority of A, B, C, D, M, and a few cursives,—an authority hardly sufficient to warrant its being placed within brackets, much less cancelled; for it is observable that Mark uses the ἐν at v. 23, but Matt. does not, nor at v. 5. 10—12, nor does Mark at i. 21. iii. 2. In iii. 2 and 4, it is absent from nearly all the MSS. In Luke vi. 2, it is doubtful. St. John, I believe, always uses it; Josephus, I think, never.

25. The αὐτὸς here is absent from B, C, D, L, was placed within brackets by Lachm., and removed by Fritz., and by Tisch. in his first Edition, but restored in his second; rightly; for it is defended by the kindred passage infra viii. 29, and vi. 45. 47, and was only removed by over-nice Critics, who, from the same fastidiousness, removed the πῶς at v. 26.

26. ἐπὶ Ἀβιάθαρ τοῦ ἀρχ.]. The sense of this disputed passage (found only in Mark) would seem to be, 'during the High-priesthood of Abiathar.' But, from the passage of the Old Test. alluded to (1 Sam. xxi. 6), it appears that, at the period when the circumstance here adverted to took place, Ahimelech was High Priest; and other passages show that Abiathar was son of Ahimelech. To remove this difficulty, many methods have been proposed. Some suppose it to have been an error of memory on the part of the Evangelist—a view quite inadmissible. Several recent Commentators suppose that the Evangelist has followed the Rabbinical mode of citation; which consists in selecting some principal word out of each section, and applying the name to the section itself. So Rom. xi. 2, ἐν Ἠλῆε, and Mark xii. 26, ἐπὶ τῆς Βάτου. Thus the sense will be: 'In that portion of the book of Samuel where the history of Abiathar is related.' But this is not permitted by the colloca-

tion of the words; nor will ἐπὶ with the Genit. admit of such a signification. Neither is Abiathar called a High Priest in 1 Sam. xxi. 2, seq. Others, again, think, that father and son had two names, and that the father was also called Abiathar,—a solution manifestly made 'for the nonce,' and grounded on no proof whatever. Equally gratuitous is the supposition of some, that Abiathar was the Sagan, or Deputy to his father Ahimelech, and is therefore styled High Priest. This, indeed, will not endure the severe historical touchstone applied to it by Fritz. Bp. Middleton, however, thinks that a great deal of learning and ingenuity have been employed to remove a difficulty which does not exist. This, he says, has arisen from imagining that the words of St. Mark, explained in the obvious way, would mean, 'in the priesthood of Abiathar; a sense which, indeed, they will not admit. Without the Article, indeed (continues he), such would have been the meaning, as in 1 Macc. xiii. 42. Luke iii. 2, ἐπ' ἀρχιερέων Ἄννα καὶ Καϊάφα. Demosth. i. 250. Thucyd. ii. 2. In fact, nothing is more common in the Classical writers and in the Sept. 'Now (argues the learned Prelate) in these examples the Article would imply, as in the case of Abiathar, that these persons were afterwards distinguished by their respective offices from others of the same name. And that the name Abiathar was not an uncommon one among the Jews, is certain. And this might render the addition τοῦ ἀρχ. natural, if not absolutely necessary.' Thus the sense will be, that 'this action of David was in the time of Abiathar (as we should say, when he flourished), i. e. the noted person who was afterwards High Priest.' So Luke iv. 27, ἐπὶ Ἐλισσαίου τοῦ προφήτου. But this method of handling the question (which had already occurred to Zeger and Wets.) is rather evading than removing the difficulty, which, after all the elaborate special pleading of Middl., still exists as much as before. I grant what Mr. Alf. affirms, that no author would in an ordinary narrative think of designating an event thus. But in endeavouring to settle the question, it is essential to ascertain the true reading as to the genuineness of the Article τοῦ. External evidence against the τοῦ is considerable, espec. since to the 9 uncial and 3 cursive MSS. adduced by Alf., I am enabled to add all the Lamb. MSS. except one, and about half of the Mus. copies; and internal evidence is also against it, considering that it was more likely to be put in than put out. It might be, and probably was, added by the scribes, or even Critics, who, from the celebrity of Abiathar, might bring

In the Article as called for; though not, as Mr. Alford asserts, for the purpose of removing the difficulty, since of that there is no proof, nor, indeed, any probability; for it may fairly be supposed that these Critics would not have had sufficient talent to excoquite so ingenious a device for removing the difficulty as that proposed by the learned Scholar above mentioned. Under these circumstances, and considering that all the modes first mentioned of removing the difficulty are either inadmissible or ineffectual, I am not disinclined to adopt the view taken by Beza long ago, and since his time by Jackson of Leicester, Wassenbergh, and others, according to which the words are regarded as originally a marginal Scholium, whence they crept into the text. Nor is this view without some authority, since the words have no place in the Cod. D and 2 MSS. of the Ital. Version, one of the 4th and the other of the 5th century. It should seem that the embarrassment here existing comes under the same category with that of Βαραχλέω at Matt. xxiii. 35, and Ἰερμίου at Matt. xxvii. 9; and is to be removed only in the way that I have there suggested, which has, at least, this advantage, that it cannot be brought under that class of solutions which Mr. Alf. stigmatizes as 'a vain attempt to heal over the difficulty.'

28. ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου] Grotius, Campbell, Wakefield, Kuinoel, and Fritz, strenuously contend that the sense here is not 'the Son of Man,' but 'a son of man.' 'For (says Campbell) as the last words are introduced as a consequence from what has been advanced, the Son of man here must be equivalent to men in the preceding, otherwise a term is introduced into the conclusion which was not in the premises.' But this interpretation is liable to very serious objections. Suffice it to say, 1. that such a signification of Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθ. is unfounded in the New Test.; and 2. that such a sense of κύριος no where exists either in the Sept., the writers of later Greek, or the New Test. In short, the interpretation can by no means be admitted, as introducing, on insufficient grounds, a very strong expression; which might lead to a laxity of opinion and practice as to the observance of the Sabbath, such as our Lord could not mean to inculcate. Nor is it necessary so to interpret; for the ὥστε here may be not illative, but consecutive. Or, with Maldon., it may be considered as completive. This view is strongly confirmed by the manner in which St. Luke introduces the words. Besides, the new interpretation is negated by the καὶ (even) of the present passage; which has great force, and implies (as Doddridge justly observes) that 'the Sabbath was an institution of high importance; and may perhaps also refer to that signal Authority which Christ, by the ministry of his Apostles, should exert over it, in changing it from the seventh to the first day of the week.' We may add, that this was a delicate way of claiming to be the MESSIAH, as in the words uttered by our Lord on another occasion (Matt. xii. 6): 'There is here something greater than the Temple.'

In short, the reasoning seems to be this: that as the Sabbath was an institution intended for the benefit of man (and not man for the observance of the Sabbath), the relaxation of the strict observance of it might, in some extreme cases, be justified, as in that of David, and in this of his disciples. Or, if that were not the case, that His countenance and permission were a sufficient sanction, for the Messiah is Lord over all creation, as granted to man, and of all that, like the Sabbath, is made for man's good,—to dispense with the strict observance of it whenever he shall see fit.

III. 1. The τὴν before συναγωγὴν is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from MSS. B and 102, though retained by Lachm.; and rightly, not only from the utter inadequacy of authority against it, but because it is required by what we read supra i. 21, καὶ εὐθὺς τοῖς σάββασιν εἰσέλθων εἰς τὴν συναγωγὴν (the one at Capernaum) ἰδίδασκε. Alf., indeed, regards it as an insertion from Matth. and Luke; but surely it is more likely to have been omitted by accident in two copies, than to have been interpolated in all the rest. The ἦν before καὶ is by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancelled, on the authority of one MS. only, the B: and Alf. sets it down as an insertion from Luke. But why not from Mark? The word was, however, more likely to be omitted in one copy, owing to the variation of position of the word (as we find from A and others), than to have been interpolated in all the rest. Perhaps Mark wrote καὶ καὶ ἦν.

For ἐξηραμμένην, the Cod. D has ξηράν; but Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. retain ἐξηρ., though at v. 3 they adopt ξηράν, from that same MS., strengthened by B, C, L, and one or two cursives. But ἐξηρ. is confirmed by the circumstance of the word being used in the Sept. (as 3 Kings xiii. 4. Hos. ix. 16, τὰς ρίζας αὐτοῦ ἐξηράθη. Prov. xvii. 22, ξηραίνεται τὰ ὀστέα, and Act. Thom. § 48), though not in the Class. writers, except in the Pseudo-Phal. Ep. 13, ἄλλοι δὲ ὄψιν ἐξηράθησαν (where the construction is the same as at Hos. ix. 16), but that is Greek of a far later date than that of the N. T. As respects the reading ξηράν, it arose, I suspect, from the Critical Revisers, who thus brought in a Classical, instead of Hellenistic Greek term. Suffice it to refer to Æschyl. Sept. 696, ξηροῖς ὀμμασι,—æsc. Eurip. El. 239, οὐκ οὖν ὀρεῖς μου—ξηρόν δέμας. Perhaps, too, they more readily adopted it because of its being found in the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke sine v. l. Not at all likely is it that Mark should first have used the Adject. and then the Participle; and of the two it is more probable he should use the Participle, as being the Hellenistic idiom, and more forcible than the Adject., as will appear from the fine metaphor of our English Æschylus: "Behold, mine arm is like a blasted sapling, wither'd up."

2. παρετήρουν] Lachm. and Tisch. edit παρετηρουντο, from MSS. A, C, D, Δ, and a few cursives; though Tisch. 2 restores παρετήρουν, perhaps because there is far more external authority for it. He might as well have abided by his first course; for internal evidence is rather in its favour, from the uncommonness of this Middle form used as a Deponent. Though the same is found in Luke xiv. 1, sine v. l., as also in Acts ix. 24, in most of the best MSS. It no where occurs in the Sept., and, I think, only once in the Class. writers, viz. Dio Cass. p. 702. Alf. thinks that the reading was brought in from Luke vi. 7. But only comparatively few copies have it there, nor would they be likely to bring in so unusual an idiom. It is pretty certain that this Mid. Deponent form was used by Luke vi. 7. xiv. 1. Acts ix. 24, also by Paul, Gal. vi. 10. Yet Luke uses the active form in his Gospel, xx. 20. So Mark may have used it here; but there is very insufficient evidence that he did. On the force of the word itself see my Lex. in v. There may seem to be here and in Luke a slight discrepancy between this account and Matthew's. But, in fact, the circumstances are independent of each other, and may both have taken place. First, it should seem, the Pharisees watched to see what Jesus would do. And, when it seemed doubtful whether he would go and heal the cripple, they, to entrap him in his words, propounded a pretended question of conscience,—whether it was lawful to heal on the Sabbath-day? Our Lord, however, knowing the evil motive which prompted their inquiry, vouchsafed no answer to it,—but proceeded immediately, in contempt of their treacherous plot, to heal the man; and afterwards (as was customary with the Jewish disputants) replies to a question by another question.

4. ἔξεστι τοῖς σάββασιν ἀγαθον. ἢ κακον.] By interrogation (far more pointed and significant than the mere declarative form) our Lord thus answers question by question (as it is said in the passage of Luke, ἑαρωτήσας ὑμᾶς τι, &c.); so leaving themselves to decide the point. By the expression ἀγαθοποιῆσαι he adverts to the healing of the cripple; and by κακοποιῆσαι to the designs against his own life, which the Pharisees were plotting even on the Sabbath. This appeal (as we find from the passage of Matthew) our Lord made the stronger by the apt illustration of an ox or an ass fallen into a pit on the Sabbath-day; from which he draws the inference, 'How much then is a man better than a sheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do good on the Sabbath-days.'

5. μετ' ὀργῆς] It is not necessary here to discuss, with Commentators, the question, whether our Lord really felt anger, or not; or what is the true definition of anger; for the word ὀργή does not here denote anger, but (as sometimes in the Class. writers) indignation, and, in the case of our Lord, a righteous indignation; a view confirmed by the word following, συλλυπούμενος, 'being grieved in mind' thereat; which was, no doubt, meant to qualify ὀργῆς, intimating that with the indignation was mingled concern and grief at the sad fate reserved for his adversaries. Comp. Matt. xxiii. 37. See more in my Lex. in v. συλλυπ.

The term πώρωσις (from verb πῶρω, and that from πῶρος, 'a hard substance,' especially of skin) signifies prop. induration, or 'a state of hardness,' such as that of the skin, or fibres of the flesh; but in the New Test. it bears only the figurative sense, as applied to the hardness of the heart by obdurate impenitence, as here and Eph. iv. 18. Rom. xi. 15.

— ὑγιῆς ὡς ἡ ἄλλη] These words, absent from 6 uncial MSS., and not a few others, have been with reason cancelled by all the recent Editors, as introduced from the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke. It is true that this use of ἀποκ. without any adjunct involves a certain harshness; but such is found once elsewhere in this very Evangelist, infra viii. 25, καὶ ἐποίησεν αὐτὸν ἀναβλεῖν· καὶ ἀποκατεστάθη, 'he was restored to the use of his sight.' Moreover, that the word is so used by Hippocr., as it is also in the Sept. and the later Greek writers, to denote being restored from sickness to health, I have already shown. Comp. 1 Kings xiii. 6.

— ἀπικατεστάθη, edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from 9 uncial and 24 cursive MSS. (to which I could add several of the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies), is probably the genuine reading. The double Augment is frequent in the most ancient copies.

6. συμβούλιον ἐπίοιον] This phrase, recurring at xv. 1, but no where else found either in the New Test. or in the Sept., would seem to be an idiom of the Provincial Greek, for συμβούλ. ἔλαβον (which occurs in the parallel passage of Matt. xii. 14), of which five exx. may be seen in Ducange's Gloss. Med. and Inf. Græc. in v., of which the most to the present purpose is Pseudo-Joannes Theol. in Comm. de Jesu Christo, συμβούλιον ἐποίησαν Ἄννας καὶ Καϊάφας. It may, however, be a Latinism formed on consiliari and conspirationem moliri, on which see Ducange, Gloss. Med. and Inf. Latinit. As respects the reading here edited by Tisch. and Alf., from B, L, and 5 cursives of the same family, namely, ἰδίῳ—I believe it to be a mere error of the scribes for ἐκείνῳ, since I cannot find the slightest vestige of any such idiom, which, indeed, would be altogether unaccountable in the New Test. The words in question might easily be confounded with each other in the Uncial Greek character. I suspect the blunder to have been committed by the writer of the archetype of the Cod. B. The genuineness of ἐκείνῳ is attested by copies of the Italic Version of the 5th century, and the Lamb. copy of the Vulg. prob. of the 7th century. Lachm. has, I find, here shown more than usual discretion by rejecting this critical tit-bit, though proffered by the tempting hand of his favourite B.

7. ἀνέχ. πρὸς] Internal evidence is quite in favour of the reading ἀν. εἰς, adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from D, P, and about 12 cursives—to which I add 6 ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies. This is confirmed by the reading παρά: but those were not glosses on, but corrections of style, made with some reason, inasmuch as when the place whither is so indefinite as a sea, πρὸς is more suitable than εἰς. And here we cannot suppose that our Lord was going to any particular spot on the sea-coast, which would have made εἰς quite proper, as at John vi. 17, εἰς Καπερναούμ. All that our Lord probably intended was, to reach some point of the sea-coast where he might take boat, and elude the pursuit of his enemies by crossing over to some point on the other side of the water. Thus πρὸς here signifies towards, in the direction of. Comp. vi. 45, πρὸς Βηθαϊδάν. If this view be well founded, it will follow that the other reading, παρά, is a false correction.

—ἠκολούθησαν, for ἠκολούθησαν, adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., has considerable, though not sufficient authority to warrant the alteration, espec. as internal evidence is adverse. The αὐτῷ just after, cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from only 4 uncial MSS., was probably lost by the variety of position, and the confusion which exists in the MSS. Lachm. retains αὐτῷ within brackets.

8. ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰδουμ.] A country only mentioned in this one passage of the New Test. It lay to the south-east of Palestine, along the great valley of El Arabah, which extends from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Akabah on the Red Sea, upwards of 200 miles, and of which Petra was the capital. It is often mentioned in Joseph., but so that the boundaries seem very indefinite (see Jos. Ant. xiii. 9, l. xv. 7, 9), the reason of which is, that during the Jewish captivity the Idumæans had taken possession of the southern parts of Palestine as far as Hebron, and were probably afterwards never quite dispossessed of it; so that even in the time of Josephus, and of our Lord, part, more or less, of this region of Judæa was included in Idumæa. See Jos. Ant. xii. 8, 6, and B. J. xiii. 9. On the country generally, see Robins. Bibl. Res. vol. ii. p. 506—580, espec. p. 555.

The punctuation which I have adopted, Ἰορδάνου is, I apprehend, preferable to that of Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., who, in pointing as they have done, were deceived by not discerning the dense brevity of the wording, which is well filled up by Fritz. thus: 'quin [disiitis] Tyri et Sidonis regionibus gestarum a Jesu rerum fama homines ad eum compulsi;' though too paraphrastically, yet so as faithfully to represent the sense. By οἱ περὶ Τ. καὶ Σ. are meant, not the inhabitants of those cities, but those inhabiting the μεθόρια mentioned at vii. 24, meaning the confines to sea-ward; as is clear from the parallel passage of Luke vi. 17, τῆς παραλίου Τύρου καὶ Σιδῶνος. Comp. Thucyd. vi. 2, οἶκον Φοίνικες περὶ (circum, circa) πᾶσαν τὴν Σικελίαν, where see my note.

9. ἵνα πλοιάριον προσκατερῇ αὐτῷ] 'that a boat (meaning a row-boat, such as was used for fishing) should attend on him,' be in readiness for his use, when necessary. It was to be provided διὰ τὸν ὄχλον, 'on account of the crowd,'—namely, that they might not throng him. Comp. Luke viii. 45, οἱ ὄχλοι συνίχουσι σε καὶ ἀποθλίβουσι, and Lucian, Nigr. 13, θλίβων καὶ στυγορῶν ἀπαντῶντας. The term προσκ., as said of a person, is not unfrequent; but as used of a thing (as here calachreatic), it is so rare, that I know of no other example. It probably was an idiom of the ordinary Greek (perhaps Provincial) of common life.

10. μᾶστιγας] Meaning such grievous disorders as are emphatically a sore affliction (or, according to the literal sense of the word, θαρτα, όταν αὐτὸν †θεώρει, προσέπιπτεν αὐτῷ καὶ ἔκραζε, λέγοντα· Ὅτι σὺ εἶ ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ! ¹² Καὶ πολλὰ ἐπετίμα exorise) to the sufferers; implying, however, that they are the salutary corrections of God. See Heb. xii. 4—11.

11. τὰ πνεύματα τὰ ἀκάθ.] Meaning persons possessed with unclean spirits (i. e. demons, see on Matt. x. 1), the latter being spoken of in the person of those possessed by them. It is no wonder that this mode of speaking should be used, inasmuch as the persons so possessed were in reality not their own masters. The use of ὅταν with the Indic. is occasionally found elsewhere in the N. T., but usually mixed with variety of reading, which cannot satisfactorily be accounted for on the theory propounded. Be that as it may, the most ancient mode of writing was ὅτ' ἄν, which I find in all the more ancient MSS. of the Lamb. and Mus., also of the MSS. of Thucyd. and of Josephus by me collated. Whether the idiom was used by the writers of the N. T. is doubtful; but the probability is that it was.

— θεώρει] MSS. B, C, D, G, L, Δ, and 7 cursives (to which I could add a few ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies), have θεύρων, which is edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.,—perhaps rightly, since internal evidence is in its favour, from the circumstance of its being more agreeable to the character of St. Mark's Greek. Of course, the reading προσέπιπτον, which I find in many Lamb. and Mus. copies, stands on the same footing, as also ἔκραζον just after.

12. φανερὸν αὐτόν] Most of the ancient MSS. (including all the Lamb. ones except one, and most of the Mus. copies) have φαν. αὐτόν, which is edited by all the recent Editors, whom I have now followed, since this reading is supported by Matt. xii. 16, in all the copies; and it is not likely that the order should have been changed for the purpose of suiting the order there. Mr. Alf., indeed, retains the ordinary reading, pronouncing the other to be a "transposition for emphasis." The emphasis, however, may be doubted; and one cannot see why emphasis should be introduced in a plain narration. I should rather denominate Mr. Alford's reading a transposition for grammatical propriety, and for neatness, considering that in a phrase of this kind it is more agreeable to neat composition to dis sever the Adj. from the verb with which it forms a phrase. Of more importance, however, is it to state, that the phrase, as used of a person, no where else occurs, and may have been one of Provincial Greek. As used of a thing it occurs, though rarely, in the later Greek writers, as Ælian and Herodian.

Vol. I.

The reading ποιῶσι just after, adopted by Tisch. and Alf., from 3 uncials and 6 cursives (to which I can only add Trin. Coll. Camb. B, x. 16), is worthy of attention, but not of reception.

14. ἔποίησε] 'appointed.' As in Apoc. i. 6, καὶ ἔποίησαν ἡμᾶς βασιλεῖς καὶ ἱερεῖς τῷ Θεῷ, and sometimes in the later Classical writers. So the Hebr. קצץ in 1 Sam. xii. 6, and sometimes the Latin facere, as in Cicero pro Plancio, 4. [Comp. Matt. x. 1. Luke ix. 1.]

15. Θεραπεύειν—καὶ] The words are cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., on the authority of B, C, Δ, 102, and the Copt. Version; but retained by Lachm., rightly; though internal evidence is rather against the words, considering that they may have been interpolated from Luke ix. 1, and the position they occupy in the Æthiopic Version, the very same as in Luke, strengthens the suspicion. They could not well have been omitted by accident. Nevertheless, the vast weight of external authority, confirmed by all the Versions, except one of mean note, forbids their removal, and does not justify their being bracketed.

16. On more mature consideration, I am now very doubtful whether the words πρῶτον Σίμωνα, which I, with many eminent Critics, inserted, though in small characters, are genuine. Very slender is the support they derive from external authority, and internal evidence is against them. The reading is probably no more genuine than that of B and C, which insert καὶ ἔποίησε τοὺς δώδεκα, both seeming to be no more than two modes of getting rid of the difficulty arising from an obscure brevity, and a negligence in composition, for what, more correctly expressed, would have been Σίμωνα, ᾧ ἐπέθηκε ὄν. Π. Similar instances present themselves in Acts v. 36. 1 Tim. v. 21. John vii. 35.

17. βοανεργές] From the Hebr. בן בר, the Sheva at ב being, as Lightf. points out, expressed in Aramaic by oa; and certainly in Syriac and Arabic בן signifies thunder, as derived, I imagine, from the Hebr. בן, strepuit, probably sometimes applied to thunder. That the Latin strepo was, we know from the fine line of Sil. Ital. xv. 145, "Per subitum moto strepere tonitrua mundo;" which may remind one of Addison's equally fine "Oh! for a peal of thunder that would make | Earth tremble." The persons in question seem so called not only from their impetuous spirit (see Luke ix. 54. Mark ix. 38. x. 37), but from their powerful delivery in preaching. So the correspondent terms in our own language are used by our best writers to denote the force of impetuous eloquence; and such is the use of tonare in Latin, as in Cicero's "Oratio fulgurans et tonans." It should seem that our Lord speaks thus by way of anticipation, and to encourage the sons of Zebedee to use their great power of voice and intonation, which would make their zeal effectual to carrying on the work of the Gospel home to the hearts of those whom they should address in preaching.

²⁰. Before ὄχλος Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. prefix ὁ, from A, B, D, L, Δ, and 4 other MSS., to which I add 1 Lamb. and 3 Mus. copies, together with Trin. Coll. B, x. 16 and 17, collated by Mr. Scriv. Internal evidence is rather in favour of the ὁ. But though the πάλιν continuative seems to involve, as I have before said, a resumption of narration, probably from supra ii. 2, it will not follow that the Article should be used,—espec. since, from the distance of time, the multitude assembled could scarcely be the same.

For text. rec. μήτε (probably an error of scribes), I have, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., received μηδὲ, from strong external authority, confirmed by internal evidence, the sense ne quidem being very suitable to the context. It has place in all the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies, as also in Trin. Coll. Camb. B, x. 16.

²¹. καὶ ἀκούσαντες—αὐτόν] There are here several points of inquiry necessary to be determined in order to the settling of the true import of these words, which have been variously explained. One thing has been satisfactorily made out,—namely, that the persons meant by the οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ are our Lord's kinsmen resident at Nazareth; who, it seems, when they had heard what had taken place at Capernaum, went over thither, in order that they might restrain him from utter neglect of himself as to the ordinary requirements of nature, and unmeasured sacrifice of himself to the demands of duty. This sense of οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ, scil. ὄντες, confirmed by the Syr., Vulg., and Euthym., is called for by the circumstances of the narrative, and justified by the usus loquendi of Hellenistic Greek, according to which εἶναι παρά τινας signifies 'to be of the same nation, or family,'—as in Susanna v. 33, ἑλαιοὶν δὲ οἱ παρ' αὐτῆς, the same just before mentioned as her parents and 'kinsfolk' (συγγενεῖς), exactly as here the mother and kinsmen of Jesus. So also Jos. Ant. i. 10, 5, περιτέμνεται (Abraham) καὶ πάντες οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ. It is scarcely necessary to remark, that κρατῆσαι may well denote merely friendly earnestness, as in 2 Kings iv. 8. Mark ix. 27. We are now enabled to fix the sense of the only remaining expression, that denoting why they had done as they had,—namely, because they thought and said 'He is beside himself,' 'scarcely in his right mind' (by an ellipse. of τοῦ νοῦ, or τῶν φρενῶν, sometimes expressed), evidently a familiar form of expression, and consequently not to be pressed on, but only denoting that a person is transported too far, his mind thrown off its balance by excessive feeling and vehemence of spirit. That this is a familiar expression, to be understood with due regard to the circumstances of the case, is confirmed by the fact, attested by Lightf., that a phrase corresponding to ἐξίστην, and taken with the same modification of meaning, frequently occurs in the Rabbinical writers. And surely when we consider that our Lord had been lately going the way, as we should say, to destroy himself, it is not surprising that his relatives should, as they naturally might, form such an inference as that above pointed out, without being thought to have used an expression of harshness or indecorous hastiness. And though they did not (as we learn from John vii. 1) believe in his Divine mission, they were doubtless alive to the feelings of nature. Mr. Alf. is at liberty to render as he does, 'he is mad,' but not to ascribe this rendering to our authorized Version, since it is not there used. This 'strongest sense the term will bear' is, he thinks, required by the fact, that his relations had doubtless heard of the charge of his having a devil, which he thinks "had been going on for some time." But since the Blessed Virgin must necessarily be included in the οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ, is it not indecorous to ascribe such an expression to her, and profane to bolster up a vain fancy of his own, by taking for granted that so horrible an imputation could have dwelt on her pure mind; espec. as she had so recently viewed one at least of his miracles, John ii.—which miracle, as appears from v. 5 of that chap., was no other than what she contemplated and expected?

Finally, the use of the term ἐξῆλθον, not ἦλθον, confirms my opinion that the family went from Nazareth to Capernaum; for should we suppose that they were then at Capernaum—and indeed we read at John ii. 12, of a short visit that they made there—yet, to render 'set out' is scarcely warranted, and would involve great harshness. They had heard reports, perhaps exaggerated, of the events recorded supra v. 7—11, and, alarmed for the safety of their illustrious Kinsman, went forthwith to Capernaum, in order to take measures for his security. Of course, this implies the intervening of two or three days between what has been recorded and the arrival of the family. But there is nothing to forbid that in the circumstance of the narrative commencing at καὶ ἀκούσαντες, since there is there no specified note of time.

are espec. mentioned by Matthew; and that Mark meant to include them is clear from comparison with ii. 16. In here using καταβάντες, as infra vii. 1, ἐλθόντες, Mark meant to intimate that the Pharisees had come from Jerusalem, probably deputed by the heads of the Sanhedrim to watch our Lord's proceedings.

^{23.} ἐν παραβολαῖς ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς] Meaning, in a widely qualified sense of the expression, that 'he addressed them in a parabolical mode of instruction,' as regards the use of comparisons and examples derived from things known and familiar to them, in order to teach things less known and comparatively obscure. In recording, however, this address, the Evangelists slightly differ. The statement of Mark is somewhat compressed, and one argument, adduced in Matt. xii. 27, 28, is not introduced. For greater clearness and force, Mark brings in first the argument which Matthew places last. He first propounds the argument, 'How can Satan be supposed to cast himself out?' and then illustrates the absurdity of so supposing, by a reference to the case of an earthly kingdom (Matthew adds, state), or even of a family, considered as a petty form of civil government. In the passage of Matthew the plan is the reverse; and, after noticing the sure effect of disunion in utter instability, the speaker argues thus, 'So also (καὶ) if Satan,' &c. In the passage of Mark, in addition to instability, we have ruin, τέλος ἔχει, 'comes to an utter end.' Mark waves what is said at Matt. v. 30 (where see my note) as less necessary. But at v. 30, Mark subjoins to Matthew's account those few, but weighty words, ὅτι—ἔχει, thus pointing out the true ground and import of the foregoing awful denunciation.

^{25.} For δύναται, δυνήσεται is read by Tisch. and Alf., from MSS. B, C, L, Δ, and a few copies of the Vulg.; while Lachm. retains δύναται,—very properly, since δυνήσ. is destitute of competent authority, and is manifestly either a gloss or a false correction. The same remark applies to the στηναι for σταθῆναι, the latter retained by Lachm. It recurs at v. 27; and it is unlikely that Mark should have used two different forms so near together.

οὐ δύν. οὐδ. For this there is considerable external authority, confirmed by the Versions; and internal evidence is in its favour. The same remark applies to the αἱ inserted at v. 28, which Mr. Alf. now admits. It was probably absorbed by the αἱ preceding,—a case of frequent occurrence. The change in position just after has considerable authority in its favour; but I can only add Serv. γ; and internal evidence is rather against it, from its being probably a correction of style by the Critics. The other Mr. Alf. terms a simplification, but how, I would say, to be accounted for; cui bono? One might rather call it the simple mode of placing the words, which was more likely to have been adopted in the simple diction of Mark than the other. As to the ὅσα for ὅσας, edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from 5 uncial and 2 cursive copies (to which I can add no Lamb. or Mus. copy), internal evidence may be in its favour; and ὅσας may be, as Alf. thinks, a grammatical correction; but rather than suppose our Evangelist to have left so glaring a piece of bad grammar, I would suppose, that, in the very few MSS. that have ὅσα, it arose from an error of scribes, who often confound terminations, and have little regard to concords. Had not ὅσ. come immediately after βλασφ., though after a separation of two or three words, one might have thought that the neuter had been intentionally used, in order to refer generically to both the antecedents.

^{29.} βλασφ. εἰς τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγ.] See note on Matt. xii. 31. A similar mode of expression occurs in Josephus, Bell. ii. 8, 9, βλασφημεῖν εἰς τοῦτο, i. e. the name of Moses.

For κρίσις, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit. ἁμαρτήματος, from B (C 1 app.), L, 2 cursives, with the Ital. and Vulg., Copt., and Armen. Versions. But the thing involves a matter of doubtful disputation. Of course, considering that external authority is so decidedly for κρίσις, the other reading ought, if received, to have internal evidence quite in its favour. Let us consider whether this be so or not. Mr. Alf. regards κρίσις as 'a correction for the unusual expression ἁμαρτ.' And it is true that ἁμαρτ. may seem justified, if not called for, by a well-known canon of criticism. But that canon does not apply to what is utterly unprecedented; which is the case with αἰώνιον ἀμάρτημα, an expression no where else found. For while in the New Test. we have ζωὴ αἰών. and ὀλιγοὶ αἰών., 2 Thess. i. 9, as also πῦρ αἰών., yet no where there have we αἰών. ἀμάρτημα, whereas κρίσις αἰών. does occur, or at least its equiv. κῆμα αἰών., in Heb. vi. 2. Still the difficulty meets us, how to account for the introduction of ἀμαρτήμ. To suppose, as I have heretofore done, that this was an alteration proceeding from certain early Critics, whose purpose it was to complete the antithesis, involves no improbability, considering the character of the Revisers of the texts of MSS. B, D, L; yet it is not altogether convincing. Accordingly, I am now inclined to think that ἀμαρτ. may be the true reading, and κῆμα, a change of reading for greater plainness, and one suggested by Heb. vi. 2. I will only add, that a reading is not to be rejected because it occurs no where else, unless it be open to some such objection as makes it highly improbable that the writer would use the word. That, however, is not the case here: for what is there to object to in the phrase, ἵνα οὖν εἴναι αἰώνιου ἀμαρτήματος (for ἀμαρτίας, as indeed the MS. D reads), 'liable to, held, bound by guilt that can never be pardoned,' in short, equiv. to οὐκ ἔχει ἀφαισιν εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, answering to which is the expression employed in the parallel passage of Matth., οὐκ ἀφαισίσταται αὐτῷ, and its parallel in the ἀποθανεῖσθαι ἐν ταῖς ἀμαρτίαις ὑμῶν of John viii. 24? Mr. Alf. remarks that "it is to the critical treatment (!!) of the Sacred Text that we owe the restoration of such important and deep-reaching expressions as this." There ought to be many such restored to us, since it cannot, I fear, be denied that the 'critical treatment' of the Word of God, owing to the incompetency and rashness of some who exercise that treatment, and claim a sort of dominion over the contents of that Word, has done its utmost to deprive the Christian world of many expressions equally important with this; which, however, I cannot think it right to bring into the text, against the authority of all the MSS. except a very few, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version.

³¹ ἔρχονται οὖν] The οὖν is here, as often,

resumptive, taking up the thread of the narrative from ver. 21. Instead of οἱ ἀδελφοὶ καὶ ἡ μήτηρ, a few ancient MSS., and most of the Versions, have ἡ μήτηρ καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοί, which is edited by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. They are probably genuine, and by supposing them such, we are enabled to account for omission from homoteleuton.

— φωνοῦντες αὐτόν] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read, from MSS. D, C, L, καλοῦντες—a manifest gloss, as is the ζητοῦντες (suggested by v. 32) of the Alex. MS. The true sense is, 'calling for' (summoning or inviting any one to come), which is that to be assigned to the word in Matt. xx. 32, often in St. John's Gospel, and in Acts ix. 41. x. 7, though never in the Classical writers; it being probably the provincial Greek of Syria (not Alexandrian Greek, for it is not found in the Sept.), and hence it was that the Revisers substituted in its place a Classical Greek term. The same corruption of text has place in the MSS. at large at John x. 3, where Lachm. and Tisch. rightly edit φωνεῖ, from several MSS. of the same class as here, thus involving an inconsistency of procedure.

³⁵ τὸ θέλημα] Tisch. and Alf. read τὰ θελήματα, from one MS. (B)—an authority quite insufficient. And vain is it to allege external evidence for a reading, as here, almost entirely unsupported by external authority of MSS., and opposed by all the ancient Versions. Here I suspect the Reviser chose to introduce, suo judicio, the plural form as used with ποιεῖν in 1 Sam. xiii. 14. Ps. lxxxix. 20. Acts xiii. 2. Eph. ii. 3, et al.

IV. 1. ἤρξατο διδάσκειν] for ἰδίδασκε, my most Commentators. But, as Fritz shows, the phrase may have its full force. The sense being, 'He began to teach by the sea'; and then, by the increasing crowd of auditors, he was compelled to embark on board the vessel (mentioned supra iii. 9), and there to instruct the people, seated on ship-board at sea (as opposed to ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς just after); for such is the sense of this expression καθ. ἐν τῇ θαλ., with which comp. Prov. xxiii. 34, κατακίση ὥσπερ ἐν καρδίᾳ θαλάσσης.

— συνήχθη] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read συνάγεται, from 4 uncial and a few cursive MSS.;—an amount of external authority quite insufficient, though supported by internal evidence, since συνάγεται may have been the original reading, and συνήχθη an alteration by some Critic, who did not perceive the suitability here of the Præsens Historicum (which frequently occurs in this Gospel, e. gr. v. 15. vi. 30. vii. 1).

τὸ πλοῖον καθῆσθαι ἐν τῇ θαλάσῃ καὶ πᾶς ὁ ὄχλος πρὸς τὴν θάλασσαν ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς ἦν. ² Καὶ ἐδίδασκεν αὐτοὺς ἐν παραβολαῖς πολλὰ, καὶ ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς ἐν τῇ διδαχῇ αὐτοῦ. ³ Ἀκούετε ἰδοὺ ἐξῆλθεν ὁ σπείρων τοῦ σπείραι· ⁴ καὶ ἐγένετο ἐν τῷ σπείρειν, ὁ μὲν ἔπεσε παρὰ τὴν ὁδὸν, καὶ ἦλθε τὰ πετεινὰ [τοῦ οὐρανοῦ] ⁵ καὶ κατέφαγεν αὐτό· ⁶ ἄλλο δὲ ἔπεσεν ἐπὶ τὸ πετρῶδες, ὅπου οὐκ εἶχε γῆν πολλήν· καὶ εὐθέως ἐξανέτειλε, διὰ τὸ μὴ ἔχειν βάθος γῆς· ⁷ ἄλλο δὲ ἀνατείλαντος ἐκαυματίσθη, καὶ, διὰ τὸ μὴ ἔχειν ῥίζαν, ἐξηράνθη. ⁸ Καὶ ἄλλο ἔπεσεν εἰς τὰς ἀκάνθας· καὶ ἀνέβησαν αἱ ἀκάνθαι καὶ συνέπνιξαν αὐτό, καὶ καρπὸν οὐκ

—τὸ πλοῖον] The τὸ is wrongly cancelled by Tisch., the sense being, 'the boat in attendance on Jesus.' See note on Matt. viii. 23. xiii. 2.

—καθῆσθαι ἐν τῇ θαλ.] Here ἐν τῇ θαλ., as being opp. to ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, must mean 'a little way out in the sea,' so as to be out of the reach of the crowd, and yet be within their hearing; for, as Theoph. and Enthym. remark, he would thus have them all in front of him, and none in his rear. The force here of the term καθῆσθαι is misapprehended by Expositors, who take it to denote simply 'the act of sitting.' But it is plain from the parallel passage of Matt. xiii. 1, 2 (without which this of Mark would be but imperfectly understood), that καθ. must here be taken to denote 'the being seated for instruction;' as was usual with the Jewish Doctors. See Vitring. de Syn. J. p. 709. That this must be the sense of καθ. in the words of Matth., ἐκάθητο παρὰ τὴν θάλασσαν, is certain from the corresponding words of Mark, ἤρξατο διδάσκειν παρὰ τὴν θαλ.

3. ἀκούετε] A formula soliciting earnest attention, said to be peculiar to Mark, though it is not used elsewhere by the Evangelist; for as to vii. 14, ἀκούετε μου πάντας καὶ συνέιετε, that is of the same kind as Matt. xv. 10, ἀκούετε μου καὶ συνέιετε. Comp. infra xii. 29 (formed on Deut. vi. 4), Ἄκουε, Ἰσραὴλ!

The τοῦ before σπείραι is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. on the authority of B and I cursive, and, as Alf. thinks, 'introduced from the passage of Matth.'—but, I would ask, cui bono? And that it should have crept into all the MSS. is incredible. Moreover, why should not Mark have used the Hellenistic idiom, as well as Matth.? I suspect that the absence of the τοῦ arose from the Critical Reviser of the text of B, or its archetype, removing it as inelegant. That the Critical Reviser of the MS. D stumbled at the Grecism is plain, since we find that in Matt. and Luke he cancelled the τοῦ, and here cancelled both τοῦ and σπείραι, which, indeed, a Class. writer would probably not have used: nor was he singular there, since the words had been, before his time, removed from the copy used by the Coptic Translator.

4. The words τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, absent from very many MSS. and Versions, and cancelled by all the recent Editors, were probably introduced from the parallel passage of Luke viii. 5.

5. ἄλλο δέ] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit καὶ ἄλλο, from MSS. B, C, L, M, Δ, et al.; and, indeed, internal evidence is in favour of the reading; but far weightier external authority is needed to justify any change. The same remark applies more forcibly to the change of εὐθέως into εὐθὺς just after, as will abundantly appear from note supra ii. 8.

6. ἡλίου δι' ἀνατείλαντος] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit, from MSS. B, C, L, καὶ ὅτε ἀνέτειλεν ὁ ἥλιος: but for this external authority is very slender, and internal evidence rather favours ἡλίου ἀνατείλ., considering that one may more easily imagine how ἡλ. δι' ἀνατ. could have passed into καὶ ὅτε ἀνέρ. than the reverse; for so plain a reading as the latter could have needed no gloss; whereas ἡλίου δι' ἀνατ. is not so plain a phrase, but that the glossographer might apply himself to make it plainer still. Moreover, as Mark uses the phrase elsewhere (e. gr. xvi. 2, probably adopted from Matt. xiii. 6), he was likely to use it here. And it is so rare, that I have met with it nowhere in the Class. writers, except that in Plato, p. 887, B, we have ἀνατέλλοντος ἡλίου, which is not quite the same, the sense there being, 'as the sun was rising' (similarly as in Sept. Is. xiii. 10), not, as here, 'when the sun was risen' (was up high): nor is it found, I believe, in the Sept. and Joseph.

7. συνέπνιξαν] The varr. lectt., ἀπέπνιξαν and others, arose, I doubt not, from ignorance of the force of the συν, which is parallel to that of the prep. in Lat., comprimo, originally applied to the compressing of the windpipe (by choking), and used of suffocation in general. The word occurs in Joa. Ant. xii. 6, 2, συμπνιγύντες, where the ἰμπνυγ. of some MSS., edited by Dind., is doubtless a gloss. The word is not found in the Sept., and very rarely in the Class. writers. The only example known to me is Theophr. C. Pl. vi. 11, 6, ἀπόλλυται τὰ δένδρα συμπνιγόμενα, καὶ οὐδεμίαν ἔχοντα διόδον τῷ πνεύματι. Here, however, it seems to be a brief expression (formed on the συμφυεῖσαι ἀπέπνιξαν of Luke), and meant to denote what would be more fully expressed by συμφυεῖσαι ἰπνιξαν. See note on Luke.

—καρπὸν οὐκ ἴδωκε] 'did not yield fruit.' This was not necessary to be said of the former seed sown; but here it was with reason expressed, since the first growth might justly afford some hope of a prosperous increase.

8. αὐξάνοντα] I cannot receive, as Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. have done, αὐξανόμενον; for though there be strong ancient authority for, yet internal evidence is against it, considering that the active form (also found in Matth. and Luke) is more agreeable to the Greek of this Evangelist, than the Midd. Reflexive, 'to increase oneself,' though used thrice by St. Paul, and often by the pure Class. writers. And when we consider the quarter from which this reading proceeds, there is every reason to think it a mere correction of style by ancient Aristocrats. For the reading εἰς instead of ἐν, adopted by Tisch. and Alf. (not Lachm.), there is next to no authority; and proof is wanting of the existence of the idiom εἰς ἐξήκοντα. The genuineness of the reading ἐν has been so ably established, and its exact sense explained by the best Expositors from Grot. to Fritz., that no one can doubt, but those Critics who think nothing right but what comes from a certain favourite quarter. See more infra v. 20.

9. ὁ ἔχων] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read δεῖχει, from B, C, D, L, Δ, without any cursive; nor can I add even one from the Lamb., Mus., and Scriv. collations. The reading may be genuine, and be Hellenistic Greek for the Class. ὅστις; but the extreme slenderness of external authority cannot but induce us to suspect that it was derived from that fertile source of emendation, — the Latin copies, which read 'qui habet.'

10. οἱ περὶ αὐτόν] Equiv. to the οἱ μαθηταὶ of Luke, meaning the disciples in constant attendance, not, as Euthym. supposes, the Seventy disciples; for they had not yet been appointed. For τὴν παραβολήν, Tisch. and Alf. read τὰς παραβολὰς, from B, C, D, Δ; while Lachm. retains lec. rec.; — very properly, since there is not sufficient evidence for the other reading; though, in addition to the Cod. Amiat. I can adduce the very ancient Cod. Lamb. of the Vulgate; and internal evidence is in its favour.

11, 12. On the sense of this passage see the note on Matt. xiii. 10, 17, where we have the citation in a complete state, and doubtless as our Lord quoted it.

11. γινῶναι after δέδοται is absent from A, B, C, K, L, and 12 cursive MSS., and is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but retained by Scholz and Fritz., of whom the latter accounts for the word's having been lost founded on a palaeographical principle; but it involves a mere hypothesis. We are, however, not bound always to show how an omission took place, espec. when the MSS. are, as in the present instance, few, and form a class; then the omission may have been purely accidental; which was probably the case here, for I see not how the word can be dispensed with, without leaving the sense very imperfect; for how can τὸ μυστήριον be supposed of itself to mean 'a knowledge of the mystery?' At any rate, it is in vain to oppose the testimony of all the MSS. except seventeen (to which I can only add one, the Trin. Coll. Camb. B, 16, 10, Scriv.), confirmed by all the Versions except the Coptic.

12. τὰ ἁμαρτήματα] Some suspicion attaches to these words, both from their being absent from several MSS., and because of the var. lect. παραπτώματα; and they are cancelled by Tisch. and Alf. Nevertheless, they are supported by 3 of the most ancient MSS., and all the early Versions, and are probably, though not certainly, genuine.

14. ὁ σπείρων τὸν λόγον σπείρει] The last two words are here put out of their natural order for the purpose of more strongly conveying the sense, which is, 'He who soweth, it is the Word [of God] that he soweth,' or, 'is sowing,' q. d. 'he is preaching the kingdom of God,' 'speaking the word of life.'

15. αἶρει] The readings ἀρπάζει in C, Δ, and ἀφαιρεῖ, itac. for ἀφαίρει, in D, are both easier readings, the former derived from the passage of Matth. Critics might well stumble at the term, since the idiom is, strictly speaking, never found in any pure Greek writer. One may compare the use of the Gothic hlifan, the Scottish and English to lift.

For ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις αὐτῶν, Tisch. and Alf. (not Lachm.) read εἰς αὐτούς, from B and εἰσιν ὁμοίως οἱ ἐπὶ τὰ πετρώδη σπειρόμενοι, οἳ, ὅταν ἀκούσωσι 13. 8.

6 cursives; to which I cannot add, but can abstract one; for the reading is, I find from Jacks., not in the Leicester MS. It is in vain to oppose the whole of the MSS. except a very few, confirmed by all the Versions, except the Coptic, on the ground that it was an alteration from the passage of Matth. I will not believe that the Evangelist could have written any thing so flat, and so little in accordance with the character of his style, as εἰς αὐτοὺς, or its correction in other MSS., ἐν αὐτοῖς. The reading, I doubt not, came from certain Critics, who did not comprehend the force of the expression, and who thought they were improving, while only weakening and impairing its spiritual significance. They ought to have known, that this peculiar expression, which St. Mark must have often heard from the mouth of St. Peter, is meant to intimate that 'the thing is not a matter of the head, but of the heart'; the Gospel is not sown in the head, but in the heart. Suffice it to refer to James i. 21, διῆρασθε τὸν ἱμνυτον λόγον τὸν δωράμενον σῶσαι τὰς ψυχὰς ὑμῶν.

The reading of A, and the original of the Coptic Vera, ἀπὸ τῆς καρδίας αὐτῶν, is evidently derived from a marginal Scholium, in which the words were adduced from the parallel passage of Luke, the Scholiast meaning to intimate (what is very true) that the complete sense intended to be conveyed was αἶραι τὸν λόγον, τὸν ἱσπαρμίνον ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις αὐτῶν, ἀπὸ τῆς καρδίας αὐτῶν. The words subjoined in St. Luke (and peculiar to that Evangelist), ἵνα μὴ πιστ. σωθ., are very important, as intended to intimate the imminent peril to be constantly apprehended from the great enemy of souls, who is continually using all possible methods to prevent the means of faith and grace from attaining their end, in the salvation of the souls of men. Comp. 1 Pet. i. 9, κοιμίζομενοι τὸ τέλος τῆς πίστεως ὑμῶν, σωτηρίαν ψυχῶν.

[18, 19. οὗτοί εἰσιν, &c.] Instead of this, several ancient MSS. and the Italic Versions have καὶ ἄλλοι εἰσιν, which reading has been adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But I must still agree with Matthæi, Fritz., and other Editors, in retaining the former; for I am persuaded that the above reading is no other than a critical emendation, devised for the purpose of removing a certain inconvenience, as involved in the repetition of the words οὗτοί εἰσιν,—and which is not to be obviated by taking the second οὗτοί εἰσιν as put per analepsin in the sense hi sunt, inquam; for thus the words would proceed most lamely. Again, I would retain the received text, οἱ—ἀκούοντες (for which is found οἱ ἀκούσαντες, which has been adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.), because, I observe, Mark here follows, not Luke, but Matthew: at least with the exception of changing, as does Luke, the singular into the plural, in order thus to make the application more suitable to each class of persons.

Again, I would by no means, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., cancel the τούτου after αἵωνος, this being found in all the MSS. except four; for as to D (adduced by Tisch.), it has βλῶν,—a reading doubtless derived from the passage of Luke. It is plain that the alteration of reading in both cases originated in a critical correction of Grecism; that of D derived from the above-mentioned passage of Luke, and that of B, C, L, Δ, another correction of style by Critics; since in Classical Greek ὁ αἰών, without any addition, denotes either 'the world,' or 'the life of man.' Which of these senses they had in view we cannot know, but they intended, we may be sure, to remove the Hebrew idiom (often found in the Rabbinical writers), in which the pronoun is indispensable, since it conveys a tacit opposition to 'the world to come.' The implied opposition to another world is here (as at Matt. xiii. 22) plain, meaning the anxious cares about this world (i. e. to avoid its pains, and enjoy its pleasures), without any due care for another,—the future and eternal one. Important is it to attend to this opposition, since care for another world tends to quicken the springing of the heavenly seed; whereas care for this world tends to choke it.

The full sense meant to be conveyed in these two verses may be best expressed as follows: 'and they who are sown among the thorns, are such as hear, indeed, the Word; but the anxious cares of this world, and the deceivableness of riches, and the desires about other matters [besides riches],—namely, the gauds of life [the pleasures of sensuality in general], entering in, choke the Word, and it becometh unfruitful.'

As regards certain particulars in phraseology, I would not, with some Expositors, regard ἀπάτη as standing for πέρψις. I prefer to retain the commonly received interpretation, by which it is understood to denote the deceivableness, or 'deceiving tendency,' of riches, as existing in those various deceits which accompany riches, ever producing disappointment, and throwing a veil over the heart, as to real happiness here and hereafter. See 1 Tim. vi. 17.

20. οὗτοί] Internal evidence is rather in favour of ἐκείνοι, adopted by Tisch. and Alf., considering that οὗτοι may have been introduced from the parallel passage of Luke; but the at-testation of three MSS. is quite insufficient; and it was more probably a correction of the Critica. Lachm. (Ed. 2) retains οἱ τοι.

— παραδέχονται] i. e. 'give it, not only the admission of mental assent (as expressed by the term in the parallel passage of Matth., συνίαν), but of heartfelt acquiescence, and entire approbation,—holding it fast in mind and heart, as expressed by the term in the passage of Luke, κατίχουσι. On the reading just after, ἐν—ἐν (adopted by Tisch. and Alf.), see note supra v. 8. It was the more easily introduced here from the harshness of construction attached to ἐν—ἐν. The best way of accounting for this use of ἐν, where we should expect ἐς, is to suppose (with Grotius and Fritz.) that the Evangelist suddenly returns back from the thing, and the application, to the parable itself.

²¹ αὐτοῖς] That this is to be understood of the disciples, who were thus privately instructed, and not the people at large, appears from the parallel passage of Luke viii. 16. Comp. also vv. 21. 24. 26. And though vv. 21—25 are brought forward in another sense at Matt. v. 15. x. 26. vii. 2. 13, yet proverbial sententiae like this are (as Grotius observes) applicable in various views. On the sense here see Whitby. The purpose, then, of our Lord in this verse is to call their attention to his words, espec. because by thus instructing them he meant to fit them to be instructors of others; thus suggesting to them their duty to become such, which lesson is pointed by a familiar illustration; q. d. 'a candle is not lit to have its light hidden; for its design is to give light, and that not to the space under the bushel, but to the whole room.' With this peculiar use of ἐρχεται (equiv. to φέρειται) comp. Aristoph. Eccl. 27, ἀλλ' ὁρᾷ τόνδε λύχνον προσίστντα.

By κλίνην must be understood a couch, which, as Grotius observes, had such a cavity as to admit of a candelabrum being put under it; nay, it seems, any thing much larger. Indeed, from the citations adduced by Wetstein, it appears to have been used by the ancients as a common hiding-place. [Comp. Matt. v. 15. Luke xi. 33.]

^{22—32}. In these verses is a further continuation of our Lord's discourse, having for its purpose to prevent, at any future time, a feeling of discouragement at the slow progress of the Gospel.

²². ἀπόκρυφον] lit. 'hidden away,' 'left unrevealed,' and so unknown. This furnishes an example of the Hebrew, or, indeed, Oriental use called by the Grammarians Evergia, namely, that of repeating, for greater force, any weighty sentiment in other words; on which see the Dissertation of Schoëtgen, appended to the second

vol. of his Hor. Hebr. For ἐς φαν. ἔλθῃ, Tisch. and Alf. (not Lachm.) edit, from C. D. L. Δ. et al., ἔλθῃ ἐς φαν.; but the authority is insufficient; and internal evidence is adverse, from the probability of there being a marginal gloss, as is the reading of B, φανερωθῇ. The phrase is so rare, that it occurs, I believe, nowhere else but here and in the parallel passage of Luke. As to the force of the sentiment in its present application, it may be, what many Expositors suppose, 'There is no doctrine, now so darkly and figuratively propounded by me, but which you, my disciples, will hereafter set forth distinctly, and without the involvements of mystery and parable.' And such is evidently the sense intended in the parallel passage of Luke viii. 17, with which compare Matt. x. 26. Here, then, we have intimated a conjoint sense at once of duty and design,—duty on the part of the Apostles and their successors, and design on the part of Divine Providence.

²⁴. καὶ ἔλεγεν· ἀκούετε] Render: 'He said also to them: See to it (take heed) as to what you hear;' not simply, what, quid et quale sit, as Grot. and Rosenm. and most Commentators explain, as though this contained a caution to stand on their guard lest they should be deceived, that thus by proving all things they might hold fast what is good; for this is not permitted by the following context, nor by the word of the parallel passage of Luke, σine v. l.; which, however, is not, as many Expositors suppose, equiv. to τί, as if τί could mean how. The passage they cite to establish this, 1 Cor. vii. 16, τί γὰρ οἶδας, does not prove it, since there the τί is interrogative, not declarative. Nor can I approve of keeping (as not a few Expositors do) the terms quite distinct, as if our Lord used both; unless, indeed, on two different occasions; which cannot be thought of. It seems best to consider the two expressions as meant to convey the same sense, and that required by the following context in Mark; the only difference being, that what is expressed in Mark indirectly and by implication, is in Luke expressed directly and clearly. Something like this view (which can alone reconcile the seeming discrepancy) seems to have been in the mind of Calvin.

— καὶ προστεθήσεται ὑμῖν τοῖς ἀκ.] Render: 'and more shall be added unto you who hear,' i. e. more of knowledge; as almost every Interpreter of note, down to Meyer, explains; while Mr. Alford, strangely enough, explains it to mean, 'more shall be demanded of you who hear [the mysteries of the kingdom of God], addition shall be made,' or, as we should say, 'laid on,' i. e. of account. But προστ. will not, without great violence, admit of such a sense. The general import of the passage may be thus expressed: 'According to the measure of attention, which ye bestow on hearing, will be the measure of improvement imparted to, i. e. attained by you. And unto you that hear with attention, shall more knowledge be imparted (i. e. will be attained by you); for to him that hath such attention as to have attained to some knowledge shall more be given; but from him that hath not bestowed due attention to increase his knowledge will be taken away (i. e. lost) that knowledge which he hath attained to.' See more on Matt. xiii. 12.

The words τοῖς ἀκούουσιν, not found in MSS. B, C, L, and a few others, have been cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., in spite of the unanswerable defence of them by Fritz., who, however, without authority and needlessly, removes the words, and places them after προστιθεῖς ὑμῖν, as they would have been placed in a Class. writer. And indeed it was, I suspect, at the position of the words, rather than at the words themselves, that the ancient Revisers took exception, and thus adopted the slashing mode of criticism.

25. For ἂν ἔχῃ, several uncial and many cursive MSS. have ἔχει. Their testimony is confirmed by almost all the ancient Versions, and the reading is adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; perhaps rightly, for internal evidence is quite in its favour, from its being more agreeable to the unstudied style of St. Mark.

27. καθέυδῃ καὶ ἐγείρηται, &c.] This expression is like that of Ps. iii. 5, ἰκοιμήθην καὶ ὑπνώσα, ἐξηγήθην, and is an expressive image of easiness and unconcern, security and confidence.

For βλαστάνῃ, Tisch., Lachm., and Alf. read βλαστᾷ, from B, C, D, L, Δ, and a few others; but on insufficient authority. Yet the reading may be genuine. But if it be, it must be an Indic., at least that is the case in the only other example that I have found of the word.—Schol. on Pind. Pyth. iv. 133, βάλλει καὶ βλαστᾷ Ἄρκ. So that Mr. Alford's decision on the readings βλαστάνῃ καὶ μηκύνῃται as "corrections, fancying that βλαστᾷ was Indic." is evidently naught. If βλαστᾷ be the true reading, it must be Indic.; and then βλαστάνῃ καὶ μηκύνῃται would be glosses, or plainer readings for those. But I really cannot admit, even in Mark's Greek, except on far better grounds, such a breach of Grammar as the use of the Indic. would involve.

28. αὐτομάτως properly signifies self-moved, and is here (as often in the Classical writers) used of that energy of nature which is independent of human aid. Thus it is equiv. to αὐτοφυής. It is, however, not confined to the Class. writers, but occurs in the Sept., Levit. xxv. 5, et al. The γὰρ, cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., only on the authority of 5 uncials and Origen, cannot be dispensed with, and was only removed by Critics who doubted the suitability of the particle, and cancelled it: while others, having a little more discretion, thinking it better to heal than to amputate, altered it to ὅτε, doubtless from the Versions. Any thing better than bringing in an Asyndeton so out of place.

—καρποφορεῖ is generally taken for φέρει; the καρπο being inert, as in Diod. Sic. p. 137, ἄμπελος—καρποφορεῖ τὸν οἶνον. But Beza, Pisc., and Fritz. more properly give it the full sense fruges fert, and take φέρει from it in the next clause.

—χόρτον] For want of some such definite term as our blade, the Greeks and Romans were obliged to use the same word as denoted grass. Χόρτον and στάχυν are put in the singular, because they are used in a generic sense, which implies plurality. Στάχυν (derived from στάω) denotes the ear in its green state, and it is so called from the peculiarly erect form it then has. Πλήρῃ σῖτον means the complete, perfect, and mature grain. So Gen. xli. 7, στάχυες πλήρεις. Here, then, the several stages of the mysterious process carried on by nature are expressed by a sort of natural climax.

—πλήρῃ σῖτον] MS. B has πλήρῃς σῖτος, and MS. D, πλ. ὁ σῖτος. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit the former reading. But no change is necessary, the ε, I doubt not, arose from the σ following. There exist other variations of reading, occasioned chiefly by it not having been seen that καρποφορεῖ stands for φέρει. The expression πλήρῃς σῖτος might be defended, or even adopted, did the same MSS. present χόρτος and στάχυν, and then καρποφορεῖ would have its usual sense. Not to say that thus much vividness and spirit would be imparted, as follows, 'First [there is] the blade, then,' &c., as in Simpl. in Epict. c. 38 (cited by Wets.), ἀπὸ πυροῦ καλὰμῃ [ιστῇ] καὶ (and then) καλὰμῃ, καὶ ἀσταχυν, καὶ πάλιν πυρός. This, however, is a case in which the authority of MSS. has especial weight, and that forbids the change.

29. ὅταν δὲ παραδῷ ὁ καρπός] With this passage the ancient Translators were so perplexed, that they either gave versions which wander from the sense, or else they expressed the sense in a general way by 'when the crop is ripe.' The best mode of removing the difficulty is to suppose an ellipsis of ἐάντων (as in the case of many other active verbs to which use imparted a reciprocal λαμβάνειν, παρίχειν, ἐφίαναι, ἐνδιδόναι, ἐπι-δίδοναι, and παραδόναι), which, though it does not occur in the Class. writers, is found in Hellenistic Greek: ex. gr. Josh. xi. 19, οὐκ ἦν πόλις, ἥτις οὐ παρέδωκε (surrender) τοῖς υἱοῖς Ἰσραὴλ. 1 Pet. ii. 23, παραδίδου δὲ τῷ κρίνοντι δικαίως. The question, however, is, to whom the fruit is to be understood to yield itself up, and deliver its increase? To the reaper, say the Commentators generally. But I prefer, with Fritz, to refer it to τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ, taken from the preceding. Thus also ὁ ἀνθρώπος, meaning the husbandman, must be understood at ἀποστέλλει. As to ἀποστέλλει τὸ δρέπανον, it is put, by a seemingly porphyra metonymy, for

 'he sendeth those who may put in the sickle;' i. e. the reapers. A similar mode of expression occurs in Joel iii. 13, ἐξαποστείλατε δρέπανα, ὅτι παρίστηνεν ὁ τρύγητος, and Rev. xiv. 15.

30. For τίνι, Tisch. and Alf. read πᾶσι, from B, C, D; while Lachm. retains τίνι, rightly, since internal evidence is as much in its favour as external authority. The same MS. reads just after ποία, and I doubt not that the Critics introduced those readings for the sake of removing the tautology they found in the text before them, which had τίνι—τίνι, possibly the original reading.

31. ὡς κόκκῳ] Most of the uncial MSS., and very many cursives, have κόκκον, which is adopted by Lachm. and Alf. It has, however, been proved by Fritz, that the reading in question cannot be tolerated, it being impossible to justify the construction; nor would even a preponderance of MS. authority for κόκκον turn the scale in its favour, since authority of MSS. in the case of so minute a difference, as that between the v and the i adscript, is of no great weight either way.
 Moreover, the ὡς (which seems, by being misunderstood, to have occasioned the mistake in κόκκον) is put either, by a harsh brevity, for ὁμοία ἐστίν· or rather the ὡς is to be taken in the sense as it were, and παραβαλοῦμεν to be supplied from the preceding παραβάλωμεν. In his 2nd Ed. Tisch. has restored κόκκῳ.

34. χωρὶς παραβολῆς] That this ought to be rendered 'apart from parable,' i. e. unparabolically, will abundantly appear from the note on Luko viii. 4, for παραβ. here is used in quite the same way as in διὰ παραβολῆς (equiv. to ἐν παραβολῇ) there.

— ἐπέλυε] i. e. 'explained by solving the difficulties,' removing the obscurities.—a use not found in N. T., but occurring in the Sept., Philo, and Joseph., and also, though very rarely, in the Class. writers.

For μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ, Tisch. and Alford read μαθ. ἰδίοις, from MSS. B, C, L, Δ, et al.
 But there is not sufficient external evidence to warrant the change; espec. since in MS. B we have both ἰδίοις and αὐτοῦ,—a mixture of two readings, one interlinery, thus leaving it uncertain which of them was in the text of the archetype; though I little doubt that it was αὐτοῦ, or αὐτοῦ, and that ἰδίοις came from a marginal Scholium. Thus in 2 Pet. ii. 22 (cited from Prov. xxvi. 11) we have κύνι ἐπιστρίψας ἐπὶ τὸ ἴδιον ἔξισαμα, where the Sept. has αὐτοῦ
 ἔξ. The same Hebr. pronoun is used indifferently to express either one or the other term.
 Lachm. was well aware of this, when he prudently retained here the text. rec.

36. παραλαμβάνουσιν—ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ] Most Expositors here take ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ as put for εἰς τὸ πλοῖον, in the sense, 'after he had dismissed the multitude, his disciples took him, just as he was (i. e. unprepared as he was, and without delay), on board the ship.' As, however, this taking of ἐν for εἰς is here somewhat harsh,
 I should be rather inclined to agree with Euthym.
 and some other ancients, together with several modern Commentators, in joining ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ with ὡς ἦν; which renders any enallage unnecessary. Thus the sense will be, that 'on the dismissal of the multitude, they carried him off, just as he sat in the boat [out of which he had been teaching].' Yet such a reference to the boat mentioned supra v. 1, involves a certain harshness, and the sense arising is unsatisfactory.
 'H' is a term not significant enough to have ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ joined with it; which words are plainly joined in construction with παραλα-βάνουσιν. Moreover, ἐν τῷ πλ., is, strictly speaking, not used for εἰς τὸ πλοῖον, but is a phrasis praeputans (and hence the Lat. is used for the Accus.), denoting, 'they took him on board, and carried him in the bark' [namely, that mentioned supra v. 1]. See note on Matt.
 xiv. 32. In this sense παραλαμβάνειν is used in Thucyd. i. 111, et alibi. To advert to the expression ὡς ἦν, this need not be understood in the somewhat jejune sense just as he was, i. e.
 without waiting for refreshment or accommodations for the passage. It may simply be taken to mean, as in many passages of the best writers, 'quam celerrime.' See my note on Thucyd. iii. 30, ὥσπερ ἔχομεν. However, since our Lord's determination to cross over the lake, late in the evening of the day, when he delivered the above parables, seems to have been sudden—so sudden that there was no opportunity for further provision for the voyage,—I am inclined to think that both the senses of ὡς ἦν on which I have treated may have place. Fritz. here aptly compares Lucian, Asin. c. 24, κάτω ἀφῆκαν ὡς ἦν ἐν τῷ δέσμῳ.

For πλοῖάρια, several of the most ancient MSS. have πλοῖα, which is adopted by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; while Fritz. and Scholz retain πλοῖάρια,—rightly, for though the word is one of rare occurrence, yet it is elsewhere found in the present Gospel (namely, iii. 9), and five times in that of St. John, and in three of those the same class of MSS. read πλοῖα. The Revisers of the above ancient MSS. probably stumbled at the uncommonness of the word and its supposed want of Classic purity. Yet it is found in Aristoph. Ran. 139. Xen. Hist. iv. 5, 17. Diod. Sic. l. ii. 57. Arrian, Perip. p. 10, 7, and 20, 33. From those passages the πλοῖάρια seems to have been a very light-built wherry, such as might be rowed by one man plying two small oars. However, as applied to the boats on the lake of Genesareth, where such cock-boats could not live, the term may have denoted a ferry-boat (as opposed to one of burden) to transport passengers from place to place. Nevertheless, πλοῖα may have been the original reading; and I find it in a few ancient Lamb. and Mus. MSS.

37. αὐτὸ ἤδη γεμίζεσθαι] Lachm. and Tisch. edit ἤδη γεμ. τὸ πλοῖον, from B, C, D, L, and the later Syr., Copt., Vulg., and Ital. Versions. Internal evidence is quite in its favour, as is, perhaps, the parallel passage of Matt.; and it is probably the true reading. Accordingly we might render, 'So that the vessel was already being filled,' or, as is said in the passage of Matt., 'covered' (καλύπτεσθαι) with the waves; but the expression employed by Mark (which, however, does not occur in the Class. writers) is more graphic, and probably suggested to Luke the very peculiar term (unprecedented elsewhere) συνεπληροῦντο, which (by a not unusual confounding of the ship with the ship's crew, found in the purest Greek writers) is put for συνεπληροῦτο τὸ πλοῖον.

38. For ἐπὶ, I have now, with all the recent Editors, received ἐν τῇ πρ., from A, B, C, D, L, et al., which, considering that internal evidence is quite in its favour, may be regarded as the true one. The other is, I doubt not, a gloss. As to the reading of D and others, ἐπὶ προσκε-φάλαιον, it is, probably, a mere correction of style. And so in Plato, Polit. i., we have καθῆστο ἐπὶ τινος προσκεφάλαιον. Yet the other construction is unexceptionable, though not Classical Greek. The only peculiarity of moment is the δυνεποικητία, involving a pregnancy of sense; the full meaning being, 'and he was seated on the cushion asleep;' for προσκεφ., though it generally denotes a pillow for the head, here signifies 'cushion to sit, or 'to recline, on.' Thus it must have been taken by Theophyl.; though when he says ξύλινον δὲ πάντως ἦν τοῦτο, there is not so much (what Fritz. imagines) a mistake on the part of Theophyl. as an error of the scribes, who mistaking, perhaps, an abbreviation, wrote ξύλινον instead of some other word, perhaps σκύντινον,—a divitiatio rendered almost certain by a passage of Pollux x. 40, where he refers to Aristoph. Amphiar. for the expressions κνίφαλον and προσκεφάλαιον, and he remarks that they were made τῶν λινῶν, καὶ σκύντινων καὶ ἐρίων. This use of προσκεφ. for 'cushion to sit upon,' though rare, is found occasionally in even the purest Class. writers, though the ancient Grammarians regarded it as an ἀδύναμις, and supposed that ὑπὸ ἡρώσιον οὐκ εἶχε to be used; but it has place in Plato ubi supra, Cratin. in Horis ap. Pollux. x. 40, Hermipp., and other of the purest Greek writers.

— διεγείρ.] Tisch. and Alf. read ἰγείρ., from B, C, D, et al.; while Lachm. retains διεγείρ., very properly, as appears from the occurrence of διεγερθεὶς infra v. 39, where D has ἰγείρβ. But διεγ. is confirmed by the passage of Luke.

39. πεφίμωσο] The ancient Critics stumbled at the use here of the Imperat. Perfect; and hence some (as the Reviser of the text of D) altered the reading to the Imper. Aorist φημιώθητι, having in mind passages of Mark i. 25, Luke iv. 35, and Matt. xxii. 12,—not aware of the force of the Imperat. Perf., which is here espec. prominent, reference being made to the permanence of the consequences of the action denoted by the verb. The full force of the term can only be drawn forth by rendering, 'Be stilled (or silent) and continue still!' The Asyndeton is highly suitable to the august dignity of the address; though even here the ancient Critics could not forbear misplaced alteration. Thus the Cod. D obtrudes a καὶ of connexion.

In the next words, ἐκόπασεν—γαλήνῃ, the Evangelist probably had in mind Ps. cvii. 20, "He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still," lit. 'hushed;' the true force of the term here, ἐκόπασεν. True is the remark of Bp. Jebb (Sac. Lit. p. 175), that 'St. Mark's description of the present occurrence is fuller and more picturesque than those of his brother Evangelists;' the reason for which may be, that St. Mark wrote under the direction, and probably in this instance from the lips of one who was not only an eye witness of our Lord's Divine power over the winds and waves, but who, above all other eye-witnesses, had special cause to be impressed by every exercise of that power,—being, on another occasion, enabled by Christ to walk upon the water,—a privilege peculiar to himself.

41. ὑπακ. αὐτῷ] Tisch. and Alf. read αὐτῷ ὑπ., from C, L, Δ, and 6 cursives of the same class, regarding the text. rec. as derived from the passage of Luke, as if all the copies except ten would be altered from that passage! It is far more probable that the position found in those ten MSS. came from the Critics, who thought that a more dignified position of words, by which an emphasis might be imparted to αὐτῷ, would be more suitable to the august nature of the occasion; forgetting that the speakers are the common sailors. Such alterations of position on grounds as weak as here, occur perpetually in the MSS. of the Family of B, C, L, and also D and its kindred. Thus here the MS. D reads ἡ θάλα. καὶ ὁ ἄνεμος,—a reading derived from the Ital. Vers., but an alteration arguing folly on the part of the Critics. As to the reading ὑπακούει, instead of ὑπακούουσιν, adopted by Tisch. and Alf., from B, C, L, Δ, and 6 cursives of the same Family, it is evidently a mere false correction by some Critic, who thought that the verb in the singular, called for by the καὶ—καὶ, would impart more force to the expression. But the shallow Critic did not perceive that the former καὶ is not connective, but intensive. Lachm. has here evinced sound discretion by not varying at all from the text. rec.

V. 1. Γαδαρηνῶν] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit Γερασηνῶν, but from only MSS. B, D, the Vulg. and Ital. Versions, and Greg. Nys.—an authority far too slender to warrant the change. The true state of the case as regards the reading here and in the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke, I have considered in the note on Matt. viii. 28, where I have shown that Γεσαρ. cannot be admitted.

3. μνήμασι] This, for μνημείois, I have, with all the recent Editors, adopted, on the strongest authority. The common reading arose, no doubt, from ver. 2. The tombs of the ancients, espec. in the East, were tolerably roomy vaults, and would be no indifferent shelter for the houseless, or such poor wretches as demoniacs or lepers, driven from human habitations. Indeed, from Diog. Laert. ix. 38, ἱρημάζων ἱνίστοι, καὶ τοῖς τάφοις ἰνδιατρίβων, we find that they were sometimes used as places of abode. See also Ia. lxv. 4. In fact, the tombs in question were doubtless hypogææ, coverns cut out of the mountains, doubtless similar to those at Telmessus and Petra; and which, as we learn from travelers, still remain, and form, at the present day, habitations for the living.

—οὔτε ἀλύσειν οὐδεὶς ἠδ. α. δῆσαι] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. omit, from a very few uncial MSS., οὐδὲ ἀλύσει οὐκέντι οὐδεὶς ἰδ. α. δ. The reading οὐδέ is called for by strict propriety of language; nevertheless, it is occasionally found in the later and less pure Class. writers, such as Polvæn.; and here οὐδέ probably arose from Critical emendation. The οὐκέντι is, I conceive, indefensible. It arose, I suspect, from marginal conjecture on the part of those Critics who wished to read καὶ οὐχ ἀλύσει ἔτι οὐδεὶς, as in some MSS. We have καὶ οὐχ ἀλ. οὐδ. ἔτι. But the ἔτι yields a very forced sense, and came, I suspect, from a marginal Scholium. Fritz. has shown, by a full and able critical discussion, that all the various readings of the uncial MSS. arose, more or less, from a desire to soften down and polish the roughness of the Evangelist's composition. As to ἀλύσει, found only in MSS. B, C, L, 33, it is passed over by Matth., Griesb., and Fritz. as wholly unworthy of attention, though adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but on very precarious grounds. External evidence is next to nothing, considering that though it is found in two of the most ancient MSS., yet the Syriac and Vulg. Versions, which support ἀλύσεις, are, espec. the Pesh. Syr., far more ancient. Moreover, internal evidence, properly weighed, is rather against ἀλύσει, which would have to be understood in a sense quite unprecedented, and taken generically for vinculus. In short, the reading arose, I suspect, purely from an error of the scribes, by their confounding one with another the two abbreviations which express -σει and -ει.

4. Worthy of observation is the minute accuracy, so characteristic of St. Mark, of the several terms here employed. The hand-chains were burst asunder, and the foot-chains were broken by being rubbed together.

5. ἐν τοῖς—ἡν] This punctuation I have adopted with the Vulg., Syr., E. V., Doddridge, Winer, and Fritz., as being required by propriety. To place the comma after κράζων, as is generally done, would yield a false sense. The reading ἐν τοῖς μν. καὶ ἐν τοῖς ὄρεσιν for the common reading ἐν τοῖς ὄρεσιν καὶ ἐν τοῖς μν., is found in many of the best MSS., and almost all the Versions, and is edited by Griesb., Fritz., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch. Here, indeed, it is the more suitable, since the words will thus be placed in the same order as νυκτός and ἡμέρας; an order most proper and correct, the sepulchres being probably their habitation by night, and the μοναταῖς by day. For those, too, were used occasionally as habitations. So Aristoph. Lysist. 787, ὅς φεύγων Γάρον, ἀφίκεται ἐν ἱερμίαν, καὶ τοῖς ὄρεσιν ᾤκει.

— κατακόπτων] 'hacking himself.' This circumstance of hacking himself with sharp stones, instead of a knife (which, of course, would not be granted him), is quite in the manner of maniacs; who often tear their flesh, and cut it with whatever they can lay their hands on. So Pausan. Lacon., cited by Wetstein, says of one: ἐτίτρωσκε αὐτὸς αὐτόν, καὶ διεξέει το σῶμα ἅπαν, κόπτων τε καὶ λυμαινόμενος. See also Just. xiii. 6, 17. In the present instance, however, it was manifestly the result of demoniacal possession.

7. εἶπε] Fr., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit λίγει, from A, B, C, and several other uncial and cursive MSS.;—perhaps rightly (see note on Matt. xiii. 28, and Mark vi. 31); and the εἶπε may have come from the parallel passage of Luke. Moreover, Mark often uses λίγειν, espec. in the Present tense.

— Θεοῦ τοῦ ὑψίστου] The epithet ὑψίστος, as applied to God, occurs no where else in the Gospels, and only once elsewhere in the New Test., i. e. Heb. vii. 1, taken from Gen. xiv. 22. It corresponds to the Heb. רָם. The appellations seem to have been at first given with reference to the exalted abode of God, i. e. in heaven. See Isa. lxvi. 1. They may also refer to the supreme majesty of the Deity. Hence in the Old Test. רָם is almost always used to distinguish the true God from those who were called gods.

— ὀρκίζω σε τὸν Θεόν] This formula usually denotes to put any one on his oath. See note on Matt. xxvi. 63. But here (as Grotius, Rosenm., and Kuinol have shown) it has the force of oro, obtestor te per Deum, and thus is equivalent to the διομαί σου of Luke vii. 28.

— μὴ με βασανίσῃς] Namely, as some ancient and modern Commentators explain, 'by compelling me to depart from the man.' But this interpretation, however agreeable to the context, is somewhat harsh, and is not permitted by the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke; from which it appears that the word is to be taken of the mode of torment, which was supposed to be apportioned to demons, after being compelled to come out of possessed persons, namely, the being forced (as Luke expresses it) εἰς τὴν ἀβυσσον ἀπελθεῖν (see 2 Pet. ii. 4, and Rev. ix. 1, 2. xi. 7, &c.), a term applied by the Greeks to their Tartarus. The words of ver. 10, καὶ παρεκάλει—ἔξω τῆς χώρας may, indeed, seem to favour the first-mentioned interpretation. But they are equally suitable to the other. The demons entreat that if they must depart from the man, they may at least not be compelled to leave the country; which was but another form of preferring the first-mentioned request, that he would not send them away to the place of torment.

8. ἔλεγε γὰρ αὐτῷ] Propriety of language in this tense will not permit us to render 'had said.' Nor is this rendering called for by the παρήγγειλεν of Luke viii. 29, for there the true reading seems to be παρήγγελλον. Render: 'for he was saying to him, strictly charging him.'

— τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἀκάθαρτον] This I have pointed off, because (though the Editors have not seen it) πνεῦμα is as it were a Votive; the Nom. with the Art. being put for the Voc., as at ix. 25. In such a case the word is most usually a masculine or feminine; yet the neuter sometimes so occurs; as Luke xii. 32, μὴ φοβοῦ, τὸ μικρὸν ποίμνιον, Eph. vi. 1, τὰ τέκνα, ὑπακούετε, &c.

9. τί σοι ὄνομα] Spirits, both good and evil, are always represented in Scripture as having names: assumed, as Commentators think, in accommodation to human infirmity. Be that as it may, our Lord did not ask the name through ignorance, but (as Euthym. suggests) to thereby elicit an answer; that the bystanders might have the more occasion to admire the stupendous power by which the miracle was wrought.

— Λεγιών] This word (from the name of a well-known Roman body of troops) was often used by the Jews to denote a great number. That the term has that sense here (and not that of Chief of the Legion) is plain from the words following, and those of vv. 10, 12.

11. It is plain that text. rec. ὄρη cannot be right, because there is in that locality but one mountain, the Hippa. Accordingly we may, with Fritz., suppose ὄρη to have originated in an error of scribes, who often confound ε and η :

but, in fact, it arose, I doubt not, from Itacism. So that here, at least, the occurrence of τῷ δρεῖ in Luke cannot, as has been too often the case, be made an occasion of imputing to the Evangelist such modes of expression as he would never have employed. I find δρεῖ in nearly all the Lamb. and Mus. copies.

— χοίρων μεγάλη βοσκ.] As to the fact of a vast herd of swine so quietly feeding on Jewish ground, it may be accounted for by the Gadarenes living on the extreme border of Judæa, not only under heathen government, but with a population probably far more heathen than Jewish. The occupiers of the land on the mountain had, it seems, ventured (illegal as it was) to feed swine, not, indeed, of Jews, for their own use, but for that of the heathen population intermixed with them.

12. I would now not object to cancel πάντες, and enclose in brackets οἱ δαίμονες, though I prefer, with Lachm., to retain within brackets the former, and leave the latter unbracketed. Tisch. and Alf. rashly cancel both; though the latter is absent from only about 15 MSS. (none of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and is supported not only by the Pesh. Syr., Vulg., Italic, Persian, and Arab. Versions, but also by the MSS. A. and D, which, though presenting the alteration τὰ δαιμόνια, was evidently formed on the reading οἱ δαίμονες.

13. εὐθέως] I would retain the word not bracketed, as Lachm.; for the authority for its omission is slender; and internal evidence is quite in its favour, considering that it was more likely to have been passed over inadvertently (espec. as the position of the words varies in the earliest MSS.) than to have been intentionally inserted.

The words ἦσαν δὲ ὡς δισχίλιοι are absent from MSS. B, C, D, L, Δ, and some Versions, and bracketed by Lachm., and cancelled by Tisch. and Alf. But there is certainly no sufficient reason to cancel them. To the question, how came the words to be expunged? I answer, they were removed, I think, by the early Critics, for the purpose of improving the composition; since, as a parenthetical clause, the words come in too late in the sentence, and as an intermediate one they are too many. There is more of terseness and Classic neatness without the words (which, accordingly, the Critics removed), but less of the character of Mark's style. However, I cannot bring to mind, even in the Class.

writers, any such use of ὡς in a parenthetic, or even an intermediate clause. And when I consider that the words contain an exact detail so peculiar to St. Mark, and that such details are seldom, if ever, expressed by him in the short-cut manner which our Critics approve, I cannot doubt that the words ἦσαν δὲ are genuine.

14. For τοὺς χοίρους, MSS. B, C, D, L, read αὐτοῦς, which is received by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But the αὐτοῖς arose, I suspect, from the Critics, whose purpose it was, as usual, to remove a tautology; espec. considering that the above parallel passage of Matthew and Luke would suggest the alteration.

For text. rec. ἀπήγγειλαν, I have, with all the recent Editors, adopted the reading ἀπήγγειλαν. Again, for ἐξῆλθον, the reading ἦλθον, adopted by Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch., has considerable external authority, confirmed by internal evidence.

— τοὺς ὄρους.] Meaning the country district, or territory, belonging to Gadara. In ἰδεῖν τί ἐστὶ τὸ γεγονός we have, I would say, a popular mode of expression, signifying, 'to examine into the reality of any reported occurrence.' So Palaphe. p. 32, cited by Wets., ἰθαίμαξον τί ἐστὶν τὸ γεγονός.

15. θεωροῦσι τὸν—λεγεῶνα] There is no reason to adopt any of the changes here found in MSS., and supported by Critics; not even the cancelling of καὶ before ἱματισμένον, for it tends to strengthen the sense. And although there may seem an unnecessary addition in τὸν ἐσχηκότα τὸν λεγεῶνα after τὸν δαιμονιζόμενον, yet the latter is far more significant; and there is a sort of climax. Render: 'They see the demoniac seated; both clothed and in his right mind; him [I say] who had been possessed by the demons who called themselves Legion.' The being seated is mentioned as a proof of sanity of mind, since maniacs rarely sit (see note on Acts iv. 14), but go restlessly roaming about, as driven by demoniacal influence. Comp. Luke viii. 29, ἡλαύντο ὑπὸ τοῦ δαίμονος εἰς τὰς ἱρῆμους.

— τὸν ἐσχηκότα τὸν λεγεῶνα] lit. 'who had had, by their dwelling in him, been possessed by.' So Luke viii. 27, ὅς εἰχε δαιμόνια. This seems to have been an expression of common life.

16. καὶ διηγ.—χοίρων] The full construction and complete sense of this very briefly-worded passage is, καὶ διηγ. πῶς ἐγένετο τῷ δαιμονιζόμενῳ, καὶ πῶς ἐγένετο περὶ τῶν

¹⁸. ἵνα ᾗ μετ' αὐτοῦ] 'might accompany him.' Many Commentators suppose this was from fear lest the demons should again enter into him. But a better motive may fairly be ascribed.

— παρακαλεῖ, instead of text rec. ἐποίησε, is found in the greater part of the MSS. (including also Lamb. and Mus. copies), with some Fathers and the Edit. Princ.; and has been, with reason, received by all the recent Editors. Indeed, propriety would seem to require the preterite; for (as Fritz. observes) 'in the dispossessed person, the effect of the things which the Lord had done remained; but the compassion (denoted by ἡλέησέ σε) was a matter which would be transient.' Yet ἐποίησε occurs in the parallel place of Luke,—and that Evangelist is generally correct in his use of tenses.

²¹. διαπερ. ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ ε. τ. π.] Render: 'when Jesus had passed over by the skiff (that mentioned supra iii. 9. iv. 1. 36. v. 2) unto the opposite side [of the sea], and was [standing] by the sea-shore'; for I would not take θάλας simply as put absolutely, as supra iii. 7, but conjoined with παρὰ, to denote 'the sea-side,' as in Matt. xiii. 1, and Mark iv. 1.

²². εἰς τῶν ἀρχισ.] 'Ἀρχισυναγωγὸς' properly signifies 'a president of a synagogue.' But there was but one synagogue at Capernaum; and from the expression εἰς τῶν ἀρχισυν., taken in conjunction with Acts xiii. 15, and what we learn from the Rabbinical writers, we may infer that in a synagogue there was not only one who was properly President, but others, consisting of the more respectable members, who also bore the title; either as having exercised the office of President, or because they occasionally discharged its duties; which were to preserve decorum and the proper forms of worship, and to select and invite those who should read or speak in the congregation.

— ἐσχάτως ἔχει] 'in ultimis est,' 'is at the last stage of the disease.' The phrase ἐσχάτως ἔχειν, which occurs only in the later Greek writers, as Diod. Sic. and Polyb., is equivalent to the more Classical ἐσχάτως εἶναι, or διακείσθαι. Compare πονηρῶς ἔχειν, Xen. Cyr. vii. 5, and θανασίμως ἔχειν, Arrian, Epict. iii. 26.

— ἵνα ἐλθὼν ἐπιβῇς, &c.] Of the various modes of removing the difficulty of construction which here exists, that which supposes an hyperbaton is inadmissible, since such an hyperbaton as this is unexampled. To suppose a circumlocution for the imperat. is as little to be approved. If there be, what Fritz. thinks there is, an ellipsis of some verb, it is most natural to supply, as does the framers of the Persian Version and Grot., παρακαλῶν from παρακαλεῖ just before. But, after all, there here exists a greater anomaly, and that arising from a blending of two modes of expression,—namely, λέγων ὅτι τὸ θυγάτριόν αὐτοῦ ἐσχάτως ἔχει, ἵνα ἐλθὼν ἐπιβῇ αὐτῇ τὰς χεῖρας, καὶ λέγων τὸ θυγάτριόν—ἔχει: ἐλθὼν ἐπιβῇς αὐτῇ τὰς χεῖρας ὅπως σωθῇ. For ζήσεται, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit, from MSS. B, C, D, L, et al., ζήσῃ. But that reading, I suspect, arose from a correction of the Grammarians, since ζήσῃ is purer Greek; but the other, as being the later Greek form, was more likely to be used by Mark, and is found in all the copies at the parallel passage of Matthew.

For ὅπως before σωθῇ, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit, from 5 uncial and several other MSS., ἵνα; whether rightly or not, I would not pronounce. It is possible that ἵνα may have sprung by mistake from the ἵνα just before, or the ὅπως may have been substituted for ἵνα, for the purpose of removing tautology: or ἵνα may have been introduced as a grammatical correction. In such a case, weight of authority from MSS. must decide, and that is in favour of ὅπως.

25. οὖσα ἐν ῥύσει αἵμ.] This peculiar, and perhaps Hellenistic phrase, occurs also in Luke viii. 43, the pure Greek one αἰμορροῦσα, in Matt. ix. 20, though we should rather have expected it from Luke the Physician, considering that the term occurs often in Hippocr., and sometimes in Galen and Aretæus. It, however, has place in the Hellenistic Greek of the Sept., as Levit. xv. 32.

26. πολλὰ παθοῦσα] The expression is a strong one (like the 'diu à medicis vexatus' of Celsus); yet when we consider the ignorance of Jewish physicians, and the various nostrums prescribed in such a case (on which see Lightfoot), many of which would be nauseous and strong, and all of them injurious to a habit of body so languid as in this disease, we may conceive that the woman's sufferings would be great. At πολλῶν the Expositors compare the saying of Menander, πολλῶν ἰατρῶν εἰσοδός μ' ἀπώλισε.

After παρα I still retain the reading αὐτῆς, which I find in almost all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies: and I continue to suppose the genitive here as used where strict propriety would have required the dat. This is confirmed by those MSS. which read αὐτῇ. That the MS. B has, or that its original had it, I doubt not; though the collator has noted αὐτῇ. The terminations -ην and -ηι are perpetually confounded by the scribes. On the anomalous construction existing throughout this portion (vv. 25—27), Fritz remarks, that the Participles ἀκούσασα and ἐλθοῦσα have nothing to do with the preceding ones οὖσα and ἐλθοῦσα, but are put ἀσυνδίτως. The difficulty may, however, he thinks, be removed by considering the words οὖσα ἐν ῥύσει—εἰς τὸ χεῖρον ἐλθοῦσα as quasi-parenthetical, and showing the nature of the disease. Thus καὶ γυνή τις will connect with ἀκούσασα περὶ τοῦ Ἰ., ἐλθοῦσα for ἤλθε καὶ, &c. This, however, is so like re-writing the sentence, that it is perhaps better to consider the whole as one of the many examples of anacoluthon which occur in the New Test.

To turn from words to things; the several circumstances here adduced are mentioned for the purpose of showing that the woman's disease was incurable, and that she herself knew it to be so; thus evincing, as Bp. Smallbrook says, 'the strength of the woman's faith, and the greatness of the miracle.'

28. ἔλεγε γάρ] Several MSS. and some Latin Versions add ἐν ἑαυτῇ, which Fritz. thinks so indispensable to the sense, that he receives the words into the text; utterly disallowing the examples which have been adduced of a similar brevity of expression in λέγειν and the Hebrew qam. But, whatever propriety may dictate, and the usage of the best writers confirm, certain it is, that in the popular and familiar phraseology of most languages, the idiom is found; though it rarely, if ever, occurs, except when, from the circumstances of the case, no mistake can arise from the omission in question.

29. ἐξηράνθη ἡ πηγὴ τ. α.] Campbell translates 'the source of her distemper.' But this is neither a correct version, nor a good explanation. Πηγὴ must be taken in a physical sense, and ἡ πηγὴ τοῦ αἵματος αὐτῆς must be closely kept together, in which πηγὴ τοῦ αἵμ. is for ῥύσει τοῦ αἵμ. found in Luke viii. 43 (answering to the Hebr. ἡ ῥοι τῆς in Levit. xx. 18), a bloody flux.

—τῷ σώματι] 'by her body,' i. e., as Euthym. explains, διὰ τοῦ σώματος μηκέτι ῥαινομένου τοῖς σταλαγμαῖσι; for it is plain (as Fritz. observes) that the woman had been then suffering under the disorder in its greatest violence. Ὅτι ἵαται, 'she had been healed'; for it is the preterite, not the present (ἵαται); implying the completeness as well as suddenness of the cure, and showing, as Grotius says, the stupendousness of the miracle. Ἐγνώ is a very significant term, and denotes full conviction from actual experience.

30. ἐπυγνούς—ἐξελθοῦσαν] These words are thought to involve some obscurity. One thing, however, is plain,—namely, that from hence, and from Luke vi. 19, it appears that the power of performing miracles was not, with our Saviour—as in the case of the Prophets and Apostles (in consequence of which they ascribed their miracles to God)—adventitious, but inherent in him by his Divine nature. This, however, is but an inference from the words; in discussing the sense of which, even the best Commentators have not a little perplexed themselves and their readers. It is needless to advert to the vain speculations of those who refer to animal magnetism, or who ascribe the cure to an effluvium, or emanation. It is best to suppose the words not meant to be taken in a physical sense;—or to teach us the mode whereby the miracle was performed; but rather to be considered as a popular mode of expression (like διὰ τῶν χειρῶν, often used of the working of miracles); and, therefore, not to be rigorously interpreted, or bound down to philosophical precision; and only importing, that Christ was fully aware that a miracle had been worked by his power and efficacy. See Whitby, and Bp. Pearson, On the Creed, vol. i. p. 140. The sentence is, however, obscure, from ellipsis and transposition; and the construction is, ἐργαζομένη ἐν αὐτῷ τὴν δύναμιν ἐξελθούσαν ἐξ αὐτοῦ; where at τὴν δύν. must be supplied ἐν αὐτῷ οὖσαν from ἐξ αὐτοῦ ἐξελθ., 'knowing that the power of working miracles, which was inherent in him, had gone out of him,' as it were by the performance of a miracle through him. This force of δύναμις is indicated by the Article, from inattention to which many of the best Commentators take τὴν δύναμιν to simply signify 'a miracle,' which obliges them to interpret ἐξελθ. in the far-fetched sense, 'vim exerceantem.' [Comp. Luke vi. 19.]

33. The ἐπ' αὐτῇ after γέγονεν has been cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from MSS. B, C, D, L; very insufficient authority for cancelling the words, espec. considering that it was more likely they should be put out for the purpose of removing a homely construction, than put in for the sake of filling up an ellipsis. My view is borne out by the various readings ἐπ' αὐτῆς and ἐν αὐτῇ, of which each arose from marginal or interlinear glosses.

34. ὑπάγε εἰς εἰρήνην] This and the kindred phrases πορεύεσθαι, and βαδίζειν, εἰς εἰρήνην were founded on the Hebr. חָזַרְךָ שָׁלוֹם, and were forms of affectionate or condescending valediction, often found in the Old Test. (see Gen. xiv. 17. 1 Sam. i. 17. xx. 42), and meaning, 'i secundo omine,' 'Go in God's name.' But when employed in answer to a request, it implied the granting of the request; and in this case the best rendering will be, 'go for peace,' meaning, as far as regards the receiving of the boon solicited (so 1 Kings xv. 9, βαδίζων εἰς εἰρήνην), with a prospect of peace and joy, viz. as is here suggested, by being made whole of a painful disorder; though, in the present passage, this is not only implied, but expressed, in the words following. Such may be considered the sense meant to be conveyed in a passage of Exod. ix. 18, βάδιζε ὑγιαίνων, and Tob. xii. 5, VOL. I.

ὑπάγε ὑγιαίνων, in both which passages ὑγ. is only a free version of the Hebr. חָזַרְךָ שָׁלוֹם.

35. ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀρχισ.] Suppl. τινᾶς, 'from the Ruler's house,' for he was now with Jesus. So John xviii. 28, ἀγούσιν οὖν τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἀπὸ τοῦ Καίφα. The idiom is also found in Latin, and indeed in modern languages.

36. ἀκούσας] Tisch. and Alf. read παρακούσας, from B, L, Δ, and one Latin MS., to which I can add nothing from the Lamb. and Mus. copies. But the authority for the reading is exceedingly slender; and internal evidence is equally balanced for either. That ἀκούσας should have been introduced from Luke into all the copies, even those used by the Syr., the Vulg., and other Translators, is highly improbable. Nevertheless, it may be the genuine reading, and exchanged for ἀκ., as not being understood. But the question is, what is the sense of παρα in παρακούσας? Mr. Alf. renders, 'having straightway overheard the message being spoken;' a use of the verb infrequent, yet found in Plato, p. 300, παρ' αὐτῶν πάντα παρακούει. Aristoph. Ran. 750. Lucian de M. C. 37. Ælian, V. H. v. 9, and Hdot. iii. 129, though, I believe, no where else. Thus we see it occurs in the purest Attic Greek writers, and those who copied their model. Hence it was not likely to be known to St. Mark, though it might well be to the framer of the text of B, who might introduce it as not relishing the εὐθέως ἀκούσας (though that same construction occurs supra i. 10. 29. ii. 8. v. 30. vi. 27. ix. 15. 29), and who thought that παρακούσας would express the sense in a neater and more polished way. Of course the reading would readily come into L, almost a fellow-copy from the same original. If this be thought taking too much for granted, I should not object to receiving the word, espec. since I have now found it in an Hellenistic Greek writer, Jos. Antt. xiii. 3, 5, πάσαι παρακίκοις ὑπὲρ τῆς εὐμορφίας ἐτύγχανε. Render: 'as soon as Jesus had caught the sound of the words proceeding from,' &c.

38. καὶ ἔρχεται] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ἔρχονται, from 5 uncial MSS. and the Syriac Version; an authority very insufficient, considering that internal evidence is against the change. Griesb. rightly saw that the verb must pertain to Jesus; and I agree with him, that the librarii altered it as thinking that it was permitted to the three Apostles to follow Jesus, but, as Fritz. shows, erroneously. Καὶ before κλαίοντας is inserted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on the authority of the same class of MSS., perhaps rightly, since internal evidence is quite in its favour.

— κλαίοντας καὶ ἀλ.] scil. τοὺς ἀνθρώπους. These words are in apposition with and exegetical of θόρυβον. Ἀλαλάζειν, from ἀλαλα (akin to the Hebr. הָלַל), whence came our halloo. It denoted properly the shout uttered by the soldiers of all the ancient nations previous to battle, but was sometimes used of any shrill vociferation, espec. of grief, as here and in Jerem. xxv. 34. 47, and Eurip. Elect. 843, ἡσπαιρεν, ἡλάλαξε.

³⁹. [Comp. John xi. 11.]

— ἐκβαλὼν πάντας] This merely means, 'having ordered all to be removed.' Jesus retained just so many as were sufficient to prove the reality of the cure. To have permitted the presence of more might have savoured of ostentation. Πάντας, which I have edited for ἀπαντας, is found in very many MSS., all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and is adopted by Lachm. and Tisch.

Imper. The mistake might easily arise in so few MSS. (and two of those, B and L, traceable to a common source), from the abbreviation of μι being for a simple μ.

VI. 1. For ἦλθεν, Fritz., Lachm., and Tisch. edit ἔρχεται, from MSS. B, C, L; perhaps rightly, since internal evidence is quite in its favour. Supposing it to be genuine, we must regard it as the Narrative Present, of which examples occur supra v. 22. 38. viii. 22. xiv. 37. Matt. xxvi. 36. 40. Luke viii. 49, et al. sæpe, where the imperf. or the aorist is occasionally found in some of the MSS.

². For πολλοί, Lachm. and Tisch. read, from MSS. B, D, and others, οἱ πολλοί. But that yields not so suitable a sense; and this is no case for change of text. The ὅτι after αὐτῷ, absent from many MSS. (including some Lamb. and Mus. ones), several of them the most ancient, has been cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch.; while Fritz. retains and defends the word, though not quite successfully.

— πόθεν τοῦτω—γίνονται] The humble condition of our Lord's kinsmen, as well as his own lowly standing in society, scandalized his townsmen, no less than the Jewish generality, who, as Bp. Pearson remarks, in looking down on his inglorious condition in life forgot that that very condition had been distinctly referred to by the Prophet. Moreover, the occupation of a carpenter (which all the MSS. confirmed by Tradition, universally ascribe to Jesus), though lowly, was not degrading, being nearly on a level with that of tent-making, to which St. Paul was brought up. We are, however, not concerned to vindicate the honour of either occupation, since to do that would be (as Bp. Middl. observes) "as little agreeable to the spirit of the Religion of Humility, as was the fashion which once prevailed of defending the style of the sacred writers of the New Test., as though it were of Attic purity. He who can believe that the Almighty must of necessity choose the original promulgers of his will from among those only who possess the advantages of rank or of learning [and, we may add, eloquence], worships not the Universal Father, but the God of his own vain imagination."

11. ἐκτινάξατε—ὑποκάτω τ. ποδῶν] See note on Matt. x. 14, where I have shown the force of αὐτοῖς. The words τὸν ὑποκάτω are absent from the MS. D and a few others, and some MSS. of the Vulg. and Italic Versions; having, I doubt not, been removed as not found in the parallel Gospels, and seeming unnecessary; which they are not, the nature of the phrase being somewhat different,—namely, 'the dirt under your feet,' that clinging to the shoe soles.

I now feel less certain than heretofore of the genuineness of the words ἀμὴν λέγω—ἐκίνη, though they have the support of the Syriac Versions, and have been ably, but not quite successfully, defended by Fritz.

13. ἡλείφον ἐλαίῳ] It appears from various passages of the Medical and Rabbinical writers cited by Wets. and Lightf., that oil (which in the Eastern and Southern countries is of a peculiarly mild quality) was used by the ancients, both Jews and Gentiles, as a medical application. And that it was so employed by the Apostles, is the opinion of almost all the recent Commentators. But surely this circumstance—that the Apostles had successfully made use of a well-known medicine, would ill comport with the gravity and dignity of the preceding context; which compels us to suppose (with all the ancient and early modern Commentators) that the healing was as miraculous as the casting out of the demons; and, in either case, was the effect of the power which our Lord had given to his Apostles when he sent them forth;—a power, too, which continued for some time in the Christian Church. As to the anointing, it was only employed as a symbolical action, typical of the oil of gladness and grace, to be imparted by Divine assistance. For the first Christians, being accustomed to represent, by visible signs, the allegorical allusions in Scripture, used oil not only (as the Jews had done) as a remedy, which had from high antiquity become sacred; but also (from that sacredness) as a religious rite in Baptism, Confirmation, and Prayers for the Sick. Thus the anointing may be regarded as one of those significant actions by which both the Prophets of the O. T. and the Apostles (after their Lord's example), out of indulgence to human weakness, accompanied their supernatural and miraculous cures. See James v. 14. In all which cases the methods adopted in those actions (which were various) contributed nothing to the cure; that being effected by means supernatural, and derived from on high.

14. ἤκουσιν ὁ βασιλεὺς] There is here, seemingly, a want of the Subject to the verb. With this the early Critics (as the various readings show) have, indeed, furnished us; supplying τὴν ἀκοὴν τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, which Beza approves, and Fritz inserts in the text. But it is surely better to retain a harshness, than to get rid of it by such means. The best mode of removing it is, to suppose a brevisiloquentia, by which τὰ γινόμενα is left to be understood from the subject-matter, and confirmed by v. 9. It is expressed in Luke ix. 7, with the addition of πάντα, and in another way in Matt. xiv. 1; but that in the passage of Luke is preferable, since it includes, with the wonderful works of Jesus, the preaching, &c., of the Twelve.

15. ἄλλοι] I have now, with Lachm. and Tisch., admitted δὲ, from several of the most ancient MSS., including several Lamb. and Mus. copies, supported by internal evidence, and by the parallel passage of Luke ix. 8.

The ἢ before ὥς, which I long ago double-bracketed, on the strongest evidence, I find absent from almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies.

16. The ὅτι is cancelled by Lach. and Tisch., from B, C, L, and 5 cursive MSS., and the Syr., Vulg., and Ital. Versions. But Versions are in such a case of little weight, and the MSS. are too few to authorize any cancelling, espec. when internal evidence is, as here, adverse, from the greater probability of the ὅτι having been put out, than brought in. In fact, this ὅτι recitativum (as Philologists denominate it) is not unfrequently cancelled in the very same class of MSS. that here exclude it. See Matt. v. 31. vii. 23. ix. 18. xxi. 16. xxvi. 65. Mark i. 27. ii. 16. vi. 16. 18. xii. 6. 29. Luke xii. 27. xiii. 35. xix. 46. Johu i. 51. iv. 42. 53. vii. 31. ix. 23. x. 34; in most of which passages Lachm. or Tisch. (and sometimes both) cancel the ὅτι.

 Γαλιλαίας, 22 καὶ εἰσελθούσης τῆς θυγατρὸς [αὐτῆς] τῆς Ἡρω-

17. I am now inclined to think the τῇ before φυλακῇ not genuine. External evidence is strong for its exclusion. I find it absent from all the best Lamb. and Mus. copies. It was more likely to be brought in, than put out.

18. ἔλεγε] Here, and in the parallel passage of Matt. xiv. 4, I would render ἔλεγε not ditul, much less dixerat, 'had said;' but dicebat, 'used to say;' denoting that he did not say it merely once, but several times, i.e. as often as was necessary, both privately and publicly, to denounce so foul an offence.

19. ἐνέειχεν αὐτῷ] Not 'had a quarrel with,' as E. V.; but, 'bore a grudge against him.' Ἐνέειχεν (equivalent to ἐγκοτεῖν) signifies 'to harbour' (literally, 'have in mind'), κότον, 'a grudge,' or 'resentment,' against any one. The complete phrase occurs in Hdot. i. 118. vi. 119. and viii. 27, the elliptical one in Luke xi. 53. Gen. xlix. 23.

20. ἐφοβεῖτο τ. 'I.] Render, 'stood in awe of John, held him in great reverence,'—a sense which the word bears also at Luke xviii. 2. Eph. 33, and sometimes in the later Greek prose writers, as Plutarch and Herodian. On again attentively considering the questio verata as to the true sense of συνετήρει, I am still of opinion that the interpretation, 'watched him closely,' 'kept him in close custody,' for protection against the malice of Herodias, involves too great a harshness to be adopted. And though the interpretation is very ancient, being found in the Vulgate Version and the Glossa ordinaria, yet the other, 'observabat,' is much more ancient, being found in the Pesch. Syr. Version and Theophyl. (probably derived from Chrys.). Moreover, this studious care and protection of John's safety is inconsistent with the wish to put him to death, ascribed to Herod, Matt. xiv. 5. Indeed I agree with Bode and De Lyra, that at the time of the birth-day banquet Herod's mind was so set against John, that his sorrow at John's tragical end was very much in semblance, and that he inwardly felt some satisfaction that he could take away his life in a way which might find some excuse with the people, as if he had done it constrained by conscience. However, the verbs ἐφοβεῖτο, συνετήρει, and ἡδέως αὐτοῦ ἤκουε, relate only to the time before John had offended Herod by his faithful representations; and the force of the Imperfect describes only his heretofore customary dispositions and feelings towards John. The only formidable difficulty to assigning the sense observabat to συνετ. is its extreme rarity, inasmuch that even the erudite Valckn? regards the expression as καὶνῶν ῥηθῆν; which need not be thought strange, if we view it as one of those idioms of common life which occasionally occur in St. Mark's Gospel. Nevertheless, an example is adduced by De Rhoer, Lection. p. 106, from Diog. Laert., who has φίλους συνετηρεῖν, where he says it signifies colere, observare amicos.

21. γεν. ἡμέρας εὐκαίρου] Notwithstanding that so many eminent Expositors interpret this of 'a solemn feast-day,' that view of the sense cannot be maintained, considering that this use of εὐκαίρου is, as Fritz has shown, of much later Grecian than that of the Evangelist's age, and I would decidedly acquiesce in that of the Ital. and Vulg. Versions, adopted by Fritz, and others, 'a convenient day,' or 'time,' 'a fit season,' i.e. for Herodias to accomplish her malicious design. Thus it is used, by an Hellenistic idiom, for καιροῦ εὐκαίρου, which expression occurs in Hdtan i. 4, 7. Plut. de Educ. § 14, and Aristen. i. 2.

—τοῖς μεγιστάσιν] A term of Alexandrian Greek, formed from μέγιστος, as μέγας from μέος, and found elsewhere in New Test. only, in Rev. vi. 15. xviii. 23. Out of the New Test. it occurs only in the Sept., the Apocr., Joseph., and the very late Class. writers, as Artemid. It is equiv. to the Latin magnates, 'great men,' men distinguished by rank and high public station; as courtiers, or governors. The next term πρώτοις denotes the principal persons of those in a private station. So Jos. Antt. vii. 9, 8, οἱ τῆς χώρας πρώτοι.

22. αὐτῆς τῆς] The αὐτῆς is absent from some inferior MSS., and the τῆς from others; while the MS. B has αὐτοῦ. But Lachm. and Tisch. retain the text, rec. without expressing any doubt; though αὐτῆς is worse than useless; and I am inclined to think it was only a var. lect. of τῆς, but one not to be received. Accordingly, I have bracketed it. The reading, αὐτοῦ, if received, must be taken as an adverb there, as several times in the New Test. But here it would very harshly discover θυγατρός from τῆς Ἡρ., and would yield a sense very jejune.

24. ἡ δέ] Tisch. and Alf. read καὶ, from the MS. B; while Lachm. retains ἡ δὲ, very properly. For αἰτήσομαι, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read αἰτήσωμαι, on strong external authority, confirmed by internal evidence. According to this the sense will be, 'what must I ask?' For βαπτιστοῦ, Tisch. reads βαπτίζοντος, from MSS. B, D, L, et al., while Lachm. retains βαπτιστοῦ, very properly (comp. Matt. xiv. 8); though internal evidence is in favour of the Participle.

26. οὐκ ἠθέλ. α. ἀθετῆσαι] The true force of the expression οὐκ ἠθ. seems to be, 'he was indisposed to do it,' 'did not care to do it,' 'could not bring himself to do it;' of which use, somewhat rare, examples are found in the best writers from Homer downwards. Suffice it to adduce Hom. II. xiii. 106. τὸ μένος καὶ χεῖρας Ἀχαιῶν Μίμειν οὐκ ἰθέλεισκειν. Thucyd. iv. 73, 4. τῶν Ἀθηναίων οὐκ ἐτίθησάντων μάχεσθαι.

Of ἀθετῆσαι α. the sense is 'to disappoint her,' by refusing her request: a sense chiefly confined to the later writers, who use the word either absolutely, or with an Accus. of person, sometimes accompanied with acc.; rarely with an Accus. of thing. That the above rendering of ἀθετῆσαι most exactly represents its true import, appears by considering that the ratio metaphorica in that term is 'to disappoint any one' by removing, or displacing what had been fixed and settled by previous engagement. Finally, αὐτὴν cannot be put, as Dr. Robinson, Lex., imagines, for 'her request;' but must rather, as it is done by Bretechn., Lex., be taken as put for the 'πρόστασις' or rather the promise, or solemn engagement, made with her; as Jos. Antt. xv. 26, οὐδένος ἀθετήσιν ὡς ἔχου. Polyb. xxx. 2, 7, ἀθετ. τὴν πίστιν.

27. σπεκουλάτορα] So I now edit, from almost all the most ancient MSS. This term, from the Latin speculator, denotes one of the body-guards; who were so called, because their principal duty was that of sentinels: for I agree with Casaubon, Wetstein, and Fritz., that they had their name from their office speculari, and not, quasi speculatores, from speculum; because the former alludes to their chief business. They had, however, other confidential duties; and among these, that of acting, like the Turkish soldiers of the present day, as executioners. As to the sense, the word may best be rendered sentinel, since the appellation belongs to those soldiers of the body-guard who took, in their turn, the watch, at the various approaches to the royal presence, and whose office it was to espy danger, and ward it off.

— ἐνεχθῆναι] Tisch. and Alf. read ἐνέγκαι, from B, C, Δ; but wrongly, since it is evidently a mere alteration, introduced for the purpose of getting rid of a very unusual construction, never, I apprehend, found in any pure Greek writer. Lachm. prudently retains ἐνεχθῆναι.

29. The τῷ before μνημείῳ has been, on strong grounds, removed by all the recent Editors.

31. εἰπεν] There is strong evidence for λίγειν, which all the recent Editors adopt, instead of εἰπεν, but no absolute demand for change. The contrary is the case with ἀπαυάσασθε just after, for text. rec. ἀναπαύσασθε, which has been adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. Mark was likely to use the Present ἀερε, as he has done infra xiv. 41, εἰσε v. l., and though it is so rare that I know of no other instance besides Matt. xxi. 45, in Xen. Anab. vii. 3, 4, ἀναπαύσασθε, and Dan. xii. 13, σὺ δὲ ὄρεαι καὶ ἀναπαύου, whereas the Aorist is not unfrequent, τόπον, καὶ ἀναπαύεσθε ὁλόγον. ἦσαν γὰρ οἱ ἐρχόμενοι καὶ οἱ 14.

 ὑπάγοντες πολλοὶ, καὶ οὐδὲ φαγεῖν ἠύκαιρου. 32 Καὶ ἀπῆλθον εἰς ἔρημον τόπον τῷ πλοίῳ κατ' ἰδίαν. 33 καὶ εἶδον αὐτοὺς 13 and accordingly was likely to be introduced here.

— εἰς ἔρημον τόπον] The phrase recurs at v. 32, and at 35 we have ὅτι ἐρημός ἐστιν ὁ τόπος, in all which passages the true sense is—as it is also in the parallel passage of Luke—‘a tract of country (from lying waste and uncultivated),—with little or no population,’—a sense this very suitable to the context, considering the circumstance recorded by John vi. 15, that our Lord retired from the busy haunts of men, as knowing that they were about to lay hold of him to make him a king. This sense of ἐρημος to signify uninhabited, occurs also in Jer. xxiii. 10, ἐρημος—ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων. Xen. Cyr. iv. 4, 2. Thucyd. i. 5, 2, ἐν χωρίῳ ἔρ.

32. τῷ πλοίῳ] Lachm. and Tisch. add ἐν, from MSS. B, L, D, and three cursive MSS. (add Lamb. 1179), which seems confirmed by Matt. xiv. 13, ἀνεχώρησαν ἐν πλοίῳ, and supra v. 21. Nevertheless, internal evidence is against the word, which was more likely to be put in, from the parallel passage, than put out; for this use of the Dative of instrument, by (as we should say, ‘to go by ship’), is rather unfrequent. The ancient Critics ought to have seen that the expression τῷ πλοίῳ, or πλοίῳ without Art., is used in order the better to answer to πρὸς τὸν πλοῖον, ‘by land,’ occurring just after.

33. καὶ εἶδον—πρὸς αὐτόν] Editors and Commentators are alike agreed that this passage has suffered grievously from transcribers; and the unusual diversity of readings has here (as in many other cases) led Critics too readily to take interpolation for granted; and, in order to relieve the plethora, pruning has been unsparringly employed by the recent Editors. Griesbach edits thus: καὶ εἶδον αὐτοὺς ὑπάγοντας· καὶ ἐπῆλθον πολλοὶ· καὶ κίχθ' ἀπὸ πασῶν τῶν πόλεων συνίδραμον ἐκεῖ. But for this, and most of the other alterations that have been made, there is little authority. Indeed, there are no sure grounds for alteration, except for the cancelling of οἱ δόχλοι, which is found in scarcely any good MS., and has been cancelled by all the Editors from Matthæi downwards. Thus πολλοὶ becomes the subject of the verbs εἶδον and ἐπῆλθον. This view, however, lies open to no little objection. The sense thence arising is, as regards εἶδον, frigid, and, as concerns ἐπῆλθον, inapposite; for, as Campbell remarks, ‘the historian would not be likely to say that many knew him, since, after being so long occupied in teaching and healing them, there would be comparatively few who did not know him.’ Hence, I cannot but suspect that πολλοὶ—though the authorities for its omission are but weak—should not be here. Yet it does not, I suspect, stand quite for nothing; but, as it is scarcely possible for us to dispense with a subject, and as the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke have οἱ δόχλοι, I suspect that under this πολλοὶ is concealed that very reading. In this I am supported not only by Critical probability (for the words πολλοὶ and δόχλοι are frequently confounded) but by the authority of the other Evangelists; and, indeed, of all those numerous MSS. which contain δόχλοι, since they may be considered as authority for the reading in question; there being little doubt but that in their Archetypes the reading δόχλοι was written in the margin, and intended as a correction of the textual πολλοὶ. On again carefully reconsidering this perplexing question, I am of opinion that the above is probably the true reading: but it requires too much to be taken for granted to be safely adopted. By removing, as I have done, the αὐτόν, on competent authority, confirmed by internal evidence, the objection urged by Campb. falls to the ground; but another arises, owing to the want of some subject; and αὐτοὺς, found in several ancient MSS., only attests the endeavour to supply, though unsuccessfully, that subject. In revising the text, I have made no other alteration than by bracketing οἱ δόχλοι, and cancelling αὐτόν. I have not thought proper to adopt, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., the reading ἐπῆλθον, 1) since the authority for it, that of B, D, and 3 cursives, is quite insufficient; 2) because the sense thus arising is inapposite, and makes the want of a subject more apparent; and 3) because it puts out that slight portion of light which we have; for the true subject left to be understood after ἐπῆλθον, and supplied from the subject-matter, is τὸ πρᾶγμα, the sense being that ‘many of the multitude perceived,’ ‘were aware of, what they were about,’ ‘penetrated their intention.’ Comp. Luke v. 22, ἐπῆλθον τοὺς διαλογισμοὺς. But the want of a subject to εἶδον is so great, that if δόχλοι be removed from the text, it must be supplied from the subject-matter; which involves great harshness; and hence I cannot but suspect that it was expunged by certain Critics, who thought that it did not well consist with πολλοὶ. Accordingly the passage may be rendered: ‘And they (i. e. the multitude) saw them withdrawing, and many of them perceived what they were about,’ or ‘the course which they intended to take;’ and, as we find by the subordinate words, which yield a sufficiently plain sense—if at least the words καὶ συνῆλθον πρὸς αὐτόν be removed (as they have been by all the best Editors), as evidently arising from a marginal scholium. The sense will thus be: ‘And [accordingly] they flocked together, ran thither (viz. to the place they had guessed), on foot from all the cities, and endeavoured to precede them (meaning our Lord and his Apostles) in getting thither.’ One may imagine how the people who saw our Lord and his Apostles withdrawing, drawing off from the land on ship-board (a use of ὑπάγω found also at James vi. 21), might be in a situation so circumstanced in respect of them, as to be enabled to arrive before them at the place whither they were bound. Yet this would seem impracticable, and is forbidden by what is suggested in the next verse. Accordingly, I prefer to understand the term as denoting (by a frequent idiom) the endeavour for the action absolutely carried out. However, I suspect that Mark wrote προῆλθον αὐτοὺς, i. e. ‘strove to be beforehand with each other in reaching their dea-tionation.' This use of the accus. for the genit. occurs at least in the later Greek writers, e. gr. Scholiast on Aristoph. Vesp. 1352.

I am not aware of any further difficulty, except the want of a subject at εἶδον, and a suitable one at ἐπέγνωσαν—which difficulty can only be removed by the method which I have long ago proposed. There is, indeed, some harshness in the supplying of the above particular after ἐπέγνωσαν; but this kind of subaudition is found at Acts ix. 30, and in the instance of the simple verb γινώσκω, infra v. 38, and ix. 30. Luke ix. 11.

For αὐτοῖς after προήλθον, Lachm. and Tisch. read αὐτοῖς, from B, D, L, and 2 others; perhaps rightly, for the construction with Accus. occurs infra viii. 2, and ix. 22, in all the copies. The reading αὐτοῖς may have come from Matt. xiv. 14, where see note.

34. ἐξελθὼν] The term occurs also in the parallel passage of Matt. xiv. 14; but the question in either case is, what is the sense? Our English Translators and Expositors generally, and most of the Foreign ones, take it to mean, 'having gone out of the ship,' 'disembarked.' Thus there will be an ellipse of τοῦ πλοίου, which is expressed infra v. 54. They, for the most part, interpret the word in the same way at Matt. xiv. 14, though some, as Wakefield and Meyer, differently. But this mode of treating passages so entirely parallel is quite inadmissible. The ellipse, too, of τοῦ πλοίου needs proof; which cannot, I apprehend, be adduced; for I have not found a single example elsewhere of this use (like egressus in Latin). Certainly the term is in both passages to be explained in the same manner; and as at Matt. xiv. 14, it cannot but mean 'having come forth' (so our common Version and Wakef., 'went' or 'come forth'), viz. from the place whither, after disembarkation, he had gone with his disciples, and taken post,—namely (as we find from John vi. 3), at τὸ ὄρος, a kind of peak-like eminence, or knoll, rising a little above the rocky margin of the eastern sea-coast of the lake and its top,—namely, that laid down in the latest maps as situated one mile and three-quarters from the coast, and about the same distance from Bethsaida Gaulon. The Article τὸ designates the mount as well known. This must be the same with the situation termed, less definitely, by Matthew and Mark ἔρημος τόπος; but by Luke ix. 10, with sufficient precision, τόπος ἱεροῦ πόλεως καλ. Βηθσαϊδά, meaning Bethsaida Gaul., at the top of the lake; and also called Julia, from the colony planted there. It was, as Reland in his "Palestine" has shown, on the East side of the lake; and was probably a peak, or knoll, rising above the mountain range which skirts the coast of the lake along the whole extent of the Gaulonitis. To this mountain peak, then, I would refer the term ἐξελθὼν in the passages both of Matthew and Mark; and the term is sufficiently appropriate, considering that there is reference to the site as our Lord's fixed abode during his sojourn in the desert of Bethsaida. So John says ἐκὶ ἐκέῃητο μετὰ τῶν μαθητῶν. This view I find supported by Euthym. (probably from Chrysost., or some other ancient Greek Father), who, after inquiring πῶθεν ἐξελθὼν λάσατο καὶ εἰδίδασκε [Ἰησοῦς]; answers, πάντως ἀπὸ τοῦ ὄρους,—namely, that mentioned in John vi. 1—3, and after adducing the words of the Evangelist, he subjoins προέλαβε γὰρ ἐν πλοίῳ μετὰ τῶν μαθητῶν (meaning that they outstripped the multitude, who had gone thither by land) καὶ ἀνελθόντες εἰς τὸ ὄρος, διανεπαύοντο. εἰτα ἐξῆλθε (he went forth), καὶ λάσατο, καὶ εἰδίδασκε. It may, indeed, be objected, that Mark says of the multitudes, περὶ ἀπὸ πασῶν τῶν πόλεων συνέδραμον ἐκεῖ (whither they saw the boat directing its course) καὶ προήλθον αὐτοὺς. But this, considering the situation of the two parties, would be physically impossible; nor is there any good reason to suppose that Mark meant to assert it; for though the words καὶ προήλθον αὐτοὺς are in the text. rec., and are adopted by Lachm. and Tisch., there is great uncertainty as to the true text of the whole passage.

35. ὥρας πολλῆς γενομένης.—καὶ ἤδη ὥρα πολλή] A very remarkable phrase, by which it seems meant lit. that 'the time of day is long,' i. e. 'long (or, as we should say, high) in figure,'—equiv. to late in hour, and thus equiv. to the phrase in Matt. xiv. 15, ὀψίως γενομένης. The only exx. quoted to the purpose, of this peculiar phrase are Polyb. v. 8. 3, ἡμέρα, πολλῆς ὥρας (scil. γενομένης) ἐπὶ τὸ θέρμον. Dionys. Hal. Antt. ii. 54, διεμίνον ἀχρι πολλῆς ὥρας ἀγωνιζόμενος, ὥς ἡ νύξ.—διέκριμεν αὐτοῖς.

36. ἄρτους· τί γὰρ φάγωσιν οὐκ ἔχουσιν] Lachm. and Tisch. edit. from 2 MSS., αὐτοῖς τι φάγωσιν. This, however, is alike unsupported by external authority and by internal evidence, as existing in its having every appearance of being a critical alteration, but without improvement.

^{37.} For δώμεν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit δώσομεν, from A, B, L, Δ, and 2 cursive MSS.; but without reason. They ought to have taken into account the reading ἀγοράσομεν, found in several of the same MSS.; which variety of reading induces me to think that the cause of the diversity was not, as Fritz. imagines, the very frequent confusion of ω and ο by the scribes, but is rather to be sought in the Critics supposing that the Future Indic. ('what shall we') would possess more spirit, and be more suitable to the occasion; and accordingly, almost all the Versions follow it. But the Subjunct. presents a sufficiently suitable sense,—namely, 'What, must we go and buy?' 'are we to go and buy?'

^{39.} συμπόσια συμμ.] This is to be understood in a distributive sense for κατὰ συμμ., 'by parties.' Συμμ., though a term properly applied to denote drinking parties, was also used of parties of any kind.

^{40.} ἀνέκλινον] lit. 'reclined:' a term, like ἀνακλίνει just before, and ἀνακειμένους in John vi. 11, employed with allusion to the reclining posture of the ancients at meals. Πρασιαί πρ., for κατὰ πρασιας, 'by companies.' Πρασία (from πράσον, 'an onion') properly signifies 'a plot of ground, espec. a garden-bed of onions; and as such beds are in square, or parallelogram, the word came to denote (like our word squadron, as derived from quadrato) a company of persons disposed in square, or in regular order for counting.

— For ἀνά, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. adopt κατὰ, from B, D, and the Coptic Vers. But, in a case like this, no Vers. (espec. so mean a one as the Coptic) is of any weight; and the external authority for κατὰ is quite insufficient, espec. considering that internal evidence is not favourable. This reading ἀνά may have come, as Alf. thinks, from the parallel passage of Luke; but it is so highly improbable that all the MSS. except two should have been thus altered (for κατὰ is found in all the Lamb. and nearly all the Mus. copies) that we can scarcely doubt the genuineness of ἀνά, and we may very well suppose κατὰ to be an alteration of certain Critics, who thought, without reason, that κατὰ was the more proper expression, as in 1 Cor. xiv. 27, 31. Nay, κατὰ may even have been a marginal gloss.

^{45.} For ἀπολύσῃ, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ἀπολύει, from MSS. B, L, Δ;—authority far too slight to warrant any change. Besides, it would introduce a worse Grecism than any to be found even in this Gospel; for when ἵσται is used of a future, the Present indicative is never used, except in the case of a verb like ἔρχομαι, when the Present is used in a Future sense. I doubt not that here ἀπολύει arose solely from a blunder of the scribes for ἀπολύσει, and later Greek writers use the Future Indic. with ἵσται, and hence, considering that the terminations -η and -αι are, by Itacism, often confounded, Mark may have so written. Yet there is no sufficient evidence that he did; and, since in the parallel passage of Matt. xiv. 22, we have ἀπολύσῃ in all the copies, and it is not likely that ἀπολύσῃ should be introduced here into all the copies except those, I would retain that reading; espec. considering that it is confirmed by all the ancient Versions, except two copies of the Italic, which have dimisit, doubtless an abbreviation for dimiserit, confirming the reading ἀπολύσει. However, ἀπολύει may have been written, by Itacism, for ἀπολύῃ. On the whole, there is evidently here no case for change.

— πρὸς Βηθ.] At John vi. 17, it is εἰς Καφερναούμ. But the discrepancy is more in semblance than in reality; since, from what I have said on Mark iii. 7, it is plain that we have only to attend to the distinctive senses of πρὸς and εἰς, to remove the difficulty thus presented. The Apostles' course was, it seems, directed 'towards,' in the direction of Bethsaida; though the voyage was to be terminated at Capernaum.

48. εἶδεν] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ἰδών, from B, D, L, Δ, 3 cursives (Evangel.), and the Vulg. and Ital.; to which I can add nothing from the Lamb. or the Mus. copies, except Lamb. 1188, also an Evangel. evidently of not quite the same weight with the Codices generally. But this manifestly insufficient authority Mr. Alford must suppose quite made up for by internal evidence being quite in its favour,—namely, by, as usual, taking for granted an alteration in all the regular copies except four,—and all for what? “for elegance, on account of the parenthetical clause ἦν γὰρ αὐτοῖς.” It is difficult to see where this elegance lies. At any rate, the term should seem more applicable to the reading of the above four MSS.; and no wonder, since it came, I doubt not, from those Critics who have by their emendations on so many other occasions approved their claim to be esteemed ‘elegant Critics.’ And the credit of this emendation must be ascribed to the Framers of the text of the MS. B; for in that alone is the καὶ before περὶ τετάρτην certainly absent. At any rate, the Vulg. has the Article, and so has MS. D. I cannot but suspect that the ἰδών of that MS. was an error of the scribe (one of the most blundering on record) for ἰδών, which was, I doubt not, in the archetype, espec. considering that it occurs in others of its family, as the Leic. MS. omitted by Wets.; to which I add Lamb. 1179. Thus it agrees with A, K, M, N, X; and it occurs in several of the most ancient Mus. copies.

— ἤθελε παρελθεῖν αὐτούς] Much trouble might have been spared to Expositors by considering the phrase as a popular one, for ‘he would (i. e. he was about to) have passed them;’ i. e. ‘he made as though he would have passed by them.’ Comp. Luke xxiv. 28.

50. πάντες—ἐταράχθησαν] The πάντες here is not to be pressed upon (and, indeed, it is passed over, as well as εἶδον αὐτόν, by the Persic Translator); or rather, it is to be taken both with εἶδ. and with ἐταρ.; for I cannot but think that the most faithful, if not the most literal version, will be, ‘for as soon as they all saw him, they were seized with trepidation.’ This is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version, ‘et isti omnes videndo eum conturbati fuerunt.’

51. καὶ ἐθαύμ.] The words are absent from B, L, Δ, and 5 cursives, with Vulg. and Ital., and cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., by whom the text. rec. is characterized as ‘combination of gloss on ἐξίσταντο.’ I characterize Mr. Alford’s reading as an emendation of Critics who thought the words useless; which, however, is far from being the case, for they involve an intensity of expression by a sort of Hendiads, as the Pesch. Syr. Trans. was well aware. In short, is it conceivable that all the copies with the exception of eight (for I can add nothing from the Lamb. and Mus. copies) have been interpolated with what would seem superfluous? As to the Vulg. and Ital., the authority of Versions against a word which would seem unnecessary is of very slender weight, but for them very considerable. Lachm. was probably not aware of this, since he only brackets the words. Finally, that the words are quite genuine, will appear from note on Matt. ix. 8.

52. οὐ συνήκαν ἐπὶ τοῖς ἄρτοις] A singularly-worded expression, obscure from brevity, and of which the full sense is, ‘they did not even on reflection on the miracle of the loaves (which they had just seen) understand the power of the Lord alike over all nature.’ Thus by ἄρτοις is meant, as Krebs observes, τῷ θαύματι τοῖς ἄρτοις γινομένῳ. That Commentator, however, and Kuinoel, seem wrong in assigning to ἐπὶ the sense post. It is rather per, by, from, denoting the efficient cause; as in Matt. iv. 4.

As respects the next words, ἦν—πεπωρωμένη, I agree with Bp. Lonsdale that the term πεπωρ. is not meant to express ‘wilful resistance to the force of truth,’ but only ‘extreme dulness of understanding, and slowness in believing;’ as, indeed, appears from our Lord’s language infra viii. 17—21, where he reproves the disciples for having learnt little from the two miracles of the loaves. Comp. xvi. 14. Luke xxiv. 35. This Hellenistic use of καρδιά to denote the mind and understanding is frequent in the New Test. and the Sept.; and that the conjoint term πενωρ. will not necessarily confine it to ‘the heart,’ is plain from 2 Cor. iii. 14, ἐκωρώθη τὰ νοήματα.

53. διαπεράσαντες ἦλθον ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν Γενν.] From the parallel passage of John it appears that the disciples, after embarking, bent their course to Capernaum instead of Bethsaida, whither they had at first intended to steer (see v. 45); perhaps thus altering their course because (as we learn from v. 48) the wind was contrary to them; and so it happened that they came to land (or, as we should technically express it, made the shore) off the territory of Gennesareth.

— προσσημίσθησαν] Scil. ἐκεῖ, 'they came to anchorage,' or rather, to a place proper for drawing the ship off shore. So Arr. E. A. vi. 20, 7, προσσημίσθησις τῷ αἰγιαλῷ. Æl. Var. H. viii. 5, τῇ Νέῳ πρ. Plut. vii. 217, προσσημίσθησις τῷ Ἀρ. The term is properly used of the ship; rarely, as here, of the sailors.

54. After ἐπιγινόντες αὐτοῦ Lachm. subjoins within brackets ὁ ἀνδρὲς τοῦ τόπου ἐκεῖνου, from MSS. A, C, Δ, and some cursive ones, with all the ancient Versions except the Vulg. and Æthiopic; with Tisch., with Griesb., Fritz., and Scholz, excludes the words; and very properly, since they manifestly originated in critical alteration, the purpose of which was to impart greater clearness, and they were doubtless from the parallel passage of Matt. xiv. 13.

As respects the grammatical solution of the difficulty, I am still of opinion that it is best to suppose an ellipsis of the subject, left to be supplied in ἐπιγινόντες,—namely, ἄνθρωποι, just as in the exactly similar case supra i. 21, 22, we have καὶ εἰσπορεύονται εἰς Κ. καὶ ἐξεπλήθυσοντο (scil. οἱ ἄνθρωποι). Render, 'and men (or 'people') were astonished.' So here Wakef. and Abp. Newc. supply people in Italics: Campb., less properly, in Roman characters. Strange is it that Lachm. should cancel the ἐκεῖ at the end of the verse, on the authority of only B, L, D, and one cursive MS.; since it was plainly omitted by the Critical Revisers for the purpose of removing a pleonasm, whereas I have already shown that it is by no means pleonastic, and I pointed out the full meaning of this peculiar mode of expression.

55. For τὴν περίχωρον, Tisch. and Alf. read, from 3 uncial and a few cursive MSS., τὴν χωρὰν, which reading has the support of several ancient Versions. The text. rec. may have come from the parallel passage of Matth. Should, then, χωρὰν be the true reading, we must understand it to denote the district or territory of Gennesareth. Of the word as used in this sense an example occurs in Jos. Bell. iii. 10, 8, παράτεινει τὴν Γεννησάρ (meaning the lake of that name) ὁμόνυμος χώρα, 'a territory of that name.'

— For περιφέρειν some MSS. have φέρειν; others, ἐπιφέρειν; and others again, προσφέρειν, which Fritz. edits; but wrongly; for the varr. lectt. arose from the librarii stumbling at the use of περιφέρειν here, which has a significatio prægnans, including the senses expressed by the above various readings; q. d. 'they carried them about (i. e. up and down), and brought them to those places where they heard he was.'

— ὅπου ἤκουον ὅτι ἐκεῖ ἐστὶ] I would not, with Palairer and Schleus., take the ὅπου as put for quoniam; neither would I, with others (as Beza, Grotius, Wetstein, Kuinoel, and Winer) regard the ἐκεῖ as redundant. It may be best to suppose this an abbreviation of the more complete and primitive mode of expression, which would have been, 'carried them to the place of which they had heard it said, he is there.' Thus the ἐκεῖ will be less of all pleonastic. [Comp. 1 Kings xviii. 10.]

56. ὅπου ἂν εἰσπορεύετο] The use of the ἂν here, and just after at ἤπνουν, is to be referred to that case treated of by Winer, Gr. § 43, 3, as used with Indic. when a matter of fact is spoken of; but yet undefined in respect of time, or other circumstances,—i. e. happening repeatedly, or even customarily whenever occasion offers. Comp. Acts ii. 45. iv. 35. 1 Cor. xii. 2. Lucian, Demon. 10, ὅπόσοι ἂν ἰδόντων. Thus the sense is, 'whithersoever he entered, and as many as touched him were made whole,' i. e. however many they might be, wherever he went. Hence it is plain that Lachm. was wrong in altering ἤπνουν to ἤψαντο, solely on the authority of MSS. B, D, L, Δ. Equally wrong are Tisch. and Alf. in adopting ἐτίθεισαν for ἐτίθουν, solely from MSS. B, L, D, and three insignificant cursive MSS.; since internal evidence as well as external authority is against it. The reading evidently arose from the alteration of half-learned Critics, who did not perceive the force of the Imperf. tense here, which has been well expressed by Wakef. thus: 'they used to' &c.

Before πόλεις and ἀγρούς, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. insert eis, though only from B, L, and 3 cursives (to which I add Scriv. p and y); and altogether injudiciously, since the reading probably arose merely from a marginal scholium. Certain it is that the word was more likely to be brought in, than put out.

— ἐν ταῖς ἀγοραῖς ἐτίθουν τοὺς ἀσθ.] This may justly be regarded as an unequivocal proof of their entire faith in the power of Christ: though it was a custom with some ancient nations to lay such persons in the dywopal here mentioned (namely, 'market-places,' or 'places of public concourse'), that they might receive the benefit of the suggestions of those who had been ill of any dangerous disease, and who, having recovered from it, might communicate the knowledge of what had been useful to them in any like case. See Herod. i. 197, and Strabo, p. 234, cited in my Recens. Syn. Indeed, from this Primitive custom, Max. Tyr. Diss. xl. p. 477 (Dav.), traces the origin of the Medical Art.

VII. 1. τινες τῶν Γρ. The expression τινες confirms my opinion at Matt. xv. 1, that the Scribes who came from Jerusalem were a deputation from the general body there resident, sent expressly to watch our Lord's proceedings. Since it cannot be supposed that the Deputation of Jerusalem would accompany the Deputation of the Scribes, the article of before Φαρισ. is, at least, useless; and I am inclined to suspect that it came from the ov preceding. The circumstance of this being a Deputation from the above body, may serve to account for the use of συνάγονται rather than any more general term, like the προσέρχονται of Matth., 'they resort unto him invisendi causa.'

2. κοιναῖς It was quite in the Jewish idiom to oppose common to holy; the most usual signification of the latter word in the Old Testament being 'separated from common, and devoted to sacred use.' Campb. Κοινός here (as often in Josephus) signifies what is 'ritually impure;' thus, as regarded the hands, it denoted that they were not washed ritually, i. e. just before the meal; though they might otherwise be clean.

— τὸν ἄρτον Lachm. and Tisch. prefix τοὺς, from MSS. B, D, L, Δ, and 6 cursive ones; but without reason. I doubt not that the τοὺς arose, through the carelessness of some ancient scribes, from the preceding τάς; which sort of error has taken place on many other occasions; and a and ov are perpetually confounded. Or the Critical Revisers may have introduced τοὺς in order to produce what they deemed a more suitable sense, namely, 'their bread,' and supported by τὸν ἄρτον at v. 5. But internal evidence strengthens overpowering external authority for ἄρτους without the Article.

— ἐμέμψαντο This word is omitted in several MSS. and some Versions, and is cancelled by Griesb. and Scholz, but retained and defended by Fritz. strenuously, but not successfully. No tolerable reason has ever been given why, supposing it to have been originally in the text, it should have been thrust out. On the other hand, it is easy to see how it should have been added, namely, by those who were not aware of the true construction of the whole passage, and did not see that vv. 3 and 4 are parenthetical.

3. πύγμῃ There are few expressions on which the Commentators are more divided in opinion than this. The early Versions show that the ancients were as much perplexed with it as the moderns. The Vulg. and some other Versions give the sense sæpe; whence it has been supposed, that they read πυκνῇ, which might be taken for πυκνὰ, and that for πυκνῶς. But (as Fritz. observes) there is no proof of the existence of any such adverb as πυκνῇ; and the sense sæpe would be inapposite. Of course, the text. rec. is to be retained and explained as best we are able. Some Expositors, ancient and modern, take πύγμῃ to mean 'up to the elbow.' But even though πύγμῃ should be proved to have the signification elbow; yet such a one as 'up to,' inherent in the Dative, cannot be tolerated. For the same reason, the interpretation of Lightf., Hammond, Schoëtig., and others, 'up to the wrist,' must be rejected. In short, πύγμῃ can only mean the doubled or closed fist, in which sense the word is taken by Scalig., Beza, and Fritz., who render 'unless they have first washed their hands, [rubbing them] with the fist;' i. e. as Dr. Robins., Lex., explains, not merely dipping the fingers, or hands in water, as a sign of ablution; but rubbing the hands together, as a ball, or fist [doubled fist], in the usual Oriental manner, when water is poured over them (2 Kings iii. 11), and hence, ad sensum, 'sedulously,' 'diligently.' So the Syr. Vera., using the same word by which it expresses ἐπιμελῶς in Luke xv. 8. But it is doubtful whether this latter can be included in the sense. It should seem that the Syr. Translator rendered by guess, and, being in utter ignorance of the force of the word, rendered as well as he could.

4. ἀπὸ ἀγορᾶς Suppl. ἐλθόντες, or γενόμενοι. The ellipsis, however frequent in the case of several similar expressions, is so rare in that of ἀπὸ ἀγορᾶς, that I know of only one other instance, namely, Crates in Θηλοῖς, Frag. iii. 4, οὐκ ἄρ' ἐν' οὐδὲν κρίας (ὡς ὑμεῖς λέγετ') οὐδ' οὐτιοῦν ἰδόμεσθα ('nor aught else that we may eat'), οὐδ' (read οὐκ) ἐξ ἀγορᾶς (scil. γενόμενοι) οὐδ' τάκωνας ποιησόμεθ' οὐδ' ἀλλαντας.

— ἃ παρ. κρατεῖν Render: 'which [things] they have received [from their ancestors], in order to hold fast;' the Infinitive being one of purpose; of which Fritz. adduces another example from Eurip. Ion 99. This use of παρὰλ. in the sense to receive mentally by instruction, occurs also at 1 Cor. xv. 1, 3. Gal. i. 9. Phil. iv. 9, ἃ ἐμάθετε καὶ παρὰλᾶτε, and sometimes in the Class. writers. Of κρατεῖν the sense is here 'to hold fast,' by studiously observing any injunctions handed down,' as supra 3 and infra 6, and 1 Thess. ii. 15, κρ. τὰς παραδόσεις. Rev. ii. 14, 15, κρ. διδασχῇ. As respects the construction of the next words βαπτισμοὺς—κλιῶν, that comes under the head of Apposition by way of explanation, here used of exemplification (which implies explanation) as at infra v. 8, an instance so rare that I know of no other example.

— χαλκίων This is advisedly said. Earthen vessels are not mentioned; for those, if supposed to be polluted, were broken (Rosenm. and Kuin.). To the present purpose is a passage in Hdct. ii.

καὶ κλινῶν) ⁵ ἔπειτα ἐπερωτῶσιν αὐτὸν οἱ Φαρισαῖοι καὶ οἱ ^{MT.} 15.

37 (de Ægyptiis), ἐκ χαλκίων ποτηρίων πίνουσι, διασμίαντες διὰ πᾶσαν ἡμέραν. Vide et seqq. The ancients universally appear to have been very attentive to this sort of cleanliness.
 So, in a very humorous passage of Crates ap.
 Athen. 267, E, where every utensil is ordered to perform its office αὐτομάτως, we have: ἔγγει, Κύαθί, ποῦ 'σθ' ἡ κύλιξ, λίαν νύχουσι σπαντήν, where Dindorf and Meineke, profiting by the aid of Pierson and Elmsley, well emend: διάνιζ' λούσα σπαντήν, which I can confirm from 2 Kings v. 10, Sept., πορευθεὶς λούσαι.

5. For ἔπειτα, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read καί, from B, D, L, and some cursive MSS., supported by the Syr., Vulg., Ital., and Coptic Versions; and, indeed, internal evidence is rather in its favour; though I cannot venture to receive it on such slender authority, espec. since I suspect that it was expelled by Critics who did not perceive its force, which is that of resuming the thread of narration (interrupted by some paren-thetic matter), and drawing it close together; in which case it does not need, and indeed has not, in the best writers, an added καί. The following examples may suffice:—Aristoph. Eccles.
 540. Plut. 1005. Theom. 556. Here καί crept in from the margin, or interlinear space; and then, as both particles seemed useless to some Critics, they removed one, but the wrong one.
 This view of mine derives confirmation from the reading of the MS. Δ, which is ἔπειτα καί, though that may be a mixture of both readings.

For ἀνίπτοις, MSS. B, D, and several cur-sives (including not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies) have κοιναῖς, unclean, dirty, as supra v. 2, and Matt. xv. 20,—which reading derives confirmation from the Vulg. and several later Versions, and is adopted by all the later Editors; and very properly, for internal evidence is quite in its favour. And, although the Pesch. Syr. and Ital.
 Versions may be thought to confirm ἀνίπτ., yet the framers of these Versions may have read κοιναῖς, and translated freely by non lotis, and immundis. That the Pesch. Syr. Translator did so at v. 2 is certain.

6. Tisch. and Alf. cancel ἀποκριθεὶς, on the authority of B, L, Δ, and 2 or 3 cursive MSS., with the Syr., Coptic, Æthiop., and Persic Versions; while Lachm. retains it; very properly, for though the word may have been introduced from the parallel passage of Matt. xv. 3, yet that a word so unimportant should have been introduced into all the MSS. except 5 was less likely, than that it should have been omitted through the carelessness of the scribes in so few. There are not wanting other instances of the omission of the same word, e.g. Matt. xxiv. 2, where both Lachm. and Tisch. edit ὁ ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν αὐτοῖς, from several ancient MSS. At Matt.

 xxvi. 63, καὶ ἀποκριθεὶς—εἶπεν αὐτῷ, nearly the same MSS. and Versions as here are alleged omit ἀποκριθεὶς—evidently from the carelessness of scribes, for every Editor retains it. The word is also omitted in the same phrase at Mark
 v. 5. xi. 33. xii. 24, though no Editor cancels it.
 At Mark xiv. 20 it is absent from MSS. B, C, D, and some cursive ones, and is unadvisedly cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. At Luke xiv.
 5 it is omitted in MSS. B, D, K, L, and some cursive ones, and several Versions; and it is cancelled by Lachm., and, in his first Ed. by Tisch., though by that Editor restored in his second;
 and very properly. At Luke xx. 34, it is omitted in MSS. B, D, L, and a few cursive ones, and is cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch.; but injudiciously, for in all the above passages internal evidence, as well as external authority, is quite in favour of the word.

9. καλῶς ἀθετεῖτε.] The adverb may be here used ironically (as in our language finely); and such is its use in a passage of Pseudoipid. ap.
 Athen. p. 377, καλῶς ἐπίτηθε' ἱκαστος εὐθύε· as also in Ælian, V. H. i. 16, καὶ πῶς ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν καλῶς οὕτω δοξάζει, &c. Or it may mean, by a kind of grave sarcasm, fairly, cleverly,
i. e., as we familiarly say, '*nice*ly managed,' so as to attain a certain end. And so καλῶς is used in a passage of Thucyd. i. 5, 2, οἷς κόσμος καλῶς τοῦτο δρᾶν (namely, to use piracy). The term ἀθετ. here is antithetical to τηρ. just after, just as ἀφέντες to κρατεῖτε in the verse preceding, and carries on the sentiment there, the ideas of 'displacing,' 'making null and void' (by non-observance), and of 'keeping,' 'observing,' being set in opposition.

11. ἐὰν εἴπῃ—ὠφελῇθῃς] Something seems wanting in this sentence; to supply which, Beza and Casaub. understand ἰσχυροῦς ἐστὶ; while Krebs., Kuinoel, and Fritz. suppose here that idiom of the Greek, by which in a sentence some verb of a contrary signification is left to be repeated from the preceding sentence; which would here be μὴ θανάτω τελευτάτω; q. d. 'he shall not suffer the punishment denounced.' This method, however, has something in it too artificial to suit the simple style of the New Test. We may rather suppose something left to be supplied, equivalent to it is enough.

14. For πάντα, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit πάλιν, from MSS. B, D, L, Δ, the Vulg., and some later Versions, with a few MSS. of the Italic. But πάντα is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., Arab., and Persic Versions, and all the MSS. except 5, and, indeed, from the parallel passage of Matt. xv. 10, where, though πάντα is not expressed, it may be implied. Πάντα was probably altered to πάλιν by Critics, who deemed the πάντα useless, and thought that πάλιν would be more effective, and better suit the context.

16. εἰ τις—ἀκούειτω] The question which has been raised as to the genuineness of these words is one of no easy determination. They are absent from MSS. B, L, and 4 cursive ones, were rejected by Mill, and bracketed by Fritz. [so too by Alf.]; while they have been retained and defended by Wets., Matth., and Griesb., and adopted without brackets by Scholz and Lachm.; very properly, considering that the external evidence against them is exceedingly slender; and though internal evidence may seem rather against than for them (yet see Matthæi), it is not of sufficient weight to balance the testimony of all the ancient Versions except the Coptic, which confirm the vastly preponderating external authority that exists for the words;—an authority which is further confirmed by Chrysost., Victor, Theophyl., and Euthym.

19. καθαρῖζον πάντα τὰ βρ.] In this passage there is much variety of reading, and great diversity of interpretation. The var. lectt., however, are, Fritz. thinks, of such a nature as to afford no reason to call in question the common reading; they being either slips of the pen, or glosses. And the conjectures of Critics are entitled to no attention; unless it can be shown that the common reading is incapable of any tolerable explanation, which is not the case. For although most of the many modes of interpretation adopted are quite inadmissible, and some even border on absurdity, yet a tolerably good sense may be extracted from the words. Such, I conceive, is that which I, with some hesitation, propounded in Recens. Synop., where καθαρῖζον is taken as a Nominative absolute, and rendered 'purifying by removal.' This I find confirmed by the authority of Fritz., who, after a minute discussion of the sense, adopts that view. Of course, the Participle with ὃ and χρῆμα understood, must be considered as standing for ὃ and a verb in the Indicative, i. e. ὃ καθαρῖζει. This use of the Participle (which often takes place in παρόν, προσήκον, ὁδῶν, &c.), I have more than once illustrated in my notes on Thucydides.

— καθαρῖζον] I have already shown that what is here said is physically no less than morally true; and that whether the text καθαρῖζον be retained, or καθαρῖζων, instead of καθαρῖζον, be adopted (as it is by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from several of the most ancient MSS.), the construction will be quite correct; though in the latter case it will be very harsh, and not in the manner of the Evangelist. Moreover, considering that the terminations -ον and -ων are very frequently confounded by the scribes, the authority of MSS. has here not its usual weight; and hence I am of opinion that, after all, the true reading is καθαρῖζον, which I would, with Fritz., regard as a participle absolute, though to be referred to the words εἰς τὸν ἀφεδρῶνα ἐκπορεύεται, the sense being, 'which thing (i. e. circumstance), that they are alike cast into the jakes, makes them all pure, whether they were accounted so, or not, before.'

21, 22. To illustrate the foregoing principle, that vice and corruption spring from within the man,—evil thoughts are first pointed out as the fontains whence spring evil actions; and then this truth is exemplified, by adverting first to the principal vices, and then to the main evil dispositions and habits which lead to the commission of those vices. Comp. Menand. Incert. Frag. xii. 2 and 3, ὑπὸ τῆς ἰδίας ἑκάστη κακίας σπῆται· καὶ πᾶν τὸ λυμαινόμενον ἴσθιν ἔρδδεν.

Here πλεονεξία and δόλος may denote those lesser degrees of theft which consist in rapacity and artful overreaching in a bargain. (See Thucyd. iii. 45, 6; 82, 2.) So Xenoph. Cyr. 6, 82, enumerates κακούργια καὶ ἀπάται, καὶ δολώσεις, καὶ πλεονεξία. Πονηρία is by the early Commentators interpreted vice or wickedness in general; and by the later ones malignity, or malevolence; of which senses the latter may seem preferable; at least, if we here suppose another class of vices intended. From the parallel passage, however, of Matthew, it should rather seem that πονηρία and δόλ. are meant to denote two species of the genus Rapacity; of which the former may be supposed to mean much the same as our terms swindling, roguery. And so it is used at Luko xi. 39. This view of the two expressions δόλος and πον. is strongly confirmed by Jerem. ix. 1—6.

To these evil actions and habits are then subjoined the cognate evil dispositions—ἀσέλγεια and ὀφθαλμὸς πονηρὸς; of which the former expression denotes that spirit of craving for any object of sensual gratification, or whatever will procure it, which never says 'Hold, enough!' The latter (the ὀφθαλμὸς πονηρὸς) denotes that grudging spirit which (as says Bp. Taylor) is a repining at the good of others, a grieving because he grieves not; and therefore nearly the same with φθόνος. See Prov. xxiii. 6, xxviii. 22. From its situation in the sentence it is plain that ἀσέλγεια cannot be taken in the usual sense lascivious or insolentia, injuria, as Kuin. explains. Indeed, as it seems primarily to mean excessiveness (thus Ælian. ap. Suid. in ἀσέλγεια says of a wind: πολλὸν καὶ ἀσέλγην τίκτεται ἐκείθε, and Eupolid. fr. incert. 25, Ed. Mein.), so it is well adapted to denote, as Bp. Taylor explains it, 'all manner of excess or immoderateness, in the use even of permitted pleasures.'

Of the last three terms, βλασφ. (as appears from the parallel passage), means, not blasphemy, but calumny. In determining the force of the two other terms, it is proper to consider their scope, which, I conceive, is to designate the evil dispositions which engender calumny. And as Solomon says (Prov. xiii. 10), 'only by pride cometh contention,' so it may be said, 'only by pride and arrogance come evil speaking and slanderous words.' So again we read in Prov. viii. 13, of 'pride and arrogance, and the tongue of perversity;' meaning slander. The remaining term ἀφροσύνη being closely connected with the preceding term ὑπερηφανία, may denote, as Lachm. explains, that thoughtless levity and rashness, which produce evil-speaking more frequently than even deliberate malice; or (as Mr. Greswell suggests) there is here meant that corruption of the natural light of reason and conscience which, as being the opposite moral quality to φρόνησις (the perfection of practical wisdom), forms, as it were, the dimas of a reprobate mind.

The first view is confirmed by the passage of Matth., where βλασφημία ('calumny') corresponds to the three terms βλασφ., ὑπερηφ., and ἀφροσ. here; so that in the present passage the idea is only further developed by adverting to the root of the vice. The second derives some confirmation from the remark of Bengel, that the reason why ἀφρ. is subjoined is, that it makes all the rest of the vices the more incurable; "non enim in sola voluntate est corruptio humana." Comp. supra v. 18, ἀσύνετος ἴσται. This is confirmed by Thucyd. i. 122, fin., where ἀφροσύνη denotes that sort of phrenzy, in a qualified sense, which arises from a want of the right use of reason. See Plut. Op. vi. 202, s. fin., and comp. Plato, p. 36, ἐν πάσαις ἀφροσύναις. Yet this view, as far as it is founded on that of Bengel, may, perhaps, justly be thought too far-fetched; and hence it will be better to take the term as used, by Hebraism, of the evil heart of unbelief, always in this sense desperately wicked. Examples of this use occur in the Sept. of Deut. xxii. 21. Judg. xix. 23. Ps. xxxviii. 6. And so φθόνον in Rom. ii. 20. Eph. v. 17. 1 Pet. ii. 15.

Tisch. and Alf. alter the position of the terms μοιχ. πορν. φόν. κλοπ. to πορν. κλοπ. φόν. μοιχ., but only from MSS. B, L, Δ, and the Coptic Version, and on no sufficient grounds. Lachm. very properly retains the text. rec., which is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions; and this is a case where ancient Versions have great weight.

15. quired. For μεθόρια, Lachm. edits θρία, from MSS. B, D, L, D, and three or four cursive ones, with Origen; while Tisch. retains μεθόρια, very properly, since internal evidence comes in aid of overwhelming external authority; for I doubt not that θρία arose from a marginal, or interlinear gloss, or an easier reading devised by those Critics who did not perceive the force of the μετά (which is that of the Latin con in confinium). The district in question was a strip of border-land, from ancient times debatable between the Kings of Tyre and of Palestine, but afterwards ceded by King Solomon in full possession to the King of Tyre; though, as often in such cases, it still long continued to retain its original appellation of the border-land. See Thucyd. ii. 27, and my note. By Τύρον καὶ Σιδῶνος is meant 'the country of Tyre and Sidon,' that of which Tyre and Sidon formed the two capital cities, namely, Phœnicia. And the border-land here in question seems to have been the strip of territory situate between the river Leontes and the Antilibanus, and extending from Nikeb along the Leontes, for about 20 miles, and about five wide.

The words καὶ Σιδῶνος are cancelled by Tisch. and Lachm., from MSS. D, L, Δ, some MSS. of the Vulg. and Origen, but retained, very properly, by Lachm. They were, I doubt not, expunged by those Critics who did not understand the geography of the narrative, and wished to get rid of a difficulty.

26. For ἦν δὲ ἡ γυνὴ, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ἡ δὲ γυνὴ ἦν, from MSS. B, D, L, Δ, 3 cursives, with several ancient Versions. The reading is evidently very ancient; and, as it has the character of St. Mark's style, it may be the true one; though there is no sufficient proof that it is, for I find only one of the Lamb. and Mus. copies that has it, namely, Lamb. 1188—a superb Lectionary.

For Συροφοινικίσσα, Lachm. reads Συροφοινικίσσα; Tisch. and Alf. Σύρα Φοινικίσσα; and so in many Lamb. and Mus. copies. But in those MSS. that have Σύρα Φοιν., the reading probably arose from an error of the scribes, who had in their originals Σύρα φ.; which Griesb. edits. But that would be no other than a barbarism. I should still be inclined to retain Συροφοινικίσσα, were it not that the external authority of MSS. in its favour is so slender, and that internal evidence is against it. And the very arguments urged by Fritz. for its authenticity only tend to strengthen this suspicion. Hence it seems best to wave the claims of Συροφοινικίσσα, and consider which of the two readings Σύρα Φοινικίσσα, and Συροφοινικίσσα may seem to deserve the preference. As respects the latter, the authority for it is insufficient to warrant its adoption. For the former there exists very considerable authority, confirmed by Euthym. and Theophyl. But I can find no authority for the form Σύρα. On the whole, it seems safest to adopt Σύρα Φοινικίσσα, though I grant that it is somewhat unlicensed Greek, espec. as regards Σύρα; for as to Φοινικίσσα, Fritz. admits that such a form might be anciently in use; not derived, however, from Φοινίξ, but from Φοινίκη, Phœnicia, of which frequent mention is made in the Acts. In fact, the form does occur in the Anecd. Græc. of Wolf. T. iii. 6, and in Ephraim Syr. vol. iii. p. 447. And though the form Συροφοινικίσσα is scarcely to be defended in strict analogy of formation, yet I would not, with Fritz., call it a meas one, but one derived from the unstudied phraseology of common life, as opposed to the language of books. I render Phœnicia, because the Syriac word is the same with that used at Acts xi. 19. xv. 3. xxi. 2. It is called of Syria, in contradistinction to the other Phœnicia, that of Libanus and Antilibanus. That the Pesch. Syr. had Συροφοινικίσσα in his copy, appears from his Version, 'now that woman was a Gentile, from Phœnicia of Syria.'

27. ἀφες πρῶτον, &c.] Thus intimating, as a just ground of refusal, that, as it was proverbially true that the children of the family were first to be satisfied before domestic animals were to be served,—so, in the present case, the Jews, the children of God's family, were first to be cared for by the offer of the Gospel, to be accepted by them or rejected; and hence it was not yet the full time for it to be offered to the Gentiles.

29. For ἔξελθ. τὸ δαιμ. ἰ. τ. θ. σ., Tisch. and Alf. read, from B, L, Δ, ἔξ. ἰ. τ. θ. σ. τὸ δαιμ.; while Lachm. retains the text. rec.; very properly, since the other arose only from a correction of style. The same remark does not apply to the change of position in two members at the next verse, found in B, D, L, Δ, and several ancient Versions, and adopted by Beng., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., since the composition is equally good in either position. It is, indeed, νιον ἐκ τῆς θυγατρὸς σου. ³⁰ Καὶ ἀπελθοῦσα εἰς τὸν οἶκον ^{MT.} αὐτῆς, εὔρε τὸ δαιμόνιον ἐξεληλυθὸς, καὶ τὴν θυγατέρα βεβλημένην ἐπὶ τῆς κλίνης. 15.

³¹ Καὶ πάλιν ἐξελθὼν ἐκ τῶν ὁρίων Τύρου καὶ Σιδῶνος, ἦλθε † πρὸς τὴν θάλασσαν τῆς Γαλιλαίας, ἀνὰ μέσον τῶν ὁρίων Δεκαπόλεως. ³² Καὶ φέρουσιν αὐτῷ κωφὸν † μογιῶλον, καὶ 29

difficult to imagine why any Revisers should have changed the position, whether in one way or the other. Still less can we suppose, with Fritz., who also retains the text. rec., that the change arose accidentally, which is supported by no one palaeographical reason. It would seem scarcely to be doubted that the change of position (whichever was the original and true position) proceeded from the Critical Revisers. Now when we consider that the MSS. B, D, L, are those which abound in alterations of this kind, we can hardly doubt as to the quarter whence proceeded the alteration here introduced. The ancient Critics, it seems, thought that the circumstance of the maid lying quietly on her bed (instead of tossing about, or stretched any where but on a bed) was the strongest proof of her cure, and ought therefore to come first; and they regarded the next words as meant to point at the cause of that cure; for the demon had been expelled, and had gone out of her. Nevertheless, the other order, as Fritz. shows, is the most natural, and best suited to the circumstances of the case.

31. For πρὸς, Griesb., Fritz., Lachm., and Tisch. read αὐτῆς, from MSS. B, D, L, Δ, and several cursive ones. The case is just the same as supra iii. 7, where see my note.

32. κωφὸν μογιῶλον] Some ancient Translators, and early modern Commentators, take μογιῶλον to denote one dumb; which they seek to establish by the use of the word in the Sept. at Is. xxxv. 6. But that version is erroneous, and therefore cannot afford any proof. In vain, too, do they appeal to Matt. ix. 33, and Luke xi. 14; for there is every reason to suppose this miracle a different one from that there recorded. Besides, the words used of the man after his cure (ἐλάλει ὀρθῶς) concur with the proper signification of the term (namely, one who speaks with difficulty), to show that the person was not dumb by nature, nor, probably, deaf by nature; otherwise it would have been needless to call him dumb (for such persons always are so); but was one who had a natural impediment to enunciation, or who, having early lost his hearing, gradually lost much of his speech, and had become a stammerer. Such an impediment is either physical and by nature, arising from what is called a bos, or ulcer, by which any one is, as we say, tongue-tied (of which Wets. adduces some examples from the Classical writers, and I have myself, in Recens. Synop., added others from Artemid. and Philostratus), or brought on, when, from an early loss of hearing, the membrane of the tongue becomes rigid and unable to perform its office. That the former was the case of this poor sufferer, would seem to appear from the expression at ver. 35, ἐλύθη ὁ δεσμός τῆς γλώσσης αὐ., denoting a physical bond, whereby the tongue is tied and prevented from discharging its functions by a real ligature of flesh, called, as we find from Justin xiii. 7, lingua nodi, to which there is an allusion in Artemid. Onir. i. 32, τὴν γλῶτταν δεδεμένην ἔχειν, and Philostr. Soph. xxi. 2, p. 515, πεπιδεμένην τὴν γλῶτταν, καὶ βυὸν ἀφωρίας ἐπ' αὐτὴν βεβλημένος. But that is confounding two things distinct from each other,—namely, the vinculum nervosum, whereby the person is utterly prevented from speaking, with the bos, or ulcerous lump, at the root of the tongue, in which case he is prevented from any clear enunciation, the former (the malady under which the person here mentioned was suffering) was natural, the latter brought on. I find this quite confirmed by the following exact description by the eminent physician Paulus Aegineta, l. vi. 29, Ἀγγυλόγλωσσαν πάθος ἐν τῇ γλώσσῃ ποτὶ μὲν ἐκ φύσεως γίνεται, κατεχομένην τὴν γλῶσσαν ὕμινον σκληροτέρων καὶ κολοσθετέρων ποτὶ δὲ ἐξ ἐπικτῆτος, διὰ τινος οὐλῆς σκληροτέρων ἢ αὐτὴν ἐξ ἐλκώσεως γενομένην ἔστι δὲ νευρώδης δεσμός. And no sufficient objection is it to that view of the sense to say, that the eminent Greek medical writer Aetius, l. viii. 38, in speaking of the ἀγγυλόγλωσσοι, meaning those who have a vinculum nervosum sub lingua, mentions that by some persons (i. e. non-medici) such are called μογιῶλοι, because, from the words infra v. 35, ἐλύθη ὁ δεσμός τῆς γλώσσης, it is plain that such must have been the nature of the impediment to speech in the present case. And no wonder is it that a non-medical writer, like the Evangelist, should, for want of medical knowledge, have adopted the less scientific, but more popular term, μογιῶλ.

For μογιῶλ. Tisch. and Alf. edit μογγιῶλ, from MSS. B, C, F, L, X, Δ, and many cursive ones, with the Lex. Cyrilli, the framer of the Synop. Evang., and Victor, as Tisch. alleges. But I do not find the reading in Victor; and as to Cyrill, his authority is opposed by that of Suid. and Zon., Phavorin., and the Sept. in Is. xxxv. 6, the Schol. on Lucian Jov. Trag. c. 27, Aetius viii. 38, and the Antiattic. ap. Bekk. Anecd. p. 100, Ἰσχυρόφωνον, τὸν μογιῶλον οὐκ ὡς αὖτε λέγειν, ἀλλὰ τὸ μογιῶλον ἀπελευνοῦσιν. As to the Synop. Evang. of Theodor. Prodromos, (to which may be added another, Synop. Evang. by Nicephorus,) Xanthopolus cited by Ducange, Gloss. in v. μογγιῶλος—they are writers of a very low period and infima Graecitatis, and in both passages μογγιῶλα may be the true reading, which word we see above did exist; and both μόγγος and Lat. mogus were barbarisms of a very late period; nay, I cannot bring myself to believe that μογγιῶλος was in use so early as the age of St. Mark. The authority of Aetius is very weighty, and probably induced Lachm., in his second Edition, to restore μογιῶλ.

35. As respects the reading ἡνοίγησαν for διανοίχθησαν, adopted by Lachm. and Tisch., from MSS. B, D, L, Δ, and 1 or 2 cursive MSS., there exists no sufficient authority, nor any good reason for the change: at least, internal evidence is equally balanced; for as likely is it that διην. should have been used by the Evangelist with reference to διανοίχθ. at v. 34, as that it should have been introduced by Critical Revisers. As to the form of Aor. I, it came, probably, from certain Critics, who thought it a purer Greek form; whereas it is a later, and less pure form. Thus at Luke xxiv. 31, for διανοίχθησαν, the MS. D has (ex emend.) ἡνοίγησαν, and at Matt. xx. 33, for ἀνοίχθῶσιν, MSS. B, D, L, Z have ἀνοίγῶσιν, which is edited by Lachm. and Tisch. At Luke xi. 18, the same Editors adopt, from strong authority, ἀνοίχθεται, instead of Vulg. ἀνοίγῆται. The form ἡνοίγη occurs in Rev. xi. 19. So that on the whole I should not be disinclined to read here διανοίγησαν, were there sufficient authority.

Tisch. and Alf. cancel the εὐθίως before διην., which is absent from MSS. B, D, and 2 cursives—an authority very insufficient; so that Lachm. retains the words, though in brackets. I doubt not that the omission was accidental only, and arose, as often, from the variation as to the position of the word, which some Critics thought should come in not with ἡνοίγησαν, but with ἐλύθη. Thus it is observable that the MS. L has it before ἐλύθη, as also the MS. Δ, or, at least, its equivalent, εὐθίως.

— ἐλύθη ὁ δεσμός τ. γ. See note supra v. 32, where I have fully shown that the phrase, though it might be taken figuratively, must, from the nature of the case, be here taken physically; there being, as I have proved, in the case in question a real physical bond, or δεσμός, such as is spoken of in the passages I have there cited; to which add Nonnus Dionys. l. xxvi., γλώσσης δεσμὸν ἔλυσεν.

36. ὅσον for καθ' ὅσον, say most Commentators; who also at μάλλον supply ποσούτῃ. But Fritz., with reason, rejects both ellipses, and simply renders the words quantum—and magis. There is not (as some suppose) any pleonasm in μάλλον περ.; but the μάλλον adds weight and intensity to the following comparative περισσότερον, as in Aristoph. Eccl. 1131, μᾶλλον ὀλβιώτερος. So μᾶλλον κρείσσον at Phil. i. 23.

For εἴπωσιν, Tisch. reads λίγωσιν, from MSS. B, L, Δ; while Lachm., very properly, retains εἴπωσιν. Both those Editors cancel αὐτῶς, from MSS. A, B, L, X, Δ, and a few cursive MSS., the Vulg., and Italic Versions. But the authority for so doing is insufficient; and internal evidence is adverse, considering that it is more likely that the word should be put out by fastidious Critics, than accidentally to have been put in. It is, moreover, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Whether Lachm. and Tisch. have done right in inserting αὐτοῖς after διεστ., from MSS. B, D, L, Δ, may be doubted; though as it is to be recognized in the Pesch. Syr. Vers., I have admitted it, but in smaller character.

37. ὑπερπερισσῶς ἐξεπλήσσοντο An expression as strong as can easily be found in the Greek language, denoting 'amazement the most extreme'; not, however, understanding it of the amazement of ignorance, but an astonishment based on sound reason—that of persons who knew how to account for what was done; referring it without any hesitation, though on the most solid principle of belief, to the finger of God as the efficient cause.

The τοὺς before ἀλάλους is cancelled by Tisch., from MSS. B, L, Δ, but retained by Lachm.;—very properly; for more likely is it that the word should have been left out through carelessness, than put in by design. Far from probable is it that the Evangelist should have left it out, since that would, while violating propriety of language, at the same time weaken the force of a sentiment as strong as can well be imagined.

VIII. 1. παμπόλλου Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch. read, from 5 uncial and several cursive MSS., πάλιν πολλοῦ. But that reading has been by Fritz. ably, and, I think, successfully, shown to be not genuine. The most convincing argument is this, that the external authority of MSS., supported by all the ancient Versions except the Vulg., is in favour of παμπόλλου, which, too, is, rather than πάλιν πολλοῦ, borne out by the parallel passage of Matthew. Internal evidence is indeed equally balanced, for so similar are παμ and παλιν in MS. characters, that one might by the scribes be conκαὶ μὴ ἐχόντων τί φάγωσι, προσκαλεσάμενος [ὁ Ἰησοῦς] τοὺς 15.

 μαθητὰς αὐτοῦ, λέγει αὐτοῖς· ² Σπλαγχνίζομαι ἐπὶ τὸν ὄχλον ³²
 ὅτι ἤδη * ἡμέραι τρεῖς προσμένουσίν μοι, καὶ οὐκ ἔχουσι τί φά-γωσι. ³ Καὶ ἐὰν ἀπολύσω αὐτοὺς νήστες εἰς οἶκον αὐτῶν, ἐκ-λυθήσονται ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ· τινὲς γὰρ αὐτῶν μακρόθεν † ἤκουσι.

founded with the other. That the term πάμπολος occurs no where in the Greek Testament, nor in the Sept., is not, as Bowyer imagined it, any sufficient argument against the use of the word by St. Mark. It is found several times in Josephus, and in Symmachus' Version of Job xxxvi. 31, and therefore might have been used by the writers of the New Test. It frequently occurs in the Greek Class. writers. It may not indeed, be easy to imagine how πάλιν, if not genuine, could have arisen. Mr. Bowyer thinks it arose from [a Critic's] observing, that πάλιν and πολὺς are frequently joined by St. Mark.

The words ὁ Ἰησοῦς are absent from not a few uncials, and several cursive MSS., including some Lamb. and Mus. copies, and are cancelled by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; perhaps rightly, since they have not the support of any ancient Version of weight, and internal evidence is against them. The αὐτοῦ just after is absent from MSS. D, L, Δ, and a few cursive ones, and has been cancelled by Tisch., but retained by Lachm. It may have been introduced from the parallel passage of Matt. xv. 32; but the evidence is very slender, since MS. Δ is but a duplicate copy of MS. L. As to the 'many Versions' alleged by Griesb. and Tisch. against αὐτοῦ, these are only the Vulg., and, perhaps, the Italic. But they furnish no decisive proof, since the curt brevity of the Latin idiom rejects pronouns so placed; whereas the Greek admits them, and the Hellenistic idiom delights in the pronoun, though it has been perpetually ejected by the Classico-Critical Revisers. See Matt. iii.
 12. viii. 25. xiv. 22. xv. 12 and 33. xvi. 5.
 xvii. 10. xxiv. 45. xxvi. 8. xxvii. 64. Luke xxii. 39. Mr. Alford here evinces unwonted discretion by retaining αὐτοῦ; for as to the ellipsis of εἰς, that, I am ready to admit, is inadmissible. Few will now be disposed to doubt that the construction is, as I have pointed out, the same as that explained by Matthiæ in his
 Gr. Gr. § 390 (§ 388, c. in the later Editions), where treating of the use of the Dative in definitions of time, when it is to be expressed that an action has taken place since a certain person has done this or that. Of his examples the following are the most apposite to the present purpose: Xen. Hist. ii. 1. 27, ἐπεὶ ἡμεῖς ἦν πέμπτη ἐπιπλύνουσι τοῖς Ἀθ. Soph. Phil.
 354. ἦν δ' ἤμαρ—δύττερον πλούντι μοι.

It is true that here αὐτοῖς must be understood; an unusual, but not unprecedented, ellipsis after a Participle, since an example occurs in Hdt. ix. 41, ὡς δὲ ἑκατὴ ἐγγεγόνεσσι ἀντι-κατημένουσιν (scil. αὐτοῖς) ἐν Πίλαταιῃσι.

2. ἡμέραι. This reading too is adopted into the text by Lachm. and Tisch.; and internal evidence, as well as competent external authority, is in its favour. And although it involves some harshness, yet that is not such as would justify us in treating it as a blunder of the scribe. It may surely be taken in the way which I have pointed out in my note on the parallel passage of Matt. xv. 32; and I am more inclined than heretofore to adopt the text of Fritz., which is somewhat confirmed by the reading of the MSS. here, ἡμέραι τρεῖς, which I regard as an error of the scribe for ἡμέραι τρεῖς εἰσι, which, I doubt not, was in the archetype of the MS. And there is, I think, great reason to suppose that that was the original reading of St. Mark.

3. νήστες] Sub. κατὰ, from νήστεις, literally, 'at fasting'; or, in our ancient phraseology, a-fasting. So 'a-cold,' &c. Thus it came at length to have the force of an adjective. And the number (sing. or plur.) is accommodated to that of the subject of the assertion.

— τινὲς γὰρ] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read καὶ τινες, from MSS. B, L, Δ, and 5 cursives; and indeed internal evidence is in favour of the reading, whereby the καὶ will be intensive, and the sense, 'yea, certain of them.' So Rom. viii.
 23, καὶ ἡμεῖς αὐτοί. Nevertheless, the authority for the reading is quite insufficient (I do not find it in any one of the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), espec. since it is opposed by the Pesch. Syr., Vulg., and other ancient Versions. Before μα-κρόθεν Tisch. inserts ἀπὸ, from MSS. D, L, Δ, and a few cursive ones; and, indeed, internal evidence is in favour of this less pure Greek reading, which occurs in all the copies at Matt.
 xxvii. 55. Mark v. 6. xiv. 54. xv. 40. Luke xvi. 23. Rev. xviii. 10. 15. 17,—perhaps the very reason why the Critics thought to bring it in here.

— ἤκουσι] The readings of the MSS. here fluctuate between ἤκουσι, ἤκασι, and εἰσι, of which the first is adopted by Griesb. and Matth., the second by Lachm., the third by Tisch. and Alf. But if any thing be certain, it is that εἰσι has no claim to be thought the true reading, since the external authority for it is very slender —only that of B, L, Δ, and the Copt. Vers.:— and internal evidence is quite against it, since had that been the original reading there would have been no ground for alteration or explanation. On the other hand, if ἤκ. had been the original reading, we can easily account for εἰσι as a marginal and easier reading, or a gloss on ἤκασι, which might not be well understood.
 To decide between the rival claims of ἤκουσι and ἤκασι is no easy matter. There is considerable external authority for the latter, which has place in several of the most ancient Lamb.
 and other copies. And although this Pr-perf. form of the verb is rare, yet it may have been used by Mark, since, though never, I believe, occurring in the early and pure Class. writers, it is not un-frequent in the Sept., Joseph., and the later Class. writers, as Liban., Procop., and others down to Photius. Consequently the form would seem not only Alexandrian and Hellenistic, but probably of common Greek. Accordingly, Mark may have used it; but there is wanting stronger evidence to prove that he did: besides, internal evidence is quite in favour of ἤκουσι, which seems to have been altered by Critics, who, stumbling at a Present form, and thinking a Perfect sense necessary, altered it to that. Thus in the ancient Versions the Translators expressed this by a Perfect sense, which, however, will not prove that they had not the Pres. form in their copies. And those who wrote ἤκασι seem to have taken it in a Pluperf. sense; and, indeed, the Pluperf. form does occur in Josephus. But to render, 'for some of them had come from far,' would make the words those of the Evangelist, and not of our Lord, as the γὰρ requires, and also the air of the context suggests. Render: 'for some of them are come from far.'

4. πῶθεν—δυνήσ. τις—χορτ. ἄρτ.] Render: 'whence (i. e. from what quarter) can one satisfy these people with bread here in a solitude?' ἐπ' ἐρημίᾳ here is equiv. to ἐν ἐρημίᾳ in Matt. x. 33, and ἐρ. is not well rendered 'in the wilderness'; rather, 'in a wilderness' ('in solitude,' as it is expressed in the Vulg.), meaning a place where one is left alone, out of the reach of all succour by supply of needful food, which is intimated in the interrog. πῶθεν, as in several passages of Arrian, Dion. Hal., and Lucian, in reference, as here, to supply of food. Of course, the interrog. implies a strong negation; as in John vi. 5. Some MSS. and Versions omit the ὧδε, as if useless, which, however, is not the case. It is sufficiently defended by what occurs supra i. 13, and by the parallel passage of Luke ix. 12, also by Plat. Com. ap. Athen. p. 5, Ἐγὼ δ' ἐνθάδ' ἐν τῇ ἐρημίᾳ. This tract of country was probably the τόπος ἐρημος mentioned in Luke ix. 10.

5. For ἐπηρώτα, Tisch. and Alf. read ἠρώτα, from MSS. B, L, Δ;—very insufficient authority, though internal evidence may seem in favour of ἠρώτ., of which ἐπηρ. may have been a gloss. See Matt. xxi. 14, and Luke ix. 45, where, however, for ἐρωτήσαι, Lachm. edits, from 4 uncial and a few cursive MSS., ἐπηρ. (Tisch. retains ἐρώτ.), while here he retains ἐπηρ., though at John xviii. 21, for Vulg. ἐπρωτας, he edits, from 4 uncial MSS., ἐρωτᾶς; and just after, for ἐπερώτησον, he edits, from 6 uncial and 2 cursive MSS., ἐρώτησον; and both emendations are adopted by Tisch.; perhaps rightly, since the compound reading probably arose from a gloss on the simple, as undoubtedly took place in some copies at John vii. 7. ix. 15. 23, and very many at Luke ix. 45. Accordingly, were the external authority here for ἠρώτ. stronger than it is, I would receive it.

6. For παρήγγειλε, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read παραγγέλλει, from MSS. B, D, L, Δ. But, though the prolepsis historicum, for the Aorist, would have been very suitable, yet there is not sufficient evidence that it was here used by St. Mark; for the MS. Δ is only a fellow-copy from the same original as MS. L, and the reading of B is yet undetermined. It may turn out to be παρήγγειλλε, which would be confirmed by the text of both Lachm. and Tisch. at Luke viii. 29, and found in almost all the uncial MSS. παρήγγειλλε, on which see note.

10. μέρη Δαλμ.] Though in the parallel passage of Matth. it is θρία Μαγδαλά, yet there is no real discrepancy, since every reason is there to think that Dalmanutha was in the same region as Magdala; though the latter was probably the chief town, and Dalmanutha only a village in the territory of Magdala, so insignificant that it is no where else mentioned. Thus the only difference is that Mark's account is, as frequently elsewhere, the more precise and minutely exact of the two. The position of Dalmanutha is best pointed out by Lightf. Works, vol. x. p. 225. 228, 229. He speaks of it as a little town within the borders of the territory of Magdala.

12. ἀναστενάξας τῷ πνεύμ.] This is a most touchingly affecting expression, used of all the Evangelists alone by St. Mark. Render: 'and after a deep drawn sigh in his spirit,' or rather, 'groan in his spirit,' i. e. in himself inwardly, in his inmost soul. Though, indeed, both ideas may be here conjoined; similarly as in a fine line of Spenser, Faerie Queene, vi. 3, 'He deeply sighed and groaned inwardly.' Parallel to this is the use of the similar term ἐμβριμάομαι, in John xi. 33, ἐμβριμήσατο τῷ πνεύματι, and 38, ἐνβ. ἐν ἑαυτῷ, which serves to determine the sense of the expression τῷ πνεύμ.

here. There is not, what has been supposed, a pleonasm in the use of the ἀνα; so far from that, it serves to intensity of sense, having respect to the depré from which the sigh is groaned upwards. Accordingly, it may be said to constitute a very forcible expression; and hence in Lament. i. 4, it is associated with two terms denoting great affliction, and bitterness of spirit, by a sort of gnawing ἐν ταυτῷ, as the Sept. has it (with which compare Rom. viii. 23, ἐν ταυτοῖς στενάζομεν, meaning, as I would take it, 'we feel a deep inward sighing and groaning for deliverance from the burden of the body of this flesh'); so that the sense in the above passage may be thus expressed, 'her priests fetch a deep sigh (or 'groan'); her virgins are deeply afflicted; and she herself is in bitter grief of spirit.' The verb ἀναστ. is so used also in Soph. Aj. 931, as also ἀναστυναχίζω in Homer, equiv. to βαρὺ στενάζω.

— σημεῖον ἐπιζητεῖ Lachm. and Tisch. edit ζητεῖ σημ., from MSS. B, C, D, L, Δ, and a few cursive ones; while Griesb. and Fritz. retain the text. rec.; and Fritz. defends it strenuously, but not quite successfully; though it cannot be denied that the compound verb is more suitable to the context, espec. the strong formula εἰ δοθήσεται. Yet, as internal evidence is decidedly in favour of ζητ. σημ., it may, perhaps, be entitled to the preference.

— εἰ δοθήσεται, &c. [The εἰ is not (as some imagine) put for οὐ; for this is a form of solemn asseveration (common in the Old T., but rarely, if ever, found in the Class. writers), in which there is implied an imprecation; which, however, is omitted per apostrophen et gravitatis ergo. The nature of the imprecation ('may I not live!' or the like) will depend upon the subject, and the speaker. The Class. writers use the complete form, but only, I believe, with ἴδω μὴ, as Aristoph. Eq. 706, ἴδω μὴ σ' ἐκφάγω ἐκ τῆς γῆς οὐδέποτε βιώσομαι. The imprecation here is suspended on the οὐ, εἰ, q. d. 'If this be so, may I not live,' or 'may I be accursed,' 'may I so live, or not, as this or that comes to pass.' Thus the conjunction comes to have the force of negation, through the ellipsis of the suppressed clause. Sometimes, however, the words thus left to be understood are expressed, as in Ezek. xiv. 16, where the Syr. and Arab. Versions render freely by, 'as I live—they shall not,' &c., while the LXX. renders literally by ζῶ ἐγὼ εἰ—σώθονται, perhaps regarding the sentence as interrogative, and supposing the interrogation to have the force of a strong negation—equiv. to 'may I not live if, &c.' Yet the Indic. there cannot be so taken for the Opt. without violating the propriety of the language. It is better to suppose the sense to be, 'do I live?' 'am I to live?' implying the strong negation, neguam! See more in note on Heb. iii. 11.

Critics, who thought them better away. Possibly they may have been introduced from the parallel passage of Matth.; but little likely is it that the interpolation should have found its way into all the copies but two, and all the ancient Versions except the Coptic. The ἔτι just after is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but the authority for this is insufficient, only that of MSS. B, C, D, L, and 5 cursive ones (to which I cannot add one from the Lamb. and Mus. copies); and internal evidence is in this case divided, since, though it may have been introduced for the purpose of matching the οὐπω just before, yet the ἔτι might, as Griesb. and Fritz. suggest, be absorbed by the ἔτι in συνίετε. Besides, the word is recognized by all the ancient Versions except the inconsiderable Coptic one. Nay, indeed, the ἔτι is, as Fritz. observes, confirmed by the foregoing οὐπω, as in John vi. 17, according to the text of Lachm., οὐπω ἀηλύθαι, preceded by καὶ σοφία ἦδη ἐγγόνει. Thus the sense is, 'even yet have ye your heart hardened?' "The heart," observes Whitby, "is then said to be hardened, when, after full evidence of what we ought to do or to believe, we neglect to do or believe it. Now this (continues he) may happen either through inconsideration, as in the case of the Apostles here and vi. 52, or through the weakness of their faith, as when they are upbraided with it xvi. 14. In both cases it seems only to have been a sin of infirmity. Or rather, this πρώσις proceeds from that perversion of the will, and those evil dispositions and affections of the soul, which render us averse from the performance of what is required, or the belief of what is revealed; as when it is said in John xii. 40, of the Jews, that their hearts were hardened; and then it is a wilful sin." See more on the form of this expression in note supra vi. 52.

19. For κοφ. πλήρεις κλασμ., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit κοφ. κλασμ. πλήρ.; but without reason; since internal evidence, as well as external authority, is opposed to the change; which proceeded, I suspect, from the Critics, who introduced a more elegant position of the words, and one, they thought, called for, or at least justified by Matt. xiv. 20, and xv. 37. But there the construction is somewhat different.

20. For οἱ δὲ εἶπον, Tisch., in his second Ed., reads ἀγούσιν αὐτῷ, from MSS. B, C, L, Δ, and one cursive MS., confirmed by the Vulg. and Copt. Versions, and two MSS. of the Italic;

while Lachmann retains the text. rec.; rightly, though internal evidence is in favour of the other reading, which is undoubtedly of the most remote antiquity, since it is recognized by the Pesch. Syr. Version, with, at least, the omission of αὐτῷ.

21. For πῶς οὐ, Lachm. reads πῶς οὐπω, from MSS. A, D, M, V, X, and several cursive ones; Tisch. and Alf. οὐπω, from MSS. C, K, L, Δ, and 8 others; while Fritz. edits πῶς οὐν οὐπω. Were any change necessary, I would adopt that of Lachm., which is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions. Nevertheless, I would retain the οὐ, for which οὐπω seems to have come from a marginal and interlinear Scholium, as perhaps is the case in Matt. xv. 17, οὐ νοεῖτε, according to the text there of Lachm. and Tisch., though in text. rec. we have οὐπω. The words are also interchanged in the copies at John vi. 17, where for οὐκ ἀηλύθαι (which Tisch. retains), Lachm. reads οὐπω ἔλ. from B, D, L, and some cursive MSS. and Versions; though no change should be made. At John vii. 8, the reading fluctuates between οὐπω and οὐ, and the Editors differ. But besides retaining οὐ, I would still more positively retain, with Lachm., the πῶς, which is necessary in order to sustain the idea of strong expostulation, called for by the context, to which that of Mark iv. 40, πῶς οὐκ ἔχετε πίστιν; bears a strong resemblance.

22. This miracle is recorded only by St. Mark, though worthy of particular attention.

For ἔρχεται, MSS. B, C, D, L, and some Versions, have ἔρχονται, which is adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but for no better reason—at least as far as I can perceive—than an uncritical leaning to their favourite MSS. and the Vulg. Version. But surely their weight is not to be opposed to that of all the MSS. except about seven [to which I cannot add a single Lamb. or Mus. copy], including the Alexandrian, and confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version. Moreover, internal evidence is rather in favour than opposed to ἔρχεται, considering that, though it is possible that ἔρχονται may have been altered to ἔρχεται for the purpose of removing the awkwardness of two plural verbs, each introduced by a καὶ, yet to be referred to two different classes of persons. More probable, however, is it that the ἔρχεται was mistaken for ἔρχονται by the inadvertence of scribes, owing to the juxta-position of καὶ φέρουσιν.

mentators say, because he thought those who had seen so many miracles in vain, were not worthy to see more. The reason, however, seems rather to have been, that our Lord rarely chose to perform a miracle with a crowd pressing about him. See supra iii. 10. v. 28.

— ἐπιθεὶς τὰς χεῖρας αὐτῷ.] Some eminent Commentators join these words with the following ones, and render, 'he put his hands upon him (or 'them,' meaning 'his eyes') and asked him.' But the imposition of the hands has no connexion with the act of interrogating. I therefore rather agree with those who join the words with the preceding, as is done in the Pesch. Syr., Arab., Vulg., and Persic Versions; and thus some MSS. have a καὶ before ἐπιθεὶς (on which see supra v. 6), and so in our common Version, and the Translations of Newc. and Campb. Now if it were true that, as Fritz asserts, ἐπιθεὶς is put for ἐπέθηκε καὶ, the first-mentioned mode of construction would almost necessarily become the only true one. But no reason is there why we should not take the Participle ἐπιθεὶς, as put for the gerund, 'putting his hands upon [him], i. e. 'his eyes'; as we may infer from v. 25, meaning after putting his hands, this being the temporal use of the Participle for Gerund, on which see Jelf, Gr. 696, a. And this seems to have been the view taken by the Vulg. Translator, who renders 'impositis manibus.' And so T. Aquinas must have construed the words, whose annotation is worthy of attention. Of course, in the communicating of the spittle to the eye, we see the symbolic use of external means; and here, as in the instance supra vii. 33, our Lord laid his hands upon the sick person (more Medicorum) to intimate that he himself is the great PHYSICIAN, and that, whatever external sign was used, the power could come from HIM only. Moreover, as human spittle was thought to have a very beneficial effect on diseased eyes (see Pliny, Hist. Nat. xviii. 4, and Plaut. Capt. iii. 4. 21), so our Lord was pleased to employ this symbolic external sign. With the spittle here employed, as to its healing and purifying effect, we may compare the eye-salve, wherewith Christ anoints the eyes of those who are spiritually blind, as mentioned in Rev. iii. 18, for there the Christian is counselled to buy eye-salve of Christ alone to anoint his eyes.

— εἴ τι βλέπει;] I still am of opinion that ἐξήνεγκεν for ἐξήγαγεν, and βλέπεις for βλέπει, edited by Tisch. and Alf., ought not to be received on such very slender authority (only that of 2 uncials and no cursives, to which I can add nothing); though internal evidence is, at least, equally balanced. Were there stronger authority than ancient Versions for τι βλέπεις; it would deserve attention, espec. considering that it would derive some confirmation from Zech. v. 2, καὶ εἶπε πρὸς με τί σὺ βλέπεις; Lachm., in his second Edition, very properly restored βλέπει, which is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version. In short, the reading βλέπεις arose, I suspect, merely from certain scribes confounding (as they often do) the termination -eis and -ei.

24. βλέπω—ὡς δένδρα] I cannot yet acquiesce in the reading βλέπω τ. ἀνθρ., ὅτι ὡς δένδ. ὁρ. περιπ., whereby the sentence is supposed to consist of two members, of which the second is introduced as the reason for saying, in the first, that 'he saw men.' Internal evidence may seem in its favour; but there is something too far-fetched and artificial to be supposed genuine. Moreover, the words thus yield, as Fritz remarks, a sense any thing but suitable, in whatever way we may interpret them. We are not bound, it must be borne in mind, always to account for the existence of a reading rejected for utter unsuitableness. But here it may be accounted for (as it is by Fritz.), from a διπτογραφία, arising from the double readings βλέπω, ὁρῶ, and ὅτι ὡς. The ὅτι in my text I have now had printed in small character, inserted within brackets; though it might have been as well cancelled, because if received, without ὁρῶ after, it must be taken as a particle pleonastic. Mr. Alford introduces both words in brackets, but obliterates both—a curious mode of blowing both hot and cold, and serving to intimate, in the Sir Roger de Coverley style of criticism, that "there is much to be said on both sides."

Why our Lord chose on this occasion to impart the faculty of sight not all at once, but by degrees—for at first the man saw things but obscurely; then, by a second laying on of hands by our Lord, he had a clear perception of all objects—is a question that has exercised the ingenuity of Expositors both ancient and modern. See Theophyl., Euthym., and Victor, the Catenist; also, of the moderns, Whitby, Kuin., and Dr. Burton. Yet their view proceeds too much on the taking for granted what cannot be proved. In a case like this (where the reason for the course pursued is not even hinted at by the sacred writer) it is sufficient for us to know, that as all such things were in our Lord's power, so he thought fit to order their taking place as he pleased; though, according to existing circumstances,—both as in the case of the deaf and dumb person of whom we read supra vii. 33, and in the present portion,—we may be sure that in both he acted as he saw to be most conducive to the glory of God, and the edification of the people. The words ὡς δένδρα are to be referred to the τοὺς ἀνθ., not περιπ.; and the sense is, 'I see men, as trees, walking'; i. e. I can distinguish men from trees only by their walking: a result of imperfect vision; since a confusion of vision in the objects is, as Plato observes, the first sign of returning sight. This view of the sense is confirmed by Victor, who, no doubt, derived it from the Fathers. From the above it is plain that the person was not born blind, but had lost his sight from disease.

25. ἐπέθηκε] Tisch. and Alf. read ἱθηνεν, from B and L; while Lachm. retains ἐπέθ.—very properly, for the compound verb is called for by propriety of language, and by the constant usage both of the New Test. and the Sept., except that in Rev. i. 17, for Vulg., ἐπίθηνεν τὴν δεξιάν αὐτοῦ ἐπ' ἐμὴν, MSS. A, B, C, and several others have ἐθῆκιν. It is surely far more probable that ἐπ was removed from two copies by Critical licence, as seeming unnecessary, or omitted by the carelessness of scribes, who very often leave out prepositions in composition—than that it should have been interpolated from v. 20 (as Mr. Alf. pronounces), in all but 2, for I find not a vestige of its absence in the Lamb. and Mus. copies.

Further, Tisch. and Alf. read καὶ διέβλεψεν, in the place of ἐποίησεν αὐτὸν ἀναβλέψαι, with MSS. B, C, L, Δ. ἀπεκρίθη for ἀποκατεστήθῃ, with C, L, Δ. ἐνέβλεπεν for ἐνέβλεψε, with B, L, and 3 cursive MSS., and finally ἅπαντα, for ἅπαντας, with B, C, D, L, M, Δ, and 5 cursive MSS. But these several changes are all of them insufficiently sustained by authority; and certainly internal evidence is, with one exception, not in their favour.

As respects the omission of the words καὶ ἐποίησεν ἀναβλέψαι, in not a few MSS. and some Versions, including the Pesch. Syr., that I think chiefly arose from a misconception of the true force of ἀναβλέψαι, by which the words seemed almost useless; whence arose the reading βλέψαι for ἀναβλ., and the rash conjectures ἐνέβλεψε or διέβλεψε put for the whole clause, in which there is nought of unnecessary or useless, if the verb ἐποίησεν be taken in a popular acceptance for, 'he bade him to look up,' literally, 'he caused him,' viz., by direction, 'to look up.'

Of ἐνέβλεψε τηλαυγῶς ἅπαντα, the full sense is 'beheld,' or 'viewed in the clearest manner,' as in the case of an object so distinctly presented to view as to admit of being seen far off. So Diod. Sic. T. i. p. 50, ὁρᾶν τηλαυγ., implying that the object is in itself most distinctly prominent. Thus the term τηλαυγῶς is esp. applied by Homer to the Sun, as also in Job xxxvii. 21, to the Moon.

26. εἰς τὸν οἶκ. αὐτοῦ] I now bracket the τὸν (expunged by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch.), both on account of strong external authority, and internal evidence against it; for it seems to have been inserted, as required by the αὐτοῦ following; the Critic who inserted it bearing in mind such passages as Matt. ix. 6, ἔπαυε εἰς τὸν οἶκ. σου. Mark ii. 11, ἦν. εἰς τὸν οἶκ. σου: v. 9. vii. 30. viii. 36. Luke v. 24, 25. viii. 39. 41. xviii. 14. It is observable that the absence of the Article, where seemingly called for, is also found elsewhere in the Gospel of St. Mark, e. gr. supra viii. 3, εἰς ἀπολύσει—εἰς οἶκον αὐτῶν, where not a single copy has τὸν. The concluding words of the verse μηδὲ εἴπῃς τιw ἐν τῇ κώμῃ are cancelled by Tisch. (solely),—though on very slender grounds. The words were, I suspect, ejected by the Critics, as presenting the most effectual mode of getting rid of the difficulty; which, however, is not so formidable as to need such a procedure. No reason is there to think that the man's house was in the town; and as to the difficulty, it may be removed by supposing a hysteron proteron in the narration, such as often occurs in simple and unstudied narrative, it being our Lord's purpose to direct the man not to tell what had taken place to any one in the town of Bethsaida, nor so much as to go into the town, lest he should be tempted to transgress this direction.

27. τὰς κώμας K. τ. Φ.] This cannot but mean the same as in the parallel passage of Matt. xvi. 13, τὰ μέρη K. τ. Φ.—namely, 'the villages pertaining to and in the district belonging to Cæs. Phil.' As to the following address of our Lord to the disciples, and their answer, there may seem to be a discrepancy between the two Evangelists;—Matthew fixing the conversation at the place in question; Mark, on the way thither. But that discrepancy may easily be removed by rendering, with Wakef. and Campb., 'when,' or 'as, Jesus was going.' And so Grotius, Rosenm., and Kuin. render by 'quum proficisceretur, pergens.' And so Euthym. (after Chrys.) must have taken it, as appears from the words εἰκός, ἐλθόντα εἰς τὰ μέρη Καισ. εὐχέσθαι ἅμα καὶ ὁδόν. But this εὐχέσθαι ἅμα involves an improbability; not to say that that view is inconsistent with what we read at Luke ix. 18, where see note. Nothing is there in that passage to forbid the sense I have assigned, since Luke speaks very indefinitely without any notation of place, and of time not such as to involve any real discrepancy. We have only to suppose, with Augustine, de Consensu Evang. ii. 53, that on the way itself, and [a little] before our Lord came to the place whither he was going [the territory of Caesarea Philippi] that he alone turned aside from the way to some [sequestered] place in order to pray, though not so far but that the disciples were so near him as to be in attendance on his motions. Comp. Matt. xxvi. 36, καθίστατε αὐτοῦ (or ὧδε) ἵνα οὐ ἀπελθῶν ἐκεί (i. e. 'a stone's-throw,' as we learn from Luke) προσεύξωμαι (taking, however, Peter, James, and John). At the close of his prayer our Lord began to go forward, and then he proceeded to interrogate his disciples, who had now joined him, and were going forward with him.

28. ἀπεκρίθ.] Tisch. and Alf. edit εἶπαν, from B, C, L, Δ, and the Syr. and Coptic Versions. Lachm. retains ἀπεκρ., but adds αὐτῶ λέγοντες. from B, C, D, L, Δ, and others, with the Ital., Vulg., and Coptic Versions. But the former reading probably arose from the par-alle passages of Matthew and Luke,—though, being supported by the Pesch. Syr. Version, it is entitled to much attention. The reading of Tisch., αὐτῷ λέγοντες, originated, I doubt not, from a marginal Scholium. For ἕνα, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read εἰς, from B, C, L, and the Coptic Vers. But for this reading very insufficient is that authority, and internal evidence is not in favour of εἰς. It may have been suggested to the Critics by the parallel passage of Luke.

29. For λέγει αὐτοῖς, Lachm. and Tisch. read ἐπὶ τὰ ἑρῶτα αὐτοῖς, from B, C, D, L, Δ, with the Copt. and some MSS. of the Italic Version. It may be the true reading; but it may have arisen from critical alteration introduced for the purpose of getting rid of the tautology in λέγει and λέγετε (to avoid which Luke wrote εἶπε); and this is more probable than that λέγει should have been introduced from the parallel passage of Matt. in all the copies except some half-dozen. Certain it is that λέγει was altered by the Critics to εἶπεν at Matt. iv. 9. ix. 11. xii. 48. xiii. 28. xv. 12. xvii. 20. 26. xx. 21. Mark v. 7. vi. 16. viii. 20. xii. 43. Luke v. 13. xix. 30. xxiii. 34, et al.

At ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ, Tisch. and Alf. cancel the δὲ, from MSS. B, L, and a few cursive ones; while Lachm. edits καὶ ἀποκρ., from MS. A and a few others. I prefer the former reading; but there is not sufficient authority for removing the particle, which may have been cancelled in a few MSS. for the purpose of removing a tautology.

31. ἀπὸ τ. πριεβ.] Lachm. and Tisch. edit ὡπὸ, from MSS. B, C, D, K, L, and some cursive ones. I grant that ἀπὸ may have been derived from the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke; but there is no sufficient proof, and little probability. More likely is it that ὡπὸ was an alteration of some Critics, who thought ὡπὸ better Greek, not considering that ἀπὸ is equally good Greek, and such as presents a stronger sense where strength of sense might be expected,—namely, 'at the hands of.' And be it remembered, that the ἀπὸ has reference (as clearly appears from the parallel passage of Matthew) to παθεῖν as well as ἀποδοκ.

36, 37. τί γὰρ ὠφελήσει, &c.] In the former of these two verses the various readings are only various forms of error. That of ἄνθρωπος—the reading recommended by Griesb. and others—cannot be admitted, because, as Fritz. points out, it would require also ὠφελήσεται. But that reading, though found, would seem derived from the parallel passage of Matthew and Luke. The textus receptus is confirmed by the circumstance of its carrying with it, in its very roughness and homeliness, a mark of genuineness. Certainly this use of ὠφέλ. as an impers. is very unusual, and would properly require for ἐὰν κερδήσῃ rather the inf. κερδήσαι; and for ζημιωθῇ, ζημιωθῆναι; which latter indeed is found in the MSS. B, L, and in D, in the parallel passage of Luke, though doubtless from correction. The reading ὠφέλῃ is indeed entitled to attention, as having internal evidence in its favour. It is, however, forbidden by the ἐὰν κερδήσῃ. And our Lord seems to have intended to put the case hypothetically, since (as Euthym. observes) it is in effect a matter of impossibility for any one man to gain the whole world; but, were it possible to gain, it would profit him nothing.

IX. 1. ἐν δυνάμει] Phrase for adv., powerfully, 'mightily,' 'gloriously,' by complete success. So in Luke iv. 36. Col. i. 29. 2 Thess. i. 11, and the simple Dat. in Acts iv. 33, with power upon earth, so as to be gloriously established among both Jews and Gentiles. See note on Acts xvi. 28.

3. γραφεῖν] The term (from γράφος, a tool like our teazle, used by wool-combers) denotes a fuller, one who fulled and dressed new clothes, or scoured and cleansed old ones, raising the nap by means of the teazle; and also, by the use of fullers' earth and alkali, restored the colour to its original whiteness. See Schol. on Aristoph., Plutarch, and even Xenoph. Mem. iii. 76, 6. There were (as Casaubon on Theoph. shows) two uses of the 'fullers' earth,'—one to cleanse away the dirt, the other to communicate whiteness to the garment. The second operation is here alluded to by Mark. In Xen. Ag. 26, the Vulg. γραφεῖς ought to be restored, for what the recent Editors have adopted, on the conjecture of Leuncl. and Steph., γραφεῖς. The γραφεῖς is not inapposite; but that γραφεῖς is the true reading is plain from Mem. iii. 7, 6, where, in a similar list of artisans, we have similarly conjoined γραφεῖς and σκυτεῖς. The sense is scourers, furbishers.

4. καὶ ἦσαν συλλαλ. τῷ Ἰ.] Here Mark, as also Matthew, only mentions this discoursing in a general way; but the particular subject thereof is recorded, for our instruction, on the authentic testimony of Luke ix. 31, seqq. The whole transaction was omitted by John, probably because so minutely narrated by the three preceding Evangelists.

5. ἀποκριθεὶς—λέγει] This is one of the many passages of the New Test. in which ἀποκρίνεσθαι signifies simply to address any one, generally in continuation of some previous discourse, and not unfrequently, as here, without any reference, to begin to speak, which is its use in Sept., Job iii. 2. Alex. ἀπεκρίθη λέγων. Cant. ii. 11. Zech. iii. 4. And so in Rev. vii. 13. This whole use is said to be a Hebraism formed on קרא; but the present is espec. such, since קרא, by a signification antecedent to the usual one, 'to answer,' meant I suspect to 'raise the voice' in beginning to speak, and then (from the adjunct) signified to 'begin to speak' in the way of answer.

7. λέγουσα] This is omitted in many MSS. (including almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and some Versions, and is cancelled by all the recent Editors, as having been introduced from the other Gospels.

8. ἐξάπινα] This rather rare form is a neuter plural, taken adverbially, of the old epic adjective ἐξάπινος; whence the Ionic ἐξαπίνης, contracted by the Attics to ἐξαίφνης. Yet the old adverb was retained by the Macedonians, and occurs sometimes in the Sept. and the later Class. writers. In ἀλλὰ τὸν Ἰ., ἀλλὰ is generally taken as put for εἰ μὴ, which is found in the passage of Matthew. Fritz., however, supposes the particle as put with reference to the negative in οὐκ ἐτί, and supplies a verb of 'seeing,'—namely, ἰδῶν, from the preceding participle. Yet the former mode is defended and illustrated by our but, which has often the sense except. The fact is, that in this case ἀλλά is for ἀλλ' ἢ, otherwise than.

10. τὸν λόγον ἐκράτησαν, &c.] The sense of these words mainly depends upon the construction. Some construe them with the words following, πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς; others take them with the preceding, συζητοῦντες. The former method is preferred by some of the ancient, and the earlier modern Commentators; while the latter is adopted by almost all the later Expositors; and with reason: for such a construction as the former would be unprecedented. They are, however, not agreed on the sense of ἐκράτησαν; some rendering it 'retinuerunt,' others, 'animo exceperunt;' others, again, 'animo retinuerunt.' To all of these interpretations, however, objections lie. Now κρατίω with the Accus. means to hold fast, and figur. 'not to let slip from one's memory, or attention;' and also, as we say, to keep to oneself, reticere. Either sense may be admitted; the former is more agreeable to what precedes; the latter, to what follows, and as being required by the construction, is preferable. Τί ἐστὶ — νεκρῶν, quidnam esset ē mortuis redire,—'what Jesus meant by speaking of rising from the dead.' They did not question the general resurrection, which all, but the Sadducees, believed: but they could not reconcile this language with what they had learnt in the law,—that Christ should live for ever, and hold an everlasting kingdom. Hence their slowness in comprehending the assurances,—so often reiterated to them by Christ,—of his death and resurrection. Inasmuch that when the Lord was dead, their hopes died with him, and only revived at his resurrection.

11. ὁ τι λέγει.] On reconsidering the force of ὅτι here, I am of opinion that there is some corruption in the text; and that the various readings are entitled to no other attention, than as attesting the perplexity of the ancient Interpreters. The difficulty is best removed by considering ὅτι (or rather ὁ τι) as standing for διότι, for what cause? equivalent to why, as in three passages adduced by Steph. Thes. in v. from Homer and Isocrat.; to which I add Xen. Ephes. iv. 2 s. fin. Thucyd. i. 90 (where ὁ τι is rightly edited by Bekker and Poppo). Jos. Ant. vi. 11. 9. The same idiom recurs infra v. 28, ὁ τι ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἐδυνήθημεν;

12. On again carefully reconsidering the disputed expression καὶ πῶς, and the best mode of removing the difficulty, I am still of opinion, that the mode of removing it by critical emendation, as Griesb., Scholz, and Fritz. propose to do, is not to be thought of. Mr. Alf., with unwonted prudence, retains the text. rec. καὶ πῶς, which he thinks forms a counter-question to that of the Apostles at v. 11. 'Our Lord,' he says, 'answers their inquiry by another, q. d. "And how is it [also] written of the Son of Man that he, &c.?"' But this method involves a certain straining of the words, by the insertion of a καὶ, as also by an unauthorized emphasis laid on he, which would require an αὐτός before πολλὰ παῖς. Not to say, that this is taking for granted that our Lord answered the question of the Apostles by a question; which, though done by Him occasionally in addressing the Pharisees, was never done in the case of the Apostles or Disciples. Moreover, this answering of question by question is quite forbidden by the parallel passage of Matth. Under these circumstances, although the interpretation which Mr. Alf. proceeds to lay down of the words following be specious, it is inadmissible, being a building erected on a false foundation. Indeed I see no sufficient reason to alter my opinion,—that for καὶ πῶς the true reading is καὶ καθὼς, which opinion is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., Vulg., and Persic Versions, and by καθὼς without the καὶ (which might easily be absorbed in the καθ. following), found in A, K, M, Δ, and about 20 cursive MSS., including some of the most ancient of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B. x. 16, collated by Scriv. I doubt not, that, on further collations, it will be found in not a few uncollated, or ill-collated MSS. Thus the sense will be, as Bp. Marsh expresses it, 'And that, as it is written of the Son of Man, he (i. e. John the Baptist) may suffer many things, and be set at nought.' If this should be thought scarcely effectual to remove the difficulty, we may, besides adopting the reading in my text, get rid of the remaining difficulty by supplying, as I have intimated in my punctuation, ἐξουθενῶν—thus leaving to be supplied after ἐξουθεν. the short corresponding clause (which is often, in such cases, left to be understood from the context) οὕτω πάσχει, equiv. to μίλλαι πάσχει, 'thus he (i. e. the Son of Man) is about to suffer.' This is strongly confirmed by the οὕτω καὶ of Matth. And I cannot doubt that the sense intended to be expressed by Mark, was the same as that expressed distinctly by Matth., though only intimated by Mark.

At v. 13 the inference is drawn, the sense being (as the parallel passage of Matth. confirms) that just as the first coming of the Son of Man was to suffer and to die, so has the first coming of Elias been, as it was written of him (αὐτόν), i. e. 'the Son of Man.' Thus there seems to have been intended an intimation that the sufferings of the Son of Man were close at hand. I must not omit to remark, that at v. 12, for ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν, Tisch. and Alf. read εἶπεν, from B, C, L, Δ, and the Syr. and Copt. Versions. Thus external authority is quite against it (for I do not find εἶπεν in a single Lamb. or Mus. copy); and internal evidence is not, as Mr. Alf. may imagine, altogether in favour of εἶπεν. In the text. rec. it may have been introduced, as he pronounces, from the parallel passage of Matth., but it is very improbable that it should, for, cui bono? And that it should thus have come into all the MSS. except 4, is incredible. On the other hand, ἴφη may probably have proceeded from Critics, who thought that the term was more grave, and suitable to the following context; and that it was preferable, as removing somewhat of the harshness involved in thus answering a question by a question. They have done the same elsewhere, e. g. infra xii. 24, where the same Editors have introduced ἴφη from the same MSS., but in both passages the better judgment of Lachm. induced him to retain the text. rec.

17. ἔχοντα—ἄλαλον] Notwithstanding what is urged by some recent Expositors, who adopt Mede's hypothesis on the Demoniacs, this can only signify, as Fritz. acknowledges, 'whose body was in the power of a demon who made him dumb.' So in Luke xi. 14, 'a deaf demon' (i. e. one who causes deafness) is mentioned. Comp. Plut. T. ii. p. 438 (speaking of the Pythian priestess), ἀλάλου καὶ κακοῦ πνεύματος οὕσα πλήρης.

18. ὅπου—καταλάβῃ] Wetst. and others render, 'and wherever, or whenever, it may attack him': for the verb καταλαμβάνειν, they say, is often used of the attack of any disorder, espec. of epilepsy. But the context demands that we should take καταλάβῃ of the demon; and the sense is, 'wherever, or whenever, he lights on him;' a signification often found in Thucyd.

—ῥήσσει αὐτόν] 'dashes him to the ground.' Such is the use of the word in Luke vi. 49, and sometimes in the later Greek writers, as Artemid. i. 60, ῥ. τὸν ἀντίπαλον. In the parallel passage of Luke is added the circumstance κράζει, answering to the ingemit of a finely graphic description in Lucret. iii. 408.

—τρίζει τοὺς ὀδ. α.] 'grinds his teeth.' So Theophyl. Sim. p. 91, χαλεπαίνων καὶ τετριγὺς τοὺς ὀδόντας. Aristoph. Ran. 926, μὴ πρὶς τοὺς ὀδόντας. These and the other particulars in this verse and ver. 22, are, indeed, all symptoms of epilepsy. But if we even should suppose that the man was an epileptic, it would not follow that the disorder was not induced by demoniacal influence.

—ξηραίνεται] Some ancient and several modern Commentators explain 'faints away,' 'falls into a swoon.' But however this may be a symptom of epilepsy, the word will not bear that sense, and can only mean 'pines away.' I agree with Fritz., that the word denotes, not so much what happens during the demon's attack, as a general consequence from thence. Thus Celsus says of Epilepsy, 'hominem consumit!'

19. I have, with all the recent Editors, received αὐτοῖς for αὐτῷ, on strong authority (to which I add some of the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), confirmed by internal evidence. See note on Matt. xvii. 17, where I have shown, that the reproof in γινεὰ ἄπιστος is meant for all the parties present in the degree that they merited it, in fact, the race of persons among whom our Lord's ministry was carried on; and the spirit of the exclamation (not interrogation) at ἕως πότε ἀνέξομαι ὑμῶν is only an ejaculation of impatient indignation at their hardness of heart and unbelief.

20. ἰδὼν αὐτόν—ἐσπάραξεν] Most Commentators take ἰδὼν for ἰδόντα. But that is a false view of the construction, which Fritz. rightly regards as involving an anacoluthon. Mark meant to say καὶ ἰδὼν (ὁ παῖς) αὐτόν, εὐθέως ὑπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος ἐσπαράσσεται, but then changed the construction; of which see another example in Acts xx. 3.

—πεσὼν ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς ἐκυλ.] 'rolled himself about.' See my Lex. Comp. Lucian. Tox. 15, T. ii. 523, init. ἐκύκευ, καὶ τέλος (at last) καταβαλὼν ἑαυτὸν εἰς τοῦδαφος ἐκυλίνδετο, καὶ λύττα ἦν ἀκριβὲς τὸ πρᾶγμα.

21. I have now received, with Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., ἐκ before παῖδ., not only as supported by competent external authority (including a few of the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies, also Trin. Coll. B. x. 16, 17), confirmed by internal evidence.

ἔστιν, ὡς τοῦτο γέγονεν αὐτῷ; 'Ο δὲ εἶπε· ἡ παιδιόθεν. ²² καὶ

²² τὸ πῦρ] I still retain the τὸ—which I find in most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies—though I am now of opinion that the Article was sometimes used when any other fire, and not merely that in the house, was meant; so that when it did not designate fire generally, the Article was usually employed, though occasionally omitted, as in Matt. iii. 10. vii. 19, and Luke iii. 9. As to the passage of John xv. 5, see note.

—ἀλλ', εἴ τι δύνασαι] This use of ἀλλ' is best regarded by Fritz. as a formula oblationis, entreating help. I would compare Dio Chrysost. p. 81, ἐκείνης δαομένης τοῦ πατρὸς, εἴ τι δύναται, βοηθεῖν. Demosth. p. 1344. 3, βοηθήσον ἡμῖν, εἴ τι ἔχεις, &c. Homer II. i. 393, ἀλλὰ σὺ, εἰ δύνασαι γα, περισχεῖο παιδὸς ἱππός. Soph. Ed. T. 697, τανῦν δ' εὐπομπός (γενού), εἰ δύναοι. Callim. Del. 226, ἄλλα φίλῃ, δύνασαι γάρ, ἀμύνειν. See also Thucyd. vi. 25, and Hdtot. viii. 57.

been omitted inadvertently by those scribes who did not see its force. I rather, however, suspect it to have been omitted from design. The Alexandrian Critic who first threw it out, perhaps thought there was more gravity in making the clause terminate with the most important word; which itself conveyed the answer; the very reason, it should seem, why our English Translators here render, Lord, I believe. And he would probably have emended Κύριε, π., had it not been forbidden by the propriety of the Greek language to commence an address with a Vocative case; not having the good taste to see the propriety of making the profession of faith be accompanied by an address so adapted to entreaty. However, I do not deny that it may have been interpolated from a Scholiast. It was evidently not in the copy used by the Pesch. Syr. Translator, but it is in a few of the earliest copies of the Ital. Vers. Lachm. remarks that it is not in the Cod. Amiant. of the Vulg.; and I find it not in the Lamb. MS. of the 7th century. However, I have very little doubt of its genuineness, and none whatever of the phrase μετὰ δακρύων just before, which is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, B, C, L, K, Δ, and 1 cursive, since the authority for cancelling the words is too slender, espec. as internal evidence in this case draws two ways. It was probably lost from variation of position, or removed by false criticism, and from its not well comporting with ἔλεγε. Certainly it could not be, as Alf. says, 'a gloss on κράξας,' which could need no such explanation. There was, moreover, another reason why the man should have shed tears in his exclamatory address, namely, that he felt the implied reproach conveyed in our Lord's words, "If thou canst but believe:" the tear-shedding attesting his strong feeling of the unworthiness of his unbelief. Perhaps, too, as Olshausen supposes, in the struggle of his anxiety at his son's wretched condition, a spark of faith was, through mercy and grace, kindled in his soul from above, whereby a strength of faith was born in the soul empty of it before.

hands of the disciples. But this is taking too low a view. It should seem from what is remarked by Chrys., Victor., and Euthym., that, in so speaking, our Lord alludes to the power which the Demon, whom he addresses, well knows to reside in himself, q.d. Ἐγὼ, ὃν σὺ οἶδας, σοὶ ἐπιτάσσω. As respects the subjoined charge καὶ μηκέτι εἰσελθῇ εἰς αὐτόν, 'this is,' indeed, as Alf. observes, 'the only place where we have such a (subjoined) charge.' But it is not put in, as he thinks, to show the excessive malignity and tenacity of this kind of spirit; still less, for what Grot., L. Brug., and others suppose; but for what is well pointed out by Chrys., Euthym., Theophyl., and Victor, that 'this was said with an eye to the father's acknowledged weakness of faith, thus intimating to the bystanders, espec. the disciples, that had it not been for this express charge from Him, who had all power, the demon might again have entered the youth.' So Euthym., τοῦτο εἶπε προειδὼς, ὅτι καὶ αὐτὸς ἐμελλεν ἀξίως (conj. εἰκότως) ἐπισημῶσαι αὐτῷ διὰ τὴν ἀπιστίαν αὐτοῦ (the father), κωλύει οὖν αὐτό, ἵνα μὴ δόξῃ (appear) ὅτι οὐκ ἀπηλάθῃ πρότερον. In short, there is every reason to think that this was altogether a very peculiar case; and hence we may account for this being the only occasion on which such a charge as this was given by our Lord.

29. The words καὶ νηστεία are omitted in B and K, and are cancelled by Tisch., with a rashness most uncritical, since to the strongest external authority for the words is added internal evidence, considering that one cannot imagine how they should have been interpolated in all the copies but one, and all the Versions; whereas that they should have been omitted, may easily be accounted for,—namely, either from the carelessness of the scribe (not, however, from his passing from καὶ to κακίστην, as Mr. Alford imagines), or rather from the licence of the Critical Reviser of that text, who at 1 Cor. vii. 5, took the same liberty, in conjunction with some other of his brethren. Nay, at Matt. xvii. 21, he cancelled both ἐν προσευχῇ and καὶ ἐν νηστείᾳ.

30. παρεπορεύοντο 'passed along,'—namely, the Lake. See note on Mark ii. 23.—Οὐκ ᾔθελεν—γινῶ. A popular mode of speaking, like that at vii. 23, οὐδὲνα ᾔθελε γινῶναι, signifying that he wished to travel in a private character. The reason for this is subjoined in the next verse, which should be rendered, 'for he was teaching his disciples and telling them' &c.

38. For ἀπεκρ. δὲ, Tisch. and Alf. read ἐφη, from B, L, Δ, and the Copt. and Syr. Verss.; while Lachm. retains ἀπεκρ.;—very properly; for the external authority for the above reading

μέν τινα [έν] τῷ ὀνόματί σου ἐκβάλλοντα δαιμόνια, ὃς οὐκ ἀκολουθεῖ ἡμῖν· καὶ ἐκωλύσαμεν αὐτὸν, ὅτι οὐκ ἀκολουθεῖ ἡμῖν. 39 Ὁ δὲ Ἰησοῦς εἶπε· Μὴ κωλύετε αὐτόν· οὐδεὶς γάρ ἐστιν ὃς ποιήσει δύναμιν ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματί μου, καὶ δυνήσεται ταχὺ κακολογήσάί με. 40 Ὁς γὰρ οὐκ ἔστι μου, † ἡμῶν ὑπὲρ † ἡμῶν ἐστιν. 41 Ὁς γὰρ ἂν ποτίσῃ ὑμᾶς ποτήριον ὕδατος ἐν [τῷ] ὀνόματί [μου,] ὅτι Χριστοῦ ἔστε, ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, οὐ μὴ ἀπολέσῃ τὸν μισθὸν αὐτοῦ. 42 Καὶ ὃς ἂν σκανδαλίσῃ ἓνα τῶν μικρῶν τῶν πιστευόντων εἰς ἐμέ, καλὸν ἐστιν αὐτῷ μᾶλλον, εἰ περικείται λίθος μυλικὸς περὶ τὸν τράχηλον αὐτοῦ, καὶ βέβληται εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν. 43 Καὶ ἐὰν σκανδαλίξῃ σε ἡ χεὶρ σου, ἀπόκοψον αὐτήν· καλὸν σοι ἐστὶ κυλλὸν εἰς τὴν ζωὴν εἰσελθεῖν, ἢ τὰς δύο χεῖρας ἔχοντα ἀπελθεῖν εἰς τὴν γέενναν, εἰς τὸ πῦρ τὸ ἄσβεστον. 44 Ὅπου ὁ σκώληξ αὐτῶν οὐ τελευτᾷ, καὶ is quite insufficient, and internal evidence is quite in favour of ἀπακρ., considering that it was far more probable that ἀπακρ. should be a correction of Critics for better Grecism (as on other occasions in the case of these very words), than that it should be an interpolation from Luke in all the copies but three. To turn from words to things;—it has been well pointed out by Bp. Lonsdale, that “the blessing pronounced by our Lord upon whosoever should receive one of the humblest of his disciples in his name, reminded John of the manner in which he and his fellow Apostles had treated a person whom they saw casting out devils in Christ’s name. He therefore interrupted his Master’s discourse to relate what they had done; doubting, it should seem, whether they had done right respecting it. How far the person here spoken of by John was a believer in the Gospel, or why his use of the name of Jesus was permitted to be effectual for the purpose of casting out devils, it is impossible for us to determine.”

— ἐν τῷ ὄν.] The ἐν is not found in several MSS. and is cancelled by most Editors. But it is defended by other passages. James v. 10. The early Critics, it seems, stumbled at the Hebraistic idiom; and hence either cancelled the ἐν, or changed it into ἐνι, which last reading (slenderly supported by MS. authority) ought not to have been edited by Fritz.

39. οὐδεὶς—ἔστιν ὃς, &c.] The construction is like that at 1 Cor. vi. 5, and in Plato, Menex. p. 71, οὐδεὶς (sc. ἔστιν) ὅστις οὐ γιλάσεται καὶ ἔρει. In δυνήσ. ταχὺ there is a popular form of speaking, for ‘will bring himself readily, or lightly, to speak evil of me;’ inasmuch as the success of the miracle will deter him therefrom.

40. For ἡμῶν—ἡμῶν many MSS. (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies) have ὑμῶν—ὕμῶν, which was edited by Matth., Griesb., Scholz, and Lachm.; while Tisch. and Alf. retain the former. External authority, as far as regards uncial MSS., is in favour of ὑμῶν, the Stephanic text; but as regards cursive MSS., is in favour ἡμῶν; though most of the ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies have ὑμῶν. As respects internal evidence, it is here equally balanced; so that the true reading must, perhaps, ever be a doubtful question.

41. The words τῷ and μου are cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on the authority of several uncial MSS.; perhaps rightly; for internal evidence is rather against them, it being difficult to imagine why they should have been excluded. Yet it must be admitted that by ἐν τῷ ὀνόματί μου ὅτι is represented the true and full sense, only alluded to in the other, ἐν ὀνόματι ὅτι.

42. Fritz., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. here insert τούτων after μικρῶν, from several very ancient MSS., confirmed by internal evidence.

— By λίθος μυλικὸς is meant not strictly speaking a millstone, but a very large stone of the size of millstones. So Hom. Il. vii. 270, βαλὼν μυλοειδέϊ πέτρῳ, and so in Virg. Æn. viii. 249, ‘vastisque molaribus instat.’

44. ὅπου—σβέννεται] The words are derived from Is. lxvi. 24, where the punishment to be inflicted, in this life, on those who are rebellious towards God, is vividly depicted, by the representation of their carcasses being subjected to the continual gnawing of worms, and the devouring of an unextinguishable fire; so as to be objects of detestation to all future generations. Here, however, they are applied to represent the eternal misery of another world, by images derived from Γέννα in this; on which, as a frequent emblem of torment, see note at Matt. v. 22. The true rendering seems to be, ‘where the worm is never to die, nor the fire to be quenched.’ So the Sept. well expresses, ὁ γὰρ σκώληξ αὐτῶν οὐ τελευτήσει, καὶ τὸ πῦρ αὐτῶν οὐ σβησθήσεται. Similar figures are found in Eclus. vii. 17, ἐκδίκησις ἀσβεστοῦ πῦρ καὶ σκώληξ, and Judith. xvi. 17, Κύριος παντοκράτωρ ἐκδίκησις αὐτοῦ ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κρίσεως, δούνα πῦρ καὶ σκώληκας εἰς σάρκα αὐτῶν· καὶ κλαύσονται ἐν αἰσθήσει ἕως αἰῶνος. Some difference of opinion, however, exists as to the nature of the punishments here designated by ὁ σκώληξ αὐτῶν καὶ τὸ πῦρ (scil. αὐτῶν, i. e. of the wicked),—namely, whether they are to be regarded as actual and positive inflictions, or as figuratively representing the gnawing of remorse and self-condemnation, and the torture of men's unavailing reproach, for having brought on themselves their own destruction. Many have been inclined to think that, though the fire be taken in a physical sense, the worm is figurative. On which interpretation it is truly observed by Fritz., that 'what holds good of one clause of the sentence, must of the other; for a confusion of the physical with the metaphorical in the same sentence is not to be tolerated.' And he would have both taken in the literal sense. But there seems no reason why both terms should not be regarded as figurative, yet designating, under these figures, real infirmities, as dreadful to the then frame as the gnawing of worms, or the burning of fire, to our present. See a recent Tract by Professor Stuart, entitled 'Exegetical Essays,' on some words of Scripture relative to future punishment,—namely, αἰὼν and αἰώνιος, ἡρώς, ἄδης and γέεννα, and espec. Sect. 3, which ably discusses the nature and manner of using figurative language in respect to the objects of a future world. And not only does the language under our consideration express torment, the acutest in kind, but eternal in duration. So, in the parallel passage of Matthew, we have the expressions εἰς τὴν γέενναν τοῦ πυρὸς and εἰς τὸ πῦρ τὸ αἰώνιον, the latter qualifying and completing the idea in the former. And therefore the notions of those who, from the time of Origen, have dared to limit this duration, are both groundless and presumptuous. With reason, therefore, does Prof. Stuart, after considering at large the bearing which the use of the terms αἰὼν and αἰώνιος in Scripture has on the subject of future punishment, come to the conclusion (awful, indeed, but not to be suppressed), that it does most indubitably follow, that 'if the Scriptures have not asserted the ENDLESS punishment of the wicked, neither have they asserted the ENDLESS happiness of the righteous, nor the ENDLESS glory and existence of the Godhead. The one is equally certain with the other. Both are laid in the same balance. They must be tried by the same tests. And if we give up the one, we must, in order to be consistent, give up the other also. The necessary conclusion, then, must be, that the smoke of future torment will ascend up for ever and ever!' That this was the universal sentiment of the Fathers, with the exception of Origen, is shown by Whitby on Heb. vi. 2.

49. πᾶς γὰρ—ἀλισθήσεται] There is perhaps no passage in the New Test. which has so defied all efforts to assign to it any certain interpretation as this. It is impossible here to detail, much less review, even a tenth of the interpretations which have been proposed. It must suffice to notice those expositions only which have any semblance of truth. And first it is of importance to inquire whether the words are to be considered with reference to what goes before, or taken as a separate dictum. The latter is the view taken by some, espec. Kuinoel; who maintains that this and the next verse are out of place, and belong to some other part of the Gospel. This, however, is a gratuitous supposition; which has, moreover, the disadvantage of depriving us of all benefit of a context, to shed some glimmer of light on the deep obscurity, which involves the present passage. Yet those who admit that the passage has a connexion with, and reference to, what precedes, are not agreed as to the precise nature of that connexion. Many refer it to the words immediately preceding; so that either a reason may be supposed given why the wicked in hell will be tormented unto eternity, or that ver. 49 may be considered as a further explication or illustration of what was said in ver. 48; for γὰρ has often the sense of nampe. But the great objection to this mode of interpretation is, that it compels us to assign such a sense to πᾶς as cannot be justified on any principle of correct exegesis,—namely, 'every wicked man,' or, 'every one of those condemned to hell.' Quite as objectionable is the sense of πᾶσα θυσία, assigned by some of these Commentators, 'every one consecrated to God,' by which the salt is taken to mean the salt of grace. Many other interpretations are grounded upon the same hypothesis, that the words have reference to those which immediately precede; every one of which, however, is liable to very strong objections.

Let us now examine the other class of interpretations,—namely, those which proceed on the principle,—that the words have reference to what follows, at ver. 47. Thus πᾶς will then denote 'every one of you,' 'every Christian.' But what is the meaning of πυρὶ ἀλισθήσεται? Here, as in the former class, we have a multitude of precarious, and even absurd interpretations. Indeed, only two can be thought deserving of any serious attention. 1. That of those who take πυρὶ ἀλίσθ. to mean, 'shall be purified by the Holy Ghost.' (See Matt. iii. 11. Acts iii. 3.) They render: 'For every Christian will be seasoned with the fire [of the Holy Ghost], as [in the old Law] the precept was, Every sacrifice shall be seasoned with salt:' q. d. 'As (καὶ for ὡς, as often) every sacrifice, under the Old Law, was to be seasoned with salt, so, in the New, every Christian shall have a portion of the Holy Spirit.' But to assign such a sense to πυρί is harsh, and we can scarcely suppose that our Lord would speak so enigmatically.—The difficulty, indeed, is chiefly centered in the interpretation of πυρί, which seems best taken by the ancients generally, and some moderns (as Beza, Rosenmüller, Kuinoel, and Fritz.), to mean 'the fiery trials of life.' They are not, however, agreed on the sense of ἀλισθήσεται. Beza and others take the meaning to be, 'Every Christian is purified by the fiery trials of life, as every sacrifice is salted with salt.' But ἀλισθ. will not admit of such a sense, and we may prefer the interpretation of ἀλ. proposed by Bos, Muzel, and Fritz.; espec. as it is confirmed by the ancient gloss δοκιμασθήσεται,—namely, 'shall be put to the proof.' The reference, moreover, of this verse is not to ver. 47 only, but likewise to the whole portion, vv. 43–47; for, as Fritz. truly observes, 'since Jesus has there thrice expressed the sentiment, that a loss even of the members of the body, nay, of those most useful, is to be encountered, rather than to yield to the seductions of vice; that so being tried and approved, we may attain the prize of our high calling: nothing can be expected but that it should be shown, that such sort of trials (like those of athletes) are absolutely necessary. By πᾶν, then, must be understood all persons, i. e. all Christians, since to them vv. 43–48 alone belong. Πῦρ designates that fiery trial of mortification and self-denial, in encountering which the fortitude of the sufferer is compared to that of enduring the loss of a limb. Πυρί ἀλ. may be interpreted, 'will be tried and prepared by such a trial for sanctification and final acceptance,'—a metaphor taken from victims which were prepared for sacrifice by the imposition of the mola salsa. In the words of the next clause καὶ πᾶσα θυσία ἀλλι ἀλισθήσεται (founded on Levit. ii. 13, καὶ πᾶν ὄψων θυσίας, i. e. every sacrifice, ὅμιον ἀλλι ἀλισθήσεται), the καὶ is to be rendered sicuti, as, like the Hebrew v. The full sense will thus be, 'Every one (i. e. every Christian) is to be seasoned [and prepared] by the fiery trials of this life [for eternal glory], even as every victim is seasoned with salt [for sacrifice];' intimating, that as salt was, by the old Law (see Levit. ii. 13), necessary to purify and prepare the victim for sacrifice, so, in the new law of the Gospel, there is a moral seasoning or preparation, as necessary to those who would, as they are required, 'offer their bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God.' Rom. xii. 1.

By a paronomasia on the double sense of salt, the word is first used, at ver. 49, in its proper sense; then, at ver. 50, in its figurative one; where it denotes, as some say, the salt of friendship; but rather, we may suppose, with others, the salt of wisdom. See Coloss. iv. 6. Comp. Matt. v. 13. Luke xiv. 34. After recommending the study of wisdom, our Lord enjoins the cultivation of peace one with another. See Rom. xii. 18. Heb. xii. 14.

X. 1. διὰ τοῦ πέραν Some Editors cancel διὰ τοῦ from MSS. C, D; while others, as Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read καὶ instead of διὰ τοῦ, from MSS. B, C, L. I see not how the reading διὰ τοῦ can be justified; and of the two proposed readings I prefer the former, since the καὶ has every appearance of having been brought in to help the sense. If the words in question be removed, and καὶ inserted, the text here will be precisely as it stands in the parallel passage of Matt. xix. 1, and that is, I doubt not, all that the Reviser intended to effect. It is, however, proper previously to ascertain the exact sense meant to be conveyed by those words, and then endeavour to make out what addition to that sense, or variation from it, was probably intended by the Evangelist. Now, in the former case, I apprehend τὰ ὄρια included not only the border-line of the river Jordan, but also its banks; and I conceive that the adjunct πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδ. was meant to express which of the two was here spoken of, namely, that beyond the Jordan, on the side of Peræa, opposite to that on the west side, that of Judæa. Accordingly, the expression here πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδ., stands in the place of an adjective qualifying ὄρια. Such is, I doubt not, the exact sense intended by the Evangelist. Now the question is, whether Mark intended to express that sense only, or to vary from it, or simply to make an addition to it. There is little doubt that he meant an addition; but the added words, as we have them, in almost all the MSS., διὰ τοῦ, convey no complete sense; yet they are not on that account to be cancelled, against the evidence of all the MSS. but a few. It is sufficient to regard them as corrupt, though perhaps so as to admit of emendation. May we not suppose that πόρου has been lost by being absorbed in the subsequent πέραν? It may be so, but I pronounce nothing. The word must have been in the copy used by the Persic Translator, who renders, 'venit in transitum Jordanis;' and probably he read there eis πόρον τ. i., and the Arab. Vers. eis τὸ πέραν, scil. χιλός. I need scarcely say how frequent is the expression πόρος ποταμοῦ in the best writers, from Homer downwards. Where this πόρος was, it is not easy to say. It was probably at Gamala, where there was then a ford, and afterwards a bridge. See note on Matt. xix. 1. It would seem that the true reading here is irrecoverably lost; at least, unless some reading of uncollated or ill-collated MSS. should furnish some clue. Meanwhile, I have marked the τοῦ and the πέραν as probably corrupt. That the Evangelist meant, in whatever way he wrote, to express the sense, 'after passing through the country beyond Jordan,' i. e. along the left bank of the Jordan, I have no doubt.

2. προσ. οἱ Φαρ.] I now agree with Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch. in cancelling the οἱ, for reasons which will appear from note supra vii. 1.

6. ἀπὸ δὲ ἀρχῆς κτίσεως] In this rare phrase κτίσις signifies 'the creation,' the world, or universe, as xiii. 19. 2 Pet. iii. 4. Sap. v. 17. xvi. 24. The argument in this and the verse following is, that 'God, at the beginning of the world, created man and woman, in order that they should live together in perfect union; and that hence married persons are to be regarded, not as two, but one; and therefore, by the Divine law, no divorce can be permitted.' [See Gen. i. 27. v. 2.]

10. ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ] This seems to designate some private lodging, which they occupied on the road; and the expression is here used in contradistinction to the public place, where our Lord had been arguing with the Pharisees.

11, 12. In these two verses there is a marvellous diversity of readings, with which I need not trouble the reader, espec. since none of them authorize any change in the text. There may be some want of neatness in the phraseology, nay, of precision in the use of one of the terms employed,—namely, ἀπολύσῃ in ver. 12,—but if the whole be taken as expressed populariter, there will be nothing to stumble at. It is true that, strictly speaking, a Jewish wife could not divorce her husband; for, as to the examples of Salome and others, their actions were done in defiance of all law, and in imitation of Roman licentiousness. Ἀπολύσῃ, therefore, at ver. 12, may, with many of the best Commentators, be considered as used with some licence, on account of the antithesis, for ἐξέλθῃ ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀνδρός; which, indeed, is found in some MSS. and Versions, but is plainly a gloss. There is the same catachresis at 1 Cor. vii. 12, 13 (where the Apostle may be supposed to have had this saying of our Lord in mind) in the use of μὴ ἀφίετω αὐτήν, and μὴ ἀφίετω αὐτόν. Perhaps, too, this term is used with reference to the customs of the Greeks and Romans, rather than the Jews, and seems to be meant to give a rule to the Apostles for general application, and which should put both sexes, in that respect, on the same footing.

The αὐτήν is by some referred to the repudiated wife; by others, to the newly married one. Either may be admitted; but in the former case the sense of ἔτι will be, 'to the injury of;' in the latter, 'in respect of;' i. e. in his connexion with. [Comp. Matt. v. 32. Luke xvi. 18. 1 Sam. vii. 10, seq.]

12. καὶ γαμηθῇ ἄλλω] Several of the most ancient MSS. have γαμήσῃ ἄλλω, which has been edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but, as is plain from Fritsch's elaborate investigation of the case, uncritically. The Reviser, it seems, scrupled at the Greek, which indeed is not very pure, since this use of the pass. γαμηθῆναι for the middle γαμήσθαι is found only in the later writers. See Lobeck, Phryn. p. 742.

14. [Comp. Matt. xviii. 3. 1 Cor. xiv. 20. 1 Pet. ii. 2.]

— καὶ μὴ κωλ.] The καὶ is omitted in many MSS., including not a few of the best Lamb. and Mus. copies, and has been cancelled by almost all Editors. In the parallel passage of Matthew, indeed, it is found in, perhaps, all the MSS. But there the order of the words is different, and it could scarcely be dispensed with.

16. For ἡὐλόγει, Lachm. and Scholz read αὐλόγει, which is found in the greater part of the most ancient MSS. (including many Lamb. and Mus. copies), and is probably the true reading. As to κατεῦλόγει, or which Tisch. and Alf. edit from MSS. B, C, κατηλόγει, it is probably a gloss, though well representing the sense, which is, 'prayed over them and for them,' 'prayed for a blessing on them.'

19. μὴ ἀποστερήσεις] Many Commentators are of opinion that ἀποστερεῖν is used in Scripture in a very extensive sense, so as to denote 'committing injustice of any kind,' and to be nearly synonymous with ἀδικεῖν. But it has properly a more special signification, denoting 'to deprive any one of his property, whether by actual and open robbery, or by secret fraud,' as denying a debt, cheating in the quality of goods sold, or overreaching in a bargain. There is, as Heupel observes, a reference to the 7th commandment, μὴ κλέψῃς, on which this is a sort of paraphrase, to show the extent of the injunction. Indeed, the Jews were accustomed, in ordinary discourse, and even in writing, to recite the precepts of the Decalogue not in the very words in which they are expressed, but in other equiv. terms.

21. ἠγάπησεν αὐτόν] On the sense of ἠγάπ. there is much difference of opinion; which has been occasioned by the fact, that the young man did not follow our Lord's admonition. This has induced some here to take ἀγαπᾶν in the sense, which it sometimes bears, 'to be content with.' But wherever so used, the word has reference to things, not persons, and is construed either with a Dative of object, or with a Participle, or an Infinitive. Of the other interpretations adopted, some are such as respect good will generally, 'he was kindly disposed towards him,' or (as that has been by many supposed not sufficient) such as imply good will by some outward gesture or action; both alike destitute of authority. The interpretation, 'he regarded him with favour and affection,' which is supported by the ancient Commentators, is the most natural and probable.

— τοῖς πτωχοῖς] The Article, not found in very many MSS. (including several Lamb. and Mus. copies), and the Edit. Princ., is cancelled by most Editors,—chiefly, it should seem, because it is not found in the parallel passages of Matthew and Luke. But, granting that 'such expressions admit of the Article, and also may dispense with it,' yet is not a writer to be allowed to choose which he will? And as the Article is used in precisely the same case at ch. xiv. 5, 7, why not here? where, indeed, we may far better account for its omission, than for its insertion;—namely, from a wish to make the phrase tally with Matthew and Luke.

22. στυγνάσας ἰ. τ. λ.] The term στυγ. here (on which see my Lex.) denotes that dissatisfaction of mind on the hearing of any thing distasteful, which stamps itself on the aspect by a lowering expression of countenance. Simil. in Eustath. de Ismen. l. iv. p. 98, we have συνοίχει τὴν ὄψιν, στυγνάζει τὸ πρόσωπον, with which comp. the fine Alexandreine of Dryden: "But sullen discontent sat lowering on her face."

24. ἐθαμβοῦντο ἐπ' αὐτῷ] 'were amazed at,' equiv. to 'were struck with astonishment' at what seemed to them so hard a saying—why is well pointed out by Matth. Henry. In the reply made by our Lord, what is said is happily introduced by the term τέκνα, an affectionate mode of address, well adapted to usher in something which should soften the seeming harshness of the foregoing expression as to the difficulty of rich men entering into the kingdom of God; and yet, as Wesl. points out, our Lord does not abate one jot of it here. But if this use of τέκνα (like the παῖδια of John xxi. 5) is worthy of remark as to its scope, presenting, as Mr. Alf. remarks, a trace of exactitude [such, I would say, as we might expect from its proceeding doubtless from St. Peter himself]—what shall we think of the rashness of those critical Revisers who removed it—as appears by its being absent from 3 important uncials and about 16 cursives adduced by the Editors, to which I could add some Lamb. and Mus. copies? Other Critics, however, made up for the presumption of their brethren by a double share of observance, in altering the τέκνα into τεκνία, which we find in the Alexand. and three other MSS., and which is absolutely edited by Lachm.! though, strange to say, he chooses at Gal. iv. 9, to alter τεκνία into τέκνα, from only three MSS. (as before), though the diminutive form is there called for by the affectionately parental air of the context. Such specimens as these of the “Critical treatment” of Sacred Scripture might well suggest to plain Christians to “cease from Critics! for wherein are they to be accounted of?”

But to turn from words to things;—in πῶς δύσκολ. at v. 25, we have a very emphatic expression implying all but impossibility; and the words τοὺς πεποιθότας ἐπὶ τ. χρήμασιν constitute a most important addition, serving to qualify the words in the passage of Matth., q. d. that ‘it is easier for a camel, &c., than for a rich man to cast off his trust in his riches,’—and no wonder, considering that every accession of wealth only increases the difficulty. So Victor. Caten. forcibly expresses a great truth: προσθήκη γὰρ τῶν πεισισμένων (incomings) μείζονα ἀνάπτει τὴν φλόγα, καὶ πεινσιτέροισιν ἐργάζεται τοὺς κτωμένους. With the present comp. parallel sentiments Job xxxi. 24. Ps. lxii. 10. 1 Tim. vi. 17.

25. τῆς τρυμαλιᾶς τῆς ῥαφίδος] The Articles are omitted in several MSS., most of them ancient. Bp. Middleton thinks them spurious; and Fritz. cancels them. Certainly, propriety requires that ῥαφίς, as it denotes ‘a needle’ in general, should not have the Article. And then propriety alike requires that if that be omitted, the other too shall be left out. Since, however, the latter propriety is of too refined a kind to be likely to have been known to the Evangelist, and as the idiom is found in our own language, it may be safer to retain the Article in question.

For διελθεῖν, very many MSS. and some Fathers have εισελθεῖν, which is adopted by Wets., Matthæi, and others. But, though I could adduce in confirmation most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, yet there are strong reasons against receiving this reading, as will appear from my note on Matt. xix. 24. The τῆς—τῆς are omitted in several MSS. (to which I could add not a few of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and were regarded as spurious by Bp. Midd., and cancelled by Fritz. and Lachm. I still, with Tisch., think fit to retain them, espec. since internal evidence is in their favour, considering that they were more likely to be removed (because absent from the passages of Matth. and Luke), than brought in merely from a notion of grammatical propriety.

26. καὶ τίς δύναται σωθ.] As Matt. xix. 25, has τίς ἄρα, this use of καὶ has been regarded as a Hebraism. But καὶ thus prefixed to τίς is frequent in the Class. writers. So Hdut. iii. 140, θαυμάσας λέγει· καὶ τίς ἐστιν Ἑλληνας εὐεργέτης;

27. The δὲ is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, C, Δ, and one cursive MS., but on insufficient grounds. Considering that the scribes often pass over δὲ, it was more likely to be omitted by accident in four MSS., than to have been inserted in all the rest from the passage of Matt.

— The τῷ before Θεῷ, which I have bracketed, is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on strong external authority (to which I add most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and internal evidence is rather against it.

28. καὶ ἤρξατο] The καὶ, not found in very many MSS. (to which I add most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), is cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but without reason, since it is obvious that some particle is necessary; and Fritz. edits ἤρξατο δὲ, but on no sufficient authority; and besides, there would thus appear no reason for the omission of the particle. Whereas the καὶ would be likely to be removed, as being employed in a manner never found in the Classical writers; or the variety of reading might, as in very many other cases, occasion omission. The Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions strongly confirm the genuineness of the word. In addition to the fact, that most of the Mus. copies which are without the καὶ have δὲ after δὲ, and that, in Trin. Coll. B. X. 16 the reading has been altered both ways, there exists strong confirmation that καὶ, as it is evidently the most ancient, is probably the genuine reading.

29. The δὲ after ἀποκριθεὶς, absent from many MSS. (to which I add several Lamb. and Mus. copies), is, with some reason, cancelled by Lachm.; and internal evidence is rather against it. Not a few MSS. have καὶ ἀποκριθ., which is edited by Fritz. But it is very possible that neither particle is genuine. The reading adopted by Tisch. and Alf., ἐφί, from B, Δ, and the Coptic Version, is evidently an alteration of Critics, such as occurs on many other occasions.

Before τοῦ εὐαγγελίου very many MSS. have ἔνεκα, which is edited by Griesb., Matth., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. I have not hitherto ventured to follow their example, not because I think (as does Fritz.) that the word is better away, but because it appears to me (espec. considering the reading of the parallel passage), that it was more likely to be inserted than omitted.

On the interpretation of this and the verse following not a few difficulties have been started. Two scruples have been raised, one as to the promise itself; the other as to its limitation, μετὰ διωγμῶν. As to the former, Campbell objects that 'in ver. 30, the words οἰκίας—ἀγρούς seem to signify that the compensation shall be in kind, in this life;' which, he says, could only mislead instead of enlightening. 'Besides, that some things are mentioned at ver. 29, of which a man can have but one, as father and mother. And yet at ver. 30, we have the plural—mothers. Wife is mentioned at ver. 29, but not wives at ver. 30. According to rule (he adds) if one was repeated, all should have been repeated; and the construction required the plural number in all.' But these objections, though they have been adopted and urged by Fritz., have, in reality, little or no force. We may safely maintain that the promise even as regarded this world was, considering that ἑκατονταπλασίονα must be taken for πολλαπλασίονα (which indeed is read in the parallel passage of Luke, and in some MSS. of that of Matt.), fulfilled literally in the Apostolic age. For the disciples, as they travelled about, or were driven by persecutions, experienced every where the utmost hospitality from their brethren; inasmuch, that the advantages they had lost might be said to be amply made up to them. There is even less force in the other objections. The strict regularity, which Campbell and Fritz. desiderate, is by no means a characteristic of the Scriptural writers (indeed of few ancient ones), and least of all of Mark. The irregularities they complain of are indeed, all of them, removed in one or other of the MSS., and those alterations are all received into the text by Fritz., though in defiance of every principle of true criticism. As to the plural number being required throughout ver. 30, it surely makes no great difference whether the plural or the singular, taken generically, be adopted. We might, indeed, say that the singular in things of which men have but one should have been used. The plural, however, may be tolerated, as referring to Christians at large. And notwithstanding grammatical propriety confined the Evangelist to the use of the singular as to the things just adverted to in the first verse, yet in the second and more minute enumeration he abandons it. Then again, though two particulars are omitted in ver. 30, which have place in ver. 29 (i. e. πατέρας and γυναῖκας), yet μητέρας might, in some measure, include the other. As to the omission of γυναῖκας, it is not difficult to account for that; for delicacy forbade the introduction of this particular. Again, as respects the spiritual recompense in this life, mentioned by Campb., and anxiously traced by many pious Expositors, as existing in "the joy and peace in believing," which would more than counterbalance the losses of those thus persecuted for righteousness' sake,—that, it should seem, was not here adverted to by our Lord. And though it might be thought little necessary that temporal remuneration should be mentioned to Apostles, yet it is to be observed, that what was here said was meant for the disciples at large; as was seen by Chrys. in his Homily on Matt. xix. 27—29, where see my notes.

To advert to the other difficulty, viz. that found in the qualifying words, μετὰ διωγμῶν; these, taken in conjunction with a promise of things merely temporal, have been thought by many so unsatisfactory, that they have sought either to alter the reading διωγμῶν into διωγμῶν, or to take μετὰ in the sense after. But there is no authority for either change. The ancient Commentators, and several modern ones (as Beza, Zeger Heupel, Wolf, and Fritz.), rightly explain the sense to be 'under persecutions,' i. e. 'even amidst persecutions.' Thus our Lord's general declaration is, that they who should leave all to follow him, would find, in that new fellowship, which they would thereby have with the Father (comp. Matt. xxiii. 9, with 1 John i. 3, 7) and with himself, a full compensation for the possessions and the friends they should have lost or given up. This view may serve to account for the non-mention of πατέρας in the second enumeration at ver. 30, the exalted relation to Him who is the Father in heaven absorbing all thought of other paternity. Upon the whole, this remarkable passage presents one of those weighty dicta of our Lord, which were at once declarations and prophecies. And the fulfilment of it in the latter view is strikingly manifest both from Scripture and from the Ecclesiastical History of the first century.

and Lachm., on considerable external authority (to which I add several Lamb. and Mus. MSS.); but internal evidence is in its favour, from the greater probability of its being removed than inserted;—removed, because not in the passage of Matt., or lost through the carelessness of scribes, or being absorbed in the αἰ preceding.

32. καὶ ἐθαμβ. καὶ ἀκολουθ. ἐφοβοῦντο] These words are evidently intended to describe the feelings of the disciples as they followed their Lord, he preceding them, in their way to Jerusalem. These feelings, which have been variously traced and accounted for by Expositors, must have partly arisen from the predictive announcement which our Lord now made to them respecting his death and passion. This might well occasion amazement; and yet the term ἐθαμβοῦντο is such as seems to call for something more than great surprise. As respects the feeling of fear, associated with that of amazement, this was doubtless for themselves as well as for their Master, who was then leading the way to a most perilous enterprise, which might be expected to terminate in their own death as well as his. Yet, with this feeling of alarm, foreboding the worst, there was, we may very well suppose, intermixed a feeling of astonishment that he should thus voluntarily and deliberately, nay, even eagerly, run into the mouth of that danger which he had formerly seemed to decline. Though, when I consider how very strong a term is ἐθαμβοῦντο, 'they were astounded' (with which may be compared what we find in two passages of Plut. ap. Steph. Theop., where the sense is explained to be stupore attonito pavori), I cannot but think that we must suppose an intermixture of a feeling of awe united with amazement (as in the instance of θάμβος, Luke v. 9), the former of which feelings had, we may perceive, been growing in the minds of the Apostles ever since the Transfiguration of their Lord; and which the increasing air of majesty, authority, and determination of purpose, he more and more assumed as his hour drew near, was well calculated to inspire.

34. τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμ.] So Tisch. and Alf. read, from B, C, D, L, Δ, with the Ital., Copt., and Syr. Versions, in marg.; and internal evidence is in favour of the above reading, considering that the text. rec. may have come from the passages of Matthew and Luke; and the phrase is used by Mark supra viii. 31. ix. 31;—sufficient evidence to prove that Mark may have so written, not that he did so write; that is negated by all the MSS. except five (for I find the text. rec. in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., Vulg., Arab., and Persic Versions. I have not mentioned cursive MSS., because, although Alford says, copying Scholz, "et alii," yet the alii, I find from Mill, consist of only R. Stephens' Codices β and η, of which the former has long been known to be the Cod. D; and as to the η, that has been proved to be the noted Cod. L. Consequently, the alii comes to nothing, the two MSS. having been already counted in the uncials. There is something so suspicious in the absence of all countenance from the cursive MSS., that it must, taken with the authority of the most weighty Versions, incline one to regard the genuineness of the reading of Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. as not proven.

35. Ἄfter λέγοντες, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. insert αὐτῷ, from B, C, D, L, Δ, confirmed by the Syr., Copt., and Arm. Versions, and Origen. Internal evidence is in its favour; but it needs more external authority to warrant its reception.

38. τὸ βάπτισμα, ὃ ἐγὼ βαπτίζομαι] Comp. Is. xxi. 4, ἡ ἀνομία με βαπτίζει, 'iniquity plunges me into ruin'; and Jos. Bell. iv. 3. 3, αἱ δὲ ὑπὸ τῶν ἐβάπτισαν τὴν πόλιν, only there there may be rather a nautical allusion,—namely, to a ship which has foundered at sea from stress of wind and weather, as at Ach. Tat. vi. 19, ὃ δὲ τῷ θυμῷ βεβαπτισμένος καταδύεται. The passages of the Class. writers cited by the Commentators are not apposite, as conveying a much weaker and diverse sense, the metaphor being there drawn from any thing stirped in liquid.

40. The μου after εὐν is cancelled by all the recent Editors, on strong external evidence, confirmed by most of the ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies; but since internal evidence is equally balanced, there is (as I have already heretofore shown) no case for change.

42. οἱ δοκοῦντες ἄρχειν] I am still of the same opinion, that there is here no pleonasm; but something, however difficult to express, is conveyed by the additional term, and the most probable sense is, 'those who are reputed to rule,' 'those who are regarded as rulers,' with a latent allusion to God supreme, 'who alone [really] ruleth unto the ends of the earth' (Ps. lix. 13), 'who ruleth by his power for ever' (Ps. lvi. 7).

45. [Comp. John xiii. 14. Phil. ii. 7. Eph. i. 7. Col. i. 14. 1 Tim. ii. 6.]

46. Βαρτίμαιος] Some take this for a patronymic, or an explication of υἱὸς Τιμαίου. Others, with more reason, consider it as a real name, and υἱὸς Τιμ. as the explanation. So Βαρθολομαῖος and Βαρισοῦς, and Thucyd. i. 29, Ἰσαρχίδας ὁ Ἰσαρχου. In such cases the patronymic has been converted into a regular appellative; just as in the case of those Greek names which have the form only, without the signification of patronyms; on which see my note on Thucyd. i. 1. The construction is Βαρτ. ὁ τυφλός, υἱὸς Τιμ.

— ὁ τυφλός] The ὁ, not found in 3 uncial

MSS., is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but wrongly; for the Article here adverts to the person as well known.

— προσαιτῶν] The πρὸς is not (as some imagine) without force; but it cannot signify, as others suppose, besides, but rather denotes to or for. Render, 'asking for himself.' So in πρόσ-οδος and προσκαλεῖσθαι. The accus. is left understood, and has been variously supplied.

48. ἐπετίμων αὐτῷ πολλοί] Meaning, we may suppose, many of those who accompanied our Lord, namely, the οἱ προάγοντες of Luke xviii. 39. Yet there is something jejune in the πολλοί, as Fritz. evidently thought, considering that he highly commends the reading πολλά, multum. And this use of πολλά occurs several times in Mark. But thus the verb will require a subiect. I suspect that the genuine reading is οἱ πολλοί, meaning 'the multitude,' equivalent to the ὁ ὄχλος of the passage of Matt.

50. ἀποβαλὼν τὸ ἱμάτιον] Namely, through joy, and in order to reach Jesus the sooner. A graphic trait, evidently proceeding from an eye-witness, like that in John vi. 10, 'Now there was much grass in the place.'

51. Ῥαββουνί] 'great master.' The reading Ῥαββουνί for Ῥαββουί is found in most of the best MSS., and edited by all the recent Editors. The ι is paragoric, and the whole termination is, the Talmudists tell us, augmentative. See John xx. 16, and Lampe in loco.

XI. 1. καὶ ὅτε ἐγγίζουσιν—Ἐλαιῶν] There is here much diversity of reading, owing to the ancient Critics stumbling at the close brevity of expression and roughness of the phraseology, and, as usual, taking the liberty to expand and polish. The sense, indeed, is what several MSS. represent; namely, 'and when they had approached to Jerusalem, and were come to the [vicinity of] Bethphage and Bethany, [even] to the Mount of Olives,' &c. But we are not warranted in receiving those readings (as Fritz. has done), since internal evidence is quite in favour of the text. rec.

2. ἐφ' οὗ οὐδεὶς ἀνθρ. κεκάθ. Lachm. edits 4. δ. οὐπὼ ἀνθρ. κεκ., from B, L, Δ, and Orig., but injudiciously, as will appear from my note on John vii. 7. That Origen, however, is wrongly alleged, appears from the note of Jackson, who also testifies that οὐπὼ is not, as Mill states, in the Leicester MS.

—κεκάθικε] Very remarkable is our Lord's prescience here displayed, even in the most minute and fortuitous particulars, as to the orders given, viz. '1. Ye shall find a colt; 2. on which no man ever sat; 3. bound with his mother; 4. where two ways meet; 5. as ye enter into the village; 6. the owners of which will at first seem unwilling that you should unbind him; 7. but when they hear that I have need of him, they will let him go.' Equally remarkable is the prompt obedience yielded by his disciples to a command to which carnal reasoning might have started many objections; and which nothing less than a stedfast persuasion that He, who sent the message, would be sure to give success to it, would have induced them to execute without demur or delay. Whitby.

—λύσαντες αὐτόν ἀγάγετε] Tisch. and Alf. edit, from B, C, L, Δ, the Ital., Vulg., Copt., and Sahid. Verss., and Orig., λύσατε αὐτ. καὶ φέρετε; while Lachm., from other ancient copies, edits λύσατε αὐτόν καὶ ἀγάγετε, which is the preferable of the two readings, espec. since it is confirmed by internal evidence, and the authority of the Pesch. Syr. Ver. But the present is no case for change.

3. ἀποστειλεῖ] Almost all the more recent

Editors adopt ἀποστέλλει, on strong external authority (to which I add most of the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), confirmed by internal evidence. And I should have received it, but that the single and double λ are perpetually confounded, and the λλ may have arisen from the error of the scribes. See Fritz.

4. For ἀπῆλθον διὰ καὶ, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit καὶ ἀπῆλ., from B, L, Δ, and Orig., which reading is favoured by internal evidence, but requires far more external authority to be safely received.

—ἀμφοδός] Here ἀμφ. does not signify, according to its usual sense, 'a way round, or about;' nor simply a street, but an alley (λαύρα, στενωπός), 'a thoroughfare,' such as goes round a block of houses, so that the door was a back-door, affording an outlet to the alley;—a most minute circumstance, which came doubtless from St. Peter. This is a very rare use of the term; and the passages of Jerem. and of Xenoph., Hippocr., and Galen, adduced by Commentators, are not to the purpose. Yet Hesych. and Suid. refer to this use in explaining the word by διόδος, 'a lane' or 'thoroughfare.' The only example at all to the purpose is a passage of Epiphani. de Ar., ἀμφοδὸν ἦτοι λαυρίαν ἐπιχωρίως καλουμένην ὑπὸ τῶν Ἀλεξανδρίων οἰκούντων, from which we learn both the variety of the term, and the nature of the idiom as of Alexandrian Greek. The only example that I can add is from Artemid. Onir. L. ii. 68, καὶ τὸ περὶ τοὺς κεράμους ἵπτασθαι καὶ τὰς οἰκίας καὶ τὰ ἀμφοδὰ, ἀκαταστασίας—προμαρτυρεῖται, where for 'τὰς οἰκίας legend. conjicio τῆς οἰκίας, deletio καὶ tertio,' the sense being, 'the back-lane of the house,' 'the lane at the back of the house.'

6. ἐνετείλατο] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit εἶπεν, from B, C, L, Δ, and some 6 ancient cursives; which reading has internal evidence in its favour.

7. ἤγαγον] Tisch. and Alf. read φέρουσιν, from B, L, Δ, and Orig.; while Lachm. retains ἤγ.; and very properly, so far as there is not sufficient authority for change; otherwise φέρο.

has internal evidence rather in its favour. The reading ἐπιβάλλουσιν, just after, depends on the foregoing reading. But the reading ἀγουσιν, found in C and several ancient cursives, seems to betray the hand of Critical alteration; and the state of the Pesch. Syr. text discourages all change in this verse; except that ἐπ' αὐτόν for ἐπ' αὐτῷ, found in several uncials and not a few cursive copies, may be the true reading, as having internal evidence in its favour; but there is wanted a greater amount of external authority to justify its adoption. Certainly the text. rec. is not what Alf. pronounces, 'a mere mechanical repetition from ἐπιβ. αὐτῷ.' After all, αὐτόν probably arose from error of scribes, who were deceived by confounding, as they often do, the α adscript and the ν.

8. On reconsidering the state of the text, I have seen cause to bracket the words καὶ ἔστρ.—ὁδόν, as prob. introduced from Matt. xx. 48. As respects one other point involving some perplexity—for δένδρων, Tisch. and Alf. read ἀγρῶν, from B, C, L, Δ, the Sahid. Vers., and Orig.; while Lachm. retains δένδρ., which I still continue to do, though internal evidence might seem to be in favour of ἀγρ., from its being the more difficult reading, and yet not absolutely unaccountable. The change may have come (the Edinburgh Reviewer thinks it did) through a Latin Version, arborum (the translation of δένδρων) taken by scribes for arborum = Gr. ἀγρῶν, which reading might be placed in the margin as an alternative reading, and then received into the text by some Revisers. It would, however, rather seem to have arisen from a marginal scholium, ἐκ τῶν ἀγρῶν, which was certainly in the copy used by the Coptic Translator. The sense intended by the Scholiast was probably 'the trees of the fields,' he having in mind Is. lv. 12. Ez. xvii. 21, and Joel i. 19, in the Sept. Version. Of course, the reading, however specious, has no claim to be received. The same may be said of κόψαντες just after, adopted by Tisch. and Alf. If received, we should point στοιβάδας. After all, however, the text. rec. confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions, was, I believe, the original text, in after-times diversely tampered with. No reason was there for Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. to alter στοιβάδας into στιβ. from a few ancient MSS. and Origen. External authority and internal evidence are alike in favour of στοιβ. as being the rougher form, and probably Hellenistic or Provincial, whereas στιβ. was alone used by the Class. Gr. writers, though likely to be introduced by the Revisers. The form στοιβ. is, indeed, so rare, that it occurs elsewhere only in Zonar. Lex., Στοιβάς ἡ στρωμνὴ ἡ τρυφῆς θρύψις, miserably corrupt words, for which I would read Στοιβάς ἡ στρωμνὴ, ἡ ῥάβδου θρύψις. This is confirmed by Phot. Lex. Στιβαὶ χαμαικοῖτιον—ἀπὸ ῥάβδων καὶ τῶν δένδρων ἀκρίμονες, where στιβάς was rightly emended by Dobree, who, however, failed to see, that after καὶ has been lost στιβάδες, which is necessary to correspond to οἱ δ. ἀκρ. (where ἀκρ. means twigs, the τὰ βῆλα of John xii. 13), and the emendation is confirmed by Suid. Lex. in στιβάδες, from which Phot. borrowed his matter.

10. ἐν ὀνόμ. Κυρίου] All the later Editors agree in cancelling these words, on rather strong external authority (to which I could add several Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence.

11. [Comp. John ii. 14.] The second καὶ here is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on strong, but scarcely sufficient grounds. More may be said against the genuineness of Ἰησοῦς just before.

13. οὐ γὰρ ἦν καιρὸς σύκων] There are few passages that have occasioned greater perplexity than the present. The difficulty of reconciling the words with our Lord's expectation of finding figs on the tree, or with his subsequent cursing of it, is obvious. Some have given up the solution in despair; others have suspected the passage to be corrupt, and propounded various conjectures; all of them inadmissible, since the MSS. discountenance any alteration, still more any cancelling of words. The present reading must be retained, and the difficulty be removed by interpretation. Almost all the methods, however, which have been propounded are either founded on unauthorized senses of καιρὸς, or are inapposite. One thing seems clear,—that we must take καιρὸς

 47 ληστῶν. ¹⁸ Καὶ ἤκουσαν οἱ Γραμματεῖς καὶ οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς, καὶ ἐξήτουν πῶς αὐτὸν * ἀπολέσωσιν· ἐφοβούντο γὰρ αὐτὸν, ὅτι πᾶς

σύκων as corresponding to the καιρὸς τῶν καρπῶν at Matt. xxi. 34, and the καιρὸς τοῦ θρισμοῦ at Matt. xiii. 30, as also the ὁ τῶν σύκων καιρὸς at Athenæus, p. 65. The force of the genit. will appear from my note on Rev. xiv. 15. The sense as above assigned is altogether suitable and satisfactory, for what can the time of any fruit be but the time of its maturity and ingathering? But the declaration contained in οὐ γὰρ ἦν καιρὸς σύκων cannot (as the order of the words would induce us to suppose) be meant to offer the reason why there was nothing but leaves on the tree; for the fig is of that class of trees wherein the fruit is developed before the leaves appear. Now some would throw the words καὶ ἐλθὼν—φύλλα in a parenthesis; for which, however, there seems no place. Others, with more reason, suppose a transposition, by a confusion of the natural order (as at xvi. 3, 4), whereby the words οὐ γὰρ, &c. though coming immediately after καὶ ἐλθὼν, &c. are to be referred to the more remote ἤλθεν εἰ ἄρα εὐρήσῃ τι ἐν αὐτῇ, thus: 'seeing a fig-tree afar off having leaves, he came, to try if he could find any fruit thereon; for fig-gathering was not yet come' (and therefore, if the tree had produced any figs, some, however unripe, might be expected to be growing on it); but when he came to it, he found nothing but leaves; and thus his disappointment could only have proceeded from the barrenness of the tree. Unripe figs, it has been observed, may be eaten for allaying hunger. And though this might seem early for figs,—yet, in Judæa, the fig-tree bears twice in the year; the first crop being ready at the beginning of the summer. Not to say that a few forward and vigorous trees will ripen their fruit several weeks before the generality.

As respects the reading of Tisch. and Alf., from B, C, L, Δ, οὐ γὰρ καιρὸς ἦν τ. σ., I find it in only one of the Lamb. MSS.; and Lachm. very properly retains the text. rec. The other arose only from Critics, who thought that position preferable. But it is quite the reverse; for the negative ought to precede, not follow, καιρὸς. Render: 'for it was not [yet] fig-time.'

16. σκεῦος] This is usually understood to mean any vessel,—namely, devoted to profane uses, and by which any gain was made. But the word σκεῦος, which in the Sept. corresponds to the Heb. קֵלִים, has, like that word, a considerable latitude of signification, and denotes, as does the Latin vas or instrumentum, a utensil, or piece of furniture, or article of dress; and, in a general sense, an article, whether for use or traffic.

In this prohibition our Lord upheld the Jewish Canons (founded on Levit. xix. 30), which, as we find from the Rabbinical writers, define the reverence of the Temple (i. e. the outer Court) to mean, that none should go into it with his staff, shoes, or purse, or with dust upon his feet; and that none should make it a thoroughfare. It may be said, indeed, that the very passing through it without a burden would make it a thoroughfare. But the doing it with a burden was much worse; because the carrying a burden had something of work in it. So Josephus, Bell. ii. 8, 9, tells us that the Essenes so rigidly observed the Sabbath, as οὐδὲ σκαῦός τι μετακινήσαι. The irregularities which our Lord rebukes had, it is supposed, originated in, or been increased by the proximity of the Castle of Antonia; to which there would be a constant resort of various persons (see Joseph. B. J. i. 3, 5), and we may imagine that the Priests, having an interest therein, connived at them.

17. ἐποιήσατε] Tisch. and Alf. read πεποιήκατε, from B, L, Δ, and Origen; while Lachm. retains ἐποίησα;—very properly; since if internal evidence were entirely in favour of πεποιήκατε, it would not counterbalance the overwhelming superiority of external authority. But that is not the case; for it is more probable that πεπ. should have proceeded from alteration of Critics, who thought the Perf. tense required it (not aware that the Aorist of custom is far more suitable), than that the 'alteration from the passage of Luke,' which Alford supposes, should have taken place in all the copies except three.

18. For ἀπολίσσωσιν, I have now, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., received ἀπολίσσωσιν, on strong external authority (at least in uncials, and not a few cursive MSS., to which I add 12 Lamb. and Mus. copies, and 2 Trin. Coll. Camb. copies, B, X, 16 and 17, collated by Mr. Scrivener). However, had I not found the Subjunct. in all the copies but one, infra xiv. 1, I should have retained -σουσιν, which is supported by internal evidence; and the Fut. Ind. does occur in the later and less pure writers, as also in the New Test., 1 Cor. vii. 32—34, and even in Mark iv. 30, at least in the MSS., and those not a few,

19 Καὶ ὅτε ὀφὲ ἐγένετο, ἐξεπορεύετο ἔξω τῆς πόλεως. 20 Καὶ πρὸτ' παραπορευόμενοι, εἶδον τὴν συκὴν ἐξηραμμένην ἐκ ῥιζῶν.
 21 Καὶ ἀναμνησθεὶς ὁ Πέτρος λέγει αὐτῷ· 'Ραββὶ, ἴδε, ἡ συκὴ, 20 ἣν κατηράσω, ἐξήρανται. 22 Καὶ ἀποκριθεὶς ὁ Ἰησοῦς λέγει 21 αὐτοῖς· Ἔχετε πίστιν Θεοῦ. 23 Ἄμην γὰρ λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι ὃς ἂν εἴπῃ τῷ ὄρει· τούτῳ· Ἀρθητι καὶ βλήθητι εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν καὶ μὴ διακριθῇ ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ αὐτοῦ, ἀλλὰ πιστεύσῃ ὅτι ἃ λέγει γίνεται· ἔσται αὐτῷ ὃ ἔαν εἴπῃ. 24 Διὰ τοῦτο λέγω ὑμῖν 22 Πάντα ὅσα ἂν προσευχόμενοι αἰτήσθε, πιστεύετε ὅτι λαμβάνετε· καὶ ἔσται ὑμῖν. 25 Καὶ ὅταν στήκητε προσευχόμενοι, ἀφίετε εἴ τι ἔχετε κατὰ τινας· ἵνα καὶ ὁ Πατὴρ ὑμῶν ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς ἀφῇ ὑμῖν τὰ παραπτώματα ὑμῶν. 26 Εἰ δὲ ὑμεῖς οὐκ ἀφίετε, οὐδὲ ὁ Πατὴρ ὑμῶν ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς ἀφήσει τὰ παραπτώματα ὑμῶν.
 27 Καὶ ἔρχονται πάλιν εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα· καὶ ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ περι- 23 1 πατοῦντος αὐτοῦ, ἔρχονται πρὸς αὐτὸν οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ οἱ Γραμματεῖς καὶ οἱ πρεσβύτεροι, 28 καὶ λέγουσιν αὐτῷ· Ἐν ποίᾳ 2 nay, exceeding forty. So that, after all, the reading both here and at iv. 30, may be considered an open question.

21. ἣν κατηράσω] A remarkable addition to the account in Matthew (xxi. 19), of which the best explanation is suggested by the words of that Evangelist, Μηκέτι ἐκ σοῦ καρπὸς γίνεται εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, a form of devoting it to utter barrenness, the very contrary to that of the primeval blessing, 'Be fruitful.' The withering had doubtless commenced immediately, παραχρῆμα, 'immediately,' not presently, as if in their presence; besides, they were passing onward, and could not stop to witness the effect. The time when the disciples noticed that effect, though Matthew omits to specify it, was, as we find from Mark, the next morning early; and, as we also find from Mark, 'dried up from the roots,' which suggested to Peter the strong term ἣν κατηράσω. And we may note the difference between Matthew's term, ἐξηράνθη, and Mark's ἐξηράνθη, the latter is the stronger, as referring to the end of the action ('it has withered away'); the former, to the commencement of progress of the action, 'how immediately did it wither away!' i. e. 'begin withering;' for I cannot agree with Bp. Lonsdale, that the words should be rendered, 'How is it that the fig-tree is immediately withered away?' for this cannot be the right sense, since the Apostles could not be at a loss to know how it came to pass; and Peter's answer excludes that supposition. There is no reason to desert the general opinion which connects πῶς with παραχρῆμα, 'How immediately and rapidly has the fig-tree withered away!' This use of πῶς with an adverb is somewhat rare; yet two examples occur in the New Test., Mark x. 23, Luke xviii. 24, πῶς δυσκόλωσι λαίσσανται; and so in the purest Greek writers, Xen. Mem. iv. 2, πῶς ἀθύμωτο. This I can confirm by the weighty authority of Henry Steph. Thes. in v., who remarks that πῶς should not be rendered quomodo, but quom; 'since,' continues he, 'no one can deny that the particle is put here admirativè, since there precedes καὶ ἰδόντες οἱ μαθ. ἰθαύμασαν,' and he renders 'quam repente exaruit ficus!' rightly, except that παραχρῆ, is equiv. to εὐθὺς, as Hesych. explains it.

22. ἔχετε πίστ. Θεοῦ] Some take this to mean, 'Have a strong faith;' by a common Hebraism, whereby the Genitive of Θεοῦ subjoined to substantives denotes greatness or excellence. But there is no reason to abandon the usual interpretation, by which Θεοῦ is taken as a Genit. of object or end, as in Rom. iii. 22. Gal. ii. 20. iii. 22, where it is also found with πίστις. Of course it is implied, that the faith which is reposed in God shall be firm and undoubting, as the words following suggest and illustrate.

24. ἔσται ὑμῖν] This, like ἔσται αὐτῷ just before, is a Dative of possession, 'shall be yours.' [Comp. Matt. vii. 7. Luke xi. 9. John xiv. 13. James i. 5, 6. 1 John iii. 22. v. 14.]

26. This verse is cancelled by Tisch., on the authority of only nine MSS., in opposition to Lachm., who retains it, as does Alf.—for once forsaking his fidus Achates—with reason. I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies except two; and the verse is confirmed by all the Versions except the Coptic; and a few MSS. even of that have it. In fact, the omission arose, I suspect, only from the homoteleuton in vv. 25 and 26, —namely, τὰ παραπτώματα ὑμῶν. It cannot be supposed to be interpolated here from Matt. vi. 15, since, had interpolation been intended, the 14th as well as the 15th verse would probably have been taken; but not a single copy here has that verse. The comparative fewness of the MSS. that are without the verse, and its presence in all the ancient Versions, make it most probable that the verse was absent in those copies from the carelessness of the scribes. Accidental omissions from that cause occur even in the most correct MSS., and in others, however excellently written, they are frequent.

30. I have now, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., received τὸ before Ἰωάν., on strong external authority, confirmed by internal evidence.

31. I must now adopt διελογ., on strong authority, confirmed by internal evidence, the ΔΙ being absorbed by the ΔΙ preceding. Even Mr. Alford acknowledges that the MSS. are too many for us to suppose διελογ. taken from Matt.; which is very true, but a truth that that gentleman hardly ever seems to recognize.

32. Ἐξ ἀνθρώπων—ἐφοβ. τὸν λαόν] Critics, ancient and modern alike, stumble at this construction, and endeavour to remove the irregularity by various methods, all of them fruitless, and, indeed, unnecessary; since we have here merely an anacoluthon (frequent in the best writers), by which the Evangelist passes from the very words of the persons spoken of to a narration of what was said; a sort of idiom similar to that by which there is a transition from the oratio directa to the obliqua. Thus φοβοῦντο τὸν λαόν is for φοβοῦμεθα τὸν λαόν, which is found in Matt. xxi. 26. I have now bracketed the οὖν, which Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancelled, because the authority for its removal is not inconsiderable, and internal evidence is quite against it.

XII. 1. For λέγειν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read λαλεῖν, from B, G, L, Δ, and 5 cursive MSS., confirmed by some Versions. Internal evidence is in favour of the reading, and also other passages, supra ii. 2. iv. 33 sq. xvi. 19; but there is need of much stronger authority, to prove that Mark did so write here. Moreover, the fact that MS. B, with its fellows, brings in ἔλεγε instead of ἔλάλει infra xiv. 31, and λίγω instead of λαλῶ at John xiv. 10 (where no Editor or Critic has seen fit to adopt the reading), tends greatly to weaken the authority of those MSS. here. I suspect that the reading arose either from the Latin Versions, or from the carelessness of scribes.

For ἐφύτευσεν ἄνθρ., Tisch. and Alf. edit ἀνθρ. ἐφύτ., from B, C, Δ, and 3 cursives; while Lachm. retains the text. rec.;—very properly, since internal evidence, as well as external authority, is in favour of it; for it is in vain that Mr. Alford pronounces the text. rec. to be ‘an alteration from the passage of Luke.’ When we consider the peculiar position of ἀμπελῶνα,—which, with that of the two subsequent words, has considerable harshness,—we cannot but see that had the Ecclesiastical Revisers made any alteration from Luke, they would have adopted the position in ἀμπελ. likewise. In short, the very harshness of the text. rec. attests its genuineness.

— ἔξιδoto] Here, and in the parallel passages of Matt. and Luke, Tisch. and Alf. edit ἔξιδeto, from a few, more or less, ancient MSS. But in all these three passages the reading is a mere barbarism, and that arising, as in a multitude of other cases, from the carelessness of scribes, or the ignorance of writers, as elsewhere in παρεδιδeto, which is not to be regarded, as it is by Tisch., Proleg. xxv., in the light of an anomalous form of the verb, for not one of his examples will bear that out. As respects the present case, ἔξιδeto is to be regarded as proceeding from the carelessness of scribes, who had before them, perhaps not ἔξιδeto, but ἔξιδeto,—a reading found, teste Scholzio, in MSS. K and 346. The sense is, ‘set it to hire,’ as in our vulgar use of the verb to set for to let. Nearly in this sense is ἐκτίθ. used in two passages of Dio Cass. p. 458 and 1229, Ed. Reim., and Æneas Tact. cxxx. p. 91. Of course, this reading is no other than a gloss on ἔξιδeto, or a critical emendation. I will only add, as respects this barbarous use of ἔξιδeto, that very many MSS., ancient and in other respects valuable, as transcribed from very precious originals, abound with instances of false spelling; indeed, comparatively few even of the best MSS. are wholly without such blemishes.

4. ἱκεφ.] Almost all the interpretations of this word that have been proposed are liable to objection, either as straining the sense by arbitrary ellipses, or as assigning significations which either are not inherent in the word, or are unsuitable. The true sense seems to be that expressed in the Syr., Vulg., and other Versions, and some modern Translations, and adopted by Beza, Cassaub., Heup., Rosen., Schleus., Kuin., and Fritz, 'wounded him in the head' (i.e. by pelting him with stones), which is confirmed by the τραυματίσαντες of Luke. And although this signification of the verb is not found elsewhere, yet it is strongly supported by analogy, as in the verbs γναθύν, γυῖον, γαστριζειν, μηρίζειν. 'Ἡτιμωμένον', 'ignominiously treated.' This form (ἀτιμώ for ἀτιμάω) is of very rare occurrence, and its Grecism has been thought questionable; for though it occurs once in the Sept. (namely, 2 Sam. x. 5), yet it is nowhere found in the classic writers, except in a passage of Demosth. cited by Hermog. p. 347, 5,—if, indeed, the reading there be sound; which, however, is questionable. There is little doubt that the word was, like not a few others, derived by St. Mark from Provincialism, or the common Greek dialect. The ancient Critics, however, have here, as they have done elsewhere, corrected what may be called a slip in Grecism, by reading καὶ ἡτιμωσαν, at the same time also removing a tautology; and the taste and judgment of Editors in after times, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., being quite on a par with that of these early Critics, have led them to adopt this emendation as the genuine reading of St. Mark; Mr. Alford characterizing the text. rec. as 'a conformation from v. 3,'—as if such a conformation was likely to be thought of! much less by all the revisers except some three.

5. πάλιν] This is cancelled by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, C, D, L, and one cursive of the same family;—authority quite insufficient, espec. considering that internal evidence is adverse, since we cannot imagine that the word would be interpolated, however it might be suggested by the passage of Luke, in all the copies but five, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions.

8. ἀπέκτειναν, καὶ ἐξέβαλον ἔ. τ. δ.] This differs from what we read in Matthew and Luke, who have: ἐξέβαλον ἔξω τοῦ ἀμπελῶνος καὶ ἀπέκτειναν. There are here, however, several var. lectt., which have induced Fritz. to decide (somewhat uncritically) that the Evangelist wrote καὶ ἐξέβαλον αὐτὸν ἔξω τοῦ ἀμπελῶνος καὶ ἀπέκτειναν. The text. rec., however, is probably the true reading, and was altered by those who stumbled, not perhaps at the minute discrepancy, but at what they did not well understand in the words themselves, 'killed him, and put him out,' &c.; the latter circumstance not seeming properly placed after the former. It seems, however, to have been so introduced, in order to point at the reason why they killed him, namely, to get rid of him out of the vineyard; because they would not yield him subjection: as it is said, 'We will not have this man to reign over us.' (Luke xix. 14.)

12. Here, as the best Commentators are agreed, the members of the verse, if disposed in the logical order, would stand thus: καὶ ἐζήτουν αὐτὸν κρατῆσαι· ἔγνωσαν γὰρ ὅτι πρὸς αὐτοὺς τὴν παραβολὴν εἶπε· καὶ (but) ἰφοβ. τὸν ὄχλον· καὶ (adeoquo) ἀφέντες αὐτὸν ἀπῆλθον. Fritz. has exercised no little ingenuity in accounting for the present order, in which there will be less harshness, if the clause ἔγνωσαν—εἶπα be regarded as parenthetical.

14. ol δὲ] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read καὶ, from B, C, D, L, Δ, and 33 (to which I add Lamb. 1177); and internal evidence is in favour of the reading, which, were there more external authority, I should be ready to adopt.

23. οὖν] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel this, on strong external authority (though not near so strong as supra v. 20), confirmed by internal evidence. Yet variety of position may have occasioned the omission. In short, why I cannot assent to the removal will appear from my note infra v. 27.

24. καὶ ἀποκρ.] See note supra ix. 12.

25. γαμίσκ.] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read γαμιζ., on considerable, but not competent, authority.

26. ἐν τῷ Βάτῳ] This is usually regarded as a transposition for ὡς εἶπεν αὐτῷ ὁ Θεὸς ἐν

τοῦ Βάτου; but Beza, Rosenm., and Kuin., more properly, explain it as a form of citing Scripture usual, in that age, with the Jewish Doctors; namely, of referring to any particular part of the Old Test., by naming some remarkable circumstance therein narrated. Thus the sense will be, ‘in the section which treats of the burning Bush,’ i. e. Exod. iii. 6. So in Rom. xi. 2, ἡ οὐκ οἴδατε ἐν Ἠλίᾳ τί λέγει ἡ γραφή; I would add that the ancient Critics cite various parts of Homer in a similar manner; e. g. ἐν Καταλόγῳ, or ἐν Τάφῳ Πατρόκλου, or ἐν Νεικυμαντείᾳ. Nay, Thucydides, i. 9, himself refers to Homer, ἐν τοῦ σκῆπτρον τῇ Παράδοσει.

For τῆς, I have now, with all the recent Editors, received τοῦ, from many MSS. (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence.

27. In this verse the second Θεὸς is absent from many MSS. (including some ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), and is cancelled by all the Editors from Griesb. downwards. Moreover, the ὁ before the first Θεὸς is omitted in several of the ancient uncials, with 15 cursives; to which I add 12 Lamb. and 5 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. Both words are probably, though not certainly, introduced from the passage of Matth. The words just after, ὑμεῖς οὖν, are cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, C, L, Δ, Copt. Vers., and 1 Latin copy of the Ital. Vers. Alf. thinks the words were 'inserted for connexion and emphasis.' But that they should have been introduced into all the copies except 4, and all the Versions except 1 of the meanest, is incredible. They were, I doubt not, removed by certain Critics, who thought them unnecessary, and espec. scrupled at the οὖν, for which others read δέ. That they should have removed the ὑμεῖς, was likely, since they did the same thing at Acts vii. 26, ἀδελφοί ἴστε ὑμεῖς, where B, C, and others of the same family, omit the ὑμεῖς, which has been expunged by Lachm. and Tisch., though not by Alf., who would have done well by showing the same discretion in the present case. There is, properly speaking, no emphasis in the use of the pronoun at either passage, but only an additional force and gravity thereby imparted. As respects the οὖν, it is not a particle of connexion, but of inference, possessing an illative force, 'so then ye do greatly err.' This is not the only occasion on which the Critics in question stumbled, through ignorance, at this illative particle, and removed it: thus, for instance, in this very Gospel, iii. 31. xi. 31. xii. 23. 37. In the other Gospels it is not unfrequently omitted in the same Family of MSS.; and the same, in a somewhat less degree, may be said of passages in the Acts and Epistles, but not the Revelation. Such an abrupt short-cut as is made in the texts of Tisch. and Alf., is quite against the character of Mark's style, which, though brief, has not the συνόψτου of St. John; and yet even that Evangelist does not evince it in particles of reasoning, but only in those of connexion. It would be in vain to defend the above reading from Matt. xxii. 29, πλῆσθε μὴ εἰδότες, &c., because there the nature of the context forbids the use of a particle of any kind.

28. I have, on further consideration, thought fit to adopt, with all the Editors from Wets. and Matth. downward, πάντων instead of πασῶν, on very strong external authority (to which I add nearly all of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence. I agree with Mr. Alf., that πρώτη πάντων is treated almost as one word, so that πάντων does not belong to ἐντολ. understood; but what he adds is to me incomprehensible. The truth is, that the two words are meant to form, in thought, one word, as if a compound term πρώτη-πάντων. Of this, were the present a proper place, I could adduce some exx. from Thucyd. Finally, I have not, with Tisch. and Alf., adopted the change of position at v. 28, πάντων πρώτη, because competent authority for this is wanting, and internal evidence is against it.

At v. 29 it is difficult, amidst the marvellous diversity of reading, to say what was the original reading, and the genuine text. Tisch. and Alf. edit ὅτι πρώτη ἴστιν, from B, L, Δ, and one cursive MS. of the same Family, which Alf. thinks the original reading, and the rest glosses. But glosses they cannot be, being rather varieties of reading occasioned by the carelessness of scribes and the licence of Critics. The reading of Tisch. and Alf. has upon it the stamp of its Family, in rash and presumptuous alteration, under the guise of improvement; for undoubtedly a pure Class. writer would not have so expressed the sentiment; but the authority for this reading is altogether insufficient. The text I have arranged is the one most likely to be genuine. Next to it in probability is πρώτη πάντων ἐντολή [ἴστιν].

29. ἀκουε, Ἰσραήλ] From this passage we learn that our Lord, in answering the question of the Scribe respecting the Chief Commandment, cited not only the Commandment itself, but the solemn assertion of the Unity of God by which it is introduced in Deut. vi. 4, and which forms the first of the three passages constituting the Shemah (consisting of Deut. vi. 4—9. xi. 19—22. Numb. xv. 37—41), which the Jews were, by ancient custom, bound to recite thrice every day. Hence it was very suitably introduced by our Lord on this occasion.

30. αὕτη πρώτη ἐντ.] The words are cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, E, L, Δ, and the Copt.; while Lachm. retains them;—with reason, since the authority for cancelling them is next to nothing; and internal evidence, though it draws two ways, yet is rather in favour of the words, from the greater likelihood of their being removed by Critics, or lost by carelessness of Transcribers, than of their being inserted in all the copies but four, confirmed by all the Versions but one of mean order—I say all the MSS.; for I have not found one of the Lamb. or Mus. copies without them. In short, far more likely is it that the Critics should have thought the addition of the words unnecessary, as implied in the foregoing context, than that the Evangelist should have omitted so weighty a sentiment, which, from the testimony of St. Luke, we cannot doubt to have been pronounced by our Lord, and which sentiment was likely to be communicated to St. Mark by St. Peter.

31. καὶ δευτέρα ὁμοία, αὐτῇ] Tisch. and Alf. edit. deut. ὁμ., without the καὶ, and αὐτῇ, from B, L, Δ, and the Coptic Vers., regarding the other words as introduced from the passage of Matth.—which is surely incredible in all the copies except three, and all the Versions but one. The καὶ may have been introduced, as seeming requisite; and it is absent from a few Lamb. and Mus. MSS.; but, whether present or absent, it shows that St. Matth. was not the model of reading here. As to the omission of αὐτῇ, that arose, I conceive, from the variety of reading existing in αὐτῇ and αὐτῷ, the latter probably derived from the passage of Matth. The weight of external authority, and the force of internal evidence, are alike in favour of αὐτῇ, for which Fritz. and Lachm. edit. αὐτῇ. But as the evidence for it is very slender, and as all the var. lectt. seem to be so many ways of removing the difficulty of the common reading, it ought not to have been received into the text; it was doubtless derived from St. Matthew. Fritz., indeed, scruples at this absolute use of ὁμοίως; but it is found in the Class. writers; and though it may not occur elsewhere in the Scriptural ones, that might be by accident, espec. as it does not often occur any where.

32. Θεός is absent from very many MSS. (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and is with reason excluded by the Editors universally.

40. οἱ κατεσθίοντες, &c.] This is by most Commentators esteemed a solecism; but similar constructions are found in the Classical writers. It is better regarded by some recent Commentators as an example of anacoluthon. Fritz., however, objects to that principle, as unsuitable to the simplicity of construction in the passage; and he would take the whole sentence as exclamatory, 'these devourers!' &c., these shall receive, &c. 43. For λέγει, Lachm. and Tisch. (1 Ed.) edit εἶπεν; while Tisch. (2 Ed.) and Alf. retain the λέγει;—very properly; since, though the external authority for εἶπεν is very strong (including several of the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies), yet internal evidence is against it.

—βαλλόντων] So I now edit, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from nearly all the uncial, and very many cursive MSS., including most of the ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies; but I cannot admit βαλ. to be, as Mr. Alford says, 'a correction:' it is rather, I would say, an erroneous writing of the scribe, who very often confound the Present and 2 Aorist of verbs of this kind. It is one of the numerous class of false spellings found in even the best MSS.

44. ἐκ τοῦ περισσεύοντος αὐτοῖς] for ἐκ τοῦ περισσίουματος, which is found in some MSS. here and at Luke, but is doubtless a correction. Τὸν βίον αὐτῆς, 'her means of subsistence.'

XIII. 1. ποταποὶ λίθοι] These were indeed stupendous; in proof of which the Commentators adduce Joseph. Ant. xv. 11, 3, and Bell. v. 5, 6, whence it appears that the stones of the Temple were some of them 45 cubits in length, 5 in depth, and 6 in breadth. It is strange, however, they did not see that the latter account in the War, as far as regards the dimensions of the stones, makes the former one seem almost incredible. For it represents them as only about 25 cubits in length, 8 in height, and about 12 in breadth. It is not so much the excessive length spoken of (for in Bell. i. 21, 6, Josephus speaks of the stones of Strato's tower as some of them 50 feet long, 9 high, and 10 broad; and in Bell. v. 5, of stones of 40 cubits long) as the disproportion in breadth, which affords room for suspicion. And as this account differs so materially from the other in Josephus, I cannot but suspect that for μ' we should read κ', which will make the number twenty-five. Thus the two accounts will exactly tally. The exclamation of the Apostles here is illustrated by what Josephus says at Bell. v. 5, 6,—namely, that the whole of the exterior of the Temple, both as regarded stones and workmanship, was calculated to excite astonishment (ἐκπληξιν).

4. ἐπὶ] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read εἰπον, from B, D, L, and five cursives; to which I cannot add one of the Lamb. and Mus. MSS. Yet internal evidence is in favour of the reading, which, with somewhat more of external authority, might be received. The form, however rare in the New Test., recurs at Acts xxviii. 26; though there it is derived from the Sept. Vers. of Isa. vi. 9. Proof is required that this form was ever used by the writers of the New Test.

—πάντα ταῦτα] There is strong, but not sufficient authority for the reading ταῦτα πάντα adopted by Lachm. For that adopted by Tisch. and Alf. there is only the Cod. B, which is by itself a συνικὴ ἑπικουρία. There is something so factitious in the reading ἔταν μέλλῃ ταῦτα συντελ. πάντα, as proclaims from what quarter it proceeded.

6. The γὰρ is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, L, but retained by Lachm.;—very properly, since it was more likely to have been omitted by accident, or from "critical treatment," in two copies, than inserted in all the rest, and all the Versions, from the passages of Matthew and Luke. The Critical Reviser seems to have thought that the Asyndeton would here have great force; unaware, it seems, that the figure is somewhat unfrequent in St. Mark's Gospel.

7. ἀκούσῃτε] Tisch. and Alf. read ἀκούετε, from B and one cursive; while Lachm. retains the text. rec.;—very properly, since it would be unjustifiable to ascribe to Mark, on next to no evidence, such slipshod Greek as that. Perhaps, however, it was an error of the scribe for ἀκούετε, which may have been in the archetype, and would be a reading worthy of attention.

8. The three καὶ in the latter clause of this verse are cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, L, or B, D, L, and some 3 or 4 cursives; but without due authority, or any good reason, the particles being more likely to have been removed by Critics, who thought them better away, than inserted for no apparent reason. Nay, in B, D, L, and two others, the words καὶ ταραχαί being not found, are cancelled by Lach. and Tisch., but retained by Alf.;—very properly, since they were merely removed by Critics, for the sake of relieving the passage of fancied plethora, most presumptuously. It cannot be here said that the words were foisted in from this or that passage; for, if not genuine, they must have been fabricated, and brought into all the copies except five! None who have read carefully the great Jewish historian can fail to see the fulfilment of the prediction here, popular commotions being at the period in question rife every where.

9. βλῖπετε ἑαυτοὺς] Render: 'Cavete autem vobis,' 'Look to, mind yourselves.' So 2 John ii. 8, βλῖπετε ἑαυτοὺς.

11. μελετᾶτε] Μελετᾶν, in the Classical writers, is used of the fore-thought, study, and elaboration of prepared speeches, in opposition to extemporary oratory. Thus the declarations of the Rhetoricians were called μελίται.

18. ἡ φυγὴ ὑμ.] These words are absent from one MS. (B), and are cancelled by Tisch. and Alf.;—most uncritically, this being done on next to no authority, and quite against internal evidence, since surely it is far more probable that the words should be omitted in one copy (for I can add nothing from the Lamb. and Mus. collections), than that it should have been interpolated in all the copies but one, and all the Versions but two. Besides, to remove the words involves the breach of a well-known Canon of Criticism, which forbids the introducing (even on far stronger evidence than this) of what is quite against the norma loquendi, or what makes positive nonsense. Now here the words are indispensable to the sense, as being absolutely required in order to make up the construction. For to suppose an ellipsis of ταῦτα, would involve the greatest harshness. From the state of the evidence, however, I think it possible that Mark wrote ἵνα μὴ γένηται χειμῶνος ταῦτα, or γ. ταῦτα χειμ., for which there is some tolerable evidence; and the variation of position in the words χειμ. and ταῦτα might easily occasion the omission.

19. The expression κτίσεως ἧς ἔκτισεν here, and ἐκλεκτοὺς, οὓς ἐξελέξ. in the next words, are not, what many Expositors regard them, pleonasmus. The former is a peculiarity of Mark's Hebraistic character of style; the latter, not only θαυ. but a mode of expression resorted to for greater emphasis, on occasions like this of solemnity, and here adopted 'quo (as says L. Brug.) significatur constare Deo consilium suum, in salvandis iis quos elegit, ne quis eorum pereat.' Vide 2 Tim. ii. 19. And so Calvin, though more at large.

21. For ἰδοὺ, Tisch. and Alf. read ἴδε, from B, D, L, and one cursive; and they cancel ἤ, from L, U, and eleven cursives. Mark may have written ἴδε, which he uses on other occasions; but there needs far better proof that he did. There occurs the same case a little before between the reading ἰδοὺ and ἴδε, where Lachm. edits ἰδοὺ, on strong but not competent authority. As respects the ἤ, the authority for its being cancelled is quite insufficient, espec. considering that its omission is more probable than its insertion. The very variation of reading might cause the omission in comparatively few copies.

For πιστεύσητε, Griesb., Tisch., and Alf. edit πιστεύετε, from many uncials (not, however, B), and not a few cursives (to which I add 7 Lamb. and Mus. copies); and internal evidence is in its favour, and the reading πιστεύετε may have been introduced from the passage of Matt.; but the evidence of the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions is strong for text, rec., and πιστεύετε may have arisen from πιστεύετε found in some MSS. (and which, besides being found in Trin. Coll. B, x. 17, I suspect, has place in the B), which may have arisen from an usual Itacism.

22. δώσουσι] Tisch. and Alf. read ποιήσουσι, from D, and about seven cursives; while Lach-mann retains δώσ.;—very properly, since internal evidence does not here make up for the want of external authority, considering that it is more probable that ποιήσ. was a gloss on δώσ., than that ποιήσ. should have been altered to δώσ. from the passage of Matthew in all the copies but a very few, and in all the Versions. Moreover, the few MSS. that have ποιήσ. are confined to one family—D and its cousins,—of which Jackson thinks that three, at least, were fellow-copies from the same original as the Cod. D, but without those innumerable licentious, corrupt, and absurd readings, which disgrace the Cod. Cantab.

25. οἱ ἀστέρες τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἔσ. ἔκπ.] Render: 'the stars of heaven shall be waning;' i. e. shall gradually lose their light. This being an example of that idiom by which et al forms with a Participle of any verb a periphrasis for a finite tense of that verb; expressing, however, a continuance or duration of the action or state. All the difference here between the Evangelists is, that Mark is more graphically minute than Matthew and Luke. I cannot adopt the variation of position introduced by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, C, D, L, and about 10 cursives (to which I could add a few Mus. and Lamb. copies), since, in a case like this, internal evidence is a principle of difficult application. Thus here, the text of Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. has every appearance of being formed from the parallel passage of Matt.; and it will not follow (as Mr. Alford imagines) that, because ἀπὸ was not taken likewise from Matt., the other alteration was not made. It is, indeed, hard to argue as to what some of the Revisers would, or would not, do, they being much governed by caprice and mere fancy.

while Lachm. retains γινώσκειται—very properly, since the other is evidently a mere Itacism. Thus it occurs in very many ancient MSS. at the parallel passage of Matt. xxiv. 32, where see note. But, with all this patent evidence as to the true origin of γινώσκειται, Mr. Alf. regards γινώσκειται as adopted from the passage of Matth. How he can bring himself to believe that the words καὶ ὑμεῖς following preclude the 2nd person here, I cannot imagine; for the καὶ ὑμεῖς is found in all the three Gospels, and therefore no argument can be drawn as to Mark alone.

31. παρέλθωσι] Tisch. and Alf. edit παρελεύσονται, from B, L, and 3 Evangelistaria (to which I can only add Scriv. y); while Lachm. retains the text. rec.; very properly, since it is far more likely that παρελεύσ. was an alteration of the Revisers of those two MSS., than that παρέλθ. should have been introduced into all the copies but two from the passage of Matth., which would be exchanging an easy reading for a difficult one.

32. Instead of the text. rec. καὶ, there is the strongest evidence external and internal for the reading ἡ. Almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies have it. For ἄγγελοι, Tisch. and Alf. read ἄγγελοι, solely on the authority of B; while Lachm. retains the text. rec.; very properly, since it is vain to run counter to all the MSS. but one, confirmed by all the Versions: and as to the authority of Augustin, it is on questions of reading very slender, and here quite nought, for the words of that Father, ‘neque angelus neque virtus’ are no quotation, but only a general expression of the sense, suggested by Acts xiii. 8, ‘neque angelum neque spiritum.’ It is difficult to say whether this reading was an error of the scribe, occasioned by the use of the singular οὐδεὶς οἶδεν just before, or whether an emendation (suggested by the same), proceeding from the same fertile brain to which we are indebted for so many other ‘lectiones singulares,’ which some wise men in book-craft are so ready with thankfulness to pick up and appropriate.

33. καὶ προσεύχεσθε] The words are cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on the authority of B, D, 1 cursive, and 3 copies of the Ital. Vers.—most rashly, since it was far more likely to be omitted in two copies, either by the negligence of scribes, or the licence of Critics, than that it should have been obtruded into all the copies but two, and all the Versions; and why? because, says Mr. Alf., it is ‘a usual addition.’ It is, indeed, an addition, but not at all a frequent one, and I am not inclined to part with one of the three or four passages which we have, at the bidding of a Critic, who probably thought that there being three verbs, which is very unusual in such a case, one might as well be removed;—not at all aware of the importance of the adjunct to the injunction ‘to look to our steps, to take heed,’ namely, ‘to watch;’ and wholly forgetful of what occurs in the next chap. (v. 38) from the same Divine speaker, and probably from the same source of information, St. Peter, γρηγορεῖτε καὶ προσεύχεσθε. The addition is of deep importance, for, as good Matth. Henry says, ‘we are to take heed of whatever would indispose us for our Master’s coming: we are to watch for his coming, that it may not at any time be a surprise to us; and we are not to fail to pray for that grace which is so necessary to qualify us to meet that presence.’

33—36. See note on Luke xxi. 34—36.

34. The καὶ before ἐκάστω is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. from B, C, D, L, and 2 cursives, but without reason. The authority is quite insufficient, espec. considering that internal evidence is adverse, for we can better account for the removal than for the insertion of the particle. In short, it was not, as Mr. Alf. thinks, inserted ‘for connexion,’ since there is no need of such connexion, but, I doubt not, removed by Critics, because there seemed to be a καὶ too many, which, as regards neatness and elegance of composition, is the case. By τὴν ἐξουσίαν is meant the [necessary] ἐξουσία, which, however, is to be understood to denote, not dominion over others, but commission, ‘full power’ as to the employment he was to exercise (as in the Parable of the talents); and the words καὶ ἐκάστω τὸ ἔργον are exegetical of the foregoing. Render: ‘namely, to each his several work, or sphere of duty.’ As respects the καὶ before τῷ θυρῷ, so far from being pleonastic, as some have thought, or to be expunged, as others, it has an emphatic force, equiv. to imprimis, ‘and especially;’ an idiom not rare when, as here, a part of any number, or body, is subjoined to the whole, e. g. Mark i. 5, and xvi. 7, εἰπάτε τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ καὶ τῷ Πέτρῳ. Mark viii. 38. And so in Class. writers, as Æschyl. Pers. 749, Θεὸς καὶ Ποσειδῶν. This idiom is here espec. suitable, since, although it was, strictly speaking, the duty of every servant to watch, it was so more particularly of him to whom that office was especially confided; called by the Greeks θυρωρὸς, and by the Romans janitor, and who was so called from his post of duty. See Ovid Fast. i. 37. And what was his duty while his master was present, was doubly so during his absence. Hence the case is well adapted to illustrate the duty of Christian watchfulness.

35. For μεσουκτίου, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read μ—ον, from B, C, D, Δ, which may seem to have internal evidence in its favour, if —ον were, as Alf. says, a correction to suit ἀλεκτ. But he should have proved that this adverbial use of μεσουκτίου ever existed; and yet that proof I am able to supply—namely, Ps. cxviii. 62, Sept. Accordingly, the reading may have come from Mark; but there is no sufficient evidence that it did; and the reading may have been merely an error of the scribe, since the terminations —ον and —ου are perpetually confounded by copyists.

37. For δ, Tisch. and Alf. read θ, from B, C, K, D, X, Δ, and 5 cursive MSS.; but wrongly, since it is manifestly an alteration, for greater facility.

XIV. 1. [Comp. John xi. 55. xiii. 1.]

2. Ἐλεγον δέ· Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read Ἐλεγον γάρ, from B, C, D, Δ, and some Latin copies, and the Coptic Vers. The other Alf. thinks derived from the passage of Matth. But it is most unlikely that all the copies except 4 should be so altered. It is far more probable that γάρ was an alteration of the Critics, or an error of the scribes; for the words when written abbreviatim are sometimes confounded.

3. [Comp. Luke vii. 37. John xi. 2.]

— πιστικῆς] With this word the Commentators have been not a little perplexed; and hence their opinions are very various. Besides conjectural alterations, and derivations from some name of place,—which are alike inadmissible,—there are three interpretations worthy of notice. 1. That of Camer., Beza, Grot., Wetst., and Rosenm., who think that πιστικῆς is put, per metathesis, for σπικᾶτου, as supra vii. 4, ἑστῆς for σῆταρι. And this is somewhat confirmed by the Vulgate Spicati. But there is little other authority for it; and probability is by no means in its favour; for why, as Fritz. remarks, should not Mark have at once used σπικᾶτου, as Galen often does? 2. That of Eras., Suic., Capell., Casaub., Salmas., Scalig., Le Clerc, Beng., Kypke, Kuin., Tittman, and Wahl, who derive the word from πίστις (as from μάντις, μαντικός; from πράξις, πρακτικός; from κρίσις, κριτικός), and take it to signify pure, genuine, unadulterated. For that nard was often adulterated, appears from Pliny and Dioec. Fritz., however, objects, that then πιστικός would be ‘qui fidem vel facere vel habere potest,’ a signif. plainly unsuitable to nard. And to derive the term from πιστός would lead to a like result. 3. That of H. Steph., Schmid, Heupel, Fischer, Schleusner, and Fritz., who derive it from πίνω or πινέω, and they take it to mean liquid; but Fritz., potable; and he shows, from Athenæus, p. 689, that unguents were sometimes drunk by the ancients. Upon the whole, however, he has better succeeded in proving that the interpretation liquid or potable is probably true, than that the sense, genuine, is certainly false. The catachresis he complains of will not be fatal to that interpretation; for it may very well be, that Mark here (as occasionally elsewhere) uses a term of the common Greek dialect; and, as the interpretation is strongly supported by the ancient Versions and Fathers, it may deserve the preference. So Euthym. explains. It is, too, somewhat confirmed by the words of Ignat. Epist. ad Eph. § 17, Διὰ τοῦτο μύρον ἔλαβεν ἐπὶ τῇ κεφαλῇ αὐτοῦ ὁ Κύριος, ἵνα πνίῃ ἡ ἰκκλησία ἀφθαρσίαν, though the other is rather confirmed by the sense involved in the subsequent term συντρίψασα.

— καὶ συντρίψασα τὸ ἀλάβ.] Here, again, the Commentators are at issue on the sense of συντρίψασα. Some take it to mean ‘having broken it in pieces by crushing it together;’ so Alf.: others, ‘having shaken it up.’ But the former would be unnecessary, and unsuitable to the purpose in view; and the latter interpretation is utterly repugnant to the sense of the word; as is that of others, ‘rubbing it in.’ The true interpretation is, no doubt, that of Drus., De Dieu, Krebs, Rosenm., Kuinoel, Schleusner, Wahl, Bretschn., and Fritz., who take it to mean, ‘disfracto officio, alabastrum aperuit.’ Συντρίψω was, it seems,—though we cannot prove the point, it being probably a term of ordinary Greek,—used of the opening of flasks of oil or liquid ointment; which was, by knocking off the tip end of the narrow neck, the orifice being so carefully stopped and sealed up (to preserve the contents), that it scarcely admitted of being opened in any other way. Now this, plainly, might be done without wasting any of the contents. The above view of the sense is confirmed by the ancient Versions, which express the general sense by aperuerunt.

The καὶ before συντρίψ. is absent from two MSS., B and L, and is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., but retained by Lachm.—very properly, internal evidence as well as overwhelming external authority being in favour of the word, which might easily be lost in two copies by the carelessness of scribes, who often omit καὶ, δὲ, γάρ, and other small particles, usually expressed abreviatim; though not likely, however grammatically necessary to the construction, to be introduced all but universally into the copies. Besides, I cannot believe that Mark would, here or elsewhere, write the slipshod Greek which Tisch. and Alf. are so ready to ascribe to him.

For τὸ before δλᾶς. most of the uncials, and about 11 cursives (to which I add 7 Lamb. and Mus. copies), have τὸν, which is probably, but not certainly, the true reading, and is edited by Lachm. As to the reading τῇ, adopted by Tisch. and Alf., from B, C, L, Δ, it could only have arisen in those copies (two of them fellow-copies) from the carelessness of scribes; who, we may suppose, confounded, as scribes often do, the very similar abbreviations for τὸν and τῇ—especially of the good monks were “impletei veteris Bacchi pinguisque ferina.” To ascribe such a barbarism to the Evangelist, when Tisch. at least knows how common are such slips to the scribes, were presumptuously injurious. Just after, the αὐτοῦ and the κατὰ are both cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., and the κατὰ by Lachm., from B, C, L, Δ, and 3 cursives; but internal evidence is quite in favour of αὐτοῦ, though not of κατὰ, which, however, may be genuine.

4. ἀγαν. πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς καὶ λέγ.] The sense of this obscurely-worded mode of expression is not, ‘were indignant within themselves and saying;’ for that rendering is not permitted by the πρὸς, which can only mean unō. However, there is here either a pregnancy of expression, by which the πρὸς comes in twice, the full construction being ἀγ. πρὸς (apud) ἑαυτοὺς καὶ λέγοντες πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς, or, supposing a transposition of the words, ἀγαν. καὶ λέγ. πρὸς ἑαυτούς. The verb ἀγαν. is, however, very rarely followed by πρὸς, the only examples known to me being Dionys. Hal. p. 1998. 15, ἡγ. πρὸς αὐτούς, ‘were indignant towards them.’ Herodian viii. 2. 5, ἀγ. πρὸς τοὺς στρ. Plut. Cam. c. 28, ἀγ. πρὸς αὐτούς, ‘were indignant towards, and expostulated with them.’ So here the full sense is, ‘were indignant at the thing, and expressing their indignation to each other by saying.’ This slight defect in composition, however, set the Critics to work to remove it. Some, as in the MS. D, by expunging the passage; others, by removing the καὶ, which a Class. writer would not have inserted; others, again, as in B, C, L, by discarding both καὶ and λέγοντες, which is adopted by Tisch. and Alf.; while Lachm. retains the text. rec., which is supported by all the MSS. except three, and all the Versions except the Coptic, and which has internal evidence quite in its favour. Thus it appears that what was said, was said by the objectors privately one to another; and from John xii. 4, it appears that Judas Iscariot was the chief speaker. Instead of ἀπώλεια, the more Classical term would be δαπάνη; though the verb ἀπώλλαιμι is by the purest Greek writers, from Homer downwards, sometimes used in the sense to waste, squander,—a sense which readily arises from the idea of a thing thus squandered, coming to nought.

5. After τοῦτο, Gricab., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. insert τὸ μύρον, from A, B, C, D, E, L, M, Δ, and some 18 cursives, with the Ital. and Vulg. Versions; and Alf. supposes that the words were removed as not being in Matt. But the state of the evidence is quite adverse. It is surely far more likely that the words should have been added in those comparatively few MSS. from John xiii. 5, than that they should have been removed in all the copies but a few, and all the Versions except the Latin.

6. ἐν ἐμοί] So, for εἰ ἐμὶ, all the Editors from Wets. downwards, on strong external authority, confirmed by internal evidence.

7. For αὐτοὺς εἰ π., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read αὐτοῖς, from B, C, D, L, Δ, and 7 cursives of the same Family; and internal evidence is in favour of the reading; but it needs far more external authority to justify its adoption.

8. ἔσχεν] for ἰδύνατο, —a sense of ἔχειν (like that of habere in Lat.) common in the Class. writers, and occurring elsewhere, as Matt. xviii. 25. There is also to be supplied from the context ποιῆσαι, as in Acts iii. 6, ὃ δὲ ἔχει (διδόναι), τοῦτο διδώτω σοι. I have, with all the Editors from Wets. downwards, received ἔσχευ instead of ἔχειν, on the strongest evidence.

— προέλαβεν] i. e. προεφθάσεν, ‘anticipated,’ ‘pre-occupied.’ Meaning, ‘she bath as it were by anticipation anointed my body for burial.’

9. ἀμὴν δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, from several uncials and a few cursive MSS.; but I pause, for I cannot find that this formula is ever used otherwise than with the Asyndeton (except with a γάρ); and indeed any connexive particle tends to weaken the force of the subsequent solemn declaration.

The τὸ after εὐαγγ. is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, D, L, and 3 cursives (to which I can make no addition), and some copies of the Ital. Vers.,—very insufficient authority to warrant this, espec. since internal evidence is not, as Mr. Alford supposes, against the reading, but rather in its favour, considering that it was more likely to be accidentally omitted in six MSS.

 than to have been interpolated in all the rest, and all the Versions except a few copies of a very corrupt Version. Moreover, I can hardly think that the Evangelist would omit a word so essential to the sense, espec. as he would be likely to have heard it used by St. Peter in his account of this remarkable transaction. The true force of the τοῦτο was well seen by Theophyl. and Euthym. on the passage of Matt., who explain by ἡ πραγματεία ἡ ἐμὴ, ἡ διήγησις ἡ κατ' ἐμῆ.
 And so the Pesch. Syr., both here and in Matt., inserts the pronoun may in order to represent the force of the τοῦτο. It is probable, however, that the sense here is equivalent to that in Matt.
 xxiv. 14, ὅπου κηρυχθήσεται τοῦτο τὸ εὐαγγ.
τῆς βασιλείας ἐν ὅλῃ τῇ οὐκονίᾳ, meaning the religion promulgated by our Lord. In short, it is quite plain that the word must not be parted with, and that there is no sufficient authority to warrant its removal.

10. The ὁ before Ἰούδας is cancelled by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from 8 ancient uncial and 17 cursive MSS., to which I have to add upwards of 12 Lamb. and Mus. copies; and internal evidence is against the Art.
 It is different with the ὁ before Ἰσκ., which Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel, on far less weight of authority (I can add nothing), and without the aid of internal evidence. In fact, the ὁ is confirmed by Matthew and Luke. As respects the ὁ prefixed to εἰς by Tisch. and Alf., on the slender authority of B, L, M, a far stronger would fail to warrant what cannot be true, since the ὁ would here be worse than useless. It doubtless came from the margin, and was meant for the word Ἰσκαρ.

13. ὑπάγετε εἰς τὴν πόλιν, καὶ ἀπαντήσῃ,
 &c.] Here, and at Luke xxii. 10, is related a
 Matthew (xxvi. 18), is not immaterial one, since it tends to supply a link in the chain, which serves to give a better idea of the transaction than is conveyed by the brief narration of it given by Matthew. From this we may gather that the transaction was one purely Providential
 (i. e. Divinely appointed), being neither the result of chance producing exact coincidences, on the one hand, nor of pre-arranged purposes on the other. For to what but full prescience on the part of our Lord can we probably, or indeed worthily, ascribe the circumstance of the person spoken of being by our Lord pointed out before- hand as appearing at a certain hour and a certain place (though that place, be it observed, is no more than the name of the master of the house here specified by our Lord) to do what, we may be sure, was no other than essential to the very performance of the charge given by our Lord to his disciples (namely, to deliver to the owner of the house this message from their Master,

 "where is," &c.); since, but for their meeting
 this person, and following this person as a guide, they could not have known to whom they were to deliver the message? This, then, we may safely pronounce to have been a circumstance divinely pre-ordained rather than one humanly pre-arranged, as, indeed, further appears by what follows, v. 16: "And his disciples went and came into the city, and found as he had said unto them;" q. d. found the several circumstances thus pointed out beforehand by their Master made good by the event. Most fitly, then, is this to be compared with what we find related in another place, Matt. xxi. 2, "Go into the village, &c., and ye shall find an ass tied, and a colt," &c., also (in the miraculous draught of fishes, John xxi. 6), where our Lord, by the exercise of no less than Divine prescience, charges:
 "Cast the net on the right side of the ship, and ye shall find. They cast, therefore, and now they were not able to draw it for the multitude of fishes." Besides which might be adduced the instance on another occasion of the money found in the belly of a fish; which money, we may observe, had been in like manner previously pointed out by our Lord to be found, thus serving, and being intended to serve, to our Lord for the payment of the tribute-money, no less than the apartment of a person who seems to have been a stranger, in which to eat the passover with his disciples, and so to serve to the celebration of the first Lord's Supper.

— ἄνθρωπος] From the word being opposed to οἰκοδοσότης in the following verse, and from the servile nature of the occupation, it may be inferred that this was a domestic.

Vers., and 4 cursives of the same Family,—insufficient authority; though internal evidence is in its favour, and it is somewhat confirmed by what is said in my note on Matt. xxvi. 18. But were we to take its genuineness for granted (though Jackson maintains that it came from the Latin copies), I should prefer to suppose that it was lost by accident, as absorbed in the ὅπου following, rather than that it was removed because not found in the passage of Luke;—a supposition which proceeds upon a most ungrounded principle. Κατάλυμα here does not designate the same kind of place as that spoken of in Luke ii. 7 (where see note), but simply a lodging for the night, or a temporary sojourn.

15. ἀνάγαιον] The MSS. here fluctuate between the readings ἀνάγαιον, ἀνάγαιον, ἀνάγειον, and ἀνάγειον: the fourth, which is the text. rec., has the least authority, or evidence of genuineness, and seems a mere Itacistic spelling of ἀνάγαιον, which is found in B, M, S, V, X, and 10 cursives, to which I may add some dozen Lamb. and Mus. copies; and it is adopted by Tisch. and Alf.; while Griesb., Fritz., Scholz, Lachm. (and myself hitherto) read ἀνάγαιον; and I see no sufficient reason to alter my decision now, since it has far stronger authority than ἀνάγειον, and is confirmed by the weighty evidence supplied by Luke xxii. 12. I see no reason why Mark and Luke should here have used different terms; and in using the same term, it was unlikely that they should have used an Attic, and not a Common Greek form. But to turn from words to things;—the term was synonymous with ὑπερῶον, and denoted that apartment in the upper story not in common use, but kept as a parlour or withdrawing room, and also as a guest apartment for entertaining company. Ἐστρωμένον has a reference to the preparation of beds, couches, carpets, pillows, stools, &c., such as, among the Oriental nations, supply the place of chairs, tables, and indeed almost all the other furniture of a room.

15. Before ἐκεί Tisch. and Alf. prefix καὶ, from B, C, L, and 1 cursive of the same Family, while Lachm. rejects it, very properly, the authority for its adoption being next to nothing, and internal evidence quite against it, for there is really no place for a connexive particle. I have no doubt that the καὶ was introduced from the margin, but was meant to come in between the ἐστρωμένον and the ἑτοιμον, and originated with a Critic, who thought that three adjectives coming together without a copula would "break Priscian's head." It is true that the third adjective ἑτοιμον was expunged by other Critics, whom by following, Lachm. narrowly misread making shipwreck of his critical credit, being only saved by his brackets. It is indeed not, what some regard it, superfluous (though not found in Luke), being meant, as Townson points out, to denote that 'this great chamber was already prepared for the celebration of the Passover' (and with what scrupulous care that operation was carried on, by which the smallest crumb of leaven was sought out, both by sun-light and by lamp-light, he shows at large), viz. not only furnished with all necessary accommodations, but ritually made ready for use, so that the disciples had only to get ready the Passover itself. Townson remarks that it is no wonder that the present Evangelist should relate the circumstance which Luke omits, since he had it from the mouth of St. Peter.

19. οἱ δὲ ἤρξ.] Tisch. and Alf. cancel the οἱ δὲ, on the authority of only 2 MSS., B, L; while Lachm. retains them; very properly, for they are quite essential to the sense, and were, I suspect, only omitted by the uncertainty of the reading, there being no less than three readings in the copies, οἱ δὲ ἤρξ., καὶ ἤρξ., and ἤρξαντο, and thus a vacant space was left, which was neglected to be afterwards filled up,—a not unfrequent case in MSS.

—εἰς καθ' εἰς] For εἰς καθ' ἑκα occurring in John viii. 9. Rom. xii. 5. Rev. iv. 8, usually regarded as a Hebraism, or Hellenistic idiom, which in fact it is. But from the circumstance of Lucian's inserting it in his Solœcis, among words forbidden to those who would cultivate a pure Greek style, we may infer that it was sometimes used, doubtless in the ordinary Greek.

20. ἀποκριθεὶς] This is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, C, D, L, with the Syr., Ital., Vulg., Pers., Coptic, and Sahid. Versions; and, indeed, internal evidence is against the word. But with such overwhelming external authority for the word, this is no case for change.

Τοῦτό ἐστι τὸ αἷμά μου, τὸ τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης, τὸ περὶ πολλῶν 28

21. Before ὁ μὲν Τῖδς Tisch. and Alf. prefix ὅτι, from B, L, and the Copt. and Sahid. Verss. —very insufficient authority, espec. since internal evidence goes the other way, considering that it is far more likely that ὅτι should have been introduced by shallow Critics, who thought some connexive word wanting, than that, if originally written by St. Mark, it should have been removed from all the copies except two, merely because there is no ὅτι in the passages of Matth. and Luke. As to the Copt. and Sahid. Versions, the Translators certainly had not the ὅτι, but thought, as did all the other ancient Translators except the Arabic, that some connexive particle was wanting, which they supplied in various ways. The ὅτι prefixed came as much from a Critical Reviser as did the οὐν after μὲν, found in at least 2 MSS.; and even has place in the parallel passage of Matth. in 2 of the most ancient MSS., D and Z, with 2 or 3 other copies. This same ὅτι is obtruded by the same Editors at Luke xxii. 22, from the same B, L, with the addition of D, the same that foists in the οὐν in the passage of Matth. So that we find the Critics, one or other of them, introducing some particle connexive in all three Gospels, though the almost universal evidence of the Greek Fathers testifies that Matth. and Mark thought fit to use the Ἀσυνδετον, which tends to strengthen the force of the declaration, but that Luke deemed some connexive particle necessary, and employed the Hebraistic καὶ, but in no one of the three passages would the Critics allow the Evangelist to write in his own manner. Both in this passage and that of Luke, Lachm. evinced sound discretion by excluding the ὅτι. The ἦν after καλὸν is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, L, and 3 Latin copies; and Lachm. brackets it. But there is scarcely sufficient warrant even for that course, though internal evidence is against the genuineness of the word.

22. Ἰησοῦς is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, D, and some Latin copies. Alf. regards it as introduced from the passage of Matth. But why not, according to his own principle, 'removed because not in Luke?' The external authority for its removal is next to nothing; and the internal evidence rather in favour of the word, which was more likely to have been removed by Critical Revisers because not in Luke, and, as regarded elegant composition, better away, than to have thus been introduced into all the copies but two, and all the Versions except the Sahid. and a few copies of the non-immaculate Ital. Versa. Here, again, Lachm. retains the word, but in brackets. The φάγετε after λάβ.

is cancelled by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, C, D, K, L, P, Δ, and some dozen cursives (to which I can only add Lamb. 1188, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), confirmed by most of the Versions; and internal evidence is against it. However, I would by no means cancel the word, which was, I suspect, partly lost by the Homœotel., and partly removed by the Critics, as unnecessary. Exactly as in the passage of Matt. xxvi. 27, at πρίν a few copies, and several Versions, even the Pesch. Syr., prefix λάβετε.

23. The τὸ before ποτήριον, is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, C, D, L, X, Δ, and 9 cursives; to which I can only add 5 Lamb. and 3 Mus. copies. Internal evidence is rather against the word, which may have been introduced from Matthew. But it is more likely to have been lost by carelessness of scribes on account of the το following, or removed by the Critics in order to better correspond to ἄρτον at v. 22. Its genuineness is sufficiently attested by all the MSS. but a comparatively few, all the Versions, and Just. M. Apol. i. 66, p. 98, B. See more in note on Matt. xxvi. 27.

24. The τὸ before τῆς is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from C, D, E, L, V, X, and 4 cursives (to which I can only add 5 Lamb. and Mus. copies); while Lachm. retains the τὸ—very properly, since internal evidence, as well as overwhelming external authority, is in its favour, considering that it was far more likely to be omitted than inserted, for though it may seem unnecessary, yet it adds to the strength of the expression. The word was omitted partly by the carelessness of scribes and partly by the licence of Critics, who deemed it superfluous, and (tell it not in Gath) found it not expressed in the Versions, which so peculiar a Greek idiom could not well be in the Latin, though in English it might, thus: 'This is my blood; namely, that, &c.' What could induce Mr. Alf. to characterize the reading as a grammatical emendation, I am at a loss to imagine. It is such a one that few Critics would have thought of making. What is here said applies to the τὸ in the parallel passage of Matt. xxvi. 28, which has been cancelled by Lachm. as well as by Tisch. and Alf., from only 5 MSS., B, D, L, Z, and 33. The καινῆς before διαθ. is here, as also in the parallel passage of Matth., cancelled by Tisch. and Alf. here, from B, C, D, Δ, and there, from B, L, Z, and 33; while Lachm. retains it in both passages—very properly, since it was more likely that καινῆς should be lost by accident and the carelessness of scribes in four or five copies, than that it should have been introduced into all except those, and all the Versions but one. In fact, the word is so indispensable to draw forth the full sense which our Lord must have intended to express, that I cannot consent to its being taken away by any critical legerdemain, ἐν τῇ κυβίᾳ τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἐν πανουργίᾳ πρὸς τὴν μεθοδίαν τῆς πλάνης,—nor will I believe that the two Evangelists would ever have omitted a word, as I have said, so indispensable, inasmuch as the covenant is required to be styled the new one, under the Gospel (forming, indeed, a new Religion), as distinguished from the old Covenant under the Law. See Jer. xxxi. 31, 32. The Old Covenant had been ratified by the blood of calves and goats, but the New Covenant by the blood of Christ. As respects the ὑπὲρ instead of περὶ edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, C, L, Δ, it is a very unsustained alteration. Alf. regards the περὶ as 'introduced from Matth.:' but why should not the ὑπὲρ have been introduced from Luke? This surely is a case where, if any where, the authority of MSS. is of the utmost weight; and here the overwhelming amount of external evidence for περὶ attests its genuineness.

25. I have now adopted the reading γενήμ. instead of γεννήμ., from almost all the uncial and a considerable number of cursive MSS., including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies.

27. The words ἐν ἐμοὶ ἐν τῇ νυκτὶ ταύτῃ are cancelled by Tisch. and Alf.; and ἐν τῇ νυκτὶ ταύτῃ bracketed by Lachm. There is considerable authority for the removal of the latter, but not for that of the former, which indeed can hardly be dispensed with. The latter may have been introduced from Matth., but the authority of the Pesch. Syr. confirms its authenticity.

For διασκορπισθήσεται, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read —συνταί, on considerable authority as regards uncial MSS., but, of cursives, only that of 4 or 5; to which I can only add 2 Lamb. and 3 Mus. copies. Accordingly, this is no case for change, as will appear from my note on Matt. xvi. 31. The reading may have been derived from the Alexandrian MS. of the Sept., in common with all recent Editions.

30. I have adopted the σὺ from the strongest external authority, confirmed by internal evidence, as will appear from my note on John vi. 19.

31. ἐκ περισσοῦ] Lachm. and Tisch. read ἐκ περισσῶν, from B, C, D; a manifest gloss, as Mr. Alf. is, I find, now aware.

32. I have, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., adopted Γεθσημανεῖ, instead of text. rec. Γεθσημανῇ, on very strong authority existing in most of the ancient MSS. (also in the Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence; though it must be confessed that the existence of Itacism either way makes the reading almost an open question.

33. ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι καὶ ἀδημ.] Meaning, 'to be seized with extreme perturbation of spirit, and to be utterly dejected, or cast down.' Of this very rare use of ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι I have noted only two examples,—Ecclus. xxx. 9, and Job xliii. 7, Aqu. Thus the expression is not simply equiv. to λυπεῖσθαι in the parallel passage of Matth.; though in each passage the two terms are associated, as in Exod. xxx. 9, ἐκθαμβ. and λυπεῖν, in order to denote that extreme of grief, even unto horror, by which the spirit is utterly cast down and overborne by the power of sorrowful emotion. Thus the simple verb θαμβέω, as H. Steph. testifies, frequently bears the sense 'stupore attonito parvo.' Perhaps Steph. would better have written torpore than stupore, as Livy has torpentes metus. In short, in this use of ἐκθαμβ. there seems an allusion to the touch of the torpedo; and indeed in the Latin obstupesco (the terms stupor and torpor are conjoined as synonymous in Ovid, Ep. Pont. i. 2, 29), as is clear from Plin. H. N. ix. 67, 'Novit torpore λέγει αὐτοῖς· Περὶ λυπὸς ἐστὶν ἡ ψυχὴ μου ἕως θανάτου· ^{MT. ⁴¹ καὶ ἔρχεται τὸ τρίτον, καὶ λέγει αὐτοῖς· Καθεύδετε τὸ λοιπὸν καὶ ἀναπαύεσθε· ἀπέχει!—ἦλθεν ἡ ὥρα· ἰδοὺ, παραδίδοται ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου εἰς τὰς χεῖρας τῶν ἁμαρτωλῶν.—⁴² Ἐγείρεσθε! ἄγωμεν! ἰδοὺ ὁ παραδιδούς με ἤγγικε.

vim suam, ipsa non torpens; mersaque in limo se occultat, pascium, qui securi supernatantes obturpauerunt (for obturpauerunt), corripient.

^{36.} Ἀββᾶ ὁ Πατήρ] There is here not, what some account, a pléonasm, founded on a custom of the Jews to call a person or thing by two names, one Hebrew, the other Greek; but the latter term is an interpretation of the former, as in Rom. viii. 15. Gal. iv. 6. Ἀββᾶ may be used, as it is supposed, according to the custom of commencing precatory addresses to God with the word 'Father'; but there is far more intended; and it has been shown by Bp. Middl., that the Article is here used instead of the Possessive pronoun, and is so expressed by the Syr. Vera. in all three passages. He justly regards the addition as expressive of the most impassioned feeling. Ἀββᾶ, he remarks, was the Oriental term by which children familiarly addressed their parents; and thus the addition 'my Father,' was requisite to give it solemnity and force.

^{37.} Σίμων, καθεύδεις;] From the parallel passage of Luke xxii. 46, it appears that besides this remonstrance to Peter in particular, our Lord addressed the same to the other disciples in general on their unseasonable sleepiness, when its opposite, a wakeful spirit, should have been found. In the passage of Matt. xxvi. 40, Peter is first addressed individually by the use of a plural verb, and then what was said is made a general remonstrance to the disciples in general as well as Peter in particular. We may suppose, then, that our Lord first addressed himself to Peter in such a way as to include, besides Peter, all the other disciples; then addressing him individually and by name, conveyed to Peter particularly what he had just done to the disciples (Peter included) generally.

^{40.} We may suppose that the disciples were not fast asleep, but rather slumbering, or dozing;

which, besides general probability, seems borne out by the mention of this minute particular (found in St. Mark alone of the Evangelists, and which, it is observable, like not a few others found in this Gospel, bears the impress of what is seen by an eye-witness), namely, ἦσαν οἱ ὀφθαλμοὶ αὐτῶν βεβαρημένοι, which seems to advert to that state of slumbering by which any one is unable to keep the eyes open, rather than that which may be said to amount to the state of settled sleep. For βεβαρημένοι, many ancient MSS., including some Lamb. and Mus. copies, have καταβαρυνόμενοι, which has been edited by Fritz., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But it has every appearance of being from the margin, and proceeding from a mere grammatical correction of style, since in βαρύνω and καταβαρ. we have purer Greek than βαρίω and καταβαρίω.

—καὶ οὐκ ᾔδεισαν τί αὐτῷ ἀποκριθῶσι] Here we have another graphic particular, such as marks an eye-witness, and which is such as none but an eye-witness would be likely to have included.

^{41.} ἀπέχει] Of the various interpretations of this disputed term, there are only two which have any claim to attention. 1. That of most of the recent Commentators, absent, i.e. transiit animi mei angor. But this is liable to insuperable objections, both Grammatical and others. 2. That of Luther, Beza, H. Steph., Hammond, Gatak., Raphael, Heupel, and Fritz., 'sufficit,' it is enough, q. d. 'I no longer need your vigils.' This is strongly confirmed by the ancient Versions, and the Glosses of the Scholiasts, and yet more by the ικανὸν ἴσσι of Luke. And although the sense be rare, yet there have been two other examples added; one from Anacreon, xviii. 33, ἀπέχει· βλάτω γὰρ αὐτήν, and another from Cyril. Thus ἀπέχει is an impersonal, and to be taken, as the simple ἴχιν and many of its compounds frequently are, in a neuter sense.

44. σύσσημον] 'A concerted signal, a token agreed on with others.' This is an Alexandrian and later Greek form for the earlier and pure Class. σημῖον, used by Matth. It occurs in the Sept. Judg. xx. 40, twice in Diod. and once in Strabo. Αὐτός just after is Hellenistic Greek for οὗτος, as often as in New Test. Ἀσφ. is to be construed not with κρατ., but with ἀπαγ., the sense being safely and surely, as in Acts xvi. 23, the jailor is ordered ἀσφαλῶς τηρεῖν αὐτούς.

— For ἀπαγάγετε, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ἀπάγετε, from B, D, L, and 4 cursives; to which I can add nothing; nor is the reading at all to be approved; since it arose evidently from critical correction framed for the purpose of getting rid of the reduplication (which is, some think, Hellenistic), similarly to what has been done on various other occasions in the use of the verb ἀγω and ἀπάγω, espec. where the Critics thought a Present sense required, not knowing that in such a case the Aorist Imper. directs to 'have a thing done,' and here κρατήσατε requires the Aorist at ἀπ.

47. εἰς δὲ τις] The expression εἰς τις is generally used of one whose name we know not, or do not care to mention. The reason for suppressing the name here is obvious. That for using the same indefinite expression further on, at verse 51, seems to have been from the Evangelist not knowing the person's name. For, though many conjectures thereupon have been hazarded, yet not one of them has even probability to recommend it, except this,—that he was a young man of the Roman soldiery; espec. as again, in this very verse, the Article points to a particular part of the company; which could only have been the soldiery.

— For ῥῶτίον, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ὠτάριον, from B, D, and one cursive;—very insufficient authority, espec. as internal evidence is against the word, which seems to have been a correction of the Critics, who were aware that ὠτίον was condemned by the Atticists, and is used by no pure Greek writer; while ὠτάριον occurs in two very pure Greek writers, Alexis and Anaxandrides, from whom four examples are adduced by Lobeck on Phryn. p. 212.

49. ἐκράτησατε] Tisch. and Alf. edit ἐκρα-τεῖτε, from one MS. alone (B); while Lachm. retains the text rec.;—very properly, since the other reading was a mere critical alteration, introduced on some fancied ground of propriety,—which is far more probable than that all the copies but one should have been altered from Matt.

51. For ἠκολούθει, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read συνηκ., from B, C, L; which reading is confirmed by supra v. 37, where some ancient copies have ἀκολ. However, the reading cannot be admitted without stronger authority; and I can supply none, but very much for ἠκολούθησεν, which I find in most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, in addition to all the most ancient cursives; so that I have, with Scholz, now admitted it into the text.

On σινδὼνα see note on Matt. xxvii. 59. The sense, however, is here somewhat different. For as the word primarily denoted 'a web of cloth,' so it came to mean a wrapper, denoting properly a kind of cloak, like the Scotch plaid, and still in use in the East, but also an upper garment, such as was used for a night-gown; of which Weststein adduces examples from Herodotus and Galen. And this is doubtless the sense here.

— ἐπὶ γυμνοῦ] Almost all Commentators suppose an ellipse of σώματος. But Fritz would take it as a Genitive of the nelder noun, τὸ γυμνόν, the naked body. That, however, would require the Article; and the existence of the word must not be admitted without some authority more valid than the use of τὰ γυμνά, 'the unprotected parts of the body.' The phrase is plainly a brief expression for ἐπὶ τοῦ γυμνοῦ τοῦ σώματος, and the very elliptical form it assumes, shows that it was much in use; probably in the phraseology of common life.

— οἱ νεανίσκοι] This, by the force of the Article, must denote the Roman soldiers just mentioned. Examples are adduced by Rosen-νεανίσκοι. 52 Ὁ δὲ καταλιπὼν τὴν σινδόνα, γυμνὸς ἔφυγεν ἀπ' αὐτῶν. MT. LU. 26. 22.

Σὺ εἶ ὁ Χριστὸς ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Εὐλογητοῦ; 62 ὁ δὲ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν 64 muller and Kuinoel of this sense in Greek, and also of juvenitutes and adolescentes in Latin. Nay, it even extends to the Hebrew.

52. γυμνός] Comp. Galen: μὴ γυμνὸς κομίζεσθαι, ἀλλὰ περιβεβλημένος σινδόνα.

54. πρὸς τὸ φῶς] for πρὸς τὸ πῦρ. This has been proved to be a Hebraism, such as often occurs in the Sept., and corresponds to ἡμ. For though the purity of the Greek has been maintained by many Commentators, yet they only adduce passages where the word signifies fulgor, rather than ignis; or, in one or two instances, a blaze, such as arises from ignited wood. Thus, by a metonymy of effect for cause, φῶς is transferred to all objects which emit light, though it may be accompanied with heat likewise.
